Reph'a-im (see above), the Valley of (see below), a spot which was the scene of some of David's most remarkable adventures (2 Sam. v. 18, 22, xxiii. 13; 1 Chr. xi. 15, xiv. 9), and was noted for its fertility (Is. xvii. 5). He twice encountered the Philistines there, and inflicted a destruction on them and on their idols so signal that it gave the place a new name. Probably during the former of these two contests the incident of the water of Bethlehem (2 Sam. xxiii. 13 ff., &c.) occurred. The "hold" (ver. 14) in which David found himself, seems (though it is not clear) to have been the cave of ADULLAM. This narrative seems to imply that the valley of Rephaim was near Bethlehem. Josephus mentions it as "the valley which extends (from Jerusalem) to the city of Bethlehem." Since the latter part of the sixteenth century (so Mr. Grove) the name has been attached to the upland plain which stretches S. of Jerusalem, and is crossed by the road to Bethlehem—the el-Buk'ah of the modern Arabs. Mr. Grove regards this plain, though appropriate in respect to its proximity to Bethlehem, as not answering at all to the meaning of the Hebrew 'emek, which designates an enclosed valley. But Porter (in Kitto) and Bonar (Land of Promise) maintain that though a wide plain with a scarcely perceptible S. W. slope, it is really a valley, being surrounded on all sides by low hills. A position N. W. of the city is adopted by Fürst, apparently on the ground of the terms of Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16 (A. V. "valley of the giants"). Tobler adopts the Wady Dér Jasin, one of the side valleys of the Wady Beit Hanina. (ELAH, VALLEY OF.) The valley appears to derive its name from the ancient Rephaim. GIANTS 3.

Reph'i-dim (Heb. rests or stays, Mr. Hayman; refreshments, Ges.; plains, Fū.), a station in the march of the Israelites from Egypt to SINAI (Ex. xvii. 1, 8, xix. 2). Lepsius's view is that Mount Serbal is the true Horeb, and that Rephidim is Wady Feirán. (PARAN.) This would account for the expectation of finding water here, which, however, from some unexplained cause failed. In Ex. xvii. 6, "the rock in Horeb" is named as the source of the water miraculously supplied. (MASSAH; MERIBAH 1.) On the other hand, the language used Ex. xix. 1, 2, seems precise, as regards the point that the journey from Rephidim to Sinai was a distinct stage. The name Horeb is by Robinson taken to mean an extended range or region, some part of which was near to Rephidim, which he places at Wady esh-Sheikh, running from N. E. to S. W., on the west side of Jebel el-Fureia, opposite the northern face of the modern Horeb. It joins the Wady Feirán. The exact spot of Robinson's Rephidim is a defile in the esh-Sheikh described by Burckhardt as at about five hours' distance from where it issues from the plain Er-Raheh, narrowing between abrupt cliffs of blackened granite to about forty feet in width. Here is also the traditional "Seat of Moses." Keil and Delitzsch, Porter (in Kitto), Rowlands (in Fairbairn), also place Rephidim in some part of Wady esh-Sheikh. Mr. Hayman (original author of this article), Stanley, Ritter, Stewart, &c., with Lepsius, place Rephidim in Wady Feirán. The fertility and richness of the Wady Feirán account, as Stanley thinks, for the Amalekites' struggle to retain possession against those whom they viewed as intrusive aggressors.

* Rep'ro-bate (fr. L.), the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. participle nimás = rejected, worthless, Ges., Fū., &c. (fr. múas, to reject), spoken of silver (Jer. vi. 30, margin "refuse"), translated "contemned" (Ps. xv. 4).—2. Gr. adj. adokimos = (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) not approved, rejected; used figuratively in N. T. mostly of persons, worthy of condemnation (Rom. i. 28; 2 Tim. iii. 8), disappointed, disallowed (1 Cor. ix. 27, A. V. "cast-away"; 2 Cor. xiii. 5-7), hence worthless (Tit. i. 16), once of land, worthless, waste (Heb. vi. 8, A. V. "rejected").

Re'sen (Heb. a curb, bridle, Ges.), mentioned only in Gen. x. 12, as one of the cities built by Asshur, "between Nineveh and Calah." Many have been inclined to identify it with Resina or Rhesena of the Byzantine authors, and of Ptolemy, near the source of the western Khabour, and most probably the modern Ras-el-ain. Bochart found Resen in the Larissa of Xenophon, the modern Nimrud (= CALAH, according to Rawlinson). Assyrian remains of some considerable extent are found between Nimrud and the remains of NINEVEH opposite Mosul, near the modern village of Selamiyeh, and Rawlinson conjectures that these represent the Resen of Genesis. The later Jews appear to have identified Resen with the Kileh-Sherghat ruins. ASSYRIA; NIMROD.

* Resh (Heb. resh = head), the twentieth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.). WRITING.

Resheph (Heb. flame, lightning, fever, Ges.), son of Ephraim and brother of Rephah (1 Chr. vii. 25).

* Res-ur-rec'tion (fr. L.) = a rising again from the dead. This is the proper and usual A. V. translation of the Gr. anastasis, once rendered "rising again," i. e. the uprising or salvation, in contrast with "fall," i. e. downfall or destruction (Lk. ii. 34); and twice, with a preposition, rendered by a verb (Acts xxvi. 23, A. V. "that should rise"; Heb. xi. 35, A. V. "raised to life again"; both literally from a resurrection). The word is used (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) in the N. T., except in Lk. i. c., to denote the rising again of the body from DEATH, the return of the dead body to LIFE, with reference—(a.) To individuals who have returned to life on earth (Heb. xi. 35; see above, and compare 1 K. xvii. 17 ff. and 2 K. iv. 20 ff.), usually of JESUS CHRIST in this application (Acts i. 22, ii. 31, iv. 33, xvii. 18; Rom. i. 4, vi. 5; Phil. iii. 10; 1 Pet. i. 3, iii. 21). (b.) To the future and general rising from the dead at the end of the world, a truth which Jesus taught in opposition to the SADDUCEES, &c. (Mat. xxii. 23 ff.; Mk. xii. 18 ff.; Lk. xx. 27 ff.; Jn. xi. 24; Acts iv. 2, xvii. 32, xxiii. 6, 8, xxiv. 15, 21, xxvi. 23 [see above]; 1 Cor. xv. 12 ff.; 2 Tim. ii. 18 [HYMENEUS; PHILETUS]; Heb. vi. 2). "The resurrection of LIFE" (i. e. of the saints or people of God unto ETERNAL happiness) is contrasted with "the resurrection of DAMNATION" (i. e. of the wicked unto eternal punishment; compare Mat. xxv. 31-41) in Jn. v. 29, and is "the better resurrection" of Heb. xi. 35 (i. e. better than the being raised again to this mortal life on earth), and "the resurrection of the just" (Lk. xiv. 14), or simply "the resurrection" (xx. 35, 36). "The first resurrection" in Rev. xx. 5, 6, is by some (Rbn. N. T. Lex., &c.) considered as "resurrection of the just" in Lk. xiv. 14, and that in xx. 35, 36; Prof. Stuart (on the Apocalypse, ii. 359 ff., 475), Joseph Mede, &c., regard it as a literal, but partial resurrection (viz. of martyrs and saints especially faithful) before the general resurrection; others (Archbishop Whately, Essays on the Future State; Dr. T. Scott; Barnes, on Rev. xx. 4-6; and others) regard it as a figurative resurrection, i. e. a revival of the principles or spirit (compare ver. 4, 14, "souls," "second death," also Rom. vi. 4 ff.; Col. iii. 1; Mat. xvii. 12, 13, &c.) of the martyr-saints, a remarkable prevalence of their characteristics, as if they were alive and ruling everywhere; millenniumists hold that it is a literal resurrection of all the dead saints preceding their personal reign with Christ on earth for 1,000 years, &c. In Jn. xi. 25, "Jesus said . . . I am the resurrection," i. e. the author of the resurrection.—The Gr. egeris (literally a waking up from sleep, a rising up; compare Dan. xii. 2) occurs once in the N. T. to denote the "resurrection" of Jesus (Mat. xxvii. 53); and the compound exanastasis (literally a rising up out of; see anastasis above) is once used for the "resurrection" of the righteous dead or saints (Phil. iii. 11; see above).—The Gr. verb anistēmi (literally to make stand up or raise up, and to stand up or rise up; from this comes anastasis above) is often used with reference to the resurrection or restoration of the body to life, both transitively (Jn. vi. 39 [A. V. "raise up again"], 40, 44, 54 ["raise up"], &c.) and intransitively (Mat. xii. 41 [A. V. "rise"], xx. 19 ["rise again"], xvii. 9 ["he risen again"], &c.). So also the Gr. verb egeirō (literally to awaken, to wake up, and, in the middle voice, to awake, to arise, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) is used either of a restoration to life (Mat. x. 8 [A. V. "raise," sc. the dead], xiv. 2 ["is risen"], xxvii. 52 ["arose"], 63 ["rise again"], &c.) or of the future resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 15, 16, 29, 32 [A. V. "rise" in all these], 35, 42-44, 52 ["raised" in these], &c.). In 1 Cor. xv. an argument for a future resurrection of believers, &c., is drawn from the resurrection of JESUS CHRIST. MAN; MIRACLES; PHARISEES; SADDUCEES, &c.

Reu, or Ben (Heb. friend, sc. of God, Ges.), son of Peleg, in the line of Abraham's ancestors (Gen. xi. 18-21; 1 Chr. i. 25); = RAGAU 2.

Ben ben (Heb. see ye, a son! Ges., A. V. margin; or, provided in my affliction, Gen. xxix. 32? Ges.; or, the pity of God, Jos.), Jacob's firstborn child (Gen. xxix. 32), son of Leah, apparently not born till an unusual interval had elapsed after the marriage (31). The notices of the patriarch Reuben in the Book of Genesis and the early Jewish traditional literature are unusually frequent, and on the whole give a favorable view of his disposition. To him, and him alone, the preservation of Joseph's life appears to have been due. His anguish at the disappearance of his brother, and the frustration of his kindly artifice for delivering him (xxxvii. 22), his recollection of the minute details of the painful scene many years afterward (xlii. 22), his offer to take the sole responsibility of the safety of the brother who had succeeded to Joseph's place in the family (xlii. 37), all testify to a warm and (for those rough times) a kindly nature. Of the repulsive crime which mars his history, and which turned the blessing of his dying father into a curse—his adulterous connection with Bilhah—we know from the Scriptures only the fact (xxxv. 22). These traits, slight as they are, are those of an ardent, impetuous, unbalanced, but not ungenerous nature; not crafty and cruel, as were Simeon and Levi, but rather, to use the metaphor of the dying patriarch, boiling up like a vessel of water over the rapid wood-fire of the nomad tent, and as quickly subsiding into apathy when the fuel was withdrawn.—At the time of the migration into Egypt Reuben's sons were four (xvii. 9; 1 Chr. v. 3). From them sprang the chief families of the tribe (Num. xxvi. 5-11). DATHAN and ABIRAM were of this tribe (xvi. 1, xxvi. 8-11). The census at Mount Sinai (i. 20, 21, ii. 11) shows that at the Exodus the tribe had 46,500 men above twenty years of age, and fit for active warlike service. On the borders of Canaan there were 43,730 (xxvi. 7). In the wilderness the position of Reuben was on the southern side of the Tabernacle. The "camp" of Reuben was formed of his own tribe, of Simeon, and of Gad. The Reubenites, like the Gadites, had maintained through the march to Canaan the ancient calling of their forefathers. (PATRIARCH; SHEPHERD.) Their cattle accompanied them from Egypt (Ex. xii. 38). It followed naturally that when the nation arrived on the pasturelands E. of the Jordan, the three tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manassah, should prefer a request to their leader to be allowed to remain in a place so perfectly suited to their requirements. The part selected by Reuben had at that date the special name of the Mishôr (PLAIN 4), with reference possibly to its evenness. Under its modern name of the Belka it is still esteemed beyond all others by the Arab sheepmasters. The country E. of Jordan apparently was not included in the original land promised to Abraham. When the Reubenites and their fellows approach Moses with their request, his main objection is that by what they propose they will discourage the hearts of the children of Israel from going over Jordan into the land which Jehovah had given them (Num. xxxii. 7). Only on their undertaking to fulfil their part in the conquest of the western country, the land of CANAAN proper, and thus satisfying him that their proposal was grounded in no selfish desire to escape a full share of the difficulties of the conquest, does Moses consent to their proposal.—From this time it seems as if a bar, not only of distance, and of the intervening river and mountain-wall, but also of difference in feeling and habits, gradually grew up more substantially between the eastern and western tribes. The first act of the former after the completion of the conquest, and after they had taken part in the solemn ceremonial in the valley between Ebal and Gerizim, shows how wide a gap already existed between their ideas and those of the western tribes. The pile of stones which they erected on the western bank of the Jordan to mark their boundary was erected in accordance with the unalterable habits of Bedouin tribes both before and since. It was an act identical with that in which LABAN and JACOB engaged at parting, with that which is constantly performed by the Bedouins of the present day. But by the Israelites W. of Jordan, who were fast relinquishing their nomad habits and feelings for those of more settled permanent life, this act was completely misunderstood, and was construed into an attempt to set up a rival altar to that of the Sacred Tent.—No judge, no prophet, no hero of the tribe of Reuben is banded down to us. In the dire extremity of their brethren in the N. under Deborah and Barak, they contented themselves with debating the news among the streams of the Mishôr; Reuben lingered among his sheepfolds and preferred the shepherd's pipe and the bleating of the flocks to the clamor of the trumpet and the turmoil of battle. His individuality fades more rapidly than Gad's. No person, no incident, is recorded, to place Reuben before us in any distincter form than as a member of the community (if community it can be called) of "the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh" (1 Chr. xii. 37). Thus remote from the central seat of the national government and of the national religion, it is not to be wondered at that Reuben relinquished the faith of Jehovah. The last historical notice which we possess of them, while it records this fact, records also as its natural consequence that the Reubenites and Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh were carried off by Pul and Tiglath-pileser (v. 25, 26).

* Reu'ben-ite (fr. Heb.) = a descendant of REUBEN, and member of his tribe (Num. xxvi. 7; Deut. iii. 12, 16; 1 Chr. xi. 42. &c.).

Reu'el (Heb. friend of God, Ges.). 1. One of the sons of Esau, by his wife Bashmeth, sister of Ishmael (Gen. xxxvi. 4, 10, 13, 17; 1 Chr. i. 35, 37). —2. One of the names of Moses' father-in-law (Ex. ii. 18); the same which, through adherence to the LXX. form, is given in another passage of the A.V. RAGUEL.—3. Father of Eliasaph, the leader of the tribe of Gad, at the time of the census at Sinai (Num. ii. 14).—4. A Benjamite, ancestor of Elah (1 Chr. ix. 8).

* Reve-la-tion (fr. L.); Gr. apokalupsis; both literally = an uncovering or unveiling, hence a disclosure or manifestation, especially from God, of what was before unseen or unknown. The word "revelation" or "revelations" occurs mostly in the Epistles (Rom. ii. 5, xvi. 25; 2 Cor. xii. 1, 7, &c.), once in Rev. i. 1. The infinite wisdom and power and skill of God are made known in the CREATION: the great truths which He has revealed to mankind are contained in the BIBLE (INSPIRATION; MIRACLES; PROPHECY); His grace and glory are especially manifested in JESUS CHRIST, the SON OF GOD, and SAVIOUR. "Revelation" is popularly used to designate the REVELATION OF ST. JOHN.

Reve-la-tion (see above) of St. John, often called the APOCALYPSE, from the Gr. title Apokalupsis Ioannou.—A. Canonical Authority and Authorship. The question as to the canonical authority of the Revelation resolves itself into a question of authorship. Was ST. JOHN THE APOSTLE and Evangelist the writer of the Revelation? This question was first mooted by Dionysius of Alexandria. The doubt which he modestly suggested has been confidently proclaimed in modern times by Luther, and widely diffused through his influence. But the general belief of the mass of Christians in all ages has been in favor of St. John's authorship. The evidence adduced in support of that belief consists of (1.) the assertions of the author, and (2.) historical tradition. (1.) The author's description of himself in chs. i. and xxii. is certainly equivalent to an assertion that he is the apostle. (a.) He names himself simply "John," without prefix or addition. He is also described as (b.) a servant of Christ; (c.) one who had borne testimony as an eye-witness of the word of God and of the testimony of Christ—terms which were surely designed to identify him with the writer of Jn. xix. 35, i. 14, and 1 Jn. i. 2; (d.) in PATMOS for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ; (e.) a fellow-sufferer with those whom he addresses; (f.) the authorized channel of the most direct and important communication ever made to the seven Churches of Asia, of which Churches John the Apostle was at that time the spiritual governor and teacher; (g.) a fellow-servant of angels and a brother of prophets. All these marks are found united together in the Apostle John, and in him alone of all historical persons. A candid reader of the Revelation, if previously acquainted with St. John's other writings and life, must inevitably conclude that the writer intended to be identified with St. John. Yet Lücke conjectures that some Asiatic disciple and namesake of the apostle may have written the book in the course of some missionary labors or some time of sacred retirement in Patmos. Unless we are prepared to give up the veracity and divine origin of the whole book, and to treat the writer's account of himself as a mere fiction of a poet trying to cover his own insignificance with an honored name, we must accept that description as a plain statement of fact, equally credible with the rest of the book, and in harmony with the simple, honest, truthful character which is stamped on the face of the whole narrative (so Mr. Bullock, original author of this article). Besides this direct assertion of St. John's authorship, there is also an implication of it running through the book. Generally, the instinct of single-minded, patient, faithful students has led them to recognize not merely the same Spirit as the source of this and other books of Holy Scripture, but also the same peculiarly-formed human instrument employed both in producing this book and the fourth Gospel (JOHN, GOSPEL OF), and in speaking the characteristic words and performing the characteristic actions recorded of St. John.—(2.) Historical testimonies in favor of St. John's authorship. (a.) Justin Martyr, about A. D. 150, says:—"A man among us whose name was John, one of the apostles of Christ, in a revelation which was made to him, prophesied that the believers in our Christ shall live a thousand years in Jerusalem." (b.) The author of the Muratorian Fragment, about A. D. 170, speaks of St. John as the writer of the Apocalypse. (c.) Melito of Sardis, about A. D. 170, wrote a treatise on the Revelation of John. Eusebius (H. E. iv. 26) mentions this among the books of Melito; and it may be presumed that he found no doubt as to St. John's authorship in the book of this ancient Asiatic bishop. (d.) Theophilus, bishop of Antioch (about 180), in a controversy with Hermogenes, quotes passages out of the Revelation of John. (e.) Irenæus (about 195), apparently never having heard a suggestion of any other author than the apostle, often quotes the Revelation as the work of John. He describes John, the writer of the Revelation, as the same who was leaning on Jesus' bosom at supper, and asked Him who should betray Him. (f.) Apollonius (about 200) of Ephesus (?), in controversy with the Montanists of Phrygia, quoted passages out of the Revelation of John, and narrated a miracle wrought by John at Ephesus. (g.) Clement of Alexandria (about 200) quotes the book as the Revelation of John, and as the work of an apostle. (h.) Tertullian (A. D. 207) quotes by name "the Apostle John in the Apocalypse." (i.) Hippolytus (about 230) is said, in the inscription on his statue at Rome, to have composed an apology for the Apocalypse and Gospel of St. John the Apostle. (j.) Origen

(about 283), in his Commentary on St. John, quoted by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 25), says of the apostle, "he wrote also the Revelation." The testimonies of later writers, in the third and fourth centuries, in favor of St. John's authorship of the Revelation are equally distinct and far more numerous. All the foregoing writers, testifying that the book came from an apostle, believed that it was a part of Holy Scripture. It is also quoted as having canonical authority by Papias, Cyprian, and in the Epistle from the churches of Lyons and Vienne, A. D. 177. It was admitted into the list of the Third Council of Carthage, A. D. 397. Such is the evidence in favor of St. John's authorship and of the canonical authority of this book. (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; NEW TESTAMENT.)—The following facts must be weighed on the other side. Marcion, who regarded all the apostles, except St. Paul, as corrupters of the truth, rejected the Apocalypse and all other books of the N. T. which were not written by St. Paul. (LUKE, GOSPEL OF.) The Alogi, an obscure sect, about A. D. 180, rejected the Revelation, saying it was the work, not of John, but of Cerinthus. But the testimony which is considered the most important of all in ancient times against the Revelation is contained in a fragment of Dionysius of Alexandria, about A. D. 240, the most influential and perhaps the ablest bishop in that age. He testifies that some writers before him altogether repudiated the Revelation as a forgery of Cerinthus; that many brethren, however, prized it very highly, and Dionysius would not venture to reject it, but received it in faith as containing things too deep and too sublime for his understanding. He argues that the way in which the name "John" is mentioned, and the general character of the language, are unlike what we should expect from John the Evangelist and Apostle; that there were many Johns in that age. He would not say that John Mark was the writer, since it is not known that he was in Asia. He supposes it must be the work of some John who lived in Asia. To this extent, and no further, Dionysius is a witness against St. John's authorship. It is obvious that he knew of no authority for attributing it to any other John. A weightier difficulty arises from the fact that the Revelation is one of the books absent from the ancient Peshito version. (VERSIONS, ANCIENT [SYRIAC].) Eusebius is remarkably sparing in his quotations from the "Revelation of John," and the uncertainty of his opinion about it is best shown by his statement that "it is likely that the Revelation was seen by the second John (the Ephesian presbyter), if any one is unwilling to believe that it was seen by the apostle." Jerome states that the Greek Churches felt, with respect to the Revelation, a similar doubt to that of the Latins respecting the Epistle to the Hebrews. (HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE.) Neither he nor Augustine shared such doubts.—B. Time and Place of Writing. The date of the Revelation is given by the great majority of critics as A. D. 95–97. Irenæus says: "It (i. e. the Revelation) was seen no very long time ago, but almost in our own generation, at the close of Domitian's reign." Eusebius also records that, in the persecution under Domitian, John the Apostle and Evangelist was banished to the island Patmos for his testimony of the divine word. There is no mention in any writer of the first three centuries of any other time or place. Unsupported by any historical evidence, some commentators have inferred, from the style and contents of the book, that the Revelation was written as early as the time of Nero. It has been inferred from i. 2, 9, 10, that the Revelation was written in Ephesus, immediately after the apostle's return from Patmos. But the style in which the messages to the seven Churches are delivered rather suggests the notion that the book was written in Patmos.—C. Language. The doubt first suggested by Harenberg, whether the Revelation was written in Aramaic, has met with little or no reception. The silence of all ancient writers as to any Aramaic original is alone a sufficient answer to the suggestion. Lücke has also collected internal evidence to show that the original is the Greek of a Jewish Christian. Lücke has also examined in minute detail the peculiarities of language which obviously distinguish the Revelation from every other book of the N. T. He urges with great force the difference between the Revelation on one side and the fourth Gospel and first Epistle on the other, in respect of their style and composition and the mental character and attainments of the writer of each. Hengstenberg maintains that they are by one writer. It may be admitted that the Revelation has many surprising grammatical peculiarities. But much of this is accounted for by the fact that it was probably written down, as it was seen, "in the Spirit," while the ideas, in all their novelty and vastness, filled the apostle's mind, and rendered him less capable of attending to forms of speech.—D. Contents. After the title of the book, the description of the writer, the blessing on the readers, and the salutation of the seven Churches of Asia (i. 1–4), John touches the keynote of the whole book—the Person of Christ, the redemption wrought by Him, His second coming to judge mankind, the painful, hopeful discipline of Christians in this present world (5–9). The first vision (i. 7–iii. 22) shows the Son of Man with His injunction, or Epistles to the seven Churches. In the next vision (iv. 1–viii. 1) John in heaven sees God on His throne, the seven-sealed book or roll produced and received by the slain Lamb, the Redeemer, amid universal adoration, and its seven seals opened by Him in order, the apostle narrating the signs which he sees as they are opened. Then come the seven angels who sound the seven trumpets (viii. 2–xi. 19), the reign of Christ with the judgment of the dead and the destruction of the earth's destroyers being proclaimed at the last. The second half of the Revelation (xii.–xxii.) comprises a series of visions connected by various links. It may be described generally as a prophecy of the assaults of the devil and his agents (= the dragon, the ten-horned beast, the two-horned beast or false prophet, and the harlot) upon the Church, and their final destruction. (ANTICHRIST; BABYLON 2; JUDGMENT; RESURRECTION; RIDDLE, &c.) It appears to begin with a reference to anterior events, and closes with views of the final judgment, the new heaven and the new earth, the new Jerusalem with its people and their way of life, the last sixteen verses containing a solemn asseveration of the truth and importance of the foregoing sayings, a blessing on those who keep them, a warning of His speedy coming, and of the nearness of the time when these prophecies shall be fulfilled.—E. Interpretation. A short account of the different directions in which attempts have been made to interpret the Revelation, is all that can be given in this place. The interval between the apostolic age and that of Constantine has been called the Chilastic period of Apocalyptic interpretation. The visions of St. John were chiefly regarded as representations of general Christian truths, scarcely yet embodied in actual facts, for the most part to be exemplified or fulfilled in the reign of Antichrist, the coming of Christ, the millennium, and the day of judgment. Immediately after the triumph of Constantine, the Christians, emancipated from oppression and persecution, and dominant and prosperous in their turn, began to lose their vivid expectation of our Lord's speedy advent, and their spiritual conception of His kingdom, and to look upon the temporal supremacy of Christianity as a fulfilment of the promised reign of Christ on earth. The Roman empire, become Christian, was regarded no longer as the object of prophetic denunciation, but as the scene of a millennial development. This view, however, was soon met by the figurative interpretation of the millennium as the reign of Christ in the hearts of all true believers. As the barbarous and heretical invaders of the falling empire appeared, they were regarded by the suffering Christians as fulfilling the woes denounced in the Revelation. The views to which the reputation of Abbot Joachim (of Calabria, A. D. 1200) gave currency became the foundation of that great historical school of interpretation which up to this time seems the most popular of all. Modern interpreters are generally placed in three great divisions. a. The Historical or Continuous expositors, in whose opinion the Revelation is a progressive history of the fortunes of the Church from the first century to the end of time (Mede, Sir I. Newton, Vitringa, Bengel, Woodhouse, Faber, E. B. Elliott, Wordsworth, Hengstenberg, Ebrard, Alford mainly, &c.). b. The Preterist expositors, who are of opinion that the Revelation has been almost, or altogether, fulfilled in the time which has passed since it was written; that it refers principally to the triumph of Christianity over Judaism and Paganism, signalized in the downfall of Jerusalem and of Rome (Alcasar, Grotius, Hammond, Bossuet, Calmet, Wetstein, Eichhorn, Hug, Herder, Ewald, Lücke, De Wette, Stuart, Lee, Maurice, &c.). c. The Futurist expositors, who believe that the whole book, excepting perhaps the first three chapters, refers principally, if not exclusively, to events which are yet to come (Dr. J. H. Todd, Dr. S. R. Maitland, B. Newton, C. Maitland, I. Williams, De Burgh, &c.).—Two methods have been proposed by which the student of the Revelation may escape the incongruities and fallacies of the different interpretations, whilst he may derive edification from whatever truth they contain. It has been suggested that the book may be regarded as a prophetic poem, dealing in general and inexact descriptions, much of which may be set down as poetic imagery, mere embellishment. But such a view would be difficult to reconcile with the belief that the book is an inspired prophecy. A better suggestion is made, or rather revived, by Dr. Arnold in his Sermons On the Interpretation of Prophecy: that we should bear in mind that predictions have a lower historical sense, as well as a higher spiritual sense: that there may be one or more than one typical, imperfect, historical fulfilment of a prophecy, in each of which the higher spiritual fulfilment is shadowed forth more or less distinctly. OLD TESTAMENT, B, note 2; PROPHET.

* Rev'e-nue. KING; PUBLICAN; TAXES.

Re'zeph (fr. Heb. = a stone heated to roast meat or bake bread on it, Ges.), one of the places which Sennacherib mentions in his taunting message to Hezekiah, as destroyed by his predecessor (2 K. xix. 12; Is. xxxvii. 12); a day's march W. of the Euphrates, on the road from Racca to Hums (so Gesenius, Keil, Thenius, &c.); E. of the Euphrates, near Bagdad (so Hitzig).

Re-zi'a (fr. Heb. = delight, Ges.), an Asherite chief, of the sons of Ulla (1 Chr. vii. 39).

Re'zin (fr. Heb. = lover, friend? or firm, stable? or prince? Ges.; a holding together, regulation, hence dominion, Fū.). 1. A king of DAMASCUS, contemporary with PEKAH in Israel, and with JOTHAM and AHAZ in Judea. He attacked Jotham during the latter part of his reign (2 K. xv. 37); but his chief war was with AHAZ, whose territories he invaded, in company with PEKAH (about B. C. 741). The combined army laid siege to Jerusalem, where AHAZ was, but "could not prevail against it" (Is. vii. 1; 2 K. xvi. 5). Rezin, however, "recovered Elath to Syria" (xvi. 6). Soon after this he was attacked, defeated, and slain by TIGLATH-PILESER II., king of Assyria (xvi. 9). (ISAIAH).—2. Ancestor of a family of Nethinim, who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 48; Neh. vii. 50).

Re'zon (Heb. prince, Ges.), son of Eliadah; a Syrian, who when David defeated Hadadezer, king of Zobah, put himself at the head of a band of freebooters and set up a petty kingdom at DAMASCUS (1 K. xi. 23). He may have been an officer of Hadadezer, who, foreseeing the destruction which David would inflict, prudently escaped with some followers; or more probably (so Mr. Wright) he gathered his band of the remnant of those who survived the slaughter. Rezon's settlement at Damascus could not have been till some time after the battle in which Hadadezer's power was broken, for David at the same time defeated the army of Damascus Syrians who came to the relief of Hadadezer, and put garrisons in Damascus. From his position at Damascus Rezon harassed the kingdom of Solomon during his whole reign.

Rhe'gi-um [re'je-un] (L. fr. Gr. rhégnumi = to break, or break through, because the sea anciently broke through there between Italy and Sicily, Pape, L. & S., &c.), an Italian town on the Bruttian coast, at the southern entrance of the straits of Messina; mentioned (Acts xxviii. 13) in the account of St. Paul's voyage from Syracuse to Puteoli, after the shipwreck at Malta. (See map under PAUL.) The figures on its coins are the "twin brothers" (Castor and Pollux) who gave the name to St. Paul's ship. The place was originally a Greek colony: it was miserably destroyed by Dionysius of Syracuse: from Augustus it received advantages which combined with its geographical position in making it important throughout the duration of the Roman empire. The modern Reggio is a town of 10,000 inhabitants, about six miles across the straits from Messina.

Rhe'sa (Gr., see below), son of Zorobabel in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. iii. 27). Lord A. C. Hervey has conjectured that "Rhesa" is no person, but merely the title Rōsh, i. e. "Prince," originally attached to the name of Zerubbabel.

* Rhi-noe'e-ros-es [ri-nos-] (fr. Gr.), Rhi-noe'e-ros in some copies, plural of Rhinoceros (Is. xxxiv. 7 margin). UNICORN.

Rho'da (fr. Gr. = rose, rose-bush), a maid who announced Peter's arrival at the door of Mary's house after his miraculous release from prison (Acts xii. 13).

Rhodes [pronounced like roads] (fr. Gr. Rhodos; L. Rhodus; thus named [so Diodorus Siculus] from a daughter of the god Neptune, or [so others] from its abounding in roses [comp. RHODA]). St. Paul touched at this island on his return voyage to Syria from the third missionary journey (Acts xxi. 1). Rhodes is immediately opposite the high Carian and Lycian headlands at the S. W. extremity of the peninsula of Asia Minor. Its position has had much to do with its history. Its real eminence began (about 400 B. C.) with the founding of that city at the N. E. extremity of the island which still continues to be the capital. After Alexander's death it entered on a glorious period, its material prosperity being largely developed, and its institutions deserving and obtaining general esteem. Its Colossus, a statue of Apollo, 70 cubits or 105 feet high, was one of the wonders of the ancient world. As we approach the time of the consolidation of the Roman power in the Levant, we have a notice of Jewish residents in Rhodes (1 Mc. xv. 23). The Romans, after the defeat of Antiochus, assigned, during some time, to Rhodes certain districts on the mainland (CARIA; LYCIA); and after these were withdrawn, the island still enjoyed (from Augustus to Vespasian) a considerable amount of independence. Its Byzantine history is again eminent. Under Constantine it was the metropolis of the "Province of the Islands." It was the last place where the Christians of the East held out against the advancing Saracens; and subsequently it was once more famous as the home and fortress of the Knights of St. John. (MALTA.) Its soil is fertile, and its climate delightful. Its present population is 28,000, viz. 21,000 Turks, 6,000 Greeks, 1,000 Jews (New Amer. Cyc.).

Rhod'o-cus (L. fr. Gr.), a Jew who betrayed the plans of his countrymen to Antiochus Eupator (2 Mc. xiii. 21).

Rho'dus (L.) = RHODES (1 Mc. xv. 33).

Ri'bai (Heb. = JERIBAI, Ges.), father of Ittai the Benjamite of Gibeah (2 Sam. xxiii. 29; 1 Chr. xi. 31).

* Rib'and = ribbon; the A. V. translation of Heb. páthil once (Num. xv. 38). ITEM OF GARMENT; LACE.

Rib'lah (Heb. fertility, Ges.). 1. One of the landmarks on the eastern boundary of the land of Israel, as specified by Moses (Num. xxxiv. 11). It was between SHEPHAM and the Sea of Chinnereth (GENNESARET, SEA OF), and on the "east side of the spring" (A. V. "AIN"). Shepham has not yet been identified, and which of the great fountains of northern Palestine is intended by "the spring" is uncertain (so Mr. Grove; but see AIN 1). Mr. Grove (with Parchi, &c.) thinks it hardly possible, without entirely disarranging the specification of the boundary, that this Riblah can be the same with "Riblah in the land of Hamath." But Gesenius (Heb. Lex.), Robinson (ii. 507, iii. 544-6), Thomson (B. S. v. 693), Porter (ii. 335, in Kitto, &c.), Winer, Fürst, &c., make Riblah in Num. xxxiv. = Riblah in 2 K. and Jeremiah.—2. "Riblah in the land of Hamath," a place on the great road between Palestine and Babylonia, at which the kings of Babylonia were accustomed to remain while directing the operations of their armies in Palestine and Phenicia. Here Nebuchadnezzar waited while the sieges of Jerusalem and of Tyre were being conducted by his lieutenants; here Zedekiah's eyes were put out, his sons having been slain before his eyes, and here the nobles of Jerusalem were also slain (Jer. xxxix. 5, 6, lii. 9, 10, 26, 27; 2 K. xxv. 6, 20, 21). In like manner Pharaoh-necho, after his victory over the Babylonians at Carchemish, returned to Riblah and summoned Jehoahaz from Jerusalem before him (xxiii. 33). This Riblah has no doubt been discovered, still named Ribleh, a miserable village in a vast and fertile plain, on the right (E.) bank of the el-Ary (Orontes), upon the great road which connects Ba'albek and Hama, about thirty-five miles N. E. of the former and twenty miles S. W. of the latter place. DIBLATH.

Rid'dle [-dl] (Heb. hiddah or chiddah = something entangled, intricate, Ges.). The Hebrew word (so Mr. Farrar, original author of this article) is used for artifice (Dan. viii. 23, A. V. "dark sentence"), a proverb (Prov. i. 6, "dark saying" in this and the two next; PROVERBS, BOOK OF), a song (Ps. xlix. 4 [Heb. 5], lxxviii. 2), an oracle (Num. xii. 8, "dark speech"), a PARABLE (Ez. xvii. 2, "riddle"), and in general any wise or intricate sentence (Hab. ii. 6, "proverb"), as well as a "riddle" in our sense of the word (Judg. xiv. 12-19). The riddles which the queen of Sheba came to ask of SOLOMON (1 K. x. 1; 2 Chr. ix. 1) were rather "hard questions" referring to profound inquiries. Solomon is said, however, to have been very fond of the riddle proper. The Greek word ainigma (= enigma, riddle) occurs only once in the N. T. (1 Cor. xiii. 12, "darkly;" compare Num. xii. 8); but, in the wider meaning of the word, many instances of it occur in our Lord's discourses. All ancient nations, and especially Orientals, have been fond of riddles. We find traces of the custom among the Arabs (Koran xxv. 35), and indeed several Arabic books of riddles exist; but these are rather emblems and devices than what we call riddles, although they are very ingenious. They were also known to the ancient Egyptians, and were especially used in banquets both by Greeks and Romans. Riddles were generally proposed in verse, like the celebrated riddle of Samson, which, however, was properly no riddle at all, because the Philistines did not possess the only clew on which the solution could depend. Francis Junius distinguishes between the greater enigma, where the allegory or obscure intimation is continuous throughout the passage (as in Ez. xvii. 2); and the lesser enigma, where the difficulty is concentrated in the peculiar use of some one word. It only remains to notice the single instance of a riddle occurring in the N. T., viz. the number of the beast (Rev. xiii. 16-18). This belongs to a class of riddles very common among Egyptian mystics, the Gnostics, some of the Fathers, and the Jewish Cabbalists. The most exact analogies to the enigma on the name of the beast are to be found in the so-called Sibylline verses. It would be absurd to doubt that St. John (not greatly removed in time from the Christian forgers of the Sibylline verses) intended some name as an answer to the number 666. Most of the Fathers supposed the name Latino (= Latin) to be intended. NUMBER 10; REVELATION OF ST. JOHN.

* Ri'ding. ASS; CAMEL; CART; CHARIOT; HORSE; MULE; WAGON.

* Right'eous (Heb. usually tsiddik, sometimes ydsahar, &c.; Gr. dikaíos) denotes one who pursues an undeviatingly right course, one whose character and conduct are in strict accordance with justice and truth (Ex. ix. 27; Ps. cxix. 137; Rom. iii. 10; Rev. xvi. 5, &c.); it is likewise applied to actions, &c., which are right or just as they should be (Deut. iv. 8; Rev. xvi. 7, xix. 2, &c.). In the language of common life those are called "righteous" whose general aim is to be right and to obey God, though they are not faultless (Gen. xviii. 23 ff.; Ps. i. 5, 6; Mat. x. 41 thrice, xxv. 37, 46; 1 Pet. iv. 18, &c.). JUSTIFY; PERFECT; RIGHTEOUSNESS, &c.

* Right'eous-ness (Heb. tsedek, tsiddikah; Chal. tsiddikah; Gr. dikaion usually, sometimes dikaíoma, once [Heb. i. 8] enthútes) = a doing or being what is just and right, the being RIGHTEOUS. "Righteousness" in the strict sense belongs only to God and sinless beings (Dan. ix. 7; Jn. xvi. 8, 10, &c.); but the "FAITH" of the true believer or of the friend of God is "counted unto him for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 3, compare iii. 22 ff., &c.). ATONEMENT; JUSTIFICATION; SAVIOUR, &c.

Rim'mon (Heb., see next article), a Benjamite of Beeroth, father of Rechab and Baanah, the murderers of Ishbosheth (2 Sam. iv. 2, 5, 9).

Rim'mon (Heb., see below), a deity worshipped by the Syrians of Damascus, where there was a temple or house of Rimmon (2 K. v. 18). Serarius refers the name to the Heb. rimmôn, a pomegranate, a fruit sacred to Venus, who is thus the deity worshipped under this title. Ursinus explains Rimmon as the pomegranate, the emblem of the fertilizing principle of nature, a symbol of frequent occurrence in the old religions. But Selden, Le Clerc, Vitringa, Rosenmüller, Gesenius, &c., think that Rimmon is from the Hebrew root rûm, to be high, and signifies most high. Mövers regards Rimmon as the abbreviated form of HADAD-RIMMON, HADAD being the sun-god of the Syrians. Combining this with the pomegranate, which was his symbol, Hadad-rimmon would then be the sun-god of the late summer who ripens the pomegranate and other fruits.

Rim'mon (Heb. a pomegranate, Ges.). 1. A town in the S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 32), allotted to Simeon (xix. 7, A. V. "Remmon;" 1 Chr. iv. 32). In each of the above lists the name succeeds that of AIN 2. In the catalogue of the places reoccupied by the Jews after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 29) the two are joined, and appear in the A. V. as EX-RIMMON. It is named as "S. of Jerusalem" in Zech. xiv. 10.—2. A city of Zebulun belonging to the Merarite Levites (1 Chr. vi. 77); probably = REMMON-METHOAR and DIMNAH.

Rim'mon-pa'rez (fr. Heb. = pomegranate of the breach, Ayre), a march-station in the WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING (Num. xxxiii. 19, 20); supposed by Rowlands (in Fbn.) to be at Jebel Ikhrimn, about seventy-five miles S. S. W. of Beer-sheba.

Rim'mon (Heb. pomegranate, Ges.), the Rock, a cliff or inaccessible natural fastness, in which the six hundred Benjamites, who escaped the slaughter of Gibeah, took refuge (Judg. xx. 45, 47, xxi. 13). It is described as in the "wilderness," i. e. the wild uncultivated country which lies on the east of the central highlands of Benjamin, on which Gibeah was situated—between them and the Jordan Valley. The name is identified with the modern Rummôn, a village three miles E. of Bethel, on the summit of a conical chalky hill, visible in all directions, and commanding the whole country.

Ring (Heb. tabba'ath, galil; Gr. daktylios). The ring was regarded as an indispensable article of a Hebrew's attire, inasmuch as it contained his signet. It was hence the symbol of authority, and as tiachus to Philip (1 Mc. vi. 15). Such rings were worn not only by men, but by women (Is. iii. 21), and are enumerated among the articles presented by men and women for the service of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxxv. 22). The signet-ring was worn on the right hand (Jer. xxii. 24). We may conclude, from Ex. xxviii. 11, that the rings contained a stone engraved with a device, or with the owner's name.

Assyrian Rings, fr. m the British Museum.—(Fbn.)
1. Of white, yellow, and greenish glass. 2. Of bronze.

The Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans often wore a profusion of rings. (ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL; SEAL.) The custom appears also to have prevailed among the Jews of the Apostolic age; for in Jas. ii. 2 a rich man is described as not simply "with a gold ring," as in the A. V., but golden-ringed (Gr. chrysodaktylios). In Ez. i. 18 "rings" (Heb. gab in two forms of pl.) are the rims of the wheels.

Rin'nah (Heb. shout, outcry, Ges.), a son of Shimon among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 20).

Ri'phath (Heb. a breaking in pieces, i. e. extreme terror, Sim.), second son of GOMER, and brother of ASHENAZ and TOGARMAH (Gen. x. 3). The Hebrew text in 1 Chr. i. 6 has, by a copyist's error, DIPHATH. The name has been variously identified with that of the Rhipæan Mountains (Knobel), the river Rhebas in Bithynia (Bochart), the Rhibii, a people living E. of the Caspian Sea (Schulthess), and the Ripheans, the ancient name of the Paphlagonians (Josephus). The weight of opinion is, however, in favor of the Rhipæan (or Rhiphæan) mountains, which are identified with the Carpathian range in the N. E. of Dacia. TONGUES, CONFUSSION OF.

* Ri'sing from the Dead. RESURRECTION.

Ris'sah (Heb. a ruin, Ges.), a march-station in the WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING (Num. xxxiii. 21, 22), supposed by Winer = Rasa in the Tab. Pent. 32 Roman miles from Ailah (Elah), and 203 S. of Jerusalem; by Wilton to be at Ain el-Jughâmîleh, about 125 miles S. S. W. of Beer-sheba; by Rowlands (in Fbn.) at el-Kusaby, about 55 miles S. W. of Beer-sheba, in Wady el-'Arish.

Rith'mah (Heb. the plant called broom, Ges.), a march-station in the WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING (Num. xxxiii. 18, 19), probably N. E. of HAZEROTH (so Mr. Hayman); supposed by Rowlands (in Fbn.) to be at Sahel er-Retamah or Wady Abou Retemât, a broad valley or plain a few miles W. of his KADESH.

River. In the sense in which we employ the word, viz. for a perennial stream of considerable size, a river is a much rarer object in the East than in the West. With the exception of the Jordan and the Litânu, the streams of the Holy Land are either entirely dried up in the summer months, and converted into hot lanes of glaring stones, or else reduced to very small streamlets deeply sunk in a narrow bed, and concealed from view by a dense growth of shrubs. For the various aspects of the streams of the country which such conditions inevitably produced, the ancient Hebrews had very exact terms, which they employed habitually with much precision. 1. The perennial river = Heb. nâhâr; possibly used of the JORDAN in Ps. lxi. 6 (A. V. "flood"), lxxiv. 15; of the great Mesopotamian and Egyptian rivers generally in Gen. ii. 10 ff.; Ex. vii. 19; such was presented by Pharaoh to Joseph (Gen. xli. 42), by Ahasuerus to Haman (Esth. iii. 10), by An-

2 K. xvii. 6; Ez. iii. 15, &c.; with the article, "the river," invariably = the EUPHRATES (Gen. xxxi. 21; Ex. xxiii. 31; Num. xxiv. 6; 2 Sam. x. 16, &c., &c.). (ABANA; AHAVA; CHEBAR; EDEN; HABOR; PHARPAR; RIVER OF EGYPT 1). The kindred Chal. nēhar is translated "river," i. e. Euphrates, in Ezr. iv.-vi., and "stream" in Dan. vii. 10.—2. The term for the fleeting fugitive torrents of Palestine is nahal or nachal, for which our translators have used promiscuously, and sometimes almost alternately, "VALLEY" (Num. xxi. 12, xxxii. 9, &c.), "BROOK" (Gen. xxxii. 23 [Heb. 24]; Num. xiii. 23, 24, xxi. 14, 15; Deut. ii. 13, 14; 1 K. xviii. 40, &c.), and "river" (Lev. xi. 9, 10; Deut. ii. 14, 36, 37, iii. 8, 12, 16 twice ["valley" here once], iv. 48, x. 7; Josh. xii. 1, 2 [thrice], xiii. 9, 16 [twice each], &c.). Many of the wadys of Palestine are deep, abrupt chasms or rents in the solid rock of the hills, and have a savage, gloomy aspect. Unfortunately our language does not contain any single word which has both the meanings of the Hebrew nahal or nachal and its Arabic equivalent wady, which can be used at once for a dry valley and for the stream which occasionally flows through it. (ARNON; BESOR; BROOK 4; CHERITH; ESHCOL; GAASH; GERAR; JABBOK; KANAH; KIDRON; KISHON; RIVER OF EGYPT 2; SHITIM; SOREK; VALLEY 3; ZERED.)—3. Heb. yōr, a word of Egyptian origin, applied to the Nile only (Gen. xli. 1 ff.; Ex. i. 22, ii. 8, 5, iv. 9, vii. 15 ff., &c.), and, in the plural, to the canals by which the Nile water was distributed throughout Egypt, or to streams having a connection with that country (Ex. vii. 19, viii. 5 [Heb. 1]; 2 K. xix. 24; Job xxviii. 10; Ps. lxxviii. 44, &c.). It is translated "flood" (Jer. xli. 7, 8; Am. viii. 8, ix. 5), also in pl. "brooks" (Brook 2), and "streams" (Is. xxxiii. 21 only).—4. Heb. yābāl (from a root signifying to well, to flow, sc. copiously and with impetus, Ges.) occurs once only (Jer. xvii. 8). The kindred ūdāl or ubāl is used only of "the river of ULAI" (Dan. viii. 2, 3, 6), and yābāl is used only in the plural in waters (Is. xxx. 25 [A. V. "streams of waters"], xlv. 4 ["water courses"]).—5. Heb. pērg = a brook, rivulet; commonly taken as a channel or canal from the idea of dividing, Ges. (Job xxix. 6; Ps. i. 3, lxxv. 9 [Heb. 10], cxix. 136; Prov. v. 16, xxi. 1; Is. xxx. 25, xxxii. 2; Lam. iii. 48), once translated "streams" (Ps. xli. 4 [Heb. 5]). The kindred pl. pēlaggōth (= brooks, streams, Ges.) is translated "divisions" in Judg. v. 15, 16; and "rivers" in Job xx. 17.—6. Heb. āphik (from a root signifying to hold, to contain, Ges.) may signify a torrent or any rush or body of water (Cant. v. 12; Ez. vi. 3, xxxi. 12, xxxii. 6, xxxiv. 18, xxxv. 8, xxxvi. 4, 6; Joel i. 20, iii. 18 [iv. 18, Heb.]), also translated "channel" (2 Sam. xxii. 16; Ps. xviii. 15 [Heb. 16]; Is. viii. 7), "stream" (Job vi. 15; Ps. cxxvi. 4), "BROOK" (Ps. xlii. 1 [Heb. 2]).—7. Gr. potamos (= a river, stream, torrent, flood, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) (Mk. i. 5; Jn. vii. 38; Acts xvi. 13; Rev. viii. 10, ix. 14, xvi. 4, 12, xxii. 1, 2), also translated "flood" (Mat. vii. 25, 27; Rev. xii. 15, 16), "stream" (Lk. vi. 48, 49), "waters" in pl. (2 Cor. xi. 26); in LXX. = 1 & 3, above. "Little rivers" in Ez. xxxi. 4 = the pl. of the Heb. elsewhere translated CONDUIT.

River of Egypt. Two Hebrew terms are thus rendered in the A. V.: 1. Nīhar Mitsrayim (Gen. xv. 18), "the river of Egypt," i. e. the Nile, and here the Pelusiac or easternmost branch. (RIVER 1.)—2. Nahal (or nachal) Mitsrayim (Num. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xv. 4, 47; 1 K. viii. 65; 2 K. xxiv. 7; Is. xxvii. 12, in the last passage translated "the stream of Egypt"), according to the common opinion, designates a desert stream on the border of Egypt, still occasionally flowing in the valley called Wādī el-'Ariah. The centre of the valley is occupied by the bed of this torrent, which only flows after rains, as is usual in the desert valleys. This stream is first mentioned as the point where the southern border of the Promised Land touched the Mediterranean, which formed its western border (Num. xxxiv. 3-6). In the later history we find Solomon's kingdom extending from the "entering in of Hamath unto the river of Egypt" (1 K. viii. 65), and Egypt limited in the same manner where the loss of the eastern provinces is mentioned (2 K. xxiv. 7). If, with the generality of critics, we think that this "river of Egypt" is the Wādī el-'Ariah, we must conclude that the same SHIHOR or SINOR is also applied to the latter, although elsewhere designating the Nile, for these two terms are used interchangeably to designate a stream on the border of the Promised Land.

Rizpah (fr. Heb. = a coal, LXX. and Rabbins; a hot stone, Ges.), concubine to King SAUL, and mother of his two sons ARMONI and MEFIBOSHETH 1. Mr. Grove supposes Rizpah a foreigner, a Hivite, descended from Ajah or AIAH, son of Zibeon. After the death of Saul and occupation of the country W. of the Jordan by the Philistines, Rizpah accompanied the other members of the royal family to their new residence at Mahanaim; and here her name is first introduced to us as the subject of an accusation levelled at ABNER by Ishbosheth (2 Sam. iii. 7). We hear nothing more of Rizpah till the tragic story which has made her name familiar (2 Sam. xxi. 8-11). Every one can appreciate the love and endurance with which the mother watched over the bodies of her two sons and her five relatives, to save them from an indignity peculiarly painful to the whole of the ancient world (Ps. lxxix. 2). But it is questionable whether the ordinary conception of the scene is accurate. The seven victims were not, as the A. V. implies, "hung"; they were crucified. The seven crosses were planted in the rock on the top of the sacred hill of Gibeah. The victims were sacrificed at the beginning of the barley harvest—the sacred and festal time of the Passover—and in the full blaze of the summer sun they hung till the fall of the periodical rain in October. During the whole of that time Rizpah remained at the foot of the crosses on which the bodies of her sons were exposed.

Raid occurs but once in the A. V., viz. in 1 Sam. xxvii. 10, where it = "raid" or "inroad." CATSEWAY; HIGHWAY.

Robbery. Whether in the larger sense of plunder, or the more limited sense of theft, systematically organized, robbery has ever been one of the principal employments of the nomad tribes of the East. From the time of Ishmael to the present day the Bedouin has been a "wild man," and a robber by trade (Gen. xvi. 12). An instance of an enterprise of a truly Bedouin character, but distinguished by the exceptional features belonging to its principal actor, is seen in the night-foray of David (1 Sam. xxvi. 6-12). Predatory inroads on a large scale are seen in the incursions of the Sabaeans and Chaldeans on the property of Job (Job i. 15, 17); the revenge coupled with plunder of Simeon and Levi (Gen. xxxiv. 28, 29); the reprisals of the Hebrews upon the Midianites (Num. xxxi. 32-54), and the frequent and often prolonged invasions of "spoilers" upon the Israelites, together with their reprisals (Judg. ii. 14, vi. 3, 4; 1 Sam. xi., xv.; 2 Sam. viii., x.; 2 K. v. 2; 1 Chr. v. 10, 18-22). Similar disorder in the country, complained of more than once by the prophets (Hos. iv. 2, vi. 9; Mic. ii. 8), continued more or less through Maccabean down to Roman times. (ARBELA; CAVE; JUDAS OF GALILEE; PISIDIA; THIEVES, THE TWO.) In the later history also of the country, the robbers, or sicarii, together with their leader, John of Gischala, played a conspicuous part. (JERUSALEM.) The Mosaic law on the subject of theft is contained in Ex. xxii. (LAW OF MOSES; PUNISHMENTS.) There seems no reason to suppose that the Law underwent any alteration in Solomon's time, as "sevenfold" restitution in Prov. vi. 30, 31, may be simply restitution to the full amount. Man-stealing was punishable with death (Ex. xxi. 16; Deut. xxiv. 7). Invasion of right in land was strictly forbidden (Deut. xxvii. 17; Is. v. 8; Mic. ii. 2).

The gazelle was allowed as food (Deut. xii. 15, 22, &c.); it was very fleet of foot (2 Sam. ii. 18; 1 Chr. xii. 8); it was hunted (Is. xlii. 14; Prov. vi. 5); it was celebrated for its loveliness (Cant. ii. 9, 17, viii. 14).

The gazelle is found in Egypt, Barbary, and Syria. —2. Heb. ya'alah (Prov. v. 19 only) = the female of the wild or mountain goat, Ges.

Rō'man (= of Rome) Em'pire. The history of the Roman Empire, properly so called, extends from the battle of Actium, B. C. 31, when AUGUSTUS became sole ruler of the Roman world, to the abdication of Augustulus, A. D. 476. The dominion of ROME over a large number of conquered nations had, however, reached wide limits some time before the monarchy of Augustus was established. The notices of Roman history in the Bible are confined to the last century and a half of the commonwealth and the first century of the imperial monarchy. There is no historic mention of Rome in the O. T. (DANIEL.) 1 Mc. i. 10 first mentions Rome as the place where Antiochus Epiphanes was a hostage. About 161 B. C. Judas Maccabeus heard of the Romans as the conquerors of Philip, Perseus, and Antiochus (1 Mc. viii. 5, 6). To strengthen himself against Demetrius, king of Syria, he sent ambassadors to Rome (viii. 17), and concluded a defensive alliance with the senate (viii. 22-32). This was renewed by Jonathan (xii. 1) and by Simon (xv. 17). In 63 B. C., when Syria was made a Roman province by Pompey, the Jews were still governed by one of the Asmonean princes. (HIGH-PRIEST; MACCABEES.) Aristobulus had lately driven his brother Hyrcanus from the high-priesthood, and was now in his turn attacked by Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea, the ally of Hyrcanus. Pompey's lieutenant, Marcus Æmilius Scaurus, interfered in the contest B. C. 64, and the next year Pompey himself marched an army into Judea and took JERUSALEM. From this time the Jews were practically under the government of Rome. Hyrcanus retained the high-priesthood and a titular sovereignty, subject to the watchful control of his minister Antipater, an active partisan of the Roman interests. Finally, Antipater's son, HEROD the Great, was made king by Antony's interest, B. C. 40, and confirmed in the kingdom by Augustus, B. C. 30. The Jews, however, were all this time tributaries of Rome, and their princes in reality were mere Roman procurators. On the banishment of Archelaus, A. D. 6, Judea became a mere appendage of the province of Syria, and was governed by a Roman PROCURATOR, who resided at Caesarea. Such were the relations of the Jewish people to the Roman government at the time when the N. T. history begins. (APPEAL; PROVINCE; TAXES, &c.) In illustration of the sacred narrative it may be well to give a short general account of the position of the emperor, the extent of the empire, and the administration of the provinces at the time of our Lord and His apostles. I. When AUGUSTUS became sole ruler of the Roman world he was in theory simply the first citizen of the republic, intrusted with temporary powers to settle the disorders of the state. The old magistracies were retained, but the various powers and prerogatives of each were conferred upon Augustus. Above all, he was the emperor (L. Imperator). This word, used originally to designate any one intrusted with the imperium or full military authority over a Roman army, acquired a new significance when adopted as a permanent title by Julius Cesar. By his use of it as a constant prefix to his name in the city and in the camp he openly asserted a paramount military authority over the state. The empire was nominally elective, but practically it passed by adoption; and till Nero's time a sort of hereditary right seemed to be recognized. (CESAR; CLAUDIUS; NERO; TIBERIUS.) —II. Extent of the Empire. Cicero's description of the Greek states and colonies, as a "fringe on the skirts of barbarism," has been well applied to the Roman dominions before the conquests of Pompey and Julius Cesar. The Roman Empire was still confined to a narrow strip encircling the Mediterranean Sea. Pompey added Asia Minor and Syria. Cesar added Gaul. The generals of Augustus overran the northwestern portion of Spain, and the country between the Alps and the Danube. The boundaries of the empire were now, the Atlantic on the W., the Euphrates on the E., the deserts of Africa, the cataracts of the Nile, and the Arabian deserts on the S., the British Channel, the Rhine, the Danube, and the Black Sea on the N. The only subsequent conquests of importance were those of Britain by Claudius and of Dacia by Trajan. The only independent powers of importance were the Parthians on the E. and the Germans on the N. The population of the empire in the time of Augustus has been calculated at 85,000,000. This population was controlled in the time of Tiberius by an army of 25 legions (about 170,000 men), besides the pretorian guards (10,000?) and other cohorts (5,000 or 6,000?) in the capital. (ARMY, II.) The navy may have contained about 21,000 men. —III. The Provinces. The usual fate of a country conquered by Rome was to become a subject province, governed directly from Rome by officers sent out for that purpose. Sometimes, however, petty sovereigns were left in possession of a nominal independence on the borders, or within the natural limits, of the province. There were differences too in the political condition of cities within the provinces. ANTIOCH 1, ATHENS, EPHESUS, TARSUS, THESSALONICA, &c., were free cities, i. e. were governed by their own magistrates, and were exempted from occupation by a Roman garrison. ANTIOCH 2, CORINTH, PHILIPPI, TROAS, &c., were "colonies," i. e. communities of Roman citizens transplanted, like garrisons of the imperial city, into a foreign land. (COLONY.) Augustus divided the provinces into two classes: (1.) Imperial, (2.) Senatorial; retaining in his own hands, for obvious reasons, those provinces where the presence of a large military force was necessary, and committing the peaceful and unarmed provinces to the Senate. The imperial provinces at first were —Gaul, Lusitania, Syria, Phœnicia, Cilicia, Cyprus, and Egypt. The senatorial provinces were Africa, Numidia, Asia, Achaia and Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Sicily, Crete and Cyrene, Bithynia and Pontus, Sardinia, Bœtica. Cyprus and Narbonian Gaul (i. e. Gaul beyond the Alps) were subsequently given up by Augustus, who in turn received Dalmatia from the Senate. Many other changes were made afterward. (DEPUTY; GOVERNOR 13; PROCTOR.) The provinces were heavily taxed for the benefit of Rome and her citizens. (CENSUS; PUBLICAN; TAXES; TRIBUTK.) They are said to have been better governed under the empire than under the commonwealth, and those of the emperor better than those of the Senate. Two important changes were introduced under the empire. The governors received a fixed pay, and the term of their command was prolonged. The condition of the Roman Empire at the time when Christianity appeared has often been dwelt upon, as affording obvious illustrations of St. Paul's expression that the "fulness of time had come" (Gal. iv. 4). The general peace within the limits of the empire, the formation of military roads (HIGHWAY), the suppression of piracy (CILICIA, &c.), the march of the legions, the voyages of the corn-fleets (ALEXANDRIA), the general increase of traffic (COMMERCE; DISPERSION), the spread of the LATIN language in the West as GREEK had already spread in the East, the external unity of the empire, offered facilities hitherto unknown for the spread of a world-wide religion. The tendency too of a despotism like that of the Roman Empire to reduce all its subjects to a dead level, was a powerful instrument in breaking down the pride of privileged races and national religions, and familiarizing men with the truth that "God hath made of one blood all nations on the face of the earth" (Acts xvii. 24, 26). But still more striking than this outward preparation for the diffusion of the Gospel was the appearance of a deep and wide-spread corruption which seemed to defy any human remedy. (ADULTERY; IDOLATRY; SLAVE, &c.) The chief prophetic notices of the Roman Empire are found in Daniel. (DANIEL, BOOK OF.) According to some interpreters the Romans are intended in Deut. xxviii. 49-57. BABYLON 2; ROME.

Romans = people [i. e. Christians] of Rome. Epistle to the. A. The date of this Epistle is fixed with more absolute certainty and within narrower limits than that of any other of St. Paul's Epistles. The following considerations determine the time of writing. 1. Certain names in the salutations point to Corinth, as the place from which the letter was sent. (a.) Phebe, a deaconess of Cenchrea, one of the port towns of Corinth, is commended to the Romans (xvi. 1, 2). (b.) GAIVS, in whose house St. Paul was lodged at the time (xvi. 23), is probably the person mentioned as one of the chief members of the Corinthian Church in 1 Cor. i. 14, though the name was very common (so Mr. Lightfoot, original author of this article). (c.) Erastus, here designated "the treasurer of the city" (xvi. 23, A. V. "chamberlain") is elsewhere mentioned in connection with Corinth (2 Tim. iv. 20; see also Acts xix. 22). 2. Having thus determined the place of writing to be Corinth, we may fix upon the visit recorded in Acts xx. 3, during the winter and spring following the apostle's long residence at Ephesus, as the occasion on which the Epistle was written. For St. Paul, when he wrote, was about to carry the contributions of Macedonia and Achaia to Jerusalem (Rom. xv. 25-27), and a comparison with Acts xx. 22, xxiv. 17, and with 1 Cor. xvi. 4 and 2 Cor. viii. 1, 2, ix. 1 ff., shows that he was so engaged at this period of his life (compare also Rom. xv. 23-25 with Acts xix. 21). The Epistle then was written from Corinth during St. Paul's third missionary journey, in the second of the two visits recorded in the Acts, when he remained three months in Greece (Acts xx. 3). It was in the winter or early spring of the year that the Epistle to the Romans was written, probably A. D. 58. (PAUL.)—B. The Epistle to the Romans is thus placed in chronological connection with the Epistles to the Galatians and Corinthians, which appear to have been written within the twelve months preceding. They present a remarkable resemblance to each other in style and matter—a much greater resemblance than can be traced to any other of St. Paul's Epistles.—C. The occasion which prompted this Epistle, and the circumstances attending its writing, were as follows. St. Paul had long purposed visiting Rome, and still retained this purpose, wishing also to extend his journey to Spain (Rom. i. 9-13, xv. 22-29). For the time, however, he was prevented from carrying out his design, as he was bound for Jerusalem with the alms of the Gentile Christians, and meanwhile he addressed this letter to the Romans, to supply the lack of his personal teaching. Phebe, a deaconess of the neighboring Church of Cenchrea, was on the point of starting for Rome (xvi. 1, 2), and probably conveyed the letter. The body of the Epistle was written at the apostle's dictation by Tertius (xvi. 22); but perhaps we may infer, from the abruptness of the final doxology, that it was added by the apostle himself.—D. The Origin of the Roman Church is involved in obscurity. If it had been founded by St. Peter, according to a later tradition, the absence of any allusion to him both in this Epistle and in the letters written by St. Paul from Rome would admit of no explanation. It is equally clear that no other apostle was the founder. The statement in the Clementines that the first tidings of the Gospel reached Rome during the lifetime of our Lord, is evidently a fiction. On the other hand, it is clear that the foundation of this Church dates very far back (xvi. 7; AQUILA, &c.). It may be that some of those Romans, "both Jews and proselytes," present on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 10), carried back the earliest tidings of the new doctrine, or the Gospel may have first reached the imperial city through those who were scattered abroad to escape the persecution which followed on the death of Stephen (viii. 4, xi. 19). At first we may suppose that the Gospel was preached there in a confused and imperfect form, scarcely more than a phase of Judaism, as in the case of Apollos at Corinth (xviii. 25), or the disciples at Ephesus (xix. 1-8). As time advanced and better instructed teachers arrived, the clouds would gradually clear away, till at length the presence of the great apostle himself at Rome dispersed the mists of Judaism which still hung about the Roman Church.—E. A question next arises as to the composition of the Roman Church, at the time when St. Paul wrote. Probably St. Paul addressed a mixed Church of Jews and Gentiles, the latter perhaps being the more numerous. There are certainly passages which imply the presence of a large number of Jewish converts to Christianity

(Rom. ii., iii., vii., &c.). If we analyze the list of names in ch. xvi., and assume that this list approximately represents the proportion of Jew and Gentile in the Roman Church (an assumption at least not improbable), we arrive at the same result. Altogether it appears that a very large fraction of the Christian believers mentioned in these salutations were Jews, even supposing that the others, bearing Greek and Latin names, of whom we know nothing, were heathens. Nor does the existence of a large Jewish element in the Roman Church present any difficulty. The captives carried to Rome by Pompey formed the nucleus of the Jewish population in the metropolis. Since that time they had largely increased. On the other hand, situated in the metropolis of the great empire of heathendom, the Roman Church must necessarily have been in great measure a Gentile Church; and the language of the Epistle bears out this supposition (Rom. i. 5, 13, ix. 3, 4, x. 1, xi. 23, 25, 30). These Gentile converts, however, were not for the most part native Romans. All the literature of the early Roman Church was written in the Greek tongue. The names of the bishops of Rome during the first two centuries are with but few exceptions Greek. A very large proportion of the names in the salutations of this Epistle are Greek names. From the Greek population of Rome, therefore, pure or mixed, the Gentile portion of the Church was almost entirely drawn. When we inquire into the probable rank and station of the Roman believers, an analysis of the names in the list of salutation again gives an approximate answer. These names belong for the most part to the middle and lower grades of society. Many of them are found in the columbaria or subterranean sepulchres of the freedmen and slaves of the early Roman emperors. Among the less wealthy merchants and tradesmen, among the petty officers of the army, among the slaves and freedmen of the imperial palace—whether Jews or Greeks—the Gospel would first find a firm footing. To this last class allusion is made in Phil. iv. 22, "they that are of Cesar's household."—F. The heterogeneous composition of this Church explains the general character of the Epistle to the Romans. In an assemblage so various, we should expect to find not the exclusive predominance of a single form of error, but the coincidence of different and opposing forms. It was therefore the business of the Christian teacher to reconcile the opposing difficulties and to hold out a meeting point in the Gospel. This is exactly what St. Paul does in this Epistle. It does not appear that it was specially written to answer any doubts or settle any controversies then rife in the Roman Church. There were therefore no disturbing influences, such as arise out of personal relations, or peculiar circumstances, to derange a general and systematic exposition of the nature and working of the Gospel. Thus the Epistle to the Romans is more of a treatise than of a letter. In this respect it differs widely from the Epistles to the Corinthians and Galatians, which are full of personal and direct allusions. In one instance alone (xiii. 1) we seem to trace a special reference to the Church of the metropolis.—G. This explanation is in fact to be sought in its relation to the contemporaneous Epistles. The letter to the Romans closes the group of Epistles written during the second missionary journey. This group contains besides, as already mentioned, the letters to the Corinthians and Galatians, written probably within the few months preceding. In the Epistles to these two Churches we study the attitude of the Gospel toward the Gentile and Jewish world respectively. These letters are direct and special, evoked by present emergencies, directed against actual evils, full of personal applications. The Epistle to the Romans is the summary of what St. Paul had written before, the result of his dealing with the two antagonistic forms of error, the gathering together of the fragmentary teaching in the Corinthian and Galatian letters.—H. Viewing this Epistle, then, rather as a treatise than a letter, we are enabled to explain certain phenomena in the text. In the received text a doxology stands at the close of the Epistle (xvi. 25-27). The preponderance of evidence is in favor of this position, but there is respectable authority for placing it at the end of ch. xiv. In some texts again it is found in both places, while others omit it entirely. The phenomena of the MSS. seem best explained by supposing that the letter was circulated at an early date (whether during the apostle's lifetime or not it is idle to inquire) in two forms, both with and without the two last chapters. (NEW TESTAMENT, I., § 39).—I. In describing the purport of this Epistle we may start from St. Paul's own words, which, standing at the beginning of the doctrinal portion, may be taken as a summary of the contents: "The Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith" (i. 16, 17). Accordingly the Epistle has been described as comprising "the religious philosophy of the world's history." The world in its religious aspect is divided into Jew and Gentile. The atonement of Christ is the centre of religious history. The doctrine of justification by faith is the key which unlocks the hidden mysteries of the Divine dispensation.—The Epistle, from its general character, lends itself more readily to an analysis than is often the case with St. Paul's Epistles. The following is a table of its contents:—Salutation (i. 1-7). The apostle at the outset strikes the keynote of the Epistle in the expressions "called as an apostle," "called as saints," Divine grace is every thing, human merit nothing.—(I.) Personal explanations. Purposed visit to Rome (i. 8-15).—(II.) Doctrinal (i. 16-xi. 36). The general proposition. The Gospel is the salvation of Jew and Gentile alike. This salvation comes by faith (i. 16, 17). The rest of this section is taken up in establishing this thesis, and drawing deductions from it, or correcting misapprehensions. (a.) All alike were under condemnation before the Gospel. The heathen (i. 18-32). The Jew (ii. 1-29). Objections to this statement answered (iii. 1-8). And the position itself established from Scripture (iii. 9-20). (b.) A righteousness (justification) is revealed under the Gospel, which being of faith, not of law, is also universal (iii. 21-26). And boasting is thereby excluded (iii. 27-31). Of this justification by faith Abraham is an example (iv. 1-25). Thus, then, we are justified in Christ, in whom alone we glory (v. 1-11). And this acceptance in Christ is as universal as was the condemnation in Adam (v. 12-19). (c.) The moral consequences of our deliverance. The law was given to multiply sin (v. 20, 21). When we died to the law we died to sin (vi. 1-14). The abolition of the law, however, is not a signal for moral license (vi. 15-23). On the contrary, as the law has passed away, so must sin, for sin and the law are correlative; at the same time this is no disparagement of the law, but rather a proof of human weakness (vii. 1-25).

So henceforth in Christ we are free from sin, we have the Spirit, and look forward in hope, triumphing over our present afflictions (viii. 1-39). (d.) The rejection of the Jews is a matter of deep sorrow (ix. 1-5). Yet we must remember—[i.] That the promise was not to the whole people, but only to a select seed (ix. 6-13). And the absolute purpose of God in so ordaining is not to be canvassed by man (ix. 14-19). [ii.] That the Jews did not seek justification aright, and so missed it. This justification was promised by faith, and is offered to all alike, the preaching to the Gentiles being implied therein. The character and results of the Gospel dispensation are foreshadowed in Scripture (x. 1-21). [iii.] That the rejection of the Jews is not final. This rejection has been the means of gathering in the Gentiles, and through the Gentiles they themselves will ultimately be brought to Christ (xi. 1-36).—(III.) Practical exhortations (xii. 1-xv. 13). (a.) To holiness of life and to charity in general, the duty of obedience to rulers being inculcated by the way (xii. 1-xiii. 14). (b.) And more particularly against giving offence to weaker brethren (xiv. 1-xv. 13).—(IV.) Personal matters. (a.) The apostle's motive in writing the letter, and his intention of visiting the Romans (xv. 14-33). (b.) Greetings (xvi. 1-23). The letter ends with a benediction and doxology (xvi. 24-27). While this Epistle contains the fullest and most systematic exposition of the apostle's teaching, it is at the same time a very striking expression of his character. Nowhere do his earnest and affectionate nature, and his tact and delicacy in handling unwelcome topics, appear more strongly than when he is dealing with the rejection of his fellow-countrymen, the Jews.—J. Internal evidence is so strongly in favor of the genuineness of the Epistle to the Romans that it has never been seriously questioned. But the external testimony in its favor is not inconsiderable. It is not the practice of the Apostolic Fathers to cite the N. T. writers by name, but marked passages from the Romans are found embedded in the Epistles of Clement and Polycarp. It seems also to have been directly cited by the elder quoted in Irenæus, and is alluded to by the writer of the Epistle to Diognetus, and by Justin Martyr. It has a place, moreover, in the Muratorian Canon, and in the Syriac and Old Latin Versions. Nor have we the testimony of orthodox writers alone. The Epistle was commonly quoted as an authority by the heretics of the sub-apostolic age, by the Ophites, by Basilides, by Valentinus, by the Valentinians Hierocleon and Ptolemæus, and perhaps also by Tatian, besides being included in Marcion's Canon. In the latter part of the second century the evidence in its favor is still fuller. BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; NEW TESTAMENT.

Rome [o as in rose] (L. Roma; Gr. Rhômê; said to have been named by the Pelasgi from their strength or might [Gr. rhômê] in war, or by the Trojans in honor of their wise matron Roma, or by Romulus from himself, &c. [so Plutarch]), the famous capital of the ancient world, situated on the Tiber, about fifteen miles from its mouth. The "seven hills" (Rev. xvii. 9) which formed the nucleus of the ancient city stand on the left bank. On the opposite side of the river rises the far higher ridge of the Janiculum. Here, from very early times, was a fortress with a suburb beneath it extending to the river. Modern Rome lies to the N. of the ancient city, covering with its principal portion the plain N. of the seven hills, once known as the Campus Martius (Field of Mars), and on the opposite bank extending over the low ground beneath the Vatican to the N. of the ancient Janiculum. Romulus, a fabled son of Mars, and afterward worshipped as the god Quirinus, is reputed to have founded the city (B. C. 753) on the summit of Mount Palatine, and to have been the first of its seven kings, the last of them, Tarquin the Proud, being dethroned B. C. 509. The Roman republic, which succeeded the monarchy, lasted nearly 500 years, until the battle of Actium, after which it gave place to the ROMAN EMPIRE. In the republic the supreme authority was committed to two consuls elected annually, at first exclusively from the patricians or Roman nobility. Tribunes of the people, whose duty it was to defend the oppressed plebeians, and who could stop any law or abolish any decree of the senate by pronouncing the word Veto (= I forbid), were first chosen B. C. 493. After this, intermarriages between the different orders were legalized; one consul (and still later two) might be elected from the plebeians; and by these and other changes, gradually introduced, the government became practically democratic. The laws of the twelve tables, which were long preserved and acted upon, were arranged and ratified B. C. 451. By them nine crimes (including nightly meetings) were punishable by death. Rome was taken and burnt by the Gauls B. C. 390; but a dictator was appointed as in other times of extreme danger, and the Gauls were repelled. After many wars with neighboring nations, the Romans became masters of all ancient Italy about B. C. 264. Then began the first Punic war (with Carthage, which was originally a Phenician colony in Africa, near the modern Tunis), at the end of which, B. C. 242, Sicily became a Roman province. In the second Punic war, B. C. 219-201, Hannibal led the Carthaginians, but he was finally defeated by Scipio Africanus at Zama, in Africa, B. C. 202, and Spain was ceded to Rome. The third Punic war, B. C. 149-6, ended with the capture and destruction of Carthage, long the formidable rival of Rome. Rome had now become a conquering nation. The Romans first entered Asia B. C. 190, and defeated ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT at Magnesia. DALMATIA became a Roman province B. C. 155; Greece, under the name of ACHAIA, B. C. 146; Numidia (modern Algiers) B. C. 105; afterward SYRIA, &c. But while the limits of their dominions were thus extended abroad, the Romans were by no means free from troubles at home. Dissensions often arose respecting the agrarian laws, &c. The civil wars of Marius and Sylla filled Rome with blood, B. C. 88-82. The two wars of the slaves in Sicily (B. C. 135-2 and B. C. 104-99), the social war between the Romans and the allied states of Italy (B. C. 91-89), the war of Spartacus or of the gladiators (B. C. 73-71), the two conspiracies of Catiline (B. C. 66 and 63), were some of the most prominent disturbances before B. C. 60. Julius Cesar now pursued a career of conquest in Gaul (modern France), Germany, and Britain. Pompey had been victorious over the pirates of CALICIA, had conquered Mithridates, king of PONTUS, and Tigranes, king of ARMENIA, had subdued SYRIA, taken JERUSALEM, &c.; Crassus had defeated Spartacus and the gladiators, but was more noted for his immense wealth. These three, agreeing to share the supreme power between them, formed the first triumvirate B. C. 60. After the death of Crassus, B. C. 53, in an expedition against the PARTHIANS, the dissensions between Pompey and Cesar produced a civil war; but the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48, and the death of Pompey soon after it, made Cesar master of the civilized world. He was made dictator, but was assassinated in the senate-house, March 15, B. C. 44, by Brutus, Cassius, and other senators, who aimed to restore the republic. Rome, however, was now too corrupt to be free; and the next year after his death a second triumvirate was formed between Antony, Octavius, and Lepidus. In the battle at Philippi, B. C. 42, the republican forces under Brutus and Cassius were defeated by the triumvirs. Lepidus having been stripped of his power, B. C. 36, the battle of Actium, in which Antony was defeated, left Octavius without a rival, and he became the first Roman emperor, under the name of AUGUSTUS CESAR. Henceforward, till Constantine transferred the seat of government to Byzantium, now named Constantinople, A. D. 330, Rome was the capital of the ROMAN EMPIRE. From the division of the empire into Eastern and Western, Rome was for about a century the capital of the Western Empire. The city was taken and partially burnt by Alaric the Goth, A. D. 410; it was again taken and plundered by Genseric the Vandal in 455; and in 476, when the Western Empire fell, it was taken by Odoacer, chief of the Heruli, who for seventeen years was king of Italy. After this Rome was thrice (493, 547, 550) taken by the Ostrogoths or Eastern Goths, and thrice (537, 547, 553) by the forces of the Emperor of the East. From 553 to 726, Rome, with the adjacent territory, was governed by an officer called prefect, duke, or patrician, appointed by the emperor; but in 726 it became an independent commonwealth, retaining its title of duchy. The Pope of Rome is said to have been constituted universal bishop by the Emperor Phocas in 606, but the temporal authority of the Pope is usually traced to the action of King Pepin of France, in conferring on Pope Stephen III.

the title of Patrician (i. e. chief magistrate) of Rome in 751, and in bestowing on him the exarchate of Ravenna in 756. Yet the Emperor Charlemagne, Pepin's son, was styled Patrician of the Romans, and exercised imperial authority in Rome, though he is declared to have confirmed his father's donations. The Countess Matilda, it is said, by her will, dated in 1102, gave her territories in central and northern Italy to the Pope; but after her decease, the Emperor Henry V. of Germany took possession of the whole of her property. About 1200, however, Pope Innocent III. asserted the claims of the Roman see in connection with these donations, and received the allegiance of the magistrates of Rome and a number of other Italian towns, and in May, 1278, the limits of the States of the Church were formally recognized and defined by a charter from the German Emperor Rudolph of Hapsburg. In the fourteenth century the Popes resided for seventy years at Avignon, in France. In 1347 Cola di Rienzo or Rienzi, at the head of a popular movement, proclaimed the republic, and was appointed tribune by acclamation; but the republic lasted only a few months. In 1376 Rome became again the residence of the Papal court, which with brief intervals (1797-9, 1808-14, 1848-9) has continued there till the present time.—Rome is not mentioned in the O. T., but in the Apocrypha (1 & 2 Mc.; ROMAN EMPIRE), and in three books of the N. T. (Acts; Rom.; 2 Tim.). The conquests of Pompey seem to have given rise to the first settlement of Jews at Rome. The Jewish King Aristobulus and his son formed part of Pompey's triumph, and many Jewish captives and emigrants were brought to Rome at that time. A special district was assigned them, not on the site of the modern Ghetto (where they now live) between the Capitol and the island of the Tiber, but across the Tiber. Many of these Jews were made freedmen. Julius Cesar showed them some kindness. They were favored also by Augustus. Claudius "commanded all Jews to depart from Rome" (Acts xviii. 2; AQUILA), on account of tumults connected, possibly, with the preaching of Christianity at Rome. This banishment cannot have been of long duration, for we find Jews residing at Rome, apparently in considerable numbers, at St. Paul's visit (xxviii. 17).—It may be useful to give some account of Rome in the time of NERO, the "CESAR" to whom St. PAUL appealed, and in whose reign he suffered martyrdom. 1. The city at that time was a large and irregular mass of buildings unprotected by an outer wall. Conybeare & Howson (ii. 367)

estimate its circuit at more than twelve miles, about twice that of the old Servian wall. St. Paul's visit lies between two famous epochs in the history of the city, viz. its restoration by Augustus and its restoration by Nero. Augustus boasted "that he had found the city of brick, and left it of marble." The streets were generally narrow and winding, flanked by densely-crowded lodging-houses (or tenement-houses) of enormous height. St. Paul's first visit to Rome took place before the Neronian conflagration, but even after the restoration of the city subsequent to that event, many of the old evils continued. The population of the city has been variously estimated: at half a million, at two millions and upward, and even at eight millions. Probably Gibbon's estimate of one million two hundred thousand is nearest to the truth. One-half of the population consisted, in all probability, of slaves. (SLAVE.) The larger part of the remainder consisted of pauper citizens supported in idleness by the miserable system of public gratuities. There appears to have been no middle class and no free industrial population. Side by side with the wretched classes just mentioned was the comparatively small body of the wealthy nobility, of whose luxury and profligacy we hear so much in the heathen writers of the time. Such was the population of Rome at the time of St. Paul's visit. 2. The localities in and about Rome especially connected with the life of St. Paul are—(a.) The Appian Way<sup>1</sup>, by which he approached Rome (Acts xxviii. 15; APPII FORUM). (b.) "The palace," or "Cesar's court" (Phil. i. 13). This may mean either the great camp of the Pretorian guards which Tiberius established outside the walls on the N. E. side of the city, or, more probably (so Mr. Hornby, with Wieseler, &c.), a barrack attached to the imperial residence on the Palatine. (PRETORIUM.) —3. The connection of other localities at Rome with St. Paul's name rests only on traditions of more or less probability, as—(a.) The Mamertine or Tullian prison, built by Ancus Martius near the forum. It still exists beneath the church of San Giuseppe dei Falegnami. Here it is said that St. Peter and St. Paul were fellow-prisoners for nine months. The story, however, of the imprisonment in the Mamertine prison seems inconsistent with 2 Tim., especially iv. 11. (b.) The chapel on the Ostian road which marks the spot where the two apostles are said to have separated on their way to martyrdom. (c.) The supposed scene of St. Paul's martyrdom, viz.

the church of San Paolo alle tre fontane on the Ostian road. (d.) The supposed scene of St. Peter's martyrdom, viz. the church of San Pietro in Montorio, on the Janiculum. (e.) The chapel Domine quo Vadis (L. = Lord, whither goest Thou?), on the Appian road, the scene of our Lord's legendary appearance to St. Peter as he was escaping from martyrdom. (f.) The places where the bodies of the two apostles, deposited first in the catacombs, are supposed to have been finally buried—that of St. Paul by the Ostian road—that of St. Peter beneath the dome of the famous Basilica which bears his name.—4. Sites unquestionably connected with the Roman Christians of the apostolic age are—(a.) The gardens of Nero in the Vatican, not far from the spot where St. Peter's now stands. Here Christians wrapped in the skins of beasts were torn to pieces by dogs, or, clothed in inflammable robes, were burned to serve as torches during the midnight games. Others were crucified. (b.) The Catacombs. These subterranean galleries, commonly from eight to ten feet high, and four to six wide, and extending for miles, especially in the neighborhood of the old Appian and Nomentan Ways, were used as places of refuge, of worship, and of burial by the early Christians. Roof. HOUSE; PALACE; PINNACLE; TEMPLE.

Room, the A. V. translation of the Heb. mā'kōm (Gen. xxiv. 23 ff.; usually = "place"), kēn (vi. 14; usually = "nest"; see NOAH, &c.; Gr. topos (Lk. ii. 7, xiv. 9, 10, 22, and 1 Cor. xiv. 16; usually and literally = "place"), &c. The Gr. anagōon or anagōion (properly [so Rbn. N. T. Lex.] = any thing above ground, hence an upper room, in the upper story or connected with the roof, for the reception of guests) is twice translated "upper room" (Mk. xiv. 15; Lk. xxii. 12). The Gr. hyperbōn (originally an adjective = upper; oftener, an upper chamber = anagōion above, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) is once translated "upper room" (Acts i. 13), and thrice "upper chamber" (ix. 37-39, xx. 8; see HORSE). The Gr. prōtoklisia (properly = the first reclining-place at table, the chief place at meals, i. e. the middle place on the highest couch; see MEALS) is translated "uppermost room" in Mat. xxiii. 6 and Mk. xii. 39, "chief room" in Lk. xiv. 7 and xx. 46, and "highest room" in xiv. 8.

* Root (Heb. shōresh; Gr. rhiza) = the part of a tree or plant which is usually underground (Job viii. 17, xxx. 4; Mat. xiii. 6, &c.). In poetry (so Gesenius) persons and nations are often compared to a plant or tree, and then the root is the chief part mentioned (Is. v. 24; Hos. ix. 16). "Root" figuratively = the lowest part, bottom (Job xxviii. 9, &c.); a stock, race (Is. xiv. 29); an abode, seat (Judg. v. 14); a ground or source (Job xix. 28; 1 Tim. vi. 10, &c.). "Root" also = a shoot, sprout, springing from the root (Is. liii. 2; Dan. xi. 7); and metaphorically descendant, offspring (Is. xi. 10, comp. 1; Rev. v. 5, xxii. 16).

Rose, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. kābats'aleth or chābat'saleth in Cant. ii. 1—"I am the rose of Sharon;" and Is. xxxv. 1—"The desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." There is much difference of opinion as to what particular flower is here denoted. Tremellius and Diodati, with some of the Rabbins, believe the rose is intended. Celsius, the Targum on Cant. ii. 1, Bochart, Dr. Royle (in Kitto), Mr. Houghton, &c., favor the narcissus (Pulsanthus Narcissus), a bulbous plant celebrated for its fragrance. Gesenius (from its etymological meaning, acid [or acrid] bulb) favors the meadow saffron (Colchicum autumnale), a plant with a bulb-like root-stock much used in medicine. Mr. Houghton says the narcissus and the lily (Lilium candidum) would be in blossom together in the early spring, while the Colchicum autumnale is an autumn plant. Chateaubriand mentions the narcissus as growing in the plain of Sharon.—2. Gr. rhodon (Wis. ii. 8; Ecclus. xxiv. 14, xxxix. 13, l. 8). Roses (genus Rosa of botanists) are greatly prized in the East, especially for the sake of the rose-water, which is in much request. Dr. Hooker observed seven species of wild roses in Syria. The hundred-leaved rose (Rosa centifolia) and damask rose (Rosa Damascena) are cultivated everywhere, and are very fragrant. The so-called "Rose of Jericho" is a small cruciferous annual plant (Anastatica Hierochuntica), bearing small white flowers, not uncommon in sandy soil in Palestine and Egypt. PALESTINE, Botany.

Rosh (Heb. head, chief). 1. In Gen. xlv. 21, Rosh is reckoned among the sons of Benjamin, but the name does not occur elsewhere, and probably "Ehi and Rosh" is a corruption of "AHIRAM."—2. GALL 2 (Deut. xxix. 18 marg.).—3. The Heb. Rôsh, translated "chief" in the A. V. of Ez. xxxviii. 2, 3, xxxix. 1, is by the LXX., Bochart, Gesenius, Fürst, Fairbairn, Stanley, &c., regarded as a proper name. Fairbairn translates the words in xxxviii. 2, rendered by the A. V. "Gog, the land of Magog, the chief prince of MESHKECH and TUBAL," thus: "Gog, of the land of Magog, prince of Rosh (or Rhos), Meshech, and Tubal." Gesenius considers it beyond doubt that by Rôsh is intended the tribe on the N. of the Taurus, so called from the neighborhood to the Rha, or Volga, and that in this name and tribe we have the first trace of the Russ or Russian nation. The name probably = Rassess, in Jd. ii. 23.

Ros'in = the resin or residuum of turpentine after distillation. 1. In Ez. xxvii. 17 the A. V. marg. has "rosin," but the text = BALM.—2. In the Song of the Three Holy Children (23), the servants of the king of Babylon are said to have "ceased not to make the oven hot with rosin (properly naphtha, so Mr. Wright, with the LXX., Vulgate, and Peshito-Syriac), pitch, tow, and small wood." SLIME.

Rubies, the A. V. translation of the Heb. plurals p'nyim, penimim, concerning the meaning of which there is much difference of opinion and great uncertainty (Job xxviii. 18; Prov. iii. 15, viii. 11, xx. 15, xxxi. 10; Lam. iv. 7). In Lam. iv. 7 the A. V. has "Her Nazarites were purer than snow, they were whiter than milk, they were more ruddy in body than rubies." A. Boote (and so J. D. Michaelis, Gesenius, Fürst) supposed "CORAL" to be intended. Bochart (with whom Mr. Houghton and Rosenmüller agree) contends that the Hebrew term denotes pearls, and supposes the "ruddy" = bright in color, or of a reddish tinge. (PEARL.) The ruby is supposed by Gesenius to be = Heb. cadôrôl, translated "AGATE" in Is. liv. 12 and Ez. xxvii. 16. The common ruby of jewelry or spinel ruby is a red variety of spinel, a compound usually of sesquioxide of iron and alumina, found in octahedrons. The oriental ruby is red SAPPHIRE.

* Rud der. SHIP.

Rue (Gr. péganon), in Lk. xi. 42 only, is doubtless the common garden rue (Ruta graveolens), a shrubby plant about two feet high, of strong medicinal virtues, and powerful odor, anciently used both as a condiment and as a medicine. It is a native of the Mediterranean coasts, and has been found by Haselquist on Mount Tabor. The Talmud enumerates rue among kitchen-herbs, and considers it free of tithe, as not cultivated in gardens. In our Lord's time, however, rue was doubtless a garden-plant, and therefore tithable. In the middle ages it was used by the priests to sprinkle holy water, and was called herb of grace.

Rufus (L. red, reddish), mentioned in Mk. xv. 21 with Alexander, as a son of Simon 6 the Cyrenian (Lk. xxiii. 26). Again, in Rom. xvi. 13, the Apostle Paul salutes Rufus "chosen in the Lord." It is generally supposed that this Rufus = the one to whom Mark refers. Yet Rufus was not an uncommon name, and possibly, therefore, Mark and Paul may have had in view different individuals.

Ru-ha'mah (Heb. pitied, compassionate, Ges.), in A. V. margin "having obtained mercy" (Hos. ii. 1). The name, if name it be, is like Lo-ruhamah, symbolical, and as that was given to the daughter of Hosea, to denote that God's mercy was turned away from Israel, so the name Ruhamah is addressed to the daughters of the people to denote that they were still the objects of His love and tender compassion.

* Ru'ler. DUKE; GOVERNOR; JUDGE; KING; PRINCE; SYNAGOGUE.

Ru'mah (Heb. lofty, Ges.), the place to which belonged Pedaiah, the father of King Jehoiaquim's mother (2 K. xxiii. 36 only), possibly = ARUMAH, near Shechem. Mr. Grove supposes rather that Rumah = DUMAH, near Hebron. Van de Velde (ii. 303) identifies Arumah with the ruin el-Arma or el-Orma, on a hill about five miles S. E. of Shechem. Some make Rumah = the Rumah in Galilee of Josephus (B. J. iii. 7, § 21), which was probably (so Ritter, Robinson, Thomson) at Rûmeh, a ruin on a hill about seven miles N. of Nazareth.

* Ru'ner. FOOTMAN 2; GUARD 2; POST, II.

Rush. REED.

Rust is the A. V. translation in Mat. v. 19, 20, of the Gr. brôsis, which joined with "MOTH" has by some been understood to denote the larva of some moth injurious to corn, as the Tinea granella; but probably (so Mr. Houghton, with Lange, &c.) refers in a general sense to any corrupting and destroying substance that may attack treasures of any kind long undisturbed. The Vulgate, with Robinson (N. T. Lex.), and the A. V. renders "rust." In Jas. v. 3 "rust" is the translation of Gr. îos, which here (so Mr. Houghton) = the tarnish which over-spreads silver rather than "rust," which now = oxide of iron.

Ruth (Heb. female friend, Ges.), a Moabitish woman, the wife, first, of Mahlon, secondly of Boaz, and by him mother of Obed; ancestress of David and of Christ; one of the four women named by Matthew in the GENEALOGY OF CHRIST (Ru. i.-iv.; Mat. i. 5). A severe famine in Judah induced Elimlech, of Bethlehem Ephratah, to emigrate into the land of Moab, with his wife Naomi, and his two sons, Mahlon and Chilion. At the end of ten years Naomi, now a childless widow, having heard that there was plenty again in Judah, resolved to return to Bethlehem, and her daughter-in-law, Ruth, attached to the mother, land, and religion of her deceased husband, returned with her. They arrived at Bethlehem just at the beginning of barley harvest, and Ruth, going out to glean, chanced to go into the field of Boaz, a wealthy man, and near kinsman of her father-in-law Elimlech. Upon learning who the stranger was, Boaz, already acquainted with her reputation for kindness and virtue, treated her with the utmost kindness and respect, and sent her home laden with corn which she had gleaned. Encouraged by this incident, Naomi instructed Ruth to claim at the hand of Boaz that he should perform the part of her husband's near kinsman, by purchasing the inheritance of Elimelech, and taking her to be his wife. But there was a nearer kinsman than Boaz, and it was necessary that he should have the option of redeeming the inheritance for himself. He, however, declined, fearing to mar his own inheritance. Upon which, with all due solemnity, Boaz took Ruth to be his wife, amidst the blessings and congratulations of their neighbors. MARRIAGE; RUTH, THE BOOK OF.

* Ruth, the Book of, contains the history of RUTH the Moabitess. Its canonicity is unquestioned. It is generally understood that the ancient Jews reckoned it a part of the Book of Judges; but in our Hebrew Bibles it is arrayed in the Hagiographa, between Canticles and Lamentations. (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT.) The date and authorship are unknown. The Talmud and most writers ascribe it to Samuel; some have ascribed it to Hezekiah, Ezra, &c. Prof. Weir (in Fairbairn) supposes the events occurred somewhat earlier than the priesthood of Eli, but were not committed to writing till some time afterward under the monarchy. The GENEALOGY in ch. iv. 18-22 is more commonly regarded as incomplete, though Usher and others have supposed that David's ancestors, as persons of preëminent piety, were divinely favored with unusual length of life. "The scope of the book is to set forth the origin of David historically and genealogically, showing how a heathen, belonging to a people so hostile to the theocracy as the Moabites, was honored to become the progenitor of the great and pious King David, because she placed unlimited trust in the Lord, and sought protection from the God of Israel" (Davidson, with Umbreit, &c.). Prof. Bush (in Kitto) thinks the leading design of the book was "to preintimate, by the recorded adoption of a Gentile woman into the family from which Christ was to derive His origin, the final reception of the Gentile nations into the true Church, as fellow-heirs of the salvation of the Gospel." "The picture given of domestic life is attractive and graphic, not merely or chiefly because of the writer's ability to place his theme in so good a light, but because he narrates an episode of domestic life beautiful in itself, which had really happened" (Davidson's Text of the O. T. considered, 656).

Rye (Heb. cussameth) occurs in Ex. ix. 32 and Is. xxviii. 25: in the latter the margin reads "spelt." In Ez. iv. 9 the text has "fitches," and the margin "spelt." Some authorities maintain that the Hebrew denotes fitches, others oats, and others rye. Celsius has shown that in all probability "spelt" is intended (so Mr. Houghton, with Dr. Hamilton [in Fairbairn], Gesenius, J. A. Alexander, &c.). Rye (Secale cereale) is a well-known cereal plant, more hardy than wheat, the principal cultivated grain of a large part of the north temperate zone, but probably not cultivated in Egypt or Palestine in early times, whereas spelt has been long cultivated and held in high esteem in the East. "Spelt" (Triticum Spelta) differs but slightly from our common wheat (Triticum vulgare). There are three kinds of spelt, viz. Triticum Spelta, Triticum dicoccum, (Rice wheat), and Triticum monococcum. FOOD.

Sab'a-oth, or Sa-ba'oth (fr. Heb., see below), the Lord of. This name is found in the English Bible twice (Rom. ix. 29; Jas. v. 4). Sabaoth is the Greek form of the Hebrew plural tsibâoth = "armies," which occurs in the oft-repeated formula translated in the A. V. of the O. T. by "LORD of hosts," <sup>a</sup> LORD God of hosts. Mr. Grove thinks that in the mouth and mind of an ancient Hebrew, "the LORD of hosts" was the leader and commander of the armies of the nation, who "went forth with them" (Ps. xlv. 9), and led them to certain victory over the worshippers of Baal, Chemosh, and other false gods; but Gesenius, Fairbairn, W. L. Alexander (in Kitto), and most scholars make "hosts" here = the ANGELS and powers of heaven (comp. Gen. xxxii. 2, 3; Josh. v. 14; Ps. ciii. 21, cxlviii. 2; Dan. viii. 10, 11). Jx. HOVAH.

Sa'bat (fr. Gr.). 1. Ancestor of certain sons of Solomon's servants who returned with Zorobabel (1 Esd. v. 34); not in Ezra and Nehemiah.—2. SEBAT (1 Mc. xvi. 14). MONTH.

Sab-a-te'as (fr. Gr.) = SHABBETHAI (1 Esd. ix. 48; comp. Neh. viii. 7).

Sab'a-tus (fr. Gr.) = ZABAD (1 Esd. ix. 28; comp. Ezr. x. 27).

Sab'ban (fr. Gr.) = BINNUI 1 (1 Esd. viii. 63; comp. Ezr. viii. 33).

Sab'bath (Heb. shabbâth, a day of rest, from shâbâth, to cease to do, to rest; Gr. sabbaton, fr. Heb.). The name Sabbath is applied to divers great festivals (Lev. xxiii.; PASSOVER), but principally and usually to the seventh day of the week, the strict observance of which is enforced not merely in the general Mosaic code (LAW OF MOSES), but in the Decalogue itself (TEN COMMANDMENTS). The first Scriptural notice of the weekly Sabbath, though it is not mentioned by name, is in Gen. ii. 3, at the close of the record of the six days' CREATION. And hence it is frequently argued that the institution is as old as mankind, and is consequently of universal concern and obligation (see below). In Ex. xvi. 23-29 we find the first incontrovertible institution of the day, as one given to, and to be kept by, the children of Israel. Shortly afterward it was re-enacted in the Fourth Commandment. Many of the Rabbis date the institution from the incident recorded in Ex. xv. 25. This, however, seems to want foundation (comp. 26). The words in ch. xvi. in connection with the gathering of manna are not in themselves enough to indicate whether such institution was altogether a novelty, or referred to a day the sanctity of which was already known to those to whom it was given. There is plausibility certainly in the opinion of Grotius, that the day was already known, and in some measure observed as holy, but that the rule of abstinence from work was first given then, and shortly afterward more explicitly imposed in the Fourth Commandment. There it is distinctly set forth, and extended to the whole of an Israelite's household, his son and his daughter, his servants, male and female, his ox and his ass, and the STRANGER within his gates. Penalties and provisions in other parts of the Law construed the abstinence from labor prescribed in the commandment. Isaiah utters solemn warnings against profaning, and promises large blessings on the due observance of, the day (Is. lviii. 13, 14). In Jeremiah's time there seems to have been an habitual violation of it (Jer. xvii.

21-27). By Ezekiel (xx. 12-24) the profanation of the Sabbath is made foremost among the national sins of the Jews. From Neh. x. 31, we learn that the people entered into a covenant to renew the observance of the Law, in which they pledged themselves neither to buy nor sell victuals on the Sabbath. The practice was then not infrequent, and Nehemiah tells us (xiii. 15-22) of the successful steps which he took for its stoppage. Henceforward there is no evidence of the Sabbath being neglected by the Jews, except such as (1 Mc. i. 11-15, 39-45) went into open apostasy. In the N. T. we find the most marked stress laid on the Sabbath. In whatever ways the Jew might err respecting it, he had altogether ceased to neglect it. On the contrary, wherever he went its observance became the most visible badge of his nationality. Our Lord's mode of observing the Sabbath was one of the main features of His life, which His Pharisaic adversaries most eagerly watched and criticised.—Mr. Garden, in the original article from which this is abridged, attempts to consider and determine the true idea and purpose of the Sabbath in the Mosaic Law and as designed for the Hebrews—I. By considering, with a view to their elimination, the Pharisaic and Rabbinical prohibitions. II. By taking a survey of the general Sabbatical periods of Hebrew time. III. By examining the actual enactments of Scripture respecting the seventh day, and the mode in which such observance was maintained by the best Israelites.—I. Nearly every one is aware that the Pharisaic and Rabbinical schools invented many prohibitions respecting the Sabbath of which we find nothing in the original institution. Of these some may have been legitimate enforcements in detail of that institution, such as the Scribes and Pharisees "sitting in Moses' seat" (Mat. xxiii. 2, 3) had a right to impose. How a general law is to be carried out in particular cases, must often be determined for others by such as have authority to do so. To this class may belong the limitation of a SABBATH-DAY'S JOURNEY. Many, however, of these prohibitions were fantastic and arbitrary, in the number of those "heavy burdens and grievous to be borne" which the later expounders of the Law "laid on men's shoulders." The harmless act of the disciples in the corn-field, and the beneficent healing of the man in the synagogue with the withered hand, were alike regarded as breaches of the Law (Mat. xii. 1-13; Jn. v. 10). A man might throw some needful nourishment to the animal that had fallen into the pit, but must not pull him out till the next day. It was unlawful to catch a flea on the Sabbath, except the insect were actually hurting its assailant, or to mount into a tree, lest a branch or twig should be broken in the process. That this perversion of the Sabbath had become very general in our Saviour's time is apparent both from the recorded objections to acts of His on that day, and from His marked conduct on occasions to which those objections were sure to be urged. There is no reason, however, for thinking that the Pharisees had arrived at a sentence against pleasure of every sort on the sacred day. The duty of hospitality was remembered. It was usual for the rich to give a feast on that day; and our Lord's attendance on such a feast, and making it the occasion of putting forth His rules for the demeanor of guests, and for the right exercise of hospitality, show that the gathering of friends and social enjoyment were not deemed inconsistent with the true scope and spirit of the Sabbath. It was thought right that the meats, though cold, should be of the best and choicest, nor might the Sabbath be chosen for a fast. Such are the inferences to which we are brought by our Lord's words concerning, and works on, the sacred day. The declaration that "the Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath," must not be viewed as though our Lord held Himself free from the Law respecting it. It is to be taken in connection with the preceding words, "the Sabbath was made for man," &c., from which it is an inference (Mk. ii. 27, 28). If, then, our Lord, coming to fulfil and rightly interpret the Law (Mat. v. 17), did thus protest against the Pharisaic and Rabbinical rules respecting the Sabbath, we are supplied by this protest with a large negative view of that ordinance. The acts condemned by the Pharisees were not violations of it.—II. The Sabbath was the keynote to a scale of Sabbatical observance—consisting of itself, the seventh month, the seventh year, and the year of Jubilee. As each seventh day was sacred, so was each seventh month, and seventh year. (FESTIVALS; NUMBER.) The seventh month opened with the Feast of Trumpets, and contained the Day of Atonement and Feast of Tabernacles—the last named being the most joyful of Hebrew festivals. (ATONEMENT, DAY OF; TABERNACLES, FEAST OF; TRUMPETS, FEAST OF.) The rules for the SABBATICAL YEAR are very precise. As labor was prohibited on the seventh day, so the land was to rest every seventh year. And as each forty-ninth year wound up seven of such weeks of years, so it either was itself, or it ushered in, "the year of JUBILEE." In Ex. xxiii. 10, 11, the Sabbatical year is placed in close connection with the Sabbath-day, and the words in which the former is prescribed are analogous to those of the Fourth Commandment. This is immediately followed by a renewed proclamation of the law of the Sabbath. The aim of the two institutions, as here exhibited, is eminently a beneficent one. To give rights to classes that would otherwise have been without such, to the bondman and bondmaid, nay, to the beast of the field, is viewed here as their main end. "The stranger," too, is comprehended in the benefit (compare also Lev. xxv. 2-7). One great aim of both the Sabbath-day and the Sabbatical year, clearly was to debar the Hebrew from the thought of absolute ownership of any thing. The year of Jubilee must be regarded as completing this Sabbatical Scale.—III. We must consider the actual enactments of Scripture respecting the seventh day. We commence our inquiry with the institution of it in the wilderness, in connection with the gathering of manna (Ex. xvi. 23). The prohibition to gather the manna on the Sabbath is accompanied by one to bake or to seethe on that day. The Fourth Commandment gives us but the generality, "all manner of work," and we are left to seek elsewhere for the particular application of the general principle. That general principle in itself, however, obviously embraces an abstinence from worldly labor or occupation, and from enforcing such on servants or dependents, or on the stranger. By him is most probably meant the partial proselyte (but see PROSELYTE and STRANGER). The naming him therefore in the commandment helps to interpret its whole principle, and testifies to its having been a beneficent privilege for all who came within it. It gave rights to the slave, to the despised stranger, even to the ox and the ass. This beneficent character of the Fourth Commandment is very apparent in the version of it in Deut. v. 12-15—"that thy bondman and thy bondwoman may rest as well as thou," &c. But although this be so, and though it be plain that to come within the scope of the commandment was to possess a franchise, to share in a privilege, yet does the original proclamation of it in Exodus place it on a ground which, closely connected no doubt with these others, is yet higher and more comprehensive. The divine method of working and rest is there proposed to man as the model after which he is to work and to rest. Time, then, presents a perfect whole, is, then, well rounded and entire, when it is shaped into a week, modelled on the six days of creation and their following Sabbath. Six days' work and the seventh day's rest conform the life of man to the method of his Creator. In distributing his life thus, man may look up to God as his Archetype. It is important to remember that the Fourth Commandment is not limited to a mere enactment respecting one day, but prescribes the due distribution of a week, and enforces the six day's work as much as the seventh day's rest. This higher ground of observance was felt to invest the Sabbath with a theological character, and rendered it the great witness for faith in a personal and creating God. Hence its supremacy over all the Law, being sometimes taken as the representative of it all (Neh. ix. 14).—In all this, however, we have but an assertion of the general principle of resting on the Sabbath, and must seek elsewhere for information as to the details wherewith that principle was to be brought out. We have already seen that the work forbidden is not to be confounded with action of every sort. The terms in the commandment show plainly enough the sort of work which is contemplated. They are servile work (A. V. "labor") and business (A. V. "work"). The Pentateuch presents us with but three applications of the general principle—not to go out of the camp (i. e. to gather manna), not to light a fire in any house, not to gather sticks (Ex. xvi. 29, xxxv. 3; Num. xv. 32-36). The reference of Isaiah to the Sabbath gives us no details (Is. lvi. 1-7, lviii. 13, 14). Those in Jeremiah and Nehemiah show that carrying goods for sale, and buying such, were equally profanations of the day. There is no ground for supposing that to engage the enemy on the Sabbath was considered unlawful before the Captivity. At a subsequent period we know (1 Mc. ii. 34-38) the scruple existed and was acted on with most calamitous effects. These effects led Mattathias and his friends to determine that action in self-defence was lawful on the Sabbath, initiatory attack unlawful (ii. 41). Yet the scruple, like many other scruples, proved a convenience, and under the Roman Empire the Jews procured exemption from military service by means of it. It was not, however, without its evils. In the siege of JERUSALEM by Pompey, as well as in the final one by Titus, the Romans took advantage of it, and, abstaining from attack, prosecuted on the Sabbath, without molestation from the enemy, such works as enabled them to renew the assault with increased resources. So far therefore as the negative side of Sabbatical observance is concerned, it would seem that servile labor, whether that of slaves or of hired servants, and all worldly business on the part of masters, was suspended on the Sabbath, and the day was a common right to rest and be refreshed, possessed by all classes in the Hebrew community. It was thus, as we have urged, a beneficent institution.—We must now quit the negative for the positive side of the institution. In the first place, we learn from the Pentateuch that the morning and evening sacrifice were both doubled on the Sabbath-day, and that the fresh shew-bread was then baked, and substituted on the Table for that of the previous week. And this at once leads to the observation that the negative rules, proscribing work, lighting of fires, &c., did not apply to the rites of religion. It became a saying that there was no Sabbath in holy things (compare Mat. xii. 5). Next, it is clear that individual offerings were not breaches of the Sabbath; and from this doubtless came the feasts of the rich on that day, which were sanctioned by our Saviour's attendance on one such (Lk. xiv. 1 ff.). It was, we may be pretty sure, a feast on a sacrifice, and therefore a religious act. All around the giver, the poor as well as others, were admitted to it. We have no ground for supposing that any thing like the didactic institutions of the SYNAGOGUE formed part of the original observance of the Sabbath. But from an early period, if not, as is most probable, from the very institution, occupation with holy themes was regarded as an essential part of the observance of the Sabbath. It would seem to have been an habitual practice to repair to a prophet on that day, in order, it must be presumed, to listen to his teaching (2 K. iv. 23). Certain Psalms too (e. g. Ps. xcii.) were composed for the Sabbath, and probably used in private as well as in the Tabernacle. At a later period we come upon precepts that on the Sabbath the mind should be uplifted to high and holy themes—to God, His character, His revelations of Himself, His mighty works. Still the thoughts with which the day was invested were ever thoughts, not of restriction, but of freedom and of joy. Such indeed would seem, from Neh. viii. 9-12, to have been essential to the notion of a holy day. We have pointed out that pleasure, as such, was never considered by the Jews a breach of the Sabbath. We have seen, then, that, for whomsoever else the provision was intended, the chosen race were in possession of an ordinance, whereby neither a man's time nor his property could be considered absolutely his own, the seventh of each week being holy to God, and dedicated to rest after the pattern of God's rest, and giving equal rights to all. We have also seen that this provision was the tonic to a chord of Sabbatical observance, through which the same great principles of God's claim and society's, on every man's time and every man's property, were extended and developed. Of the Sabbatical year, indeed, and of the year of Jubilee, it may be questioned whether they were persistently observed. But no doubt exists that the weekly Sabbath was always partially, and in the Pharisaic and subsequent times very strictly, however mistakenly, observed.—We have hitherto viewed the Sabbath merely as a Mosaic ordinance. It remains to ask (A.) whether there be indications of its having been previously known and observed; and, (B.) whether it have a universal scope and authority over all men. (A.) The first and chief argument of those who maintain that the Sabbath was known before Moses, is the reference to it in Gen. ii. 2, 3. This is considered to represent it as coeval with man, being instituted at the Creation. But we have no materials for ascertaining, or even conjecturing, which was put forth first, the record of the Creation, or the Fourth Commandment. Gen. iv. 3 reads—"And in process of time it came to pass that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord." The words rendered "in process of time" mean literally "at the end of days" (margin), and it is contended by some that they designate a fixed period of days, probably the end of a week, the seventh or Sabbath-day. Again, the division of time into weeks seems recognized in Jacob's courtship of Rachel—"Fulfil her week" (Gen. xxix. 27, 28). Lastly, the opening of the Fourth Commandment, the injunction "Remember the Sabbath-day," is appealed to as proof that that day was already known. It is easy (so Mr. Garden, but see note <sup>1</sup> below) to see that all this is but a precarious foundation on which to build. It is not clear that the words in Gen. iv. 3 denote a fixed division of time of any sort. Those in Gen. xxix. obviously do, but carry us no further than proving that the week was known and recognized by Jacob and Laban, though it must be admitted that, in the case of time so divided, sacred rites would probably be celebrated on a fixed and statedly-recurring day. The argument from the prevalence of the weekly division of time would require a greater approach to universality in such practice than the facts exhibit, to make it a cogent one. The injunction in the Fourth Commandment to remember the Sabbath-day may refer only to its previous institution in connection with the gathering of manna, or may be but the natural precept to keep in mind the rule about to be delivered: on the other hand, the perplexity of the Israelites respecting the double supply of manna on the sixth (Ex. xvi. 22) leads us to infer that the Sabbath for which such extra supply was designed was not then known to them. Moreover, the language of Ez. xx. seems to designate it as an ordinance distinctively Hebrew and Mosaic. We cannot, then, from the uncertain notices which we possess, infer more than that the weekly division of time was known to the Israelites and others before the Law of Moses.<sup>1</sup> (WEEK.)—(B.) But to come to our second question, it by no means follows, that even if the Sabbath were no older than Moses, its scope and obligation are limited to Israel, and that itself belongs only to the obsolete enactments of the Levitical Law. That Law contains two elements, the code of a particular nation, and commandments of human and universal character. (LAW OF MOSES.) To which class belongs the Sabbath, viewed simply in itself, is a question which will soon come before us, and one which does not appear hard to settle. Meanwhile, we must inquire into the case as exhibited by Scripture. And here we are at once confronted with the fact that the command to keep the Sabbath forms part of the Decalogue, which has a rank and authority above the other enactments of the Law (Mat. xix. 17-19; Rom. xiii. 8, 9; Eph. vi. 2, 3). In some way, therefore, the Fourth Commandment has an authority over, and is to be obeyed by, Christians, though whether in the letter, or in some large spiritual sense and scope, is a question which still remains. The phenomena respecting the Sabbath presented by the N. T. are (1.) the frequent reference to it in the four Gospels; and (2.) the silence of the Epistles, except one place (Col. ii. 16, 17), where its repeal would seem to be asserted, and perhaps one other (Heb. iv. 9). (1.) The references to it in the four Gospels are numerous. We have already seen the high position which it took in the minds of the Rabbis, and the strange code of prohibitions which they put forth in connection with it (see I. above). Consequently no part of our Saviour's teaching and practice seems to have been so eagerly and narrowly watched as that which related to the Sabbath. We have already seen the kind of prohibitions against which both His teaching and practice were directed; and His two pregnant declarations, "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath" (Mk. ii. 27), and "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (Jn. v. 17), surely exhibit to us the Law of the Sabbath as human and universal. The former sets it forth as a privilege and a blessing. The latter wonderfully exalts the Sabbath by referring it to God as its archetype. (2.) The Epistles, it must be admitted, with the exception of Col. ii. 16, 17, and perhaps Heb. iv. 9, are silent on the subject of the Sabbath. No rules for its observance are ever given by the apostles—its violation is never denounced by them, Sabbath-breakers are never included in any list of offenders. Col. ii. 16, 17 seems (so Mr. Garden, but see note <sup>2</sup>) a far stronger argument for the abolition of the Sabbath in the Christian dispensation than is furnished by Heb. iv. 9 (A. V. "rest," margin "keeping of a Sabbath") for its continuance; and while the first day of the week is more than once referred to as one of religious observance, it is never identified with the Sabbath. When we turn to the monuments which we possess of the early Church, we find ourselves on the whole carried in the same direction. The seventh day of the week continued, indeed, to be observed; but not as obligatory on Christians in the same way as on Jews. Again, the observance of the Lord's Day as a Sabbath would have been well-nigh impossible to the majority of Christians in the first ages, so connected were they with persecuting heathen masters, fathers, and neighbors. When the early Fathers speak of the LORD'S DAY, they sometimes, perhaps, by comparing, connect it with the Sabbath; but we have never found a passage, previous to the conversion of Constantine, prohibitory of any work or occupation on the former, and any such, did it exist, would have been in a great measure nugatory, for the reasons just alleged. After Constantine things become different at once. His celebrated edict prohibitory of judicial proceedings on the Lord's Day was probably dictated by a wish to give the great Christian festival as much honor as was enjoyed by those of the heathen, rather than by any reference to the Sabbath or the Fourth Commandment; but it was followed by several which extended the prohibition to many other occupations, and to many forms of pleasure held innocent on ordinary days. But it was surely impossible to observe both the Lord's Day, as was done by Christians after Constantine, and to read the Fourth Commandment without connecting the two; and, seeing that such was to be the practice of the developed Church, we can understand how the silence of the N. T. Epistles, and even the strong words of St. Paul (Col. ii. 16, 17), do not impair the human and universal scope of the Fourth Commandment, exhibited so strongly in the very nature of the Law, and in the teaching respecting it of Him who came not to destroy the Law, but to fulfil (Mat. v. 17). In the East, indeed, where the seventh day of the week was long kept as a festival, that would present itself to men's minds as the Sabbath, and the first day of the week would appear rather in its distinctively Christian character (LORD'S DAY), than in connection with the Old Law. But in the West the seventh day was kept for the most part as a fast, and that for a reason merely Christian, viz. in commemoration of our Lord's lying in the sepulchre throughout that day. Its observance therefore would not obscure the aspect of the Lord's Day as that of hebdomadal rest and refreshment. An exposition which has been given of Heb. iv. 8-10, by Owen and Wardlaw, is singularly illustrative of the view just suggested. Ver. 9 is, "there remaineth therefore a rest for the people of God." Now, it is important that throughout the passage the Greek word for "rest" is katapania, and that in the words just quoted it is changed into sabbatismos, which certainly means the keeping of rest, the act of sabbatizing rather than the objective rest itself. It has accordingly been suggested that those words are not the author's conclusion—which is to be found in the form of thesis in the declaration "we which have believed do enter into rest"—but a parenthesis to the effect that "to the people of God," the Christian community, there remaineth, there is left, a Sabbatizing, the great change that has passed upon them and the mighty elevation to which they have been brought as on other matters, so as regards the Rest of God revealed to them, still leaving scope for and justifying the practice. The objections, however, to this exposition are many and great, and most commentators regard the passage as having no reference to the weekly Sabbath.—The Gr. sabbaton, or pl. sabbata, sometimes = "week" in the N. T., i. e. (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) the interval from Sabbath to Sabbath (Mat. xxviii. 1; Mk. xvi. 2, 9; Lk. xviii. 12, xxiv. 1; Jn. xx. 1, 19; Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2). "The second Sabbath after the first" (Lk. vi. 1, literally the second-first Sabbath) = the first Sabbath after the second day (Sabbath) of unleavened bread connected with the PASSOVER (Robinson, Doddridge, Jahn, &c.); or the first Sabbath after the beginning of the second year in a cycle of seven years which was connected with the SABBATICAL YEAR (Wieseler, Van Oosterzee [in Lange], &c.). DAY; LORD'S DAY.

<sup>1</sup> The apostle says (Col. ii. 16, 17)—"Let no man, therefore, judge you in meat, or drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath-days; which are a shadow of good things to come; but the body is of Christ." He had been speaking of "the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us," and here he enumerates the ceremonial ordinances respecting food and drink and festivals, the term "Sabbath-days," here in the plural ("holy day" and "new moon" being in the singular) naturally including other holy days (e.g. the first, tenth, fifteenth, and twenty-second days of the seventh month, compare Lev. xxiii. 24, 32, 39) besides the seventh day of the week. These were "shadows of good things to come," types of which Christ was the "body" or fulfilment, "carnal ordinances imposed until the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 10). Christians might discontinue keeping these and all similar days without disobedience to God. Now, if there were contentions among the Colossians in respect to observing the first day of the week as the day of holy rest, as was perhaps the case, the apostle might properly, as the first day of the week (LORD'S DAY) was undoubtedly observed by the early Christians, add the observance of the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath to the catalogue of burdensome ordinances, without interfering at all with the Fourth Commandment, which plainly distinguishes "the Sabbath-day" as an institution from "the seventh day" of the week on which the Israelites observed it. The Son of Man as "Lord of the Sabbath" (Mk. ii. 28) might change it from the seventh day to the first; and then the sanctification of the seventh day as the Sabbath might be gradually discontinued without taking away the Sabbath or setting aside the Fourth Commandment. The perpetual obligation of the Sabbath is argued—(1.) From its adaptation to the physical and moral nature of man, and its necessity for the promotion of his highest well-being. Mankind must have a Sabbath, or be morally and physically degraded.—(2.) From its having been instituted by God for mankind. Whether instituted by God in Paradise or not (see note <sup>1</sup>), the reason for its institution as given in the Fourth Commandment (which reason is not inconsistent with, but only supplemented by, another in Deut. v. 15 peculiar to the Israelites) is one which applies to the whole race of man.—(3.) From the manifest favor with which God has always regarded it. Both under the Old Dispensation and the New the Sabbath has been a delight to God and His people; it has been "the holy of the Lord, honorable" (Is. lviii. 13). God has made it a blessing, spiritually as well as temporally, to all who have heartily and faithfully observed it.

<sup>2</sup> The argument for the pre-Mosaic institution of the Sabbath may be stated more cogently thus: The Israelites, like all the nations around them, were familiar with the WEEK as a division of time: Moses, when giving an account of the CREATION of the world, declared that God rested on the seventh day and blessed and sanctified it; and still further, God Himself in the Fourth Commandment, after speaking of the Sabbath just as if it was something previously known the observance of which was enforced, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy," subjoins as the reason, "For in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the LORD blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it." The natural conclusion from these facts is, that God instituted the Sabbath in Paradise for the human race—a conclusion coincident with the language of our Saviour, "The Sabbath was made for MAN," not for Israelites or Jews only, but for man as man (Mk. ii. 27).

Sabbath-day's Journey (Acts i. 12). On a violation of the commandment by some who went to look for manna on the seventh day, Moses enjoined every man to "abide in his place," and forbade any man to "go out of his place" on that day (Ex. xvi. 29). It seems natural to look on this as a mere enactment for the occasion, and having no bearing on any state of affairs subsequent to the journey through the wilderness and the daily gathering of manna. Whether the earlier Hebrews did or did not regard it thus, it is not easy to say. In after-times the precept in Ex. xvi. was undoubtedly viewed as a permanent law. But as some departure from a man's own place was unavoidable, the Scribes and Pharisees fixed the allowable amount at 2,000 paces, or about six furlongs, from the wall of the city. Our Saviour seems to refer to this law in warning the disciples (Jewish Christians, who would not feel free from the restrictions on journeying on that day) to pray that their flight from Jerusalem in the time of its judgment should not be on the Sabbath-day (Mat. xxiv. 20). The permitted distance seems to have been grounded on the space to be kept between the Ark and the people (Josh. iii. 4) in the wilderness, which tradition said was that between the Ark and the tents. We find the same distance given as the circumference outside the walls of the Levitical cities to be counted as their suburbs (Num. xxxv. 5). The place reckoned from was thus not a man's own house, but the wall of the city where he dwelt, and thus the amount of the lawful Sabbath-day's journeying must have varied greatly. When a man was obliged to go farther than a Sabbath-day's journey, on some good ground, he must, according to the Talmud, furnish himself the evening before with food for two meals, sit down and eat at the appointed distance, bury what he had left, and thank God for the appointed boundary, and then the next morning make this the point to reckon the distance from. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Sab-ba-the-us (fr. L.) = SHABBETHAI the Levite (1 Esd. ix. 14; compare Ezr. x. 15).

Sab-ba'te-al (fr. SABBATH) Year. As each seventh day and month were holy, so was each seventh year, by the Mosaic code. The law of the Sabbatical year, first given in Ex. xxiii. 10, 11, is, to sow and reap for six years, and to let the land rest on the seventh, "that the poor of thy people may eat: and what they leave the beasts of the field shall eat." It is added, "In like manner thou shalt deal with thy vineyard and thy oliveyard." We next meet with the enactment in Lev. xxv. 2-7, and finally in Deut. xv., in which last place the new feature presents itself of the seventh year being one of release to debtors. When we combine these several notices, we find that every seventh year the land was to have rest to enjoy her Sabbaths. Neither tillage nor cultivation of any sort was to be practised. (CORNER; GLEANING; LOAN; POOR.) This singular institution has the aspect, at first sight, of total impracticability. This, however, wears off when we consider that in no year was the owner allowed to reap the whole harvest (Lev. xix. 9, xxiii. 22), and so there would usually be some crop from spontaneous production, besides the produce of the vines and olives. Moreover, it is clear that the owners of land were to lay by corn in previous years for their own and their families' wants (xxv. 20-22). And though the right of property was in abeyance during the Sabbatical year, it has been suggested that this applied only to the fields, and not to the gardens attached to houses. The release of debtors during the Sabbatical year must not be confounded with the release of bondservants on the seventh year of their service. (SLAVE.) The spirit of this law, like that of the weekly Sabbath, was beneficent, limiting the rights and checking the sense of property; the one puts in God's claims on time, the other on the land. There may also have been an eye to the benefit which would accrue to the land from lying fallow every seventh year, in a time when the rotation of crops was unknown. The Sabbatical year opened in the Sabbatical month, and the whole Law was to be read every such year, during the Feast of Tabernacles, to the assembled people. At the completion of a week of Sabbatical years, the Sabbatical scale received its completion in the year of JUBILEE. It has been inferred from Lev. xxv. 2, that the Sabbatical year was to be held by the people on the first year of their occupying Canaan, but this would contradict ver. 3, 4. It is more reasonable to suppose, with the best Jewish authorities, that the law became obligatory fourteen years after the first entrance into the Promised Land, the conquest of which took seven years, and the distribution seven more. A further question arises: Was this law in point of fact obeyed? In the threatenings in Lev. xxvi., judgments on the violation of the Sabbatical year are particularly contemplated (ver. 33, 34); and that it was greatly if not quite neglected appears from 2 Chr. xxxvi. 20, 21, where the Captivity is spoken of as lasting "until the land had enjoyed her Sabbaths; for as long as she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years." Some of the Jewish commentators have inferred from this that their forefathers had neglected exactly seventy Sabbatical years. If such neglect was continuous, the law must have been disobeyed 490 years, i. e. through nearly the whole duration of the monarchy; and as there is nothing in the previous history leading to the inference that the people were more scrupulous then, we must look to the return from Captivity for indications of the Sabbatical year being actually and punctiliously observed. The dates of three Sabbatical years Mr. R. S. Poole gives as B. C. 163, 135, 87 (Jos. xii. 9, § 5, xiii. 8, § 1, xiv. 16, § 2, xv. 1, § 2; B. J. i. 2, § 4; 1 Mc. vi. 49, 53). ALEXANDER THE GREAT is said to have exempted the Jews from tribute during it; so too did Julius Cesar. CHRONOLOGY; FESTIVALS; SABBATH; YEAR.

the third in order of the sons of CUSH, who probably settled on the southern coast of ARABIA. The statements of Pliny, Ptolemy, &c., respecting Sabbatha, Sabota, or Sobotal, metropolis of the Atramiæ (probably the Chatramotitæ), seem (so Mr. E. S. Poole, with Winer, Knobel, Kell, &c.) to point to a trace of the tribe descended from Sabtah, always supposing that this Sabbatha was not a corruption or dialectic variation of SABA, SEBA, or SHEBA. Ptolemy places Sabbatha in 77° long, 16° 30' lat. It was an important city, containing no less than sixty temples. Gesenius thinks that Sabtah corresponds to the Ethiopian city Subat, Saba, Sabai, on the southwestern coast of the Red Sea, not far from the present Arkiko. Michaelis removes Sabtah to Ceula opposite Gibraltar, called in Arabic Sebtah; Bochart places Sabtah near the western shore of the Persian Gulf, with the Saphtha of Ptolemy, the name also of an island in that gulf.

Heb., id.), the fifth in order of the sons of CUSH (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chr. i. 9), whose settlements would probably be near the Persian Gulf in ARABIA. Bochart would place him in Carmania on the Persian shore of the Gulf; Gesenius and the Targum in Ethiopia.

Sack'but (Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15), the A. V. rendering of the Chal. sabbichâ. If this musical instrument = the Gr. sambuké and L. sambuca, the English translation is entirely wrong. The sackbut was a wind-instrument; the sambuca was played with strings. Mr. Chappell says: "The sackbut was a bass trumpet with a slide, like the modern trombone." The sambuca was a triangular instrument with four or more strings played with the fingers. HARR; MUSIC.

The robe probably resembled a sack in shape, was confined by a girdle of similar material (2 Sam. iii. 31; Is. iii. 24, &c.), and was sometimes worn through the night (1 K. xxi. 27). It was a garment of ascetics and prophets (Is. xx. 2). DRESS; MOURNING.

I. The words used to denote Sacrifice in Scripture. 1. Heb. minhâh or minchâh = a "GIFT" or "present" (Gen. xxxii. 13, 18, 20, 21, &c.), a sacrifice or "offering" generally (iv. 3-5, &c.), especially an unbloody sacrifice or "MEAT-OFFERING" (Lev. ii. 1, 3 ff., &c.).—2. Heb. korban, translated "offering" (Lev. i. 2 ff., ii. 1, 13, &c.) or "oblation" (ii. 4 ff., &c.; CORBAN).—3. Heb. zebach or zebach, Chal. debah or dëbach (Ezr. vi. 3) refers emphatically to a bloody sacrifice, in which the shedding of blood is the essential idea (Gen. xxxi. 54; Lev. iii. 1 ff., &c.), opposed to No. 1 in Ps. xl. 6, and to No. 4 in Ex. x. 25, &c. (compare Ps. li. 16, 17, 19 [Heb. 18, 19, 21]).—4. Heb. ôlâh = the

"BURNT-OFFERING" or "burnt-sacrifice," to be wholly consumed.—5. Heb. cdil (= complete, finished, perfect, Ges.), translated "whole burnt-sacrifice" (Deut. xxxiii. 10), "whole burnt-offering" (Ps. li. 19, Heb. 21), translated also "wholly" when used with other words denoting sacrifice (Lev. vi. 22, 23 [Heb. 15, 16]; 1 Sam. vii. 9).—6. Heb. shelem = "PEACE-OFFERING."—7. Heb. hattath or chattath = "SIN-OFFERING."—8. Heb. daham = "TRESPASS-OFFERING."—9. Gr. thusia, uniformly translated "sacrifice" in N. T. (Mat. ix. 13, &c.); in LXX. = No. 1, 3, 7, above.—10. Gr. doron, uniformly translated "GIFT" in N. T. (Mat. ii. 11, v. 23, 24, &c.); in LXX. = No. 1, 2, 3, above.—11. Gr. eidolothuton (= idol-sacrifice, Rbn., N. T. Lex.), translated "meats (or 'things') offered to idols," &c. (Acts xv. 29, xxi. 25; 1 Cor. viii. 1, 4, 7, 10, x. 19, 28; Rev. ii. 14, 20).—12. Gr. prosphora = "offering" (Acts xxi. 26, xxiv. 17; Eph. v. 2; Heb. x. 5, 8, 10, 14, 18), once "offering up" (Rom. xv. 16); in LXX. = No. 1 above.—II. The historical development of Sacrifice in the O. T. embraces—1. Origin of Sacrifice. In tracing the history of sacrifice from its first beginning to its perfect development in the Mosaic ritual, we are at once met by the long-disputed question as to the origin of sacrifice; whether it arose from a natural instinct of man, sanctioned and guided by God, or was the subject of some distinct primeval revelation. There can be no doubt (so Mr. Barry, whose article is here abridged), that sacrifice was sanctioned by God's Law, with a special typical reference to the ATONEMENT of Christ; its universal prevalence, independent of, and often opposed to, man's natural reasonings on his relation to God, shows it to have been primeval, and deeply rooted in the instincts of humanity. Whether it was first enjoined by an external command, or was based on that sense of sin and lost communion with God which is stamped by His hand on the heart of man—is an historical question, perhaps insoluble. The great difficulty in the theory which refers it to a distinct command of God, is the total silence of Holy Scripture. Nor is the mysterious and supernatural character of the Atonement, with which the sacrifices of the O. T. are expressly connected, any conclusive argument on this side of the question. All allow that the eucharistic and deprecatory ideas of sacrifice are perfectly natural to man. The higher view of its expiatory character, dependent, as it is, entirely on its typical nature, appears but gradually in Scripture. Only in the N. T. (especially in Hebrews) is its nature clearly unfolded. It is to be noticed that, except in Gen. xv. 9, the method of patriarchal sacrifice is left free. The inference is at least probable, that when God sanctioned formally a natural rite, then, and not till then, did He define its method. The question, therefore, of the origin of sacrifice is best left in the silence with which Scripture surrounds it.—2. Ante-Mosaic History of Sacrifice. In examining the various sacrifices recorded in Scripture before the establishment of the Law, we find that the words specially denoting expiatory sacrifice (hattath or chattath and daham; see above) are not applied to them. This fact does not at all show that they were not actually expiatory, but it justifies the inference that this idea was not then the prominent one in the doctrine of sacrifice. The sacrifice of Cain and Abel is called minhah or minchah (see above, and GIFT), although in the case of the latter it was a bloody sacrifice. In the case of both it would appear to have been eucharistic. The sacrifice of Noah after the Flood (Gen. viii. 20) is called burnt-offering ('olah; see above). This sacrifice is expressly connected with the institution of the COVENANT in ix. 8–17. The same ratification of a covenant is seen in Abraham's burnt-offering (xv. 9). The sacrifice (zebach or zabach) of Jacob at Mizpah also marks a covenant with Laban, to which God is called to be a witness and a party. In all these, therefore, the prominent idea seems to have been what is called the federative, the recognition of a bond between the sacrificer and God, and the dedication of himself, as represented by the victim, to the service of the Lord. The sacrifice of Isaac (xxii. 1–13) stands by itself. Yet in its principle it appears to have been of the same nature as before: the voluntary surrender of an only son on Abraham's part, and the willing dedication of himself on Isaac's, are in the foreground; the expiatory idea, if recognized at all, holds certainly a secondary position. In the burnt-offerings of Job for his children (Job i. 5) and for his three friends (xlii. 8), we for the first time find the expression of the desire of expiation for sin. The same is the case in the words of Moses to Pharaoh (Ex. x. 25). Here the main idea is at least deprecatory.—3. Sacrifices of the Mosaic Period. These are inaugurated by the offering of the PASSOVER and the sacrifice of Ex. xxiv. The Passover, indeed, is unique in its character, and seems to embrace the peculiarities of all the divisions of sacrifice soon to be established; but it is clear that the idea of salvation from death by means of sacrifice is brought out in it with a distinctness before unknown. The sacrifice of Ex. xxiv., offered as a solemn inauguration of the Covenant of Sinai, has a similarly comprehensive character, but the solemn use of the BLOOD (compare Heb. ix. 18–22) distinctly marks the idea that expiatory sacrifice was needed for entering into covenant with God. The Law of Leviticus now unfolds distinctly the various forms of sacrifice:—(a.) THE BURNT-OFFERING. Self-dedictory.—(b.) THE MEAT-OFFERING (unbloody); the PEACE-OFFERING (bloody). Eucharistic.—(c.) THE SIN-OFFERING; the TRESPASS-OFFERING. Expiatory.—To these may be added,—(d.) THE INCENSE offered after sacrifice in the Holy Place, and (on the Day of Atonement) in the Holy of Holies, the symbol of the intercession of the priest (as a type of the Great High-Priest), accompanying and making efficacious the prayer of the people. In the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Lev. viii.) we find these offered in what became ever afterward the appointed order: first came the sin-offering, to prepare access to God; next, the burnt-offering, to mark their dedication to His service; and thirdly, the meat-offering of thanksgiving. Henceforth, the sacrificial system was fixed in all its parts, until He should come whom it typified. It is to be noticed that the Law of Leviticus takes the rite of sacrifice for granted (Lev. i. 2, ii. 1, &c.), and is directed chiefly to guide and limit its exercise. In every case but that of the peace-offering, the nature of the victim was carefully prescribed, so as to preserve the idea symbolized.<sup>1</sup> The place of offering was expressly limited, first to the TABERNACLE, afterward to the TEMPLE. This ordinance also necessitated their periodical gathering as a nation before God, and so kept clearly before their minds their relation to Him as their national King.

(ЖЕHOBAH.) Both limitations brought out the great truth, that God Himself provided the way in which man should approach Him, and that the method of reconciliation was initiated by Him, and not by them. In consequence of the peculiarity of the Law, it has been argued that the whole system of sacrifice was only a condescension to the weakness of the people, borrowed, more or less, from the heathen nations, especially from Egypt, in order to guard against worse superstition and positive idolatry. Taken as an explanation of the theory of sacrifice, it is weak and superficial; but as giving a reason for the minuteness and elaboration of the Mosaic ceremonial, it may probably have some value.

—4. Post-Mosaic Sacrifices. The regular sacrifices in the Temple service were:—(a.) Burnt-offerings.

(1.) The daily burnt-offerings (Ex. xxix. 38-42; Num. xxviii. 3-8). (2.) The double burnt-offerings on the Sabbath (xxviii. 9, 10). (3.) The burnt-offerings at the great FESTIVALS, and at the new moon, Day of Atonement, and Feast of Trumpets (xxviii. 11-xxix. 39).—(b.) Meat-offerings. (1.) The daily meat-offerings (flour, oil, and wine) accompanying the daily burnt-offerings (Ex. xxix. 40, 41). (2.) The SHEWBREAD, renewed every Sabbath (Lev. xxiv. 5, 9). (3.) The special meat-offerings at the Sabbath and the great festivals (Num. xxviii., xxix.) (4.) The FIRST-FRUIITS, at the Passover (Lev. xxiii. 10-14), at Pentecost (xxiii. 17-20), both "wave-offerings;" the first-fruits of the dough and threshing-floor at the harvest-time (Num. xv. 20, 21; Deut. xxvi. 1-11), called "heave-offerings."—(c.) Sin-offerings. (1.) Sin-offering (a kid) each new moon (Num. xxviii. 15). (2.) Sin-offerings at the Passover, Pentecost, Feast of Trumpets, and Tabernacles (xxviii. 22, 30, xxix. 5, 15, 19, 22, 25, 28, 31, 34, 38). (3.) The offering of the two goats for the people, and of the bullock for the priest himself, on the Great Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi.; ATONEMENT, DAY OF).—(d.) Incense.

(1.) The morning and evening incense (Ex. xxx. 7, 8). (2.) The incense on the Great Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 12). Besides these public sacrifices, there were offerings of the people for themselves individually; at the PURIFICATION of women (Lev. xii.), the presentation of the FIRST-BORN, and CIRCUMCISION of all male children, the cleansing of the LEPROSY (xiv.) or any uncleanness (xv.), at the fulfilment of NAZARITE and other vows (Num. vi. 1-21; Vow), on occasion of marriage and of burial, &c., &c.—III. The Theory of Sacrifice, as set forth in the O. and N. T. By the order of sacrifice in its perfect form (as in Lev. viii.) it is clear that the sin-offering occupies the most important place, the burnt-offering comes next, and the meat-offering or peace-offering last of all. The second could only be offered after the first had been accepted; the third was only a subsidiary part of the second. Yet, in actual order of time, it has been seen that the patriarchal sacrifices partook much more of the nature of the peace-offering and burnt-offering; and that, under the Law, by which was "the knowledge of sin" (Rom. iii. 20), the sin-offering was for the first time explicitly set forth. This is but natural, that the deepest ideas should be the last in order of development—it is needless to dwell on the universality of heathen sacrifices, and difficult to reduce to any single theory the various ideas involved therein. It is clear that the sacrifice was often looked upon as a gift or tribute to the gods, also that sacrifices were used as prayers to obtain benefits, or to avert wrath. On the other hand, that they were regarded as thank-offerings, and the feasting on their flesh as a partaking of the "table of the gods" (compare 1 Cor. x. 20, 21), is equally certain. Nor was the higher idea of sacrifice, as a representation of the self-devotion of the offerer, body and soul, to the god, wholly lost, although generally obscured by the grosser and more obvious conceptions of the rite. But, besides all these, there seems always to have been latent the idea of propitiation, i. e. the belief in a communion with the gods, natural to man, broken off in some way, and by sacrifice to be restored.—Now, the essential difference between these heathen views of sacrifice and the Scriptural doctrine of the O. T. is not to be found in its denial of any of these ideas. In fact, it brings out, clearly and distinctly, the ideas which in heathenism were uncertain, vague, and perverted. But the essential points of distinction are two. First, that whereas the heathen conceived of their gods as alienated in jealousy or anger, to be sought after, and to be appeased by the unaided action of man, Scripture represents God Himself as approaching man, as pointing out and sanctioning the way by which the broken covenant should be restored. The second mark of distinction is closely connected with this, inasmuch as it shows sacrifice to be a scheme proceeding from God, and, in His foreknowledge, connected with the one central fact of all human history. It is to be found in the typical character of all Jewish sacrifices, on which, as the Epistle to the Hebrews argues, all their efficacy depended.—The nature and meaning of the various kinds of sacrifice is partly gathered from the form of their institution and ceremonial, partly from the teaching of the Prophets, and partly from the N. T., especially the Epistle to the Hebrews. All had relation, under different aspects, to a COVENANT between God and man. The SIN-OFFERING represented that Covenant as broken by man, and as knit together again, by God's appointment, through the "shedding of blood." Its characteristic ceremony was the sprinkling of the blood before the veil of the Sanctuary, the putting some of it on the horns of the altar of incense, and the pouring out of all the rest at the foot of the altar of burnt-offering. The shedding of the blood, the symbol of life, signified that the death of the offender was deserved for sin, but that the death of the victim was accepted for his death by the ordinance of God's mercy. Beyond all doubt the sin-offering distinctly witnessed that sin existed in man, that the "wages of that sin was death," and that God had provided an Atonement by the vicarious suffering of an appointed victim. The ceremonial and meaning of the BURNTOFFERING were very different. The idea of expiation seems not to have been absent from it, for the blood was sprinkled round about the altar of sacrifice; but the main idea is the offering of the whole victim to God, representing (as the laying of the hand on its head shows) the devotion of the sacrificer, body and soul, to Him (Rom. xii. 1). The death of the victim was, so to speak, an incidental feature. The MEAT-OFFERING, the peace or thank-offering, the first-fruits, &c., were simply offerings to God of His own best gifts, as a sign of thankful homage, and as a means of maintaining His service and His servants. The characteristic ceremony in the peace-offering was the eating of the flesh by the sacrificer. It betokened the enjoyment of communion with God. It is clear from this that the idea of sacrifice is a complex idea, involving the propitiatory, the dedicatory, and the eucharistic elements. Any one of these, taken by itself, would lead to error and superstitution. All three, probably, were more or less implied in each sacrifice, each element predominating in its turn. Now, the Israelites, while they seem always to have retained the ideas of propitiation and of eucharistic offering, constantly ignored the self-dedication which is the link between the two, and which the regular burnt-offering should have impressed upon them as their daily thought and duty. It is therefore to this point that the teaching of the prophets is mainly directed (1 Sam. xv. 22; Is. i. 10-20; Jer. vii. 22, 23; Ez. xx. 39-44; Hos. vi. 6; Am. v. 21-27; Mic. vi. 6-8, &c.). The same truth is recognized by the Psalmist (Ps. xl. 8-11, l. 13, 14, li. 16, 17, cxli. 2). It is not to be argued from these passages that the idea of self-dedication is the main one of sacrifice. The idea of propitiation lies below it, taken for granted by the Prophets as by the whole people, but still enveloped in mystery until the Antitype should come to make all clear. For the evolution of this doctrine we must look to the N. T. Without entering directly on the great subject of the ATONEMENT (which would be foreign to the scope of this article), it will be sufficient to refer to the connection, established in the N. T., between it and the sacrifices of the Mosaic system. To do this, we need do little more than analyze the Epistle to the Hebrews, which contains the key of the whole sacrificial doctrine. In the first place, it follows the prophetic books by stating, in the most emphatic terms, the intrinsic nullity of all mere material sacrifices (Heb. ix. 9, 10, x. 4). The very fact of their constant repetition is said to prove this imperfection; but it does not follow that they actually had no spiritual efficacy, if offered in repentance and faith. On the contrary, the object of the whole Epistle is to show their typical and probationary character, and to assert that in virtue of it alone they had a spiritual meaning. Our Lord is declared (see 1 Pet. i. 20) "to have been foreordained" as a sacrifice "before the foundation of the world;" or (as it is more strikingly expressed in Rev. xiii. 8) "slain from the foundation of the world." The material sacrifices represented this Great Atonement as already made and accepted in God's foreknowledge: and to those who grasped the ideas of sin, pardon, and self-dedication, symbolized in them, they were means of entering into the blessings which the One True Sacrifice alone procured. They could convey nothing in themselves; yet, as types, they might, if accepted by a true, though necessarily imperfect, faith, be means of conveying in some degree the blessings of the Antitype. (SAVIOUR.)—This typical character of all sacrifice being thus set forth, the next point dwelt upon is the union in our Lord's Person of the PRIEST, the offerer, and the sacrifice. It is clear that the Atonement, in this Epistle, as in the N. T. generally, is viewed in a twofold light. On the one hand, it is set forth distinctly as a vicarious sacrifice, which was rendered necessary by the sin of man, and in which the Lord "bare the sins of many." It is its essential characteristic that in it He stands absolutely alone, offering His sacrifice without any reference to the faith or the conversion of men. In it He stands out alone as the Mediator between God and man; and His sacrifice is offered once for all, never to be imitated or repeated. Now, this view of the Atonement is set forth in the Epistle to the Hebrews, as typified by the sin-offering (Heb. ix. 7-23). All the expiatory and propitiatory sacrifices of the Law are now for the first time brought into full light. As the sin-offering, though not the earliest, is the most fundamental of all sacrifices, so the aspect of the Atonement, which it symbolizes, is the one on which all others rest. On the other hand, the sacrifice of Christ is set forth to us, as the completion of that perfect obedience to the will of the Father which is the natural duty of sinless man, in which He is the representative of all men, and in which He calls upon us, when reconciled to God, to "take up the Cross and follow Him." In this view His death is not the principal object; we dwell rather on His lowly Incarnation, and His life of humility, temptation, and suffering, to which that death was but a fitting close. The main idea of this view of the Atonement is representative rather than vicarious. It is typified by the burnt-offering, in respect of which the N. T. merely quotes and enforces the language already cited from the O. T., and especially (see Heb. x. 6-9) the words of Ps. xl. 6, &c., which contrast with material sacrifice the "doing the will of God." As, without the sin-offering of the Cross, this, our burnt-offering, would be impossible, so also without the burnt-offering the sin-offering will to us be unavailing. With these views of our Lord's sacrifice on earth, as typified in the Levitical sacrifices on the outer altar, is also to be connected the offering of His Intercession for us in heaven, which was represented by the incense (Heb. ix. 24-28, comp. iv. 14-16, vi. 19, 20, vii. 25; ADORATION; PRAYER). The typical sense of the meat-offering, or peace-offering, is less connected with the sacrifice of Christ Himself, than with those sacrifices of praise, thanksgiving, charity, and devotion, which we, as Christians, offer to God, and "with which He is well pleased" (xiii. 15, 16), as with "an odor of sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable to God" (Phil. iv. 18).

Sa'das = AZGAD (1 Esd. v. 13; comp. Ezr. ii. 12).

* Sad'dle. ASS; CAMEL; HORSE; MULE.

Sad'duc (fr. Gr.) = ZADOK the high-priest (1 Esd. viii. 2).

Sad'du-rees [-seez] (fr. L. Sadducei; Gr. Saddoukaioi; see below), a religious party or school among the Jews at the time of Christ, who denied that the oral law was a revelation of God to the Israelites, and who deemed the written law alone to be obligatory on the nation, as of divine authority (Mat. iii. 7, xvi. 1, 6, 11, 12, xxii. 23, 34; Mk. xii. 18; Lk. xx. 27; Acts iv. 1, v. 17, xxiii. 6-8).—Origin of the name. The Hebrew word by which they are called in the Mishna is Tsedukim,<sup>1</sup> the plural of Tsedek = just, or righteous; used in the Bible only as a proper name, ZADOK. The most obvious translation of the word, therefore, is to call them Zadoks or Zadokites. The ordinary Jewish statement is that they are named from a certain Zadok, a disciple of the Antigonus of Socho, who is mentioned in the Mishna as having received the oral law from SIMON the Just, the last of the men of the Great Synagogue. But this statement is unsupported by Josephus or the Talmud, and appears unworthy of credit. Epiphanius states that the Sadducees called themselves by that name from Heb. tsedek = righteousness, "and that there was likewise anciently a Zadok (Heb. Tsedok) among the priests, but that they did not continue in the doctrines of their chief." This explanation of the origin of the word Sadducees must be rejected with that given by the Jews (so Mr. Twissleton, original author of this article). If now recourse is had to conjecture, the word is less likely to have arisen from the meaning of righteousness than from the name of an individual, inasmuch as Zadok (Heb. Taddók) never occurs in the Bible, except as a proper name. Now, according to the existing records of Jewish history, there was one ZADOK of transcendent importance, and only one: viz. the priest who was so prominent in David's time, and who declared in favor of Solomon, when Abiathar took the part of Adonijah as successor to the throne (1 K. i. 32-45). His line of priests appears to have had decided pre-eminence in subsequent history. Now, as the transition from the expression "sons of Zadok" and "priests of the seed of Zadok," to Zadokites, is easy and obvious, and as in Acts v. 17, it is said, "Then the high-priest rose, and all they that were with him, which is the sect of the Sadducees," and were filled with indignation," it has been conjectured by Geiger that the Sadducees or Zadokites were originally identical with the sons of Zadok, and constituted what may be termed a kind of sacerdotal aristocracy. To these were afterward attached all who for any reason reckoned themselves as belonging to the aristocracy; e. g. the families of the high-priest, who had attained consideration under the dynasty of Herod. These were for the most part judges, and individuals of the official and governing class.—I. As the PHARISEES asserted, so the Sadducees denied, that the Israelites were in possession of an Oral Law transmitted to them by Moses. That doctrine (of the existence of a Mosaic Oral Law) is at the present day rejected, probably by almost all, if not by all, Christians; and the greater number of Christians have never even heard of it, though it is older than Christianity, and has been the support and consolation of the Jews under the most cruel persecutions, and is likewise now maintained, all over the world, by those who are called the orthodox Jews. It must not be assumed that the Sadducees, because they rejected a Mosaic Oral Law, rejected likewise all traditions and all decisions in explanation of passages in the Pentateuch. Although they protested against the assertion that such points had been divinely settled by Moses, they probably, in numerous instances, followed practically the same traditions as the Pharisees. This will explain why in the Mishna specific points of difference between the Pharisees and Sadducees are mentioned, which are so unimportant, e. g. whether the stream of water from a clean vessel into an unclean one is itself clean or unclean, &c.—II. The denial of man's RESURRECTION after death, followed in the conception of the Sadducees as a logical conclusion from their denial that Moses had revealed to the Israelites the Oral Law. For on a point so momentous as a second life beyond the grave, no religious party among the Jews would have deemed themselves bound to accept any doctrine as an article of faith, unless it had been proclaimed by Moses, their great legislator; and it is certain that in the written Law of the PENTATEUCH there is a total absence of any assertion by Moses of the resurrection of the dead. This fact is presented to Christians in a striking manner by the well-known words of the Pentateuch which are quoted by Christ in argument with the Sadducees on this subject (Ex. iii. 6, 16; Mk. xii. 26, 27; Mat. xxii. 31, 32; Lk. xx. 37). It cannot be doubted that in such a case Christ would quote to His powerful adversaries the most cogent text in the Law; and yet the text actually quoted does not do more than suggest an inference on this great doctrine. It is true that passages in other parts of the O. T. express a belief in a resurrection (Is. xxvi. 19; Dan. xii. 2; Job xix. 26; and in some of the Psalms); and it may at first sight be a subject of surprise that the Sadducees were not convinced by the authority of those passages. But although the Sadducees regarded the books which contained these passages as sacred, it is more than doubtful whether any of the Jews regarded them as sacred in precisely the same sense as the written Law. To the Jews Moses was and is a colossal Form, preëminent in authority above all subsequent prophets.—In connection with the disbelief of a resurrection by the Sadducees, it is proper to notice the statement (Acts xxiii. 8) that they likewise denied there was "angel or spirit." A perplexity arises as to the precise sense in which this denial is to be understood. The two principal explanations which have been suggested are, either that the Sadducees regarded the angels of the O. T. as transitory unsubstantial representations of Jehovah, or that they disbelieved, not the angels of the O. T., but merely the angelical system which had become developed in the popular belief of the Jews after their return from the Babylonian Captivity. Perhaps, however, another suggestion is admissible. It appears from Acts xxiii. 9, that some of the scribes on the side of the Pharisees suggested the possibility of a spirit or an angel having spoken to St. Paul, on the very occasion when it is asserted that the Sadducees denied the existence of angel or spirit. Now, the Sadducees may have disbelieved in the occurrence of any such phenomena in their own time, although they accepted all the statements respecting angels in the O. T.; and thus the key to the assertion in ver. 8, that the Sadducees denied "angel or spirit," would be found exclusively in ver. 9.—III. The opinions of the Sadducees respecting the freedom of the will, and the way in which those opinions are treated by Josephus, have been noticed under PHARISEES. Possibly the stress laid by the Sadducees on the freedom of the will may have had some connection with their forming such a large portion of that class from which criminal judges were selected. The sentiment of the lines—

"Our acts our Angels are, or good or ill, Our fatal shadows that walk by us still," would express that portion of truth on which the Sadducees, in inflicting punishments, would dwell with most emphasis: and as, in some sense, they disbelieved in angels, these lines have a peculiar claim to be regarded as a correct exponent of Sadducean thought.—IV. Some of the early Christian writers, e. g. Epiphanius, Origen, and Jerome, attribute to the Sadducees the rejection of all the Sacred Scriptures except the Pentateuch; but this statement is now generally admitted to have been founded on a misconception of the truth, and probably to have arisen from a confusion of the Sadducees with the Samaritans. Josephus is wholly silent as to an antagonism on this point between the Sadducees and the Pharisees. What probably had more influence than any thing else in occasioning this misconception respecting the Sadducees, was the circumstance that in arguing with them on the doctrine of a future life (see II. above), Christ quoted from the Pentateuch only, although there are stronger texts in favor of the doctrine in some other books of the O. T.—V. It may be proper to notice a fact which, while it accounts for misconceptions of early Christian writers respecting the Sadducees, is on other grounds well worthy to arrest the attention. This fact is the rapid disappearance of the Sadducees from history after the first century, and the subsequent predominance among the Jews of the opinions of the Pharisees. Two circumstances indirectly, but powerfully, contributed to produce this result: (1.) The state of the Jews after the capture of Jerusalem by Titus; (2.) The growth of the Christian religion. (1.) It is difficult to over-estimate the consternation and dismay which the destruction of Jerusalem occasioned in the minds of sincerely religious Jews. In this their hour of darkness and anguish, they naturally turned to the consolations and hopes of a future state; and the doctrine of the Sadducees, that there was nothing beyond the present life, would have appeared to them cold, heartless, and hateful. (2.) While they were sunk in the lowest depths of depression, a new religion which they despised as a heresy and a superstition, of which one of their own nation (JESUS CHRIST) was the object, and another (PAUL) the unrivalled missionary to the heathen, was gradually making its way among the subjects of their detested conquerors, the Romans. One cause of its success was undoubtedly the vivid belief in the resurrection of Jesus, and a consequent resurrection of all mankind. Consciously, therefore, or unconsciously, many circumstances combined to induce the Jews, who were not Pharisees, but who resisted the new heresy, to rally round the standard of the Oral Law, and to assert that their holy legislator, Moses, had transmitted to his faithful people by word of mouth, although not in writing, the revelation of a future state of rewards and punishments. This doctrine is still maintained by the majority of our Jewish contemporaries.—The Karaites, who are found in Russia, Austria, Constantinople, &c., and number about 5,000 or 6,000, hold doctrines which are, with few exceptions, the same as those of the Sadducees (Ginsburg, in Kitto).

2. A descendant of Zerubbabel in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Mat. i. 14).

Saffron (fr. Ar. zafra, yellow), the A. V. (and doubtless correct) translation of the Heb. carrôm, mentioned only with other odorous substances in Cant. iv. 14; the Arabic Kurkum is similar to the Hebrew, and denotes the Crocus sativus, or "saffron crocus." Saffron has from the earliest times been in high esteem as a perfume. It was also used in seasoning dishes. The part of the plant which was used was the stigma, which was pulled out of the flower and then dried. These, when prepared, are dry, narrow, threadlike, and twisted together, of an orange-yellow color, having a peculiar aromatic and penetrating odor, with a bitterish and somewhat aromatic taste, tingeing the mouth and saliva yellow. Saffron was formerly highly esteemed as a stimulant medicine, and is still in high repute in the East (Dr. Royle, in Kitto).

* Sail. SHIP.

* Salat (fr. L.; Heb. hâsil or châsid, kâdôsh, &c.; Chal. kaddîsh; Gr. hagios) = a holy one, applied to angels (Dan. viii. 13; Zech. xiv. 5; 1 Th. iii. 13, &c.), but especially to the people of God, dead (Mat. xxvii. 52; Rev. xvi. 6, &c.) or living (Ps. xvi. 3, xxxvii. 28; Acts ix. 32, 41; Rom. i. 7, &c.). All the words translated "saint" are in other passages translated "holy" (Ps. lxxvi. 2; Is. iv. 3; Dan. iv. 8, 13; 1 Th. v. 26, 27, &c.). FAITH; RIGHTeous; SAVIOUR.

Sa'la (Gr.) = SALAH (Lk. iii. 35).

Sa'lah (fr. Heb. = SHELAH; see below), son of Arphaxad and father of Eber (Gen. x. 24, xi. 12-14; Lk. iii. 35); = SHELAH 2. The name is significant of extension. It thus seems to imply the historical fact of the gradual extension of a branch of the Shemitic race from its original seat in Northern Assyria toward the river Euphrates.

Sal'a-mis (Gr., probably named from Gr. salos, i. e. the breaking of the waves against the steep shores of the island, L. & S.), a city at the E. end of the island of CYPRUS, and the first place visited by Paul and Barnabas, on the first missionary journey, after leaving the mainland at Seleucia. Here alone, among all the Greek cities visited by St. PAUL, we read of "synagogues" in the plural (Acts xiii. 5). Hence we conclude that there were many Jews in Cyprus. And this is in harmony with what we read elsewhere. Jewish residents were in the island when the Seleucids reigned at Antioch (1 Mc. xv. 23). At a later period, in the reigns of Trajan and Hadrian, dreadful tumults here, caused by a vast multitude of Jews, made the whole city a desert. Salamis, afterward rebuilt and called Constantia, was not far from the modern Famagousta. It was situated near a river called the Pedieus, on low ground, which is in fact a continuation of the plain running up into the interior toward the place where Nicosia, the present capital of Cyprus, stands. Its harbor was very good. It was anciently the capital of Cyprus, and was, under the Romans, the most important mercantile town, if not the seat of government.

Sa-la'thi-el (Gr.) = SATHATHIEL, son of Jechonias (= JECONIAH or JEHOIACHIN), king of Judah, and father of Zerubbabel (ZERUBBABEL), according to Mat. i. 12; but son of Neri, and father of Zerubbabel, according to Lk. iii. 27; while the genealogy in 1 Chr. iii. 17-19 leaves it doubtful whether he is the son of Assir or Jechonias, and makes Zerubbabel his nephew. Upon the principle that no genealogy would assign to the true son and heir of a king any inferior and private parentage, whereas, on the contrary, the son of a private person would naturally be placed in the royal pedigree on his becoming the rightful heir to the throne; we may assert, with the utmost confidence (so Lord A. C. Hervey), that St. Luke gives us the true state of the case, when he informs us that Sathathiel was the son of Neri, and a descendant of Nathan the son of David. And from his insertion in the royal pedigree, both in 1 Chr. and Matthew, after the childless Jechonias, we infer, with no less confidence, that, on the failure of Solomon's line, he was the next heir to the throne of David. It may therefore be considered as certain, that Sathathiel was the son of Neri, and the heir of Jechonias. Dr. W. L. Alexander (in Kitto) prefers the hypothesis that Sathathiel "was really the son of Jechonias, and was counted for a son to Neri from having married his daughter." GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

Sal'cub (fr. Heb. = a moving along, moving about, Ges.), a city named in the early records of Israel as the extreme limit of BASHAN (Deut. iii. 10, "Salchah;" Josh. xiii. 11) and of the tribe of Gad (1 Chr. v. 11). On another occasion the name seems to denote a district rather than a town (Josh. xii. 5). It is doubtless identical with the town of Salkhad, which stands at the southern extremity of the Jebel Haurân, twenty miles S. of Kunawat (the ancient Kenath). Immediately below Salkhad commences the plain of the great Euphrates desert. The town is of considerable size, two or three miles in circumference, surrounding a castle on a lofty isolated hill, which was probably once the crater of a volcano. Many of the houses, though long deserted, are still perfect, with their stone roofs, doors, and walls; the city walls are still tolerably good; but the region is uninhabited and desolate.

Sal'ehab (Heb.) = SALCAH (Deut. iii. 10).

Salem (Gr. fr. Heb. shalēm = peace, Rbn. N. T. Lex.). 1. The place of which MELCHIZEDEK was king (Gen. xiv. 18; Heb. vii. 1, 2). Dr. Wolff, Stuart apparently (Comm. on Heb. l. c.), &c., regard Salem as a title (= peace), not the name of a place. But Salem and SHAVEN are generally regarded as lying near each other in Abram's road from Hobah to the plain of Mamre. The various opinions in regard to this Salem are:—1. That of the Jewish commentators, who with one voice affirm that Salem is JERUSALEM, on the ground that Jerusalem is so called in Ps. lxxvi. 2 (so Jos. i. 10, § 2, the Targums, and most commentators). 2. Jerome maintained that the Salem of Melchizedek was not Jerusalem, but a town near Scythopolis, which in his day was still called Salem. Elsewhere he places it more precisely at eight Roman miles from Scythopolis, and gives its name then as Salumias. Further, he identifies this Salem with the SALIM of John the Baptist (so also Rosenmüller, Tuch, Rüdiger, &c.). 3. Ewald pronounces that Salem is a town on the E. side of Jordan, on the road from Damascus to Sodom, quoting at the same time Jn. iii. 23. 4. A tradition given by Eupolemus (Eusebius Prep. Ev. ix. 17) differs in some important points from the Biblical account. According to this the meeting took place in the sanctuary of the city Argarizin, which is interpreted by Eupolemus to mean "the Mountain of the Most High." Argarizin is of course har Gerizzim (Heb. = Mount GERIZIM). Stanley (246) thinks Gerizim was the scene of the meeting with Melchizedek. (SHALEM.) 5. A Salem is mentioned in Jd. iv. 4, among the places seized and fortified by the Jews on the approach of Holofernes. If the Gr. aulōn, here translated "valley," is, according to frequent usage, the Jordan valley, then the Salem referred to must be that mentioned by Jerome. Or, as is perhaps still more likely, it refers to another Salim near Zer'in (Jezreel).—2. It seems to be agreed on all hands that Salem in Ps. lxxvi. 2 = JERUSALEM, but whether as a mere abbreviation to suit some exigency of the poetry, and point the allusion to the peace (salem) which the city enjoyed through the protection of God, or whether, after a well-known habit of poets, it is an antique name preferred to the more modern and familiar one, is a question not yet decided.

Sal'im (L. = SALEM), a place named (Jn. iii. 23) to point out the situation of ENON, the scene of John's last baptisms—Salim being the well-known town or spot, and Enon a place of fountains, or other water, near it. Eusebius and Jerome both affirm unhesitatingly that it existed in their day near the Jordan, eight Roman miles S. of Scythopolis. Jerome adds (under "Salem") that its name was then Salumias. Various attempts have been more recently made to determine the locality of this spct. 1. Some (as Alford, Greek Testament) propose SHILHIM and AIN, in the arid country far in the S. of Judea, entirely out of the circle of associations of John and of our Lord. Others identify it with the SHALIM of 1 Sam. ix. 4, but this latter place is itself unknown. 2. Robinson (iii. 298, 333) suggests the modern village of Salim, three miles E. of Nabulus, but this is no less out of the circle of John's ministrations, and is too near the Samaritans. A writer in the Colonial Church Chronicle, No. cxxvi. 464, who concurs in this opinion, was told of a village one hour E. (?; about five miles N. ?) of Salim "named 'Ain-un, with a copious stream of water." (ENON.) 3. Dr. Barclay maintains that Salim is to be found in Wady Selein, and Enon in the copious streams of 'Ain Farah, among the deep and intricate ravines some five miles N. E. of Jerusalem. This opinion Porter (in Kitto) favors. 4. The name of Salim has been lately discovered by Van de Velde (ii. 345) in a position exactly in accordance with the notice of Eusebius, viz. six English miles S. of Beisan, and two miles W. of the Jordan. Salim fulfils also the conditions implied in the name of Enon (springs), and the direct statement of the text, that the place contained abundance of water.

Sal'lai, or Sal'la-i (Heb. basket-maker? Ges.). 1. A Benjamite, who settled in Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 8).—2. Head of one of the courses of priests who went up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (xii. 20); = SALLU 2.

Sal'im (Heb. weighed, Ges.). 1. Son of Meshullam; a Benjamite in Jerusalem after the Captivity (1 Chr. ix. 7; Neh. xi. 7).—2. SALLAI 2 (xii. 7).

Sal-im-mus (fr. Gr.) = SHALLUM 11 (1 Esd. ix. 25).

Sal'ma (Heb. garment, Ges.), or Salmon (Heb. clothed, Ges.), son of Nahshon, the prince of Judah; father of Boaz, the husband of Ruth. On the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, Salmon took RAHAB of Jericho to be his wife, and from this union sprang the Christ (Mat. i. 4, 5; Lk. iii. 32, &c.). Two circumstances connected with Salmon have caused some perplexity. As regards the first, the orthography, the variation in proper names is so extremely common, that such slight differences are scarcely worth noticing (Rev. iv. 20, 21; comp. Shimea, Shim-eah, Shammah, Shamma, names of David's brother, &c.). As to the other difficulty, the variation in Salma's genealogy, which has induced some to think the Salma of 1 Chr. ii. 51, 54 is not the Salma of ii. 11, is more apparent than real. It arises from the circumstance that Bethlehem Ephrathah, which was Salmon's inheritance, was part of the territory of Caleb, the grandson of Ephrathah; and this caused him to be reckoned among the sons of Caleb (so Lord A. C. Hervey).

* Sal'mah (Heb.) = SALMA (Ru. iv. 20 marg.).

* Sal-man-as'ser = SHALMANESER (Hos. xi. 5 margin).

Sal-man-a'sar (L.) = SHALMANESER (2 Esd. xiii. 40).

Sal'mon (L. fr. Heb. tsalmōn = shady, Ges.; see below). It is usually supposed that a hill near Shechem, on which Abimelech and his followers cut down the boughs with which they set the tower of Shechem on fire (Judg. ix. 48, A. V. "ZALMON") is the "Salmon" or Zalmon mentioned in Ps. lxxviii. 14; and this is probable, though the passage is peculiarly difficult, and the precise allusion intended by the poet seems hopelessly lost (so Mr. Twisleton). The literal translation of the word is, "Thou makest it snow" in Salmon, or "It snows in Salmon," with liberty to use the word either in the past or in the future tense. As, notwithstanding ingenious attempts, this supplies no satisfactory meaning, recourse is had to a translation of doubtful validity, "Thou makest it white as snow," or "It is white as snow"—words to which various metaphorical meanings have been attributed. The allusion which, through the lexicon of Gesenius, is most generally received, is that the words refer to the ground being snow-white with bones after a defeat of the Canaanite kings. Some (Targum, Kimchi, &c.) suppose that Salmon (Heb. Tsalmon) is not a proper name in this passage, but merely signifies darkness.

Sal'mon (Heb. clothed, Ges.), the father of Boaz (Ru. iv. 20, 21; Mat. i. 4, 5; Lk. iii. 32). SALMA.

Sal-mo'ne (Gr.), the E. point of the island of CRETE (Acts xxvii. 7). PAUL.

Sal'mon, the Greek form of—1. SHALLUM, father of Hilkiah (Bar. i. 7).—2. SALU, father of Zimri (1 Mc. ii. 26).

Sal-lo'me [as an English word often pronounced Sa-lome'; comp. MAGDALENE, &c.] (fr. Heb. = pacific, Schl.). 1. The wife of ZEBEDEE (comp. Mat. xxvii. 56 with Mk. xv. 40). It is the opinion of many modern critics (Wieseler, Lange, Meyer, Alford, &c.) that she was the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus, to whom reference is made in Jn. xix. 25. The words admit, however, of another and hitherto generally received explanation, according to which they refer to the "MARY THE WIFE OF CLEOPHAS" immediately afterward mentioned. The only events recorded of Salome are that she preferred a request on behalf of her two sons for seats of honor in the kingdom of heaven (Mat. xx. 20), attended at the crucifixion of Jesus (Mk. xv. 40), and visited his sepulchre (xvi. 1). She is mentioned by name only on the two later occasions.—2. The "daughter of HERODIAS" by her first husband, HEROD PHILIP I (Mat. xiv. 6). She married first Philip the tetrarch of Trachonitis, her paternal uncle, and secondly Aristobulus, the king of Chalcis.

Salt [sawlt] (Heb. melah or melach; Gr. hals). Indispensable as salt (chloride of sodium) is to ourselves, it was even more so to the Hebrews, being to them not only an appetizing condiment in the food both of man (Job vi. 6) and beast (Is. xxx. 24 margin), and a most valuable antidote to the effects of the heat of the climate on animal food, but also entering largely into their religious services as an accompaniment to the various offerings presented on the altar (Lev. ii. 13). (SACRIFICE.) They possessed an inexhaustible and ready supply of it on the southern shores of the Dead Sea. (SEA, THE SALT.) Salt might also be procured from the Mediterranean Sea, and from this source the Phenicians would naturally obtain the supply necessary for salting FISH (Neh. xiii. 16) and for other purposes. The Jews appear to have distinguished between rock-salt and that gained by evaporation, as the Talmudists particularize one species (probably the latter) as the "salt of Sodom." The salt-pits formed an important source of revenue to the rulers of the country, and Antiochus conferred a valuable boon on Jerusalem by presenting the city with 375 bushels of salt for the Temple-service. In addition to the uses of salt already specified, the inferior sorts were applied as a manure to the soil, or to hasten the decomposition of dung (Mat. v. 13; Lk. xiv. 35). Too large an admixture, however, was held to produce sterility, as exemplified on the shores of the Dead Sea (Deut. xxix. 23; Zeph. ii. 9): hence "a salt land" = a barren land (Job xxxix. 6 margin; Jer. xvii. 6); and hence also arose the custom of sowing with salt the foundations of a destroyed city (Judg. ix. 45), as a token of its irretrievable ruin.—The salt used in this country (Syria and Palestine) is not manufactured by boiling clean salt water, nor quarried from mines, but is obtained from marshes along the sea-shore, as in Cyprus, or from salt-lakes in the interior, which dry up in summer, as the one in the desert N. of Palmyra, and the great lake of Jebbûl, S. E. of Aleppo. Maundrell, who visited the lake at Jebbûl, found salt there which had entirely lost its savor (Mat. v. 13; Mk. ix. 50), and the same abounds among the debris at Undum, and in other localities of rock-salt at the south end of the Dead Sea. Indeed, it is a well-known fact the salt of this country, when in contact with the ground, or exposed to rain and sun, does become insipid and useless. From the manner in which it is gathered, much earth and other impurities are necessarily collected with it. Not a little of it is so impure that it cannot be used at all, and such salt soon effloresces and turns to dust—not to fruitful soil, however. It is not only good for nothing itself, but it actually destroys all fertility wherever it is thrown, and this is the reason why it is cast into the street" (Thn. ii. 43, 44).—The associations connected with salt in Eastern countries are important. As one of the most essential articles of diet, it symbolized hospitality; as an antiseptic, durability, fidelity, and purity. Hence the expression, "COVENANT of salt" (Lev. ii. 13; Num. xviii. 19; 2 Chr. xiii. 5), as betokening an indissoluble alliance between friends; and again the expression, "salted with the salt of the palace" (Ezr. iv. 14), not necessarily meaning that they had "maintenance from the palace," as the A. V. has it, but that they were bound by sacred obligations of fidelity to the king. So in the present day, "to eat bread and salt together" is an expression for a league of mutual amity. It was probably with a view to keep this idea prominently before the minds of the Jews that the use of salt was enjoined on the Israelites in their offerings to God. The purifying property of salt, as opposed to corruption, led to its selection as the outward sign in Elisha's miracle (2 K. ii. 20, 21), and is also developed in the N. T. (Mat. v. 13; Col. iv. 6). The custom of rubbing infants with salt (Ez. xvi. 4) originated in sanitary considerations, but received also a symbolical meaning.

Salt, City of (Heb. 'ir hammelah or -lach; see CITY 1, and SALT), the fifth of the six cities of Judah which lay in the "wilderness" (Josh. xv. 62; DESERT 2). Robinson, Porter (in Kitto), &c., would place it somewhere near the plain at the S. end of the Salt Sea. (SALT, VALLEY OF.) Van de Velde mentions a Nahr Malh (?), a ravine or wady which begins W. S. W. from Sebbih (Masada), and runs S. E. to the Dead Sea.

* Salt Sea, the. SEA, THE SALT.

Salt, Valley of (Heb. gêy melah, and gêy hammelah or -lach; see VALLEY 2, and SALT), a certain valley, or perhaps more accurately a "ravine," in which occurred two memorable victories of the Israelite arms. 1. That of DAVID over the Edomites (2 Sam. viii. 13; 1 Chr. xviii. 12; compare 1 K. xi. 15, 16; Ps. lx. title; ABISHAI; JOAB 1). 2. That of ANAZIAH (2 K. xiv. 7; 2 Chr. xxv. 11). Neither of these notices affords any clew to the situation of the Valley of Salt. Seetzen was probably the first to suggest that it was the broad open plain which lies at the lower end of the Dead Sea, and intervenes between the lake itself and the range of heights which crosses the valley at six or eight miles to the S. (AKRABBIM.) The same view is taken (more decisively) by Dr. Robinson (ii. 109), who notes that it is adjacent to the mountain of salt (K'holim U'-dum), and separates the ancient territories of Judah and Edom. Porter (in Kitto) suggests that it might be the Wady Zuweireh, a well-known pass at the northern end of the salt-range of U'dum, though the scope of the narrative would rather seem to locate it nearer Edom. Mr. Grove also thinks it might be nearer Petra, and raises objections to Dr. Robinson's identification from the peculiar Hebrew word (gáy) here translated valley (VALLEY 2), from the word (ARABAH) elsewhere uniformly applied to the more northern parts of the same valley, and from the possibility that the Hebrew name (see above) translated "valley of salt" may be the representation of some archaic Edomite name (compare el-Milh [= salt], the Arabic representative of Mo'adah). Some have thought the place of David's victory in 2 Sam. viii. 13 was the remarkable valley of SALT S. E. of Aleppo (Robinson's Ges. Heb. Lex.).

Salum (fr. Gr.). 1. SHALLUM 8 (1 Esd. v. 28).—2. SHALLUM 6 (viii. 1).

Sal-na-tion (fr. L.). Salutations may be classed under the two heads of conversational and epistolary. The salutation at meeting consisted in early times of various expressions of blessing, such as "God be gracious unto thee" (Gen. xliii. 29); "Blessed be thou of the Lord" (Ru. iii. 10; 1 Sam. xv. 13); "The Lord be with you," "The Lord bless thee" (Ru. ii. 4); "The blessing of the Lord be upon you; we bless you in the name of the Lord" (Ps. cxxix. 8). Hence the term "bless" received the secondary sense of "salute" (Gen. xlvii. 7, 10; 1 K. viii. 66, &c.). The Hebrew term used in these instances (shalóm) has no special reference to "PEACE," as stated in the margin, but to general well-being, and strictly answers to our "welfare." The salutation at parting consisted originally of a simple blessing (Gen. xxiv. 60, xxviii. 1, xlvii. 10; Josh. xxii. 6), but in later times the term shalóm was introduced here also in the form "Go in peace," or rather "Farewell" (1 Sam. i. 17, xx. 42; 2 Sam. xv. 9). This was current in our Saviour's time (Mk. v. 34; Lk. vii. 50; Acts xvi. 36), and is adopted by Him in His parting address to His disciples (Jn. xiv. 27). It had even passed into a salutation on meeting in such forms as "Peace be to this house" (Lk. x. 5), "Peace be unto you" (xxiv. 36; Jn. xx. 19). The more common salutation, however, at this time was borrowed from the Greeks, their word chairein (A.V. "hail," "God speed" in 2 Jn. 10, 11) being used at meeting (Mat. xxvi. 49, xxviii. 9; Lk. i. 28), and probably also at departure. In modern times the ordinary mode of address current in the East resembles the Hebrew:—Es-selám aleykum, "Peace be on you," and the term "salam" has been introduced into our own language to describe the Oriental salutation.—The greetings noticed above were freely exchanged among persons of different ranks, even strangers, on meeting (Ru. ii. 4; Ps. cxxix. 8; Prov. xxvii. 14). The only restriction appears to have been in regard to religion, the Jew saluting only "brethren" (Mat. v. 47). The Apostle John forbids an interchange of greeting where it implied a wish for the success of a bad cause (2 Jn. 11, A.V. "God speed"). The modern Orientals are famed for the elaborate formality of their greetings, which occupy a very considerable time; the instances in the Bible are not such, and therefore the address to persons on urgent business, "Salute no man by the way" (2 K. iv. 29; Lk. x. 4), may best be referred to the delay likely to ensue from subsequent conversation (so Mr. Bevan).—The Persian monarch was never approached without the salutation, "O king, live for ever" (Dan. ii. 4, &c.). There is no evidence that this ever became current among the Jews (1 K. i. 31, compare 30). (ADORATION; KISS.) The epistolary salutations in the period subsequent to the O. T. were framed on the model of the Latin style: the addition of the term "peace" may, however, be a vestige of the old Hebrew form (2 Mc. i. 1). The writer placed his own name first, and then that of the person whom he saluted; only in special cases was this order reversed (i. 1, ix. 19; 1 Esd. vi. 7). A combination of the first and third persons in the terms of the salutation was not unfrequent (Gal. i. 1, 2; Phn 1; 2 Pet. i. 1). The Gr. chairein (A.V. "greeting") was used elliptically (expressed or understood) in the introductory salutation (1 Mc. x. 18; 2 Mc. ix. 19 ["wisheth joy"]; 1 Esd. viii. 9; Acts xv. 23, xxiii. 26 ["send greeting" in the last 3]; Jas. i. 1). A form of prayer for spiritual mercies was also used, e. g. "grace and peace" (Rom. i. 7, &c.). The concluding salutation consisted occasionally of a translation of the Latin valet (Gr. ronumai, A. V. "farewell"; Acts xv. 29, xxiii. 30), but more generally of the Gr. verb aspazomai, "I salute" (Rom. xvi. 5, 7, 9 ff, &c.) or "greet" (xvi. 3, 6, 8, &c.), or the cognate substantive aspasmos, A.V. "salutation" (1 Cor. xvi. 21, &c.), accompanied by a prayer for peace or grace. EPISTLE.

*Sal-va-tion (fr. L.; Heb. yeshú'ah, yasha', &c.; Gr. sóteria, sóterion) sometimes denotes deliverance from temporal evils or earthly destruction (Ex. xiv. 13, xv. 2; 1 Sam. xiv. 45; Phil. i. 19, &c.), but especially deliverance from the punishment and misery consequent on sin, with restoration to the favor of God and the bestowment of eternal life and blessedness in the KINGDOM OF HEAVEN (Is. lxii. 11; Zech. ix. 9; Lk. i. 77; Rom. i. 16, &c.). God is figuratively called "salvation," i. e. the author or giver of salvation (Ps. xxvii. 1; Is. xii. 2, xxxiii. 2, &c.). The Lord JESUS CHRIST has provided the salvation of the Gospel, and is therefore preëminently "the SAVIOUR" (Mat. i. 21; 1 Tim. iv. 10). ATONEMENT; DAMNATION; DEATH; FAITH; JUSTIFICATION; LIFE; RIGHTEOUS; SIN, &c.

Sam-ma'as [-ma'yas] (Gr. = SHEMAIAH). 1. SHEMAIAH 23 (1 Esd. i. 9).—2. SHEMAIAH 11 (viii. 39).—3. The "great Samaias," father of Ananias and Jonathas (Tob. v. 13).

Sam-a-ri-a [in L. pronounced Sam-a-ri'a] (L. fr. Heb. Shómérón = watch-post, Ges.; see below). 1. A city of Palestine. The word Shómérón means, etymologically (so Dr. Hesse), the original author of this article), pertaining to a watch, or a watch-mountain; and we should almost be inclined to think that the peculiarity of the situation of Samaria gave occasion to its name (see below). In the territory originally belonging to the tribe of Joseph, about six miles N. W. of SHECHEM, there is a wide basin-shaped valley, encircled with high hills, almost on the edge of the great plain (SHARON) which borders upon the Mediterranean. In the centre of this basin, which is on a lower level than the valley of Shechem, rises a less elevated oblong hill, with steep yet accessible sides, and a long flat top. This hill was chosen by OMRI as the site of the capital of the kingdom of Israel. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) He "bought the hill of Samaria of SHEMER for two talents of silver, and built on the hill, and called the name of the city which he built after the name of the owner of the hill, Samaria" (1 K. xvi. 23, 24). This statement, of course, dispenses with the etymology above alluded to; but the central position of the hill admirably adapted it for a place of observation and a fortress. From the date of Omri's purchase, B. C. 925, Samaria retained its dignity as the capital of the ten tribes. Ahab built a temple to Baal there (xvi. 32, 33); and hence a portion of the city, possibly fortified by a separate wall, was called "the city of the house of Baal" (2 K. x. 25). Samaria must have been a place of great strength. It was twice besieged by the Syrians, in B. C. 901 (1 K. xx. 1), and in B. C. 892 (2 K. vi. 24-vii. 20); but on both occasions the siege was ineffectual. The possessor of Samaria was considered de facto king of Israel (2 K. xv. 13, 14); and woes denounced against the nation were directed against it by name (Is. vii. 9, &c.). In B. C. 721, Samaria was taken, after a siege of three years, by SHALMANESER, king of Assyria (2 K. xviii. 9, 10), and the kingdom of the ten tribes was terminated. (See No. 3 below.) Some years afterward the district of which Samaria was the centre was repopled by Esar-haddon; but we do not hear especially of the city until the days of Alexander the Great. That conqueror took the city, which seems to have somewhat recovered itself, killed a large portion of the inhabitants, and suffered the remainder to settle at Shechem. He replaced them by a colony of Syro-Macedonians, and gave the adjacent territory to the Jews to inhabit. These Syro-Macedonians occupied the city until the time of John Hyrcanus, who took it after a year's siege, and did his best to demolish it entirely (B. C. 109). After this disaster the Jews inhabited what remained of the city; at least we find it in their possession in the time of Alexander Jannæus, and until Pompey gave it back to the descendants of its original inhabitants. By directions of Gabinius, Samaria and other demolished cities were rebuilt. But its more effectual rebuilding was undertaken by Heron the Great. He called it Sebaste (Gr. = venerable, august) = Augusta, after his patron AUGUSTUS; built a wall round it twenty stadia (two and a half miles) long, and a magnificent temple in the centre, dedicated to Cesar; and colonized it with 6,000 veterans and others. How long Samaria maintained its splendor after Herod's improvements we are not informed. In the N. T. the city itself does not appear to be mentioned, but rather a portion of the district to which, even in older times, it had extended its name (compare Mat. x. 5; Jn. iv. 4, 5). Henceforth its history is very unconnected. Septimus Severus planted a Roman colony there in the beginning of the third century. It had a Christian bishop probably as early as the third century. It fell into the hands of the Mohammedans during the siege of Jerusalem. During the crusades a Latin bishopric was established there. At this day the city is represented by a small village retaining few vestiges of the past except its name, Sebustieh, an Arabic corruption of Sebaste. Some architectural remains it has, partly of Christian construction or adaptation, as the ruined church of St. John the Baptist, partly, perhaps (colonnades, &c.), traces of Idumean magnificence. Jerome, whose acquaintance with Palestine imparts a sort of probability to the tradition which prevailed so strongly in later days, asserts that Sebaste, which he invariably identifies with Samaria, was the place in which John the Baptist was imprisoned and suffered death. He also makes it the burial-place of the prophets Elisha and Obadiah.—2. The "Samaria" of 1 Mc. v. 66 is in Josephus, doubtless correctly, Marissa (i. e. MARESHA).—3. "Samaria" (the district), "Samaritans." In the strictest sense of the term, a SAMARITAN would be an inhabitant of the city of Samaria. But it is found in the O. T. only once, and then in a wider signification (2 K. xvii. 29), designating those whom the king of Assyria had "placed in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel." "Samaria" at first included all the tribes over which Jeroboam made himself king, whether E. or W. of the river Jordan (1 K. xiii. 32). In other places in the historical books of the O. T. (except 2 K. xvii. 24, 26, 28, 29) "Samaria" seems to denote the city exclusively. But the prophets use "Samaria" in a greatly extended sense (Ez. xvi. 53; Hos. viii. 5, 6; Am. iii. 9). Hence "Samaritan" must have denoted every one subject to the king of the northern capital. But whatever extent the word might have acquired, it necessarily became contracted as the limits of the kingdom of Israel became contracted. In all probability the territory of Simeon and that of Dan were very early absorbed in the kingdom of Judah. This would be one limitation. Next, in B. C. 771 and 740 respectively, Pul, king of Assyria, and Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, carried away the Reubenites and the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. v. 26; compare also 2 K. x. 32, 33). This would be a second limitation. But the latter of these kings went further: "He took Ijon, and Abel-beth-maachah, and Janoah, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilead, and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria" (2 K. xv. 29). This would be a third limitation. But we have yet to arrive at a fourth limitation of the kingdom of Samaria, and, by consequence, of the word Samaritan. It is evident from an occurrence in Hezekiah's reign, that just before the deposition and death of Hoshea, the last king of Israel, the authority of the king of Judah, or, at least, his influence, was recognized by portions of Asher, Issachar, and Zebulun, and even of Ephraim and Manasseh (2 Chr. xxx. 1-26). Men came from all those tribes to the Passover at Jerusalem. This was about B. C. 726. Samaria (the city), and a few adjacent cities or villages only, represented that dominion which had once extended from Bethel to Dan northward, and from the Mediterranean to the borders of Syria and Ammon eastward (compare 2 K. xvii. 5, 6, 23; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 6).—This brings us more closely to the second point of our discussion, the origin of those who are in 2 K. xvii. 29, and in the N. T., called Samaritans. SHALMANESER (2 K. xvii. 5, 6, 26) carried Israel, i. e. the remnant of the ten tribes which still acknowledged Hoshea's authority, into Assyria. This remnant consisted, as has been shown, of Samaria (the city) and a few adjacent cities and villages. Now, (1.) Did he carry away all their inhabitants, or no? (2.) Whether they were wholly or only partially desolated, who replaced the deported population? In reference to (1.) the language of Scripture admits of scarcely a doubt. "Israel was carried away" (xvii. 6, 28), and other nations were placed "in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel" (xvii. 24, compare 26, 28, and xxi. 13). There is no mention whatever, as in the case of the somewhat parallel destruction of the kingdom of Judah, of "the poor of the land being left to be vine-dressers and husbandmen" (xxv. 12; CAPTIVITY). We may then conclude that the cities of Samaria were not merely partially but wholly evacuated of their inhabitants in B. C. 721 (see below), and that they remained in this desolated state until, in the words of 2 K. xvii. 24, "the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon (BABEL), and from CUTHAN, and from AVA (IVAN, xviii. 34), and from HAMATH, and from SEPHARVAIN, and placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel: and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities thereof." Thus the new Samaritans were Assyrians by birth or subjugation, were utterly strangers in the cities of Samaria, and were exclusively the inhabitants of those cities.—An incidental question, however, arises, Who was the king of Assyria that effected this colonization?

Josephus apparently attributes it to Shalmaneser; but the Samaritans themselves, in Ezr. iv. 2, 10, attributed their colonization to "ESAR-HADDON, king of Assur," or to "the great and noble ASNAPPER," either the king himself or one of his generals (about

b. c. 677). The fact, too, that some of these foreigners came from Babylon would seem to direct us to Esar-haddon, rather than to his grandfather, Shalmaneser. And this date coincides with the termination of the sixty-five years of Isaiah's prophecy, delivered b. c. 742, within which "Ephraim should be broken that it should not be a people" (Is. vii. 8).—These strangers, placed in "the cities of Samaria" by Esar-haddon, were of course idolaters, and worshipped a strange medley of divinities. God's displeasure was kindled, and they were infested by beasts of prey, which had probably increased to a great extent before their entrance upon it. On their explaining their miserable condition to the king of Assyria, he dispatched one of the captive priests to teach them "how they should fear the Lord." The priest came accordingly, and henceforth, in the language of the sacred historian, they "feared the Lord, and served their graven images, both their children and their children's children: as did their fathers, so do they unto this day" (2 K. xvii. 41). Such was the origin of the new Samaritans—men not of Jewish extraction, but from the further East. A gap occurs in their history until Judah has returned from Captivity. They then desire to be allowed to participate in the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerusalem. But they do not call it a national undertaking. They advance no pretensions to Jewish blood. They confess their Assyrian descent, and even put it forward ostentatiously, perhaps to enhance the merit of their partial conversion to God. The Jews, however, do not listen favorably to their overtures. Ezra, no doubt, who records the transaction, saw them through and through. On this the Samaritans become open enemies, frustrate the operations of the Jews through the reigns of two Persian kings, and are only effectually silenced in the reign of Darius Hystaspis,

b. c. 519. The feud, thus unhappily begun, grew year by year more inveterate. Matters at length came to a climax. About b. c. 409, Manasseh, a priest expelled from Jerusalem by Nehemiah for an unlawful marriage, obtained permission from the Persian king of his day, Darius Nothus, to build a temple on Mount GERIZIM, for the Samaritans, with whom he had found refuge (so Dr. Hessey, with Prideaux, &c.; but see GERIZIM; NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF). The animosity of the Samaritans became more intense than ever. They are said to have done every thing in their power to annoy the Jews. Their own temple on Gerizim they considered much superior to that at Jerusalem. There they sacrificed a pass-over. Toward the mountain, even after the temple on it had fallen, wherever they were, they directed their worship. To their copy of the Law (SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH) they arrogated an antiquity and authority greater than attached to any copy in the possession of the Jews. The Law (i. e. the five books of Moses) was their sole code; they rejected every other book in the Jewish Canon. The Jews, on the other hand, were not more conciliatory in their treatment of the Samaritans. The copy of the Law possessed by that people they declared to be the legacy of an apostate (Manasseh), and cast grave suspicions upon its genuineness. Certain other Jewish renegades had from time to time taken refuge with the Samaritans. Hence, by degrees, the Samaritans claimed to partake of Jewish blood, especially if doing so happened to suit their interest. A remarkable instance of this is exhibited in their unsuccessful request of Alexander the Great, about b. c. 332 (before he besieged and destroyed the city of Samaria), to be excused from payment of tribute in the Sabbatical year, on the plea that, as true Israelites, descendants of Ephraim and Manasseh, sons of Joseph, they refrained from cultivating their land in that year. Another instance of claim to Jewish descent appears in the words of the woman of Samaria to our Lord (Jn. iv. 12), "Art thou greater than our father Jacob, who gave us the well?" Very far were the Jews from admitting this claim to consanguinity on the part of these people. They were ever reminding them that they were after all mere Cutheans, mere strangers from Assyria. They would have no dealings with them that they could possibly avoid (iv. 9). "Thou art a Samaritan and hast a devil" was an expression of bitter reproach (viii. 48). The Samaritan was publicly cursed in their synagogues—could not be a witness in Jewish courts—could not be admitted to any sort of proselytism. The traditional hatred in which the Jew held the Samaritan is expressed in Eccles. i. 25, 26. Even the apostles believed that an inhospitable slight shown by a Samaritan village to Christ would be not unduly avenged by calling down fire from heaven (Lk. ix. 52 ff.; compare Mat. x. 5, 6; Lk. x. 33, xvii. 16; Jn. iv. 22; Acts i. 8, viii. 5, ff.). Such were the Samaritans of our Lord's day: a people distinct from the Jews, though lying in the very midst of the Jews, a people preserving their identity, though seven centuries had rolled away since they had been brought from Assyria by Esar-haddon, and though they had abandoned their polytheism for a sort of ultra Mosaicism: a people, who—though their limits had gradually contracted, and the rallying-place of their religion on Mount Gerizim had been destroyed by John Hyrcanus (B. C. 130), and though Samaria (the city) had been again and again destroyed, and though their territory had been the battle-field of Syria and Egypt—still preserved their nationality, still worshipped from Shechem and their impoverished settlements toward their sacred hill; still retained their nationality, and could not coalesce with the Jews. Not, indeed, that we must suppose that the whole of the country called in our Lord's time Samaria was in the possession of the Cuthean Samaritans, or that it had ever been so. It was bounded northward by the range of hills which commences at Mount Carmel on the W., and, after making a bend to the S. W., runs almost due E. to the valley of the Jordan, forming the southern border of the plain of Esdraelon. It touched toward the S., as nearly as possible, the northern limits of Benjamin. Thus it comprehended the ancient territory of Ephraim, and of the Manassites W. of Jordan. The Cuthean Samaritans, however, possessed only a few towns and villages of this large area, and these lay almost together in the centre of the district. They observe the Law, and celebrate the Passover in a sacred spot on Mount GERIZIM. The Samaritans were very troublesome, both to Jews and Romans, in the first century A. C. PILATE chastised them with a severity which led to his own downfall, and a slaughter of 10,600 of them took place under Vespasian. Yet, they increased greatly in numbers and importance. Epiphanius (fourth century) considers them the chief and most dangerous enemies of Christianity. An outrage on the Christians at Neapolis (Shechem), toward the end of the fifth century, was so severely punished that they sank into obscurity. They are just noticed by travellers in the twelfth and fourteenth centuries. In the latter part of the sixteenth century a correspondence with them was commenced by Joseph Scaliger. At Nablus (SHECHEM) the Samaritans have still a settlement, consisting of about 200 persons. The view maintained above, as to the purely Assyrian origin of the New Samaritans, is that of Suicer, Reland, Hammond, Drusius (in the Critici Sacri), Maldonatus, Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Robinson, and Archbishop Trench. Others, as De Sacy, Gesenius, Winer, Döllinger, Davidson, Mills, Ayre, &c., have held a different view, which may be expressed thus in Döllinger's words: "In the northern part of the Promised Land (as opposed to Judea proper) there grew up a mingled race which drew its origin from the remnant of the Israelites who were left behind in the country on the removal of the Ten Tribes, and also from the heathen colonists who were transplanted into the cities of Israel. Their religion was as hybrid as their extraction: they worshipped Jehovah, but, in addition to Him, also the heathen idols of Phœnician origin which they had brought from their native land."

Sa-mar'i-tan Pen'ta-tench (see above, and PENTATEUCH). I. The Samaritan Pentateuch is a Recension of the commonly received Hebrew Text of the Mosaic Law, in use with the Samaritans, and written in the ancient Hebrew or so-called Samaritan character. This recension is quoted by Origen, Jerome, Eusebius, and other Fathers. The Talmud mentions the Samaritan Pentateuch distinctly and contemptuously as a clumsily-forged record. Down to within the last two hundred and fifty years, however, no copy of this divergent Code of Laws had reached Europe, and it began to be pronounced a fiction. In 1616, Pietro della Valle acquired a complete MS. from the Samaritans in Damascus. In 1623 it was presented by Achille Harley de Sancy to the Library of the Oratory in Paris, and in 1628 there appeared a brief description of it by J. Morin in his preface to the Roman text of the LXX. It was published in the Paris Polyglott, whence it was copied, with few emendations from other copies, by Walton. The number of MSS. in Europe has gradually grown to eighteen. These MSS. vary in size from 12mo to folio, and no scroll, such as the Jews and the Samaritans use in their synagogues, is found among them. Their material is vellum or cotton-paper; the ink used is black in all cases save the scroll used by the Samaritans at Nablus, the letters of which are in gold. There are neither vowels, accents, nor diacritical points. The individual words are separated from each other by a dot. Greater or smaller divisions of the text are marked by two dots placed one above the other, and by an asterisk. A small line above a consonant indicates a peculiar meaning of the word, an unusual form, a passive, &c.: it is, in fact, a contrivance to bespeak attention. The whole Pentateuch is divided into nine hundred and sixty-four paragraphs, or Kâtsim, the termination of which is indicated by these figures, =, ∴, or <. To none of the MSS. which have as yet reached Europe can be assigned a higher date than the 10th century A. C. The scroll used in Nablus is said by the Samaritans to have been written by Abishua the son of Phinehas. Its true date is not known. (OLD TESTAMENT; WRITING.) Morin and others after him placed the Samaritan Pentateuch far above the Received Text in point of genuineness, but Ravius succeeded in finally disposing of this point of the superiority (1755). It was from his day forward allowed, almost on all hands, that the Masoretic text was the genuine one, but that in doubtful cases, when the Samaritan had an "unquestionably clearer" reading, this was to be adopted, since a certain amount of value, however limited, did attach to it. Here the matter rested until 1815, when Gesenius, in his masterly dissertation on its origin and character, abolished the remnant of the authority of the Samaritan Pentateuch. Gesenius divides all the peculiar readings of the Samaritan Pentateuch into eight classes, viz.—1. Readings by which emendations of a grammatical nature have been attempted. (a.) The quiescent letters, or matres lectionis (OLD TESTAMENT, A 1), are supplied. (b.) The more poetical forms of the pronouns are altered into the more common ones. (c.) The same propensity for completing apparently incomplete forms is noticeable in the flexion of the verbs. (d.) On the other hand, the paragogical letters vav (ו) and yod (י), at the end of nouns, are almost universally struck out by the Samaritan corrector; and, in the ignorance of the existence of nouns of a common gender, he has given them genders according to his fancy. (e.) The infinite absolute is reduced to the form of the finite verb. For obsolete or rare forms, the modern and more common ones have been substituted in a great number of places. 2. Glosses and interpretations received into the text. 3. Conjectural emendations of real or imaginary difficulties in the Masoretic text. 4. Readings in which apparent deficiencies have been corrected or supplied from parallel passages in the common text. 5. An extension of class 4, comprising larger phrases, additions, and repetitions from parallel passages. 6. Emendations of passages and words of the Hebrew text which contain something objectionable in the eyes of the Samaritans, on account either of historical improbability or apparent want of dignity in the terms applied to the Creator. Thus, in the Samaritan Pentateuch, no one, in the antediluvian times, begets his first son after he has lived 150 years: but one hundred years are, where necessary, subtracted before, and added after the birth of the first son. (CHRONOLOGY; SEPTUAGINT.) Thus Ex. xii. 40 in our text reads, "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel who dwelt in Egypt was four hundred and thirty years." The Samaritan has "The sojourning of the children of Israel [and their fathers who dwell in the land of Canaan and in the land of Egypt] was four hundred and thirty years:" an interpolation of very late date indeed. Again, in Gen. ii. 2, "And God [?] had] finished on the seventh day" is altered into "the sixth," lest God's rest on the Sabbath-day might seem incomplete. 7. Samaritanisms, i. e. certain Hebrew forms, translated into the idiomatic Samaritan. 8. Alterations made in favor or on behalf of Samaritan theology, hermeneutics, and domestic worship. Thus the word Elohim (God), four times construed with the plural verb in the Hebrew Pentateuch, is in the Samaritan Pentateuch joined to the singular verb (Gen. xx. 13, xxxi. 53, xxxv. 7; Ex. xxii. 9); and further, anthropomorphisms as well as anthropopathisms are carefully expunged—a practice very common in later times. The last and perhaps most momentous of all intentional alterations is the constant change of all the phrases, "God will choose a spot," into "He has chosen," viz. GERIZIM, and the well-known substitution of Gerizim for Ebal in Deut. xxvii. 4 (A. V. 5). In Exodus as well as in Deuteronomy the Samaritan has, immediately after the Ten Commandments, the following from Deut. xxvii. 2-7 and xi. 30: "And it shall be on the day when ye shall pass over Jordan . . . ye shall set up these stones . . . on Mount Gerizim . . . and there shalt thou build an altar . . . 'That mountain' on the other side Jordan by the way where the sun goeth down . . . in the champaign over against Gilgal, beside the plains of Moreh, 'over against Shechem;'"—this last superfluous addition, which is also found in Deut. xi. 30 of the Samaritan Pentateuch, being ridiculed in the Talmud.—From the immense number of these worse than worthless variants Gesenius has singled out the following four, which he thinks preferable on the whole to those of the Masoretic text; yet they too have since been, all but unanimously, rejected: (1.) After the words, "And Cain spoke to his brother Abel" (Gen. iv. 8), the Samaritan adds, "let us go into the field." (2.) In Gen. xxii. 13 instead of "behind him a ram" the Samaritan reads, "one ram." (3.) For (Gen. xlix. 14) "an ass of bone," i. e. "a strong ass," the Samaritan has "an ass of strangers." (4.) For "he led forth his trained servants" (Gen. xiv. 14), the Samaritan reads, "he numbered."—Important additions to the preceding classes of Gesenius have been made by Frankel, such as the Samaritans' preference of the imperative for the third person; ignorance of the use of the infinitive absolute for the imperative; Galileanisms—to which also belongs the permutation of the letters Ahevi (aleph [א], he [ה], vav [ו], yod [י]), in the Samaritan; the occasional softening down of the pé (פ) into béyth (ב), of caph (צ) into gimel (ג), tsadey (צ) into zayin (ז), &c., and chiefly the presence of words and phrases in the Samaritan which are not interpolated from parallel passages, but are entirely wanting in our text. Frankel derives from these passages chiefly the conclusion that the Samaritan Pentateuch was, partly at least, emended from the LXX., Onkelos, and other very late sources. Kirchheim makes thirteen classes of peculiarities instead of the eight of Gesenius: 1. Additions and alterations in the Samaritan Pentateuch in favor of Gerizim. 2. Additions for the purpose of completion. 3. Commentary, glosses. 4. Change of verbs and moods. 5. Change of nouns. 6. Emendation of seeming irregularities by assimilating forms, &c. 7. Permutation of letters. 8. Pronouns. 9. Gender. 10. Letters added. 11. Addition of prepositions, conjunctions, articles, &c. 12. Junction of separated, and separation of joined words. 13. Chronological alterations.—Mr. Deutsch, the original author of this article, gives four reasons for the divergence of existing opinions: (a.) the obscurity of the history of the Samaritans (SAMARIA 3); (b.) the small number of MSS., all comparatively recent; (c.) the imperfect collation of these MSS.; (d.) the lack of any thorough comparison of the various readings of the Samaritan Pentateuch and those of the LXX. The following are the leading opinions, and the chief arguments for and against them:—(1.) The Samaritan Pentateuch came into the hands of the Samaritans as an inheritance from the ten tribes whom they succeeded (so J. Morin, Walton, Cappellus, Kennicott, Michaelis, Eichhorn, Bauer, Jahn, Bertholdt, Steudel, Mazade, Stuart, Davidson, &c.). Because (a.) It seems improbable that the Samaritans should have accepted their code at the hands of the Jews after the Exile, since there existed an intense hatred between the two nationalities. (b.) The Samaritan Canon has only the Pentateuch in common with the Hebrew Canon: had that book been received at a period when the Hagiographa and the Prophets were in the Jews' hands, it would be surprising if they had not also received those. (c.) The Samaritan letters, avowedly the more ancient, are found in the Samaritan copy: therefore it was written before the alteration of the character into the square Hebrew—which dates from the end of the Exile—took place. On the other side it is argued:—(a.)

There existed no religious animosity whatsoever between Judah and Israel when they separated. The ten tribes could not therefore have bequeathed such an animosity to those who succeeded them. On the contrary, the contest between the slowly Judaized Samaritans and the Jews only dates from the moment when the latter refused to recognize the claims of the former, of belonging to the people of God, and rejected their aid in building the Temple. (b.) The jealousy with which the Samaritans regarded Jerusalem, and the intense hatred which they naturally conceived against the post-Mosaic writers of national Jewish history, would sufficiently account for their rejecting the other books, in all of which, save Joshua, Judges, and Job, either Jerusalem, as the centre of worship, or David and his House, are extolled. (c.) The present Hebrew character was not introduced by Ezra after the return from the Exile, but came into use at a much later period. The Samaritans might therefore have received the Pentateuch at the hands of the returned exiles, who, according to the Talmud, afterward changed their writing, and in the Pentateuch only, so as to distinguish it from the Samaritan. (2.) The second leading opinion on the age and origin of the Samaritan Pentateuch is that it was introduced by Manasseh at the time of the foundation of the Samaritan Sanctuary on Mount Gerizim (so Ant. van Dale, R. Simon, Prideaux, Fulda, Hasse, De Wette, Gesenius, Hupfeld, Hengstenberg, Keil, &c.). In support of this opinion are alleged, the idolatry of the Samaritans before they received a Jewish priest through Esarhaddon (2 K. xvii. 24-33), and the immense number of readings common to the LXX. and this Code, against the Masoretic text. (3.) Other, but very isolated notions, are those of Morin, Le Clerc, Poncet, &c., that the Israelitish priest sent by the king of Assyria to instruct the new inhabitants in the religion of the country brought the Pentateuch with him. Further, that the Samaritan Pentateuch was the production of an impostor, Dositheus, who lived during the time of the apostles, and who falsified the sacred records in order to prove that he was the Messiah (Usher). Against which there is only this to be observed, that there is not the slightest alteration of such a nature to be found. Finally, that it is a very late and faulty recension, made after the Masoretic Text (sixth century after Christ), into which glosses from the LXX. had been received (Frankel).—The chief opinions with respect to the agreement of the numerous and as yet uninvestigated readings of the LXX. and the Samaritan Pentateuch are:—1. That the LXX. have translated from the Samaritan (De Dieu, Selden, Hottinger, Hassencamp, Eichhorn, &c.). 2. That mutual interpolations have taken place (Grotius, Usher, Ravius, &c.). 3. That both versions were formed from Hebrew copies, which differed among themselves as well as from the one which afterward obtained public authority in Palestine; that, however, very many wilful corruptions and interpolations have crept in in later times (Gesenius). 4. That the Samaritan has in the main been altered from the LXX. (Frankel).—But the Samaritan and LXX. quite as often disagree with each other, and follow each the Masoretic Text. Further, the quotations in the N. T. from the LXX., where they coincide with the Samaritan against the Hebrew Text, are so few and unimportant that they cannot be adduced as any argument whatsoever.—II. Versions from the Samaritan Pentateuch. 1. Samaritan. According to the Samaritans themselves, their high-priest Nathaniel, who died about 20 B. C., is its author. Gesenius puts its date a few years A. C. Juynboll thinks that it had long been in use in the second century A. C. Frankel places it after Mohammed. Other investigators date it from the time of Esarhaddon's priest (so Schwarz), or either shortly before or after the foundation of the temple on Mount Gerizim. It seems certain, however, that it was composed before the destruction of the second temple; and being intended, like the Targums, for the use of the people exclusively, it was written in the popular Samaritan idiom, a mixture of Hebrew, Aramaic, and Syriac. In this version the original has been followed, with a very few exceptions, in a slavish and sometimes perfectly childish manner, the sense evidently being of minor consideration. In other cases, where no Samaritan equivalent could be found for the Hebrew word, the translator, instead of paraphrasing it, simply transposes its letters, so as to make it look Samaritan. On the whole it may be considered a very valuable aid toward the study of the Samaritan Text, on account of its very close verbal adherence. A few cases, however, may be brought forward, where the Version has departed from the Text, either under the influence of popular religious notions, or for the sake of explanation. Anthropomorphisms are avoided. "Angel" is frequently found instead of "God." A great difficulty is offered by the proper names which this version often substitutes, they being, in many cases, less intelligible than the original ones. The similarity it has with Onkelos occasionally amounts to complete identity; but no safe conclusion as to the respective relation of the two versions can be drawn from this. This Version has likewise, in passing through the hands of copyists and commentators, suffered many interpolations and corruptions. The first copy of it was brought to Europe by De la Valle, together with the Samaritan Text, in 1616. J. Nodrinus first published it together with a faulty Latin translation in the Paris Polyglott, whence it was, with a few emendations, reprinted in Walton, with some notes by Castell.—2. Greek-Samaritan. The hatred between the Samaritans and the Jews is supposed to have caused the former to prepare a Greek translation of their Pentateuch in opposition to the LXX. of the Jews. In this way at least the existence of certain fragments of a Greek Version of the Samaritan Pentateuch, preserved in some MSS. of the LXX., together with portions of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, &c., is accounted for. These fragments are supposed to be alluded to by the Greek Fathers under the name Samaritanikon (Gr. = Samaritan). It is doubtful, however, whether it ever existed (as Gesenius, Winer, Juynboll suppose) in the shape of a complete translation, or only designated (as Castell, Voss, Herbst hold) a certain number of scholia translated from the Samaritan Version. Other critics (Hävernick, Hengstenberg, &c.) see in it only a corrected edition of certain passages of the LXX.—3. In 1070 an Arabic Version of the Samaritan Pentateuch was made by Abu Said in Egypt, on the basis of the Arabic translation of Saadiah haggakon. (VERSIONS, ANCIENT [ARABIC].) Like the original Samaritan it avoids anthropomorphisms and anthropopathisms, replacing the latter by euphemisms, besides occasionally making some slight alterations, especially in proper nouns. It appears to have been drawn up from the Samaritan Text, not from the Samaritan Version. Its language is far from elegant, or even correct.—4. To this Arabic version Abu Barakat, a Syrian, wrote in 1208 a somewhat paraphrastic commentary, which has by degrees come to be looked upon as a new Version—the Syriac.—III. Samaritan Literature, besides the Pentateuch and its versions. 1. Chronicon Samaritanum (L. = Samaritan Chronicle). "There is no Prophet but Moses" is a chief dogma of the Samaritans. Fierce invectives are uttered against Samuel, Eli, Solomon, Ezra, &c. Joshua alone seems to have found favor in their eyes; but the Book of Joshua, which they perhaps possessed in its original form, gradually came to form only the groundwork of a fictitious national Samaritan history, overgrown with the most fantastic and anachronistic legends. This is the so-called "Samaritan Joshua," or Chronicon Samaritanum, sent to Scaliger by the Samaritans of Cairo in 1584. It was edited by Juynboll (Leyden, 1848), and his acute investigations have shown that it was redacted into its present form about A. D. 1300, out of four special documents, three of which were Arabic, and one Hebrew (i. e. Samaritan). The chronicle embraces the time from "King Joshua" to about A. D. 350, and was originally written in, or subsequently translated into, Arabic. 2. From this work chiefly has been compiled another chronicle written in 1355, by Abu'l Fatah. This comprises the history of the Jews and Samaritans from Adam to the years of the Hegira 756 and 798 (A. D. 1355 and 1397) respectively. It is of equally low historical value; its only remarkable feature being the adoption of certain Talmudical legends, which it took at second hand from Josippon ben Gorion. 3. A work on the history and genealogy of the patriarchs, from Adam to Moses, attributed to Moses himself; perhaps the same which Petermann saw at Nablus, and which consisted of sixteen vellum leaves (supposed, however, to contain the history of the world down to the end). 4. Other Samaritan works chiefly in Arabic—their Samaritan and Hebrew literature having mostly been destroyed by the Emperor Commodus—are: some Commentaries upon the whole or parts of their Pentateuch; a few theological works chiefly in Arabic, mixed with Samaritanisms; and some grammatical works. 5. Their Liturgical literature consists chiefly of hymns (Deftor, Durran) and prayers for Sabbath and Feast days, and of occasional prayers at nuptials, circumcisions, burials, &c.—IV. We shall only briefly touch here upon the strangely contradictory rabbinical laws framed for the regulation of the intercourse between the two rival nationalities of Jews and Samaritans in religious and ritual matters; discrepancies due partly to the ever-shifting phases of their mutual relations, partly to the modifications brought about in the Samaritan creed, and partly to the now less now greater acquiescence of the Jews in the religious state of the Samaritans. Thus we find the older Talmudical authorities disputing whether the Cuthim (Samaritans) are to be considered as "Real Converts," or only converts through fear—"Lion Converts." (PROSELYTE IV.) It would appear that notwithstanding their rejection of all but the Pentateuch, they had adopted many traditional religious practices from the Jews—principally such as were derived direct from the Books of Moses. It was acknowledged that they kept these ordinances with even greater rigor than those from whom they adopted them. The utmost confidence was therefore placed in them for their ritually slaughtering animals, even fowls; their wells are pronounced to be conformed to all the conditions prescribed by the Mishna; their unleavened bread for the Passover is commended; their cheese; and even their whole food is allowed to the Jews. Their testimony was valued in that most stringent matter of the letter of divorce. They were admitted to the office of circumcising Jewish boys. The criminal law makes no difference between them and the Jews. By degrees, however, inhibitions began to be laid upon the use of their wine, vinegar, bread. We hear of their exclusion by R. Meir, in the third generation of the Tanaim (Aram. = repeaters, or teachers of the Law), and later again under R. Abbuhā, the Amora (Aram. = expositor, or later doctor of the Law), at the time of Diocletian; this time the exclusion was unconditional and final. Partaking of their bread was considered a transgression, to be punished like eating the flesh of swine. In Mat. x. 5 Samaritans and Gentiles are already mentioned together; and in Lk. xvii. 18 the Samaritan is called "a stranger." The reason for this exclusion is variously given.

SAM'a-tus (fr. Gr.), one of the sons of Ozora in the list of 1 Esd. ix. 34.

*Sa'mech [-mek] (Heb. fulcrum, support, Ges.), the fifteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.). WRITING.

Sa-mel'us [-me'yus] (fr. Gr.) = SHEMAIAH 13 (1 Esd. ix. 21).

Sam'gar-ne'bo (Heb. fr. Pers. = sword of NEBO, i. e. of Mercury? Ges.; Fürst makes Samgar = cupbearer, and connects Nebo with the following Sarsechim; Von Bohlen makes Samgar = warrior), one of the princes or generals of the king of Babylon who commanded the army of the Chaldeans at the capture of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxix. 3).

Sa'mi = SHOBAI (1 Esd. v. 28).

Sa'mis = SHIMEI 13 (1 Esd. ix. 34).

Sam'lah (Heb. a garment), a king of Edom, successor to Hadad or Hadar (Gen. xxxvi. 36, 37; 1 Chr. i. 47, 48). Mr. E. S. Poole supposes MASREKAH was his chief city.

SAM'mus (fr. Gr.) = SHEMA (1 Esd. ix. 43).

Sa'mos (Gr. a height, especially by the sea-shore, Str., L. & S.), a very illustrious Greek island off that part of Asia Minor where IONIA touches CARIA. Samos is a very lofty and commanding island. It was celebrated for its fertility, its pottery, its temple of Juno, and as the birth-place of Pythagoras. It is noticed in the account of St. Paul's return from his third missionary journey (Acts xx. 15). He had been at Chios, and was about to proceed to Miletus, having passed by Ephesus without touching there. The night was spent at the anchorage of TROGYLIUM, in the narrow strait between Samos and the extremity of the mainland-ridge of Mycale. This spot is famous for the great battle of the old Greeks against the Persians in B. C. 479, and for a gallant action of the modern Greeks against the Turks in 1824. Jews resided here (1 Mc. xv. 23). Samos was anciently mistress of the sea, afterward a valuable dependency of Athens. In the time of Herod the Great, and when St. Paul was there, it was politically a "free city" in the province of ASIA. ROMAN EMPIRE.

Sam-o-thra'ci-a [-she-a] (L. fr. Gr. = the SAMOS [or height] of THRACE, Str.), an island in the Aegean Sea, off the coast of Thrace, mentioned in the account of St. Paul's first voyage to Europe (Acts xvi. 11). Being a very lofty and conspicuous island, it is an excellent landmark for sailors, and must have been full in view, if the weather was clear, throughout that voyage from TROAS to NEAPOLIS. This voyage, made with a fair wind, occupied only parts of two days, and the technical word here used (A. V. "came with a straight course") implies that they ran before the wind (compare the five days of a subsequent return-voyage, xx. 6). Now, the position of this island exactly corresponds with these notices. St. Paul and his companions anchored for the night off Samothracia. The ancient city, and therefore probably the usual anchorage, was on the north side, which would be sufficiently sheltered from a S. E. wind. In St. Paul's time Samothracia (or Samothrace) had, according to Pliny, the privileges of a small free state, though it was doubtless considered a dependency of the province of Macedonia. The mysterious divinities called Cabiri were here worshipped.

Samp'sa-mes [-meez] (Gr.), a name in the list of those written to by the Romans in behalf of the Jews (1 Mc. xv. 23). It was probably a place, which Grimm identifies with Samsun on the coast of the Black Sea, between Sinope and Trebizond.

Samson (L.; Gr. Sampsôn; fr. Heb. Shimshôn = sunlike, Ges.; strong, Jos.; the distinguished, the hero, Fû.), son of MANOAH, a man of ZORAH, in the tribe of DAN, on the border of Judah (Josh. xv. 33, xix. 41). The account of his birth, life, and exploits is given in Judg. xiii.-xvi. His birth was foretold by an angel of the Lord, who said that he should be "a NAZARITE unto God from the womb," and should "begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the PHILISTINES." He sought, contrary to his parents' wish, to marry a Philistine female of TIMNATH, acting in this under the prompting and secret control of Jehovah, who saw fit thus to bring upon the Philistines a righteous retribution. On his way to Timnath he slew a LION, in the carcass of which he afterward found a swarm of bees and honey. (BEE.) At the MARRIAGE feast he put forth a RIDDLE, the solution of which the guests obtained through his wife's treachery. He then went to ASHKELON and slew thirty Philistines, whose garments (DRESS) he gave as the prize to those who expounded the riddle. His wife was given to another, and Samson then caught 300 foxes or jackals (FOX), fastened a firebrand to each pair, and turned them into the standing corn of the Philistines. The enraged Philistines burnt his wife and her father; Samson slew many of the Philistines, and retired to the rock ETAM (ETAM, THE ROCK); and afterward, bound by the men of Judah and delivered up to the Philistines, he slew a thousand of the latter in LEHI with the jaw-bone of an ass, and was then refreshed by drinking of the spring EN-HAKKORE. Subsequently visiting a harlot in GAZA, and watched by his enemies, he escaped them by carrying off both doors or leaves of one of the city-gates with their posts and bar to the top of a hill in the direction of Hebron. After this, he loved a woman in the valley of SOREK, named DELILAH, who enticed him to reveal to her the secret of his great strength and then betrayed him to his enemies, who put out his eyes (PUNISHMENTS) and made him grind corn in the prison-house at Gaza. (MILL.) After his hair began to grow and his strength returned, the Philistines made a great sacrifice to DAGON and brought out Samson to make sport for them. He then, taking hold of the two middle pillars on which the house stood, pulled down the whole edifice, and thus slew at his death about 3,000 men and women. (1.) As a JUDGE his authority seems to have been limited to the district bordering upon the country of the Philistines, and his action as a deliverer does not seem to have extended beyond desultory attacks upon the dominant Philistines. It is evident from Judg. xiii. 1, 5, xv. 9-11, 20, and the whole history, that the Israelites, or at least Judah and Dan, which are the only tribes mentioned, were subject to the Philistines through the whole of Samson's judgeship; so that Samson's twenty years of office (xvi. 31) would be included in the forty years of the Philistine dominion. From the angel's speech to Samson's mother (xiii. 5), it appears further that the Israelites were already subject to the Philistines at his birth; and as Samson cannot have begun to be judge before he was twenty years of age, it follows that his judgeship must have coincided with the last twenty years of Philistine dominion. But in 1 Sam. vii. 1-14, &c., we find that the Philistine dominion ceased under the judgeship of Samuel. Hence Lord A. C. Hervey concludes that the early part of Samuel's judgeship coincided with the latter part of Samson's; and that the capture of the ark by the Philistines in the time of Eli occurred during Samson's lifetime. Lord A. C. Hervey also argues the proximity of the times of Samson and Samuel from the general prominence of the Philistines in their relation to Israel, the Naziritism of both Samson and Samuel (xiii. 5, xvi. 17; compare 1 Sam. i. 11), and the similar notices of the house of Dagon and of the lords of the Philistines (Judg. xvi. 8, 18, 23, 27; 1 Sam. v. 2, 7; JUDGES, BOOK OF). There is no allusion whatever to other parts of Israel during Samson's judgeship, except the single fact of the men of the border tribe of Judah, 3,000 in number, fetching him from the rock Etam to deliver him up to the Philistines (Judg. xv. 9-13). The whole narrative is entirely local, and, like the following story concerning Micah (xvii., xviii.), seems to be taken from the annals of the tribe of Dan. (2.) As a NAZARITE, Samson exhibits the law in Num. vi. in full practice (Judg. xiii. 5, xvi. 17). (3.) Samson was endowed with supernatural power by the Spirit of the Lord. "The Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times in Mahaneh-dan." "The Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him, and the cords that were upon his arms became as flax burnt with fire." "The Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he went down to ASHKELON, and slew thirty men of them" (Judg. xiii. 25, xiv. 19). After his locks were cut, and his strength was gone from him, it is said, "he wist not that the Lord was departed from him" (xiii. 25, xiv. 6, 19, xv. 14, xvi. 20). The phrase, "the Spirit of the Lord came upon him," is common to him with Othniel and Gideon (iii. 10, vi. 34); but the connection of supernatural power with the integrity of the Nazaritic vow, and the particular gift of great strength of body, as seen in tearing in pieces a lion, breaking his bonds asunder, carrying the gates of the city on his back, and throwing down the pillars which supported the house of DAGON, are peculiar to Samson. Indeed, his whole character and his history have no exact parallel in Scripture. It is easy, however, to see how forcibly the Israelites would be taught, by such an example, that their national strength lay in their complete separation from idolatry, and consecration to the true God; and that He could give them power to subdue their mightiest enemies, if only they were true to His service (compare 1 Sam. ii. 10).—Samson was one of the most remarkable personages in history. God seems to have raised him up "to baffle the power of the whole Philistine nation by the prowess of a single individual. . . . The enrolment of his name by an apostolic Jew (Heb. xi. 32) in the list of the ancient worthies, who had by faith obtained an excellent report, warrants us undoubtedly in a favorable estimate of his character on the whole, while at the same time the fidelity of the inspired narrative has perpetuated the record of infirmities which must for ever mar the lustre of his noble deeds" (Bush, in Kitto).—It is an interesting question whether any of the legends respecting HERCULES were derived from Phenician traditions of the strength of Samson. The combination of great strength with submission to the power of women; the slaying of the Nemean lion; the coming by his death at the hands of his wife; and especially the story told by Herodotus of the captivity of Hercules in Egypt, are certainly remarkable coincidences. Phenician traders might easily have carried stories concerning the Hebrew hero to Greece, Italy, &c., and such stories would have been moulded according to the taste or imagination of those who heard them.

Sam'u-el (L. fr. Heb. Shēmū'el = name of God, Origin? Ges.; placed by God; asked of God, Jos.; heard of God, Sil., &c.), also written SHĒMUEL, the last JUDGE, the first of the regular succession of Prophets (PROPHET), and the founder of the monarchy. (KING.) He was son of ELKANAH 4, an Ephrathite or Ephraimite (EPHRATHITE 2), and of HANNAH. His birth-place (1 Sam. i. 1, 19; RAMAH 2; RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM) is one of the vexed questions of sacred geography, as his descent is of sacred genealogy. Elkanah's family must have been large. His wife Peninnah had several children, and Hannah had, besides Samuel, three sons and two daughters. In the account of Samuel's birth Hannah is described as a woman of a high religious mission. Almost a Nazarite by practice (i. 15), and a prophetess in her gifts (ii. 1), she sought from God the gift of the child for which she longed with a passionate devotion of silent prayer, of which there is no other example in the O. T., and when the son was granted, the name which he bore, and thus first introduced into the world, expressed her sense of the urgency of her entreaty—Samuel (= "the Asked [or Heard] of God"). Living in the great age of vows, she had before his birth dedicated him to the office of a NAZARITE. As soon as he was weaned (CHILD), she herself with her husband brought him to the TABERNACLE at SHILOH, where she had received the first intimation of his birth, and there solemnly consecrated him (i. 24). Then his mother made him over to ELI (25, 28), and the child himself performed an act of worship. The HYMN which followed on this consecration is the first of the kind in the sacred volume (ii. 1-10; POETRY, HEBREW). From this time the child is shut up in the Tabernacle. The priests furnished him with an EPHON, and his mother every year, apparently at the only time of their meeting, gave him a little mantle. (DRESS; MANTLE 2.) He seems to have slept within the Holiest Place (iii. 3), and his special duty was to put out, as it would seem, the sacred candlestick, and to open the doors at sunrise. In this way his childhood was passed. Whilst thus sleeping in the Tabernacle he received his first prophetic call (iii. 1-18). The stillness of the night—the sudden voice—the child-like misconception—the venerable Eli—the contrast between the terrible doom and the gentle creature who has to announce it—give to this portion of the narrative a universal interest. From this moment the prophetic character of Samuel was established. His words were treasured up, and Shiloh became the resort of those who came to hear him (iii. 19-21). In the overthrow of the sanctuary, which followed shortly on this vision, we hear not what became of Samuel (iv. 11). He next appears, probably twenty years afterward, suddenly among the people, warning them against their idolatrous practices (vii. 3, 4). He convened an assembly at MIZPEH. As he was offering up a sacrifice, and sustaining his loud cry of supplication, the Philistine host suddenly burst upon them. A violent thunderstorm came to the timely assistance of Israel. The Philistines fled, and, exactly at the spot where twenty years before they had obtained their great victory, they were entirely routed. A stone was set up, which long remained as a memorial of Samuel's triumph, and gave to the place its name of EBEN-EZER = the Stone of Help (vii. 12). This was Samuel's first and, as far as we know, his only military achievement. But it was apparently this which raised him to the office of "JUDGE" (comp. xii. 11 and Eccles. xlv. 15-18). He visited, in discharge of his duties as ruler, the three chief sanctuaries on the W. of Jordan—BETHEL, GILGAL, and MIZPEH (1 Sam. vii. 16). His own residence was still his native city, Ramah or Ramathaim, which he further consecrated by an altar (vii. 17). Here he married, and two sons (ABIAH 3; JOEL 1; VASHNI) grew up to repeat under his eyes the same perversion of high office that he had himself witnessed in his childhood in the case of the two sons of Eli. In his old age he shared his power with them (viii. 1-4).—Down to this point in Samuel's life there is little to distinguish his career from that of his predecessors. But his peculiar position in the sacred narrative turns on the events which follow. He is the inaugurator of the transition from what is commonly called the theocracy (JEHOVAH; KING) to the monarchy. The misdemeanor of his own sons precipitated the catastrophe which had been long preparing. The people demanded a king. For the whole night he lay fasting and sleepless, in the perplexity of doubt and difficulty (so Dean Stanley, original author of this article, after Josephus). In the vision of that night, as recorded by the sacred historian, is given the dark side of the new institution, on which Samuel dwells on the following day (1 Sam. viii. 9-18). This presents his reluctance to receive the new order of things. The whole narrative of the reception and consecration of SAUL gives his acquiescence in it. The final conflict of feeling and surrender of his office is given in the last assembly over which he presided, and in his subsequent relations with Saul. The assembly was held at Gilgal, immediately after the victory over the Ammonites. The monarchy was a second time solemnly inaugurated, and "Saul (so the Hebrew text; 'Samuel,' according to the LXX.) and all the men of Israel rejoiced greatly." Then takes place his farewell address. He appeals to their knowledge of his integrity, and sums up the new situation in which they have placed themselves, and although the wickedness of asking a king is still strongly insisted on, and the thunderstorm (in May or June; RAIN; THUNDER), in answer to his prayer, is urged as a sign of the Divine displeasure, the king is repeatedly acknowledged as the Lord's "anointed" (ANOINTING), the future prosperity of the nation is declared to depend on their use or misuse of the new constitution, and Samuel retires with expressions of goodwill and hope (xii.). It is the most signal example afforded in the O. T. of a great character reconciling himself to a changed order of things, and of the Divine sanction resting on his acquiescence.—His subsequent relations with Saul are of the same mixed kind. The two institutions which they respectively represented ran on side by side. Samuel was still Judge. He judged Israel "all the days of his life" (vii. 15), and from time to time came across the king's path. Samuel is called emphatically "the PROPHET" (Acts iii. 24, xiii. 20). He was especially known in his old age as "Samuel the Seer" (1 Sam. ix. 11, 18, 19; 1 Chr. ix. 22, xxvi. 28, xxix. 29). He was consulted far and near on the small affairs of life (1 Sam. ix. 7, 8). From this prophetic gift, combined with his office of ruler, an awful reverence grew up around him. No sacrificial feast was thought complete without his blessing (ix. 13). A peculiar virtue was believed to reside in his intercession. He was conspicuous in later times among those that "call upon the name of the Lord" (Ps. xcix. 6; 1 Sam. xii. 18; Jer. xv. 1). There was something peculiar (so Stanley) in the long-sustained cry or shout of supplication, which seemed to draw down as by force the Divine answer (1 Sam. vii. 8, 9, xv. 11). But two points more especially placed him at the head of the prophetic order as it afterward appeared. The first is brought out in his relation with Saul, the second in his relation with David. (1.) He represents the independence of the moral law, of the Divine Will, as distinct from regal or sacerdotal enactments, which is so remarkable a characteristic of all the later prophets. He was, if a Levite, yet certainly not a priest; and all the attempts to identify his opposition to Saul with a hierarchical interest are founded on a complete misconception of the facts of the case. From the time of the overthrow of Shiloh, he never appears in the remotest connection with the priestly order. When he counsels Saul, it is not as the priest but as the prophet. Saul's sin, in both cases where he came into collision with Samuel, was not of intruding into sacerdotal functions, but of disobedience to the prophetic voice. The first was that of not waiting for Samuel's arrival, according to the sign given by Samuel at his original meeting at Ramah (x. 8, xiii. 8); the second (xv.) was that of not carrying out the stern prophetic injunction for the destruction of the Amalekites. The aged prophet with his own hand hacked AGAG limb from limb, and with true prophetic utterance said to Saul, "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." The parting was not one of rivals, but of dear though divided friends. The king throws himself on the prophet with all his force; not without a vehement effort the prophet tears himself away. A long shadow of grief fell over the prophet. "Samuel mourned for Saul" (xv. 11, 35; xvi. 1). (2.) He is the first of the regular succession of prophets (Acts iii. 24). Moses, Miriam, and Deborah, perhaps Ehud, had been prophets. From Samuel, however, the continuous succession was unbroken. His mother, though not expressly so called, was in fact a prophetess. But the connection of the continuity of the office with Samuel appears to be still more direct. It is in his lifetime, long after he had been "established as a prophet" (1 Sam. iii. 20), that we hear of the companies of disciples, called in the O. T. "the sons of the prophets," by modern writers "the schools of the prophets." Samuel is expressly described as "standing appointed over them" (xix. 20). In those schools, and learning to cultivate the prophetic gifts, were some, whom we know for certain, others whom we may almost certainly conjecture, to have been so trained or influenced. One was Saul. Twice at least he is described as having been in the company of Samuel's disciples (x. 10, 11, xix. 24). Another was DAVID. The first acquaintance of Samuel with David was when he privately anointed him at the house of Jesse. But the connection thus begun with the shepherd-boy must have been continued afterward. David, at first, fled to "Naioth in Ramah," as to his second home (xix. 19). Samuel there becomes the spiritual father of the Psalmist king. He is also the founder of the first regular institutions of religious instruction, and communities for the purposes of EDUCATION.—The death of Samuel is described as taking place in the year of the close of David's wanderings. It is said with peculiar emphasis, as if to mark the loss, that "all the Israelites were gathered together" from all parts of this hitherto divided country, and "lamented him," and "buried him," not in any consecrated place, nor outside the walls of his city, but within his own house, thus in a manner consecrated by being turned into his tomb (xxv. 1). The place long pointed out as his tomb is the height, most conspicuous of all in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, immediately above the town of GIBEON, now called Neby Samu'il (= the Prophet Samuel). His relics were translated from Judea (the place is not specified) A. D. 406, to Constantinople, and received there with much pomp by the Emperor Arcadius. HEMAN, his grandson, was one of the chief singers in the Levitical choir (1 Chr. vi. 33, xv. 17, xxv. 5). On the apparition of Samuel at En-dor (1 Sam. xxviii. 14; Eccles. xli. 20), see MAGIC, p. 585. It has been supposed that Samuel wrote a Life of David, of course of his earlier years (1 Chr. xxix. 29); but this appears doubtful. Various other books of the O. T. have been ascribed to him by the Jewish tradition. (JUDGES; RUTH; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.) He is regarded by the Samaritans as a magician and an infidel. SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, III. 1; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.

Sam'u-el (see above), Books of, two historical books of the O. T., which are not separated from each other in the Hebrew MSS., and which, from a critical point of view, must be regarded as one book. The present division was first made in the LXX., and was adopted in the Vulgate from the LXX. It was not till A. D. 1518 that the division of the LXX. was adopted in Hebrew, in the edition of the Bible printed by the Bombergers at Venice. (OLD TESTAMENT.) The book was called by the Hebrews "Samuel," probably because the birth and life of SAMUEL were the subjects treated of in the beginning of the work. The whole consists of three large sections:—(1.) The history and administration of Samuel (1 Sam. i.–vii.). (II.) The establishment of a monarchy, and the history of Saul's reign (viii.–xxxi.), including (1.) Saul's advancement and administration till God rejected him (viii.–xv.), and (2.) his downward course till his death (xvi.–xxxi.). (III.) David's reign (2 Sam. i.–xxiv.), including (1.) his career of conquest and prosperity (i.–ix.), (2.) his great sin, and the troubles which afterward afflicted his house (x.–xxiv.).—A. Authorship and Date of the Book. 1. In common with all the historical books of the O. T., except the beginning of Nehemiah, the Book of Samuel contains no mention in the text of the name of its author. It is indisputable that the title "Samuel" does not imply that the prophet was the author of the Book of Samuel as a whole; for the death of Samuel is recorded in the beginning of 1 Sam. xxv. The absence of the historian's name from both the text and the title of the book is not supplied by any statement of any other writer, made within a reasonable period from the time when the book may be supposed to have been written. No mention of the author's name is made in the Book of Kings, nor, as will be hereafter shown, in the Chronicles, nor in any other of the sacred writings. It is not mentioned in the Apocrypha or in Josephus, or in the Mishna. In the Babylonian Gemara, which is supposed to have been completed in its present form somewhere about A. D. 500, it is for the first time asserted that "Samuel wrote his book," i. e. as the words imply, the book which bears his name. But this statement cannot be proved to have been made earlier than 1,550 years after the death of Samuel, and is unsupported by reference to any authority of any kind. Abarbanel, a learned Jew, who died A. D. 1508, propounded the opinion that the Book of Samuel was written by the prophet Jeremiah, and this opinion was adopted by Hugo Grotius. But this opinion is highly improbable. In our own time the most prevalent idea seems to be that the first twenty-four chapters of the Book of Samuel were written by the prophet himself, and the rest of the chapters by the prophets NATHAN and GAD. Mr. Twisleton thinks that two circumstances have contributed to the adoption of this opinion at the present day:—(a.) the growth of stricter ideas as to the importance of knowing who was the author of any historical work which advances claims to be trustworthy; (b.) the mistranslation of 1 Chr. xxix. 29, which Mr. Twisleton, with the LXX., &c., would translate thus:—"Now the history of David first and last, behold it is written in the history of Samuel the seer, and in the history of Nathan the prophet, and in the history of Gad the seer"—the Hebrew word dibráy (= "acts" and "book," A. V., Vulg., &c.) being here translated "history" in each of the four times that it is used. Mr. Twisleton thinks it morally certain that this passage of the Chronicles is no authority for the supposition that, when it was written, any work was in existence of which either Gad, Nathan, or Samuel, was the author. 2. Although the authorship of the Book of Samuel cannot be ascertained with any certainty, there are some indications as to the date of the work. The earliest undeniable external evidence of the existence of the book seems to be the Greek translation of it in the SEPTUAGINT. The next best external testimony is 2 Mc. ii. 13, in which it is said of Nehemiah that, "he, founding a library, gathered together the acts of the kings, and the prophets, and of David, and the epistles of the kings concerning the holy gifts." Now, although this passage (MACCABEES, BOOKS OF, II.) cannot be relied on for proving that Nehemiah himself did in fact ever found such a library, yet it is good evidence to prove that the Acts of the Kings were in existence when the passage was written; and it cannot reasonably be doubted that this phrase was intended to include the Book of Samuel, which is equivalent to 1 and 2 Kings in the LXX. (KINGS, FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF.) Hence there is external evidence that the Book of Samuel was written before 2 Maccabees. And lastly, 1 Chr. xxix. 29 seems likewise to prove externally that the Book of Samuel was written before the CHRONICLES, "the history (A. V. 'book') of Samuel the seer" in this passage being most naturally understood as referring to this work.—The internal evidence respecting the Book of Samuel indicates that it was written some centuries earlier; for (a.) It seems to have been written at a time when the PENTATEUCH was not acted on as the rule of religious observances (1 Sam. vii. 9, 10, 17, ix. 13, x. 3, xiv. 35; 2 Sam. xxiv. 18-25; HIGH PLACES; SACRIFICE). This circumstance points to its date as earlier than the reformation of Josiah. (b.) It is in accordance with this early date that allusions in it even to the existence of MOSES are so few (1 Sam. xii. 6, 8). To a religious Jew, when the laws of the Pentateuch were observed, Moses could not fail to be the predominant idea in his mind; but Moses would not necessarily be of equal importance to a Hebrew historian who lived before the reformation of Josiah. (c.) It tallies with an early date that it is one of the best specimens of Hebrew prose in the golden age of Hebrew literature. In prose it holds the same place which Joel and the undisputed prophecies of Isaiah hold in poetical or prophetic language. At the same time this argument from language must not be pushed so far as to imply that, standing alone, it would be conclusive; for some writings, the date of which is about the time of the Captivity (e. g. Habakkuk), are in pure Hebrew.—Mr. Twisleton concludes, from the above arguments and from 1 Sam. xxvii. 6, that the work was composed at a period not later than the reformation of Josiah (about B. C. 622),—that the very earliest point of time at which it could have existed in its present form was subsequent to the secession of the Ten Tribes (B. C. 975),—but that the precise time between 975 B. C. and 622 B. C., when it was composed, cannot be definitely ascertained. Dr. Samuel Davidson thinks "that the writer or compiler of the whole lived after Rehoboam, perhaps under Abijah, Rehoboam's son." The death of David, although evidently implied in 2 Sam. v. 5, is not directly recorded in Samuel. From this fact Hävernicks infers that the author lived not long after the death of David. Dr. Eadie (in Fbn.) thinks that "the Books" of Samuel, "or rather the materials out of which they have been formed, were contemporaneous with the events recorded."—B. Sources of the Book of Samuel. The only work actually quoted in this book is the Book of Jasher, i. e. the Book of the Upright, respecting which there have been many unsatisfactory conjectures. (JASHER, BOOK OF.) It, however, contains several poetical compositions: (1.) David's Lamentations over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 19-27), called "The Bow" (i. 18); universally admitted to be a genuine production of David. (2.) David's Lamentation on the death of Abner (iii. 33, 34); undoubtedly genuine. (3.) 2 Sam. xxii. A Song of David; = Ps. xviii., with a few unimportant verbal differences. For poetical beauty, the song is well worthy to be the production of David. The following difficulties, however, are connected with it. (a.) The date of the composition is assigned to the day when David had been delivered not only out of the hand of all his enemies, but likewise "out of the hand of Saul." "This form of expression does not imply that Saul was the last of his enemies, but rather that he was the first, both in time and in importance, so that he might be considered equal to all the others put together. . . . The psalm was not occasioned by any particular event, but by a retrospect of all the deliverances from persecution which the writer had experienced" (Prof. J. A. Alexander, on Ps. xviii.). (b.) In the closing verse (2 Sam. xxii. 51), Jehovah is spoken of as showing "mercy to His anointed, unto David and his seed for evermore." These words would be more naturally written of David than by David. They may, however, be a later addition (so Mr. Twisleton; but compare PENTATEUCH, II. 2). (c.) In some passages of this song (xxii. 21-25) the strongest assertions are made of the poet's uprightness and purity. Now, it is a subject of surprise that, at any period after the painful incidents of his life in the matter of Uriah, David should have used this language concerning himself (so Mr. Twisleton). "The 'righteousness' here claimed (ver. 21, 25) is not an absolute perfection or entire exemption from all sinful infirmity, but what Paul calls submission to the righteousness of God (Rom. x. 3), including faith in His mercy and a sincere governing desire to do His will. . . . The essential idea in the writer's mind (ver. 22) was that of apostasy or total abjuration of God's service. It is of this mortal sin, and not of all particular transgressions, that the Psalmist here professes himself innocent" (Prof. J. A. Alexander, on Ps. xviii.). (PERFECT.) (4.) A song, called "last words of David" (2 Sam. xxiii. 2-7). There is no sufficient reason to deny that this song is David's. (5.) The Song of HANNAH (1 Sam. ii. 1-10).—Mr. Twisleton thinks that perhaps the two conjectures respecting the composition of the Book of Samuel which are most entitled to consideration, are—first, That the list which it contains of officers or public functionaries under David is the result of contemporary registration; and secondly, That the Book of Samuel was the compilation of some one connected with the schools of the prophets, or penetrated by their spirit. "It is universally admitted," says Dr. Davidson, "that the contents of these books (of Samuel) were drawn from various written sources. This, indeed, is manifest from internal evidence. The narrative is so extended, in most parts, that it approaches to the nature of a biography, though it is occasionally brief and chronicle-like. . . . The historical character of the books rests on sufficient evidence, internal and external. Every impartial reader feels that the narrative bears the impress of truth. The biographical portraits are striking and natural, having a vividness like that proceeding from an eye-witness. The delineation is artless, natural, lively; the connection of the events probable and just. . . . Places, times, and minute sketches evince the hand of persons who were well acquainted with the facts related. . . . The books are sometimes quoted or referred to in the N. T., as 2 Sam. vii. 14 in Heb. i. 5, and 1 Sam. xiii. 14 in Acts xiii. 22. Allusions to them also occur in the Psalms" (Text of the O. T. considered, pp. 657, 664). (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION.)—A comparison of the Books of Samuel and Chronicles tends to throw light on the state of the Hebrew mind at the time when the Book of Samuel was written, compared with the ideas prevalent among the Jews some centuries later, at the time of the compilation of the Chronicles.—In the numerous instances wherein there is a close verbal agreement between passages in Samuel and in the Chronicles, the sound conclusion seems to be that the Chronicles were copied from Samuel, and not that both were copied from a common original. San-a-bas-sar-s (fr. Gr.) = SHESHBAZZAR (1 Esd. vi. 18, 20).

San'a-sib (Gr.), ancestor of certain priests said to have returned with Zorobabel (1 Esd. v. 24).

San-bal-lat (Heb. fr. Pers. = lauded by the army, or giving strength to the army? Von Bohlen, Ges.; a chestnut-tree, Fii.), a Moabite of HORONAIM (so Lord A. C. Hervey, with Gesenius, and most), called "Sanballat the HORONITE" (Neh. ii. 10, 19, xiii. 28). All that we know of him from Scripture is that he had apparently some civil or military command in Samaria, in the service of Artaxerxes (iv. 2), and that, from the moment of Nehemiah's arrival in Judea, he set himself to oppose every measure for the welfare of Jerusalem, and was a constant adversary to the Tirshatha. His companions in this hostility were TOBIAH the Ammonite, and GESHEM the Arabian (ii. 19, iv. 7). For the details of their opposition see NEHEMIAH, and NEHEMIAH, Book or, and Neh. vi. The only other incident in his life is his alliance with the high-priest's family by the marriage of his daughter with one of the grandsons of Eliashib, which, from the similar connection formed by Tobiah the Ammonite (xiii. 4), appears to have been part of a settled policy concerted between Eliashib and the Samaritan faction. The expulsion from the priesthood of the guilty son of Joiada by Nehemiah must have still further widened the breach between him and Sanballat, and between the two parties in the Jewish state. Here, however, the Scriptural narrative ends—owing, probably, to Nehemiah's return to Persia—and with it likewise our knowledge of Sanballat. SAMARIA 8.

* Sancti-fi-ca-tion (properly a making holy, hence a being holy or state of holiness), and sancti-fy (= to make clean or holy, to set apart as sacred, to regard and treat as holy). The former occurs only in the N. T. as the translation of Gr. hagiazomai (1 Cor. i. 30; 1 Th. iv. 3, 4; 2 Th. ii. 13; 1 Pet. i. 2), elsewhere translated "holiness" (Rom. vi. 19, 22; 1 Th. iv. 7; 1 Tim. ii. 15; Heb. xii. 14). The verb "to sanctify" is the usual translation of the Heb. kaddash or kadesh (Gen. ii. 3; Ex. xiii. 2, xix. 10, 14, 22, 23, &c.), and Gr. hagiazó (Mat. xxiii. 17, 19; Jn. x. 36, xvii. 17, 19 twice, &c.), each also translated "to hallow" (Ex. xx. 11, xxix. 21; Mat. vi. 9, &c.), "to be holy" (Ex. xxix. 37; Is. lxxv. 8; Rev. xxii. 11, &c.). ATONEMENT; CLEAN; JUSTIFICATION; PERFECT; PRIEST; PURIFICATION; SAINT; SANCTUARY; SPIRIT, THE HOLY.

* Sancti-fy (fr. L.; Heb. mikdash, kodesh; Gr. hagion) = a holy or consecrated place; a place for keeping sacred things (Ex. xv. 17, xxv. 8, xxx. 13, 24; Heb. vii. 2, &c.). SANCTIFICATION; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE.

* Sand (Heb. hál or chál; Gr. amos). "The sand of the sea" is often used as an image of great abundance or innumerable multitude (Gen. xxii. 17, xli. 49; Rom. ix. 27; Heb. xi. 12, &c.), sometimes also of a great burden or weight (Job vi. 3; Prov. xxvii. 3). San'dal (fr. Gr. sandalon), the A. V. translation of the Gr. sandalion, literally = little sandal (Mk. vi. 9; Acts xii. 8); = Heb. na'al; see below. The sandal appears to have been the article ordinarily used by the Hebrews for protecting the feet. It consisted simply of a sole attached to the foot by thongs. The Heb. na'al (A. V. "shoe" (Ex. iii. 5, xii. 11, and elsewhere) implies such an article, its proper sense being that of confining or shutting in the foot with thongs: we have also express notice of the thong (A. V. "shoe-latchet") in several passages (Gen. xiv. 23; Is. v. 27; Mk. i. 7). The Gr. hupodéma (also translated "shoe" in A. V., Mat. iii. 11, x. 10, and elsewhere) properly applies to the sandal exclusively, as it means what is bound under the foot; but the Alexandrine and later writers used it to denote any covering of the foot. A similar observation applies to the Gr. sandalion, in A. V.

"sandal" (Mk. vi. 9; Acts xii. 8).—We learn from the Talmudists that the sole was made of leather, felt, cloth, or wood, and was occasionally shod with iron. In Egypt various fibrous substances, such as palm-leaves and papyrus-stalks, were used in addition to leather, while in Assyria wood or leather was employed. In Egypt the sandals were usually turned up at the toe like our skates, though other forms, rounded and pointed, are also exhibited. In Assyria the heel and the side of the foot were encased, and sometimes the sandal consisted of little else than this. In Palestine a heel-strap was essential to a proper sandal. Great attention was paid by the ladies to their sandals; they were made of the skins of an animal ("Badger-skins," Ez. xvi. 10), and the thongs were handsomely embroidered (Cant. vii. 1, Jd. x. 4, xvi. 9). Sandals were worn by all classes of society in Palestine, even by the very poor (Am. viii. 6), and both the sandal and the thong or shoe-latchet were so cheap and common, that they passed into a proverb for the most insignificant thing (Gen. xiv. 23; Ecclus. xli. 19). They were, however, dispensed with in-doors, and were only put on by persons about to undertake some business away from their homes; such as a military expedition (Is. v. 27; Eph. vi. 15), or a journey (Ex. xii. 11; Josh. ix. 5, 13; Acts xii. 8): on such occasions persons carried an extra pair, which our Lord in Mat. x. 10 (compare Mk. vi. 9; Lk. x. 4) forbade the apostles to do on their first journey. During meal-times the feet were undoubtedly uncovered, as implied in Lk. vii. 38 and Jn. xiii. 5, 6, and in the exception in regard to the Passover (Ex. xii. 11). It was a mark of reverence to cast off the shoes in approaching a place or person of eminent sanctity (Ex. iii. 5; Josh. v. 15). This is now the well-known custom in the East. The modern Egyptians take off their shoes before stepping on the carpeted leevdn (House), that spot being devoted to prayer. It was also an indication of violent emotion, or of mourning, if a person appeared barefoot in public (2 Sam. xv. 30; Is. xx. 2; Ez. xxiv. 17, 23). To carry or to unlouse a person's sandal was a menial office betokening great inferiority on the part of the person performing it (Mat. iii. 11; Mk. i. 7; Jn. i. 27; Acts xiii. 25). The expression in Pa. lx. 8, cviii. 9, "over Edom I cast out my shoe," evidently signifies the subjection of that country, and may refer to the custom of handing the sandal to a slave, or of claiming possession of a property by planting the foot on it, or of acquiring it by the symbolical action of casting the shoe, or Edom may be regarded as a shelf on which the sandals were rested while the owner bathed his feet (so Mr. Bevan). The use of the shoe in the transfer of property is noticed in Ru. iv. 7, 8, and that connected with repudiating a levirate marriage in Deut. xxv. 5. San'he-drin (accurately Sanhedrin, a Heb. or Aram. form of Gr. sunedrion = "council"), called also in the Talmud the great Sanhedrin, the supreme council of the Jewish people in the time of Christ and earlier. 1. The origin of this assembly is traced in the Mishna to the seventy elders whom Moses was directed (Num. xi. 16, 17) to associate with him in the government of the Israelites. This body continued to exist, according to the Rabbinical accounts, down to the close of the Jewish commonwealth. But since the time of Vorstius it has been generally admitted that the tribunal established by Moses was probably temporary, and did not continue to exist after the Israelites had entered Palestine. In the lack of definite historical information as to the establishment of the Sanhedrim, it can only be said in general that the Greek etymology of the name seems to point to a period subsequent to the Macedonian supremacy in Palestine, probably in the time of Alexander's successors or of the Maccabees (so Prof. G. E. Day, original author of this article). We gather from the few incidental notices in the N. T. that it consisted of chief priests, or the heads of the twenty-four classes into which the priests were divided, elders, men of age and experience, and scribes, lawyers, or those learned in the Jewish law (A. V. "council;" Mat. xxvi. 57, 59; Mk. xv. 1; Lk. xxii. 66; Acts v. 21). 2. The number of members is usually given as seventy-one (i. e. seventy besides Moses, so the Mishna); but some say seventy. The president of this body was styled Nasi (Heb. = "prince" or "chief"), and, according to Maimonides and Lightfoot, was chosen on account of his eminence in worth and wisdom. Often, if not generally, this preëminence was accorded to the high-priest (Mat. xxvi. 62). The vice-president, called in the Talmud "father of the house of judgment," sat at the right hand of the president. Some writers speak of a second vice-president, but this is not sufficiently confirmed. The Babylonian Gemara states that there were two scribes, one of whom registered the votes for acquittal, the other those for condemnation. (MINISTER; OFFICER.) While in session the Sanhedrim sat in the form of a half-circle. 3. The place in which the sessions of the Sanhedrim were ordinarily held was, according to the Talmud, a hall called Gazzith, supposed by Lightfoot to have been situated in the southeast corner of one of the courts near the Temple-building. In special exigencies, however, it seems to have met in the residence of the high-priest (Mat. xxvi. 3). Forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, and consequently while the Saviour was teaching in Palestine, the sessions of the Sanhedrim were removed from the hall Gazzith to a somewhat greater distance from the Temple-building, although still on Mount Moriah. After several other changes, its seat was finally established at Tiberias.—As a judicial body the Sanhedrim constituted a supreme court, to which belonged in the first instance the trial of a tribe fallen into idolatry, false prophets, and the high-priest; also the other priests. As an administrative council it determined other important matters. Jesus was arraigned before this body as a false prophet (Jn. xi. 47), and Peter, John, Stephen, and Paul as teachers of error and deceivers of the people. From Acts ix. 2 it appears that the Sanhedrim exercised a degree of authority beyond the limits of Palestine. According to the Jerusalem Gemara the power of inflicting capital punishment was taken away from this tribunal forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem. With this agrees the answer of the Jews to Pilate (Jn. xix. 31). The Talmud also mentions a lesser Sanhedrim of twenty-three members in every city in Palestine in which were not less than 120 householders. * San-he'rib (Heb.) = SENNACHERIB (2 K. xviii. 13 margin).

San-san'nah (Heb. palm-branch, Ges.), a city in the southern district of Judah (Josh. xv. 31 only). Wilton (Negeb) makes this = HAZAR-SUSAH and HAZAR-SUSIM, and supposes it may be in the Wady es-Suny, W. of Beer-sheba. Rowlands (in Fairbairn, article "South Country") supposes these names may = SITNAH.

Saph (Heb. threshold, basin, Ges.), one of the sons of "the giant;" slain by Sibbechai the Hushathite (2 Sam. xxi. 18); called SIPPAT in 1 Chr. xx. 4.

Saphat (Gr.) = SHEPHATIAH 2 (1 Esd. v. 9).

Saph-a-t'as (Gr.) = SHEPHATIAH 2 (1 Esd. viii. 34).

Sa'pheth (fr. Gr.) = SHEPHATIAH 3 (1 Esd. v. 33).

Sa'phir (L. fr. Heb. = fair, Ges.), one of the villages addressed by the Prophet Micah (i. 11 only). By Eusebius and Jerome it is described as "in the mountain-district between Eleutheropolis and Ascalon." In this direction a village called es-Sawafir still exists (or rather three of that name, two with affixes), possibly the representative of the ancient Saphir (Rbn. ii. 34 n.). Es-Sawafir lies seven or eight miles N. E. of Ascalon, and about twelve W. of Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis). Tobler prefers a village called Siber, close to Sawafir. Schwarz suggests the village of Safiriyeh, a couple of miles N. W. of Lydda.

Sap-phi'ra [saf-fi'rah] (fr. Gr. = SAPPHIRE, or fr. Syr. = beautiful), the wife of ANANIAS 10, and the participator both in his guilt and in his punishment (Acts v. 1-10).

Sap'phire [saf-fi're] (L. sapphirus; Gr. sappheiros; Heb. sappir), a precious stone, apparently of a bright blue color (Ex. xxiv. 10); the second stone in the second row of the high-priest's breastplate (xxviii. 18); extremely precious (Job xxviii. 16); one of the precious stones that ornamented the king of Tyre (Ez. xxviii. 13). "Sapphire" occurs in the N. T. only as the second of the twelve foundations of the wall of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19). The sapphire of the ancients = our lapis-lazuli, which is a mineral of a beautiful blue color, highly esteemed for ornamental purposes, used also for making the blue ultramarine pigment. It was much used in ancient Egyptian jewelry for signet-stones, pendants, and amulets (King). The modern sapphire is a precious stone of a bright blue color, next in hardness to the diamond. The sapphire, Oriental RUBY, Oriental AMETHYST, Oriental EMERALD, and Oriental TOPAZ, are all varieties of corundum, distinguished by their different colors. Emery (ADAMANT) and adamantine spar are also varieties of corundum, which in modern mineralogy denotes alumina (the characteristic basis of clay) as found native in a crystalline state. Rosenmüller and Braun regard the "sapphire" of the O. T. as our modern sapphire or precious corundum.

Sa'ra (L. = SARAH). 1. SARAH, the wife of Abraham (Heb. xi. 11; 1 Pet. iii. 6).—2. Daughter of Raguel, said to have been married successively to seven husbands, all killed by ASMODEUS; but subsequently the happy wife of TOBIAS (Tob. iii. 7, vi. 10 ff., vii., &c.). TOBIT, BOOK OF.

Sar-a-bl'as (Gr.) = SHEREBIAH (1 Esd. ix. 48).

Sarah (Heb. princess). 1. The wife of ABRAHAM, and mother of ISAAC; originally SARAI; in N. T. SARA. Her name is first introduced in Gen. xi. 29, as follows: "Abram and Nahor took them wives: the name of Abram's wife was Sarai; and the name of Nahor's wife was Milcah, the daughter of Haran, the father of Milcah and the father of Iscah." In Gen. xx. 12, Abraham speaks of her as "his sister, the daughter of the same father, but not the daughter of the same mother." The common Jewish tradition is that Sarai is the same as ISCAH, the daughter of Haran, and the sister of Lot. The change of her name from "SARAI" to "Sarah" was made at the same time that Abram's name was changed to Abraham, on the establishment of the Covenant of Circumcision between him and God. Her history is of course that of Abraham. She came with him from Ur to Haran, from Haran to Canaan, and accompanied him in all the wanderings of his life. Her only independent action is the demand that HAGAR and ISHMAEL should be cast out—a demand symbolically applied in Gal. iv. 22-31 to the displacement of the Old Covenant by the New. The times in which she plays the most important part in the history are when Abraham was sojourning, first in Egypt, then in Gerar, and where Sarah shared his deceit toward Pharaoh (Gen. xii. 11-15) and toward Abimelech (xx. 9-11). Her personal beauty is expressly mentioned in xii. 11 ff. (compare xx. 11). Her character is represented as deeply and truly affectionate, but impulsive, jealous, and imperious in its affection. She died at Hebron at the age of 127 years, 28 years before her husband, and was buried by him in the cave of MACHPELAH. She is referred to in the N. T. as a type of conjugal obedience in 1 Pet. iii. 6, and as one of the types of faith in Heb. xi. 11.—2. SERAH, the daughter of Asher (Num. xxvi. 46).

Sa'ral (Heb. my princess, Jerome; Jah is ruler, Fii.; contentious, Ewald, &c.), the original name of SARAH, the wife of Abraham. It is always used in the history from Gen. xi. 29 to xvii. 15, when it was changed to Sarah.

Sa-ral'as [-ra'yas] (Gr. = SERAIAH). 1. SERAIAH the high-priest (1 Esd. v. 5).—2. SERAIAH, the father of Ezra (viii. 1; 2 Esd. i. 1).

Sa-ra-mel (Gr. fr. Heb. or Syr.? see below; the Latin and some Greek MSS. read Asaramel), the name of the place in which the assembly of the Jews was held at which the high-priesthood was conferred upon Simon Maccabeus (1 Mc. xiv. 28). Some (as Castello) have treated it as a corruption of JERUSALEM, but this is altogether improbable.

Others have conjectured that it is a corruption of—
 (1.) Hahatsar Millo = the court of MILLO (Grotius).
 2. Hahatsar Am El = the court of the people of God,
 i. e. the great court of the Temple (Ewald). 3. Hash-sha'ar Am El = the gate of the people of God (Winer). 4. Hassar Am El = the prince of the people of God, as if not the name of a place, but the title of Simon (Grimm). None of these explanations, however, can be regarded as entirely satisfactory (so Mr. Grove).

Sa'raph (Heb. fiery, poisonous; see under SERPENT ants of Shelah the son of Judah, as having had dominion in Moab.

Sar-ched'o-nus (fr. Gr. Sacherdonos) = ESAR-HAD-DON (Tob. i. 21).

Sar-de'us (fr. Gr.) = AZIZA (1 Esd. ix. 28).

Sar'dine [-din]. In Rev. iv. 3 St. John declares that He whom he saw sitting on the heavenly throne
 "was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone" (= SARDIUS). Sardine occurs only here, from Gr. sardinios (= sardios) of the Received Text, for which later editions have sardios.

Sar'dis (said to be from an old Lydian word = the sun, Creuzer), a city about two miles S. of the river Hermus, just below the range of Tmolus (Bos Dagh), on a spur of which its acropolis was built.
 It was the ancient residence of the kings of LYDIA.
 After its conquest by CYRUS the Persians always kept a garrison in the citadel, and it was so occupied by ALEXANDER THE GREAT. Sardis was in very early times, both from the extremely fertile character of the neighboring region, and from its convenient position, a commercial mart of importance.

 Chestnuts were first produced in the neighborhood.
 The art of dyeing wool is said by Pliny to have been invented there; and at any rate Sardis was the entrepot of the dyed woollen manufactures. Sardis too was the place where the metal electrum was procured (AMBER); and thither the Spartans sent, in the sixth century B. C., to purchase gold for gilding the face of the Apollo at Amyclæ. This was probably furnished by the auriferous sand of the Pactolus, a brook which ran through the forum by the side of the great temple of Cybele. Sardis recovered the privilege of municipal government (and, as was alleged several centuries afterward, the right of a sanctuary) upon its surrender to Alexander the Great. It changed hands more than once in the contests after the death of Alexander. In 214 B. C. it was taken and sacked by the army of ANTIOCHUS
 THE GREAT. After the ruin of Antiochus's fortunes it passed, with the rest of Asia on that side of Tan-rus, under the dominion of the kings of PERGAMOS, whose interest led them to divert the course of traffic between Asia and Europe away from Sardis.
 Its productive soil must always have continued a source of wealth; but its importance as a central mart appears to have diminished from the time of the invasion of Asia by Alexander. Of the few inscriptions discovered, all, or nearly all, belong to the time of the Roman empire. The massive temple of Cybele still bears witness in its fragmentary remains to the wealth and architectural skill of the people that raised it. The two columns represented in the engraving belonged to it. They are 6 feet

4½ inches in diameter at about 35 feet below the capital. One stone in their architrave in 1812 was calculated to weigh twenty-five tons. The present soil is more than twenty-five feet above the pavement. On the N. side of the acropolis, overlooking the valley of the Hermus, is a theatre near 400 feet in diameter, attached to a stadium of about 1,000.
 This probably was erected after the restoration of Sardis by Alexander. The modern name of the ruins at Sardis is Sert-Kalessi. Travellers describe the appearance of the locality, on approaching it from the N. W., as that of complete solitude. The Pactolus is a mere thread of water, all but evanescent in summer-time. The Wadis-ichai (Hermus), in the neighborhood of the town, is between fifty and sixty yards wide, and nearly three feet deep.

 In the time of the Emperor Tiberius, Sardis was desolated by an earthquake, and a pestilential fever followed. Its tribute was remitted for five years, and it received a benefaction from the emperor. It was nearly destroyed by Tamerlane about A. D. 1400. In 1850 no human being lived there. Its site is extremely unhealthy (Rev. H. Christmas, in Fairbairn). Sardis is mentioned in the Bible only in Rev. iii. 1-6. There the Church is pointedly reproved. Melito, bishop of Sardis (second century), wrote various works. CANON.

Sar'dites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of Sered the son of Zebulun (Num. xxvi. 26).

Sar'di-us (Heb. šdem; Gr. sardios, from SARDIS, where it was first found, Pliny), a precious stone which occupied the first place in the first row of the high-priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 17, xxxix. 10), and was one of the ornaments of the king of Tyre (Ez. xxviii. 13). The A. V. margin has "RUBY" in all these passages; but there can scarcely be a doubt that either the sard (= sardius) or SARDONYX is here denoted (so Mr. Houghton). The LXX., Josephus, Vulgate, &c., agree with the A. V. in rendering "sardius." The sixth foundation of the wall of the heavenly Jerusalem was a sardius (Rev. xxi. 20). The sard or sardius (also called carnelian) is a CHALCEDONY, or translucent quartz, red or yellow. It has long been a favorite stone for the engraver's art. A bright-red sort was in Pliny's time most esteemed. ENGRAVER; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL; SARDIUS; SEAL.

Sar'do-nyx (L. fr. Gr. = SARDIUS and ONYX), a sort of CHALCEDONY in which layers of dark or light sard (SARDIUS) and white were regularly united (Rev. xxi. 20 only). It is frequently employed by engravers for the purposes of a signet-ring.

Sa-rep'ta (Gr.) = ZAREPHTH (Lk. iv. 26).

Sar'gon (Heb. fr. Pers. = prince of the sun? Ges.), one of the greatest of the Assyrian kings. His name is read in the native inscriptions as Sargina, while a town which he built and called after himself (now Khorsabad) was known as Sarghūn to the Arabian geographers (so Prof. Rawlinson, original author of this article). He is mentioned by name only once in Scripture (Is. xx. 1). Vitringa, Offerhaus, Eichhorn, and Hupfeld, identified him with SHALMANESER; Grotius, Lowth, and Keil, with SENNACHERIB; Perizonius, Kalinsky, and Michaelis, with ESAR-HADDON. The Assyrian inscriptions prove Sargon to have been distinct from the several monarchs named, and fix his place in the list (as did Rosenmüller, Gesenius, Ewald, and Winckler) between Shalmaneser and Sennacherib. He was certainly Sennacherib's father, and doubtless his immediate predecessor. He ascended the throne of Assyria, as we gather from his annals, in the same year that MERODACH-BALADAN ascended the throne of Babylon, which, according to Ptolemy's Canon, was B. C. 721. He seems to have been a usurper, but was undoubtedly a great and successful warrior. In Babylonia he deposed Merodach-baladan, and established a viceroy; in Media he built a number of cities, which he peopled with captives from other quarters; in Armenia and the neighboring countries he gained many victories; while in the far west he reduced Philistia, penetrated deep into the Arabian peninsula, took Tyre, conquered (as his inscriptions claim) Samaria, received tribute from Cyprus, and forced Egypt to submit to his arms and consent to the payment of a tribute. In this last direction he seems to have waged three wars—one in his second year (B. C. 720), for the possession of Gaza; another in his sixth year (B. C. 715), when Egypt itself was the object of attack; and a third in his ninth (B. C. 712), when the special subject of contention was Ashdod, which Sargon took by one of his generals. (TARTAN.) This is the event which causes the mention of Sargon's name in Scripture (Is. xx. 1 ff.). The year of the attack, being A. C. 712, would fall into the reign of the first Ethiopian king, Sabaco I. (So?), who probably conquered Egypt in B. C. 714. Sargon was also the builder of useful works, and of the magnificent palace at Khorsabad. He probably reigned nineteen years, from B. C. 721 to B. C. 702, when he left the throne to his son, the celebrated Sennacherib. ASSYRIA; NINEVEH.

Sa'ron (Gr.) = SHARON, the district in which Lydda stood (Acts ix. 35 only).

Sa-rothi-e (Gr. Alex. MS.), ancestor of certain sons of the servants of Solomon said to have returned with Zorobabel (1 Esd. v. 34); not in Ezra or Nehemiah.

Sa'se-chim [-kim] (Heb. chief of the eunuchs = RABSAHS? Ges.; see below), one of the generals of Nebuchadnezzar's army at the taking of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxix. 3). He appears to have held the office of chief eunuch; = NEBUCHASSAN and RABSAHS?

Sa'ruch [-ruk] (fr. Gr.) = SERTG (Lk. iii. 35).

Sa'tan. The word itself, the Heb. śāṭān, is simply an "adversary," and is so translated in 1 Sam. xxix. 4; 2 Sam. xix. 22; 1 K. v. 4, xi. 14, 23, 25; Num. xxii. 22, 32 marg.; Ps. cix. 6 marg.). This original sense is still found in our Lord's application of the name to PETER in Mat. xvi. 23. It is used as a proper name or title in the O. T., viz. (with the article) in Job i. 6-12, ii. 1-7, and Zech. iii. 1, 2, also (without the article) in 1 Chr. xxi. 1. In the N. T. "Satan" (Gr. Satanás, from Hebrew) is found in twenty-five places (exclusive of parallel passages), and the corresponding Greek term ho diabolos, A. V. "the devil" (DEVIL 1) in about the same number. The title "the prince of this world" is used three times (Jn. xii. 31, xiv. 30, xvi. 11), "the wicked one" is used certainly six times (Mat. xiii. 19, 38; 1 Jn. ii. 13, 14, iii. 12, v. 18), probably more frequently, and "the tempter" twice (Mat. iv. 3; 1 Th. iii. 5). The scriptural revelation on the subject, it is clear from this simple enumeration of passages, is to be sought in the N. T. rather than in the O. T. It divides itself naturally into the consideration of his existence, his nature, and his power and action.—A. His existence. The personal existence of a Spirit of Evil is revealed, in various degrees of clearness, again and again in Scripture. Every quality, every action which can indicate personality, is attributed to him in language which cannot be explained away (see below). The tendency of the mind in its inquiry as to the origin of evil is generally toward one or other of two extremes (so Mr. Barry). The first is to consider evil as a negative imperfection, arising, in some unknown and inexplicable way, from the nature of matter, or from some disturbing influences which limit the action of goodness on earth. The other is the old Persian or Manichean hypothesis, which traces the existence of evil to a rival Creator, not subordinate to the Creator of Good, though perhaps inferior to Him in power, and destined to be overcome by Him at last. (PERSIANS, § 2; PHILOSOPHY.) The Revelation of Scripture, speaking with authority, meets the truth, and removes the error, inherent in both these hypotheses. It asserts in the strongest terms the perfect supremacy of God, so that under His permission alone, and for His inscrutable purposes, evil is allowed to exist (Prov. xvi. 4; Is. xlv. 7; Am. iii. 6; comp. Rom. ix. 22, 23). It regards this evil as an anomaly and corruption, to be taken away by a new manifestation of Divine Love in the Incarnation and ATONEMENT. (JESUS CHRIST; SAVIOUR.) The conquest of it began virtually in God's ordinance after the Fall itself, was effected actually on the Cross, and shall be perfected in its results at the Judgment Day. Still Scripture recognizes the existence of evil in the world, not only as felt in outward circumstances ("the world"), and as existing by nature in the soul of man ("the flesh"), but also as proceeding from the influence of an Evil Spirit, exercising that mysterious power of free will, which God's rational creatures possess, to rebel against Him, and to draw others into the same rebellion ("the devil"). In accordance with the "economy" and progressiveness of God's revelation, the existence of Satan is but gradually revealed. In the first entrance of evil into the world, the temptation is referred only to the SERPENT. (ADAM; EVE.) Throughout the patriarchal and Jewish dispensation, this vague and imperfect revelation of the Source of Evil alone was given. The Source of all Good is set forth in all His supreme and unapproachable Majesty; evil is known negatively as the falling away from Him; and the "vanity" of idols is represented as the opposite to His reality and goodness. (ATONEMENT, DAY OF.) The Book of Job stands alone on the basis of "natural religion," apart from the gradual and orderly evolutions of the Mosaic revelation. In it, for the first time, we find a distinct mention of "Satan," the "adversary" of Job. But it is important to remark the emphatic stress laid on his subordinate position, on the absence of all but delegated power, of all terror, and all grandeur in his character. It is especially remarkable that no power of spiritual influence, but only a power over outward circumstances, is attributed to him. The Captivity brought the Israelites face to face with the great dualism of the Persian mythology, the conflict of Ormuzd with Ahriman, the coördinate Spirit of Evil. (PERSIANS § 2.) In the books written after the Captivity we have again the name of "Satan" mentioned (1 Chr. xxi. 1; Zech. iii. 1, 2); but it is confessed by all that the Satan of Scripture bears no resemblance to the Persian Ahriman. His subordination and inferiority are as strongly marked as ever. In the interval between the O. T. and N. T. the Jewish mind had pondered on the scanty revelations already given of evil spiritual influence. But the Apocryphal Books, while dwelling on demons (ASMODEUS; DEVIL 2; DEMON) have no notice of Satan, except in Wis. ii. 24. The same may be observed of Josephus. But, while a mass of fable and superstition grew up on the general subject of evil spiritual influence, still the existence and nature of Satan remained in the background, felt, but not understood. The N. T. first brings it plainly forward. From the beginning of the Gospel, when he appears as the personal tempter of our Lord (JESUS CHRIST), through all the Gospels, Epistles, and Apocalypse, it is asserted or implied, again and again, as a familiar and important truth (Jn. viii. 44, &c.; ANGELS; DEMONIACS).—B. His nature. Satan is spoken of as a "spirit" in Eph. ii. 2, as the prince or ruler of the demons (A. V. "devils"; DEMON; DEVIL 2) in Mat. xii. 24-26, and as having "ANGELS" subject to him in Mat. xxv. 41 and Rev. xii. 7, 9. The whole description of his power implies spiritual nature and spiritual influence. We conclude, therefore, that he was of angelic nature, a rational and spiritual creature, superhuman in power, wisdom, and energy;

and not only so, but an ARCHANGEL, one of the "princes" of heaven. But of the time, cause, and manner of his fall, Scripture tells us scarcely any thing.<sup>1</sup> It limits its disclosures, as always, to that which we need to know. The passage on which all the fabric of tradition and poetry has been raised is Rev. xii. 7, 9, which speaks of "MICHAEL and his angels" as "fighting against the DRAGON and his angels," till the "great dragon, called the devil and Satan, was cast out into the earth, and his angels cast out with him;" but this (so Mr. Barry) cannot refer to the original fall of Satan. The only other passage which refers to the fall of the angels is 2 Pet. ii. 4 ("God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness to be reserved unto judgment"), with the parallel passage in Jude 6 (see note <sup>1</sup> below). The declaration of our Lord in Lk. x. 18, "I beheld Satan, as lightning, fall from heaven," may refer to the fact of his original fall; but tells nothing of its cause or method. John viii. 44, it seems likely, refers to the beginning of his action upon man. From 1 Tim. iii. 6, "lest being lifted up by pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil," it is a probable inference that pride was the cause of the devil's condemnation.—But Scripture describes to us distinctly the moral nature of the Evil One. This is no matter of barren speculation to those who, by yielding to evil, may become the "children of Satan," instead of "children of God." The ideal of goodness is made up of the three great moral attributes of God—Love, Truth, and Purity or Holiness; combined with that spirit which is the natural temper of a finite and dependent creature, the spirit of Faith. We find, accordingly, that the opposites of these qualities are dwelt upon as the characteristics of the devil (Mat. iv. 1-10; Jn. viii. 44; 1 Tim. iii. 6; 1 Jn. iii. 10-15, &c.).—C. His power and action. The power of Satan over the soul is represented as exercised either directly or by his instruments. His direct influence over the soul is simply that of a powerful and evil nature on those in whom lurks the germ of the same evil, differing from the influence exercised by a wicked man in degree rather than in kind; but he has the power of suggesting thoughts, without the medium of action or words—a power which is only in very slight degree exercised by men upon each other. This influence is spoken of in Scripture in the strongest terms, as a real external influence, correlative to, but not to be confounded with, the existence of evil within (Mat. xiii. 19, 39; Acts xxvi. 18; Rom. xvi. 20; 1 Cor. v. 5; 2 Cor. ii. 11; 1 Th. ii. 18; 2 Th. ii. 9; 1 Tim. i. 20, v. 15; Rev. ii. 9, 10, 13, 24, iii. 9). The Bible puts before us in plain and terrible certainty the fact of Satanic influence over the soul. Yet its language is very far from countenancing the Manichean theory. The influence of Satan is always spoken of as temporary and limited, subordinated to the Divine counsel, and broken by the Incarnate Son of God. It is brought out visibly, in the form of possession, in the earthly life of our Lord, only in order that it may give the opportunity of His triumph (Rom. xvi. 20; compare Gen. iii. 15). The history of Job shows plainly, what is elsewhere constantly implied, <sup>1</sup> There is no impossibility in the nature of things that God has created or should create beings of just such powers as are ascribed to "the devil and his angels;" and there is no more impossibility that such beings have sinned or should sin than that men have sinned or should sin. The existence of fallen angels is no more impossible than the existence of holy angels; the same God may not only have created both, but may have made both originally alike.

that Satanic influence is permitted in order to be overruled to good, to teach humility, and, therefore, faith. The mystery of the existence of evil is left unexplained, but its present subordination and future destruction are familiar truths. So, accordingly, on the other hand, his power is spoken of as capable of being resisted by the will of man, when aided by the grace of God (2 Cor. ii. 11; Eph. iv. 27, vi. 10-17; 1 Tim. iii. 7, vi. 9; 2 Tim. ii. 26; Jas. iv. 7; 1 Pet. v. 8; 1 Jn. v. 18). Besides his own direct influence, the Scripture discloses to us the fact that Satan is the leader of a host of evil spirits or angels who share his evil work, and for whom the "everlasting fire is prepared" (Mat. xxv. 41; ETERNAL; JUDGMENT, &c.). Mat. xii. 24-26 identifies them distinctly with the demons (A. V. "devils") who had power to possess the souls of men. (BEELZEBUL; DEMON; DEMONIACS.) They are mostly spoken of in Scripture in reference to possession; but in Eph. vi. 12 they are described in various lights, as "principalities," "powers," "rulers of the darkness of this world," and "spiritual powers of wickedness in heavenly places" (or "things"); and in all as "wrestling" against the soul of man. In Rev. xii. 7-9, they are spoken of as fighting with "the dragon, the old serpent called the devil and Satan," against "Michael and his angels," and as cast out of heaven with their chief.<sup>2</sup> Taking all these passages together, we find them sharing the enmity to God and man implied in the name and nature of Satan; but their power and action are but little dwelt upon in comparison with his. The Evil One is not only the "prince of the demons," but also the "prince of this world" (Jn. xii. 31, xiv. 30, xvi. 11), and even the "god of this world" (2 Cor. iv. 4; compare Eph. vi. 12; IDOLATRY). This power he claimed for himself, as a delegated authority, in the temptation of our Lord (Lk. iv. 6; JESUS CHRIST); and the temptation would have been unreal, had he spoken altogether falsely. It implies another kind of indirect influence exercised through earthly instruments. There are some indications in Scripture of the exercise of this power through inanimate instruments, of an influence over the powers of nature, and what men call the "chances" of life (Lk. xiii. 16; Jn. vi. 70, viii. 44; Acts xiii. 10; 2 Cor. xi. 14, 15, xii. 7; 1 Th. ii. 18;

<sup>2</sup> These and other passages respecting the state of the fallen angels may be harmonized thus: The "chains of darkness," with which they are bound represent the utter hopelessness of their escape from the JUDGMENT of God which awaits them: their trial and condemnation at the appointed time are just as certain as in the case of a murderer against whom the evidence is conclusive and fully in readiness while the guilty one is closely confined with heavy chains in a strong prison. They may have a particular place called "HELL," or "the deep" (Lk. viii. 31), or "the bottomless pit" (Rev. ix. 1), for their proper abode, and at their first banishment from heaven, and at other particular times, may have been sent thither, while yet none of them may now be compelled to remain there constantly, but all may be allowed for a time or at times to visit the earth and fully manifest their abominable character. They may sometimes be sent by the irresistible power of God to desert places on the earth: they may be some of the time not in the heaven of heavens where God and holy angels dwell, but in the AIR or in some other part of the heavens where they may meet the holy angels and strive to hinder them in their discharge of the sacred trusts committed to them. In this sense there may be "war in HEAVEN" (Rev. xii. 7), i. e. in the air or in some other part of that vast region called "heaven." There the "prince of the power of the air" may marshal his host and be defeated by the holy angels. Thus "the devil and his angels" may have their proper home in hell and yet not be always there. They will disobey God and leave their prison or abode of torment, if they can; but God will ultimately confine them there without a respite (Mat. xviii. 29, xxv. 41 ff.; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6; Rev. xx. 10, &c.).

1 Jn. iii. 8-10; Rev. ii. 10). Most of all is this indirect action of Satan manifested in those who deliberately mislead and tempt men. The method of his action is best discerned by an examination of the title by which he is designated in Scripture. He is called emphatically "the devil" (Gr. ho diabolos; DEVIL 1). The derivation of the word in itself implies only the endeavor to break the bonds between others, and "set them at variance;" but common usage adds to this general sense the special idea of "setting at variance by slander." In the application of the title to Satan, both the general and special senses should be kept in view. His general object is to break the bonds of communion between God and man, and the bonds of truth and love which bind men to each other. He slanders God to man, and man to God. The slander of God to man is seen best in Gen. iii. 4, 5, "Ye shall not surely die: for God doth know, that in the day that ye eat thereof, your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." These words attribute selfishness and jealousy to the Giver of all good. The slander of man to God is illustrated by Job i. 9-11, ii. 4, 5. In reference to it, Satan is called the "adversary" of man in 1 Pet. v. 8, and represented in that character in Zech. iii. 1, 2; and is designated in Rev. xii. 10 as "the accuser of our brethren, who accused them before our God day and night." The method of Satanic action upon the heart itself may be summed up in two words—Temptation and Possession. The subject of TEMPTATION is illustrated, not only by abstract statements, but also by the record of the temptations of ADAM and of our Lord. (JESUS CHRIST.) It is expressly laid down (as in Jas. i. 2-4), that "temptation," properly so called, i. e. "trial," is essential to man, and is accordingly ordained for him and sent to him by God (as in Gen. xxii. 1). Man's nature is progressive; his faculties, which exist at first only in capacity, must be brought out to exist in actual efficiency by free exercise. His appetites and passions need to be checked by the reason and conscience, and this need brings on a trial. Besides this, the will itself delights in independence of action. The need of giving up the individual will freely and by conviction, so as to be in harmony with the will of God, is the occasion of a still severer trial. It is this tentability of man, even in his original nature, which is represented in Scripture as giving scope to the evil action of Satan. He is called the "tempter" (Mat. iv. 3; 1 Th. iii. 5). He has power, first, to present to the appetites or passions their objects in vivid and captivating forms; and next, to act upon the desire of the will for independence. It is a power which can be resisted, because it is under the control and overruling power of God (1 Cor. x. 13; Jas. iv. 7, &c.). It is exercised both negatively and positively. Its negative exercise is referred to in the parable of the sower (Mat. xiii. 19). Its positive exercise is set forth in the parable of the wheat and the tares (23, 38, 39). This exercise of the Tempter's power is possible, even against a sinless nature. We see this in the Temptation of our Lord (iv. 1 ff. &c.). But in the temptation of a fallen nature Satan has a greater power. "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin" (Jn. viii. 34; compare Rom. vi. 16, vii. 14-24). His own "LUST" or the "FLESH" sympathizes with, and aids, the temptation of the Evil One. This is a fact recognized by experience. The power of sin is broken by the ATONEMENT and the gift of the Spirit, but yet not completely cast out (Gal. v. 17). (ANANIAS 10; DAVID; JUDAS IS-CARIOT; REDEMPTION; REPENTANCE; SANCTIFICATION; SAVIOUR; SIN; SPIRIT, THE HOLY.) This twofold power of temptation is frequently referred to in Scripture, as exercised, chiefly by the suggestion of evil thoughts, but occasionally by the delegated power of Satan over outward circumstances. (EX-COMMUNICATION; HYMENEUS; PHILETUS.) On the subject of Possession, see DEMONIACS.

Sath-ra-bu'za-nes [-neez] (L.) = SHETHAR-BOZNAI (1 Esd. vi. 3, 7, 27).

Satyr [-tur] (fr. Gr.), the A. V. translation in Is. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 14, of the Heb. šd'ir, pl. šd'irim, literally translated "hairy" in Gen. xxvii. 11, 23, and "rough" in Dan. viii. 21, is frequently applied to he-goats (GOAT), and is translated in plural "devils" (DEVIL 3) in Lev. xvii. 7, and 2 Chr. xi. 15; but in Is. xiii. 21, and xxxiv. 14, where the prophet predicts the desolation of Babylon, our translation is correct, and Satyrs, i. e. demons of woods and desert places, are intended (so Mr. Houghton, with Bochart, Gesenius, Rosenmüller, Parkhurst, Maurer, &c.). The satyrs in classical mythology were imaginary beings, represented as partly (usually half or more) human and partly goat-like in form, and regarded as constituting a class of deities or superhuman beings that frequented forests and lonely places. The Hebrew word translated "satyr" in the A. V. is here rendered demon in the LXX.; hairy or shaggy animal (see above) in the Vulgate; shaggy beast (or wild goat) by Prof. J. A. Alexander (on Is.), Dr. W. L. Alexander (in Kitto), Henderson, Fairbairn, Ayre, &c.; ape by Michaelis, Lichtenstein, &c. "If the question is determined by tradition and authority, it denotes demons; if by the context and usage of the word, it signifies wild goats, or more generically, hairy, shaggy animals" (J. A. Alexander, on Is. xiii. 21). The Mendesians of Egypt worshipped the goat, especially the he-goat (Herodotus); and some species of Cynocephalus (dog-faced baboon) also entered into the theology of the ancient Egyptians (so Mr. Houghton, &c.). The "devils" in Lev. xvii. 7 and 2 Chr. xi. 15 were probably goats or idols in the form of goats (Gesenius, J. A. Alexander, &c.).

Saul (L. fr. Heb. = asked for, desired, Ges.), more accurately SHAUL. 1. "Saul of Rehoboth by the River" was one of the early kings of Edom, and successor of Samlah (Gen. xxxvi. 37, 38). In 1 Chr. i. 48 he is called SHAUL.—2. The first king of Israel. His character is in part illustrated by the fierce, wayward, fitful nature of his tribe (BENJAMIN 1), and in part accounted for by the struggle between the old and new systems in which he found himself involved. To this we must add a taint of madness, which broke out in violent frenzy at times, leaving him with long lucid intervals. He was remarkable for his strength and activity (2 Sam. i. 23), and like the Homeric heroes, of gigantic stature, taller by head and shoulders than the rest of the people, and of that kind of beauty denoted by the word "goodly" (1 Sam. ix. 2), and which caused him (so Dean Stanley, original author of this article) to be compared to the gazelle, "the gazelle (A. V. 'beauty') of Israel" (2 Sam. i. 19). The birth-place of Saul is not expressly mentioned; but, as ZELAH was the place of Kish's sepulchre (2 Sam. xxi.), it was probably his native village.<sup>1</sup> His father,

Kish, was a powerful and wealthy chief, though the family to which he belonged was of little importance (1 Sam. ix. 1, 21). A portion of his property consisted of a drove of asses. In search of these asses, gone astray on the mountains, he sent his son Saul, accompanied by a servant, who acted also as a guide and guardian of the young man (ix. 3-10). After a three days' journey through Ephraim and Benjamin (SHALIM; SHALISHA; ZUPH), Saul met with SAMUEL for the first time (11 ff.). A Divine intimation had indicated to him the approach and the future destiny of the youthful Benjamite. Surprised at his language, but still obeying his call, they ascended to the high place, and in the inn or caravanserai at the top (so LXX.) found thirty or (LXX., and Josephus) seventy guests assembled, among whom they took the chief place. In anticipation of some distinguished stranger, Samuel had bade the cook reserve a boiled shoulder, from which Saul, as the chief guest, was bidden to tear off the first morsel (LXX. ix. 22-24). They then descended to the city, and a bed was prepared for Saul on the housetop. At daybreak Samuel roused him. They descended again to the skirts of the town, and there (the servant having left them) Samuel poured over Saul's head the consecrated oil, and with a kiss of salutation announced to him that he was to be the ruler and (LXX.) deliverer of the nation (ix. 25-x. 1). From that moment a new life dawned upon him. He returned by a route which, like that of his search, it is impossible to make out distinctly (RACHEL; TABOR, PLAIN OF; ZELZAH); and at every step homeward it was confirmed by the incidents which, according to Samuel's prediction, awaited him (x. 9, 10). The finding of the asses was announced to him, and loaves of bread were offered him as if to indicate his new dignity. At "the hill of God" (ver. 5, 10; possibly his own city, GIBEATH), he met a band of prophets (PROPHET) descending with musical instruments, and he caught the inspiration from them as a sign of his new life. This may be styled the private, inner view of his call. The outer call, related independently of the other, was as follows:—An assembly was convened by Samuel at Mizpeh, and lots were cast to find the tribe and family which was to produce the king. Saul was named—and, by a Divine intimation, found hid in the circle of baggage which surrounded the encampment (x. 17-24). His stature at once conciliated the public feeling; the shout was raised, "Long live the king" (x. 23-24); and he returned to Gibeath, accompanied by the fighting part of the people, of whom he was now to be the especial head. The murmurs of the worthless part of the community who refused to salute him with the usual presents were soon dispelled. He was (having apparently returned to his private life) on his way home, driving his herd of oxen, when he heard one of those wild lamentations in the city of Gibeath, such as mark in Eastern towns the arrival of a great brew GENEALOGY being often omitted: see CHRONOLOGY I.) = grandson of Abiel, "Saul's uncle" in xiv. 50 descriptive of ABNER rather than of Ner, and "MICHAEL" in 2 Sam. xxi. 8, a copyist's mistake for MERAB. But some have supposed that Ner was "Saul's uncle," and thus Abner was Saul's cousin, in which case there may have been either two named Ner, (viz. Saul's grandfather and Saul's uncle), or only one Kish (viz. the grandson of Jehiel and brother of Ner), who might have been reckoned as Jehiel's son in consequence of the distinct and important family of which he became the head (compare the cases of EPHRAIM and MANASSEH who were reckoned as "sons" of their grandfather Jacob, and of ANAH who appears among the "sons" of Seir in Gen. xxxvi. 20 and 1 Chr. i. 35).

<sup>1</sup> The following is the genealogy of Saul according to the most common mode of reconciling the different statements (1 Sam. ix. 1, 2, xiv. 49-51; 2 Sam. ix. 12, xxi. 8; 1 Chr. viii. 29 ff., ix. 33 ff.). This table makes ABIEL 1 = JEHIEL 12, "son of Abiel" in 1 Sam. ix. 1 (a link in a He-

commissioners (xxi. 1-9, xxii. 14). Saul himself had a tall spear (ARMS, I. 2, a), which never left him. In battle he wore a DIADEN (A. V. "CROWN") on his head and a BRACELET on his arm (2 Sam. i. 10). The warlike character of his reign naturally still predominated, and he could now attack the neighboring tribes of MOAB, AMMON, EDOM, ZOBAB, and finally AMALEK (1 Sam. xiv. 47). The war with Amalek is twice related, first briefly (xiv. 48), and then at length (xv. 1-9). Saul's disobedience to the prophetic command of SAMUEL was shown in the sparing of the king (AGAG), and the retention of the spoil. This second act of disobedience called down the second curse, and the first distinct intimation of the transference of the kingdom to a rival. The struggle between Samuel and Saul in their final parting is indicated by the rent of Samuel's robe as he tears himself away from Saul's grasp, and by the long mourning of Samuel for the separation (xv. 27, 35, xvi. 1). The rest of Saul's life is one long tragedy. The frenzy (MADNESS) which had given indications of itself before, now at times took almost entire possession of him. It is described as "an evil spirit from the Lord" (comp. the phrase "religious madness"; DEMONIACS), which, when it came upon him, almost choked or strangled him from its violence (xvi. 14, LXX.). In this crisis DAVID was recommended to him by one of the young men of his guard. From this time forward their lives are blended together. In Saul's better moments he never lost the strong affection which he had contracted for David. Occasionally too his prophetic gift returned, blended with his madness (xix. 24). But his acts of fierce, wild zeal increased (xxii., xxviii. 3, 9; 2 Sam. xxi. 1). At last the monarchy itself, which he had raised up, broke down under the weakness of its head. The Philistines reentered the country, and with their chariots and horses occupied the plain of Esdraelon. Their camp was pitched on the southern slope of the range now called Little Hermon, by Shunem. On the opposite side, on Mount Gilboa, was the Israelite army, clinging as usual to the heights which were their safety. It was near the spring of Gideon's encampment (HAROD = trembling)—and now the heart of the king as he pitched his camp there "trembled exceedingly" (1 Sam. xxviii. 5). In the loss of all the usual means of consulting the Divine Will, he determined, with that wayward mixture of superstition and religion which marked his whole career, to apply to one of the necromancers who had escaped his persecution. She was a woman living at En-dor, on the other side of Little Hermon. According to the Hebrew tradition mentioned by Jerome, she was the mother of Abner. She recognizes the disguised king first by the appearance of Samuel. Saul apparently saw nothing, but listened to her description of a god-like figure of an aged man, wrapped round with the royal or sacred robe. (DIVINATION 5; MAGIC, p. 585.) On hearing the denunciation, which the apparition conveyed, Saul fell the whole length of his gigantic stature (xxviii. 20 margin) on the ground, and remained motionless till the woman and his servants forced him to eat. The next day the battle came on, and according to Josephus, perhaps according to the spirit of the sacred narrative, his courage and self-devotion returned. The Israelites were driven up the side of Gilboa. The three sons of Saul were slain (xxxi. 2). Saul himself with his armor-bearer was pursued by the archers and charioteers of the enemy (xxxi. 3; 2 Sam. i. 6). He was wounded. His shield was cast away (i. 21). He fell upon his own sword (1 Sam. xxxi. 4). According to another account, an Amalekite (Jewish tradition makes him the son of Doeg) came up at the moment of his death-wound, and found him "fallen," but leaning on his spear (2 Sam. i. 6, 10). The dizziness of death was gathered over him (LXX., 2 Sam. i. 9), but he was still alive; and he was, at his own request, put out of his pain by the Amalekite, who took off his royal diadem and bracelet, and carried the news to David (i. 7-10).<sup>3</sup> The body, on being found by the Philistines, was stripped and decapitated. The armor was sent into the Philistine cities, as if in retribution for the spoliation of Goliath, and finally deposited in the temple of Astarte (ASHTAROTH), apparently in the neighboring Canaanitish city of BETH-SHAN; and over the walls of the same city was hung the naked headless corpse, with those of his three sons (ver. 9, 10). The head was deposited (probably at ASHDOD) in the temple of Dagon (1 Chr. x. 10). The corpse was removed from Bethshan by the gratitude of the inhabitants of JABESH-GILEAD, who came over the Jordan by night, carried off the bodies, burnt them, and buried them under the tamarisk (A. V., with Onkelos, Syriac, Arabic, Fürst, &c., "tree;" compare "oak" in 1 Chr. x. 12) at Jabesh (1 Sam. xxxi. 13). Thence, after the lapse of several years, his ashes and those of Jonathan were removed by David to their ancestral sepulchre at Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xxi. 14). (CHRONOLOGY.)

—3. The Jewish name of St. PAUL.

* Save, to. SALVATION; SAVIOUR.

SA-VI'as (fr. Gr.) = Uzzi, ancestor of Ezra (1 Esd. viii. 2).

Sa'vior, or Sa'viour [save'yur] (Heb. participle mōshîa', from yāsha', to save; Gr. sōtēr) = one who saves or brings salvation, i. e. one who delivers or rescues from actual or impending danger. The Hebrew and Greek terms express, beyond this, assistance and protection of every kind; and, in a secondary sense, the results of such assistance—victory, safety, prosperity, and happiness. Thus, the Judges are termed "saviours" (Neh. ix. 27; Judg. iii. 9 margin); "the Lord gave Israel a saviour," viz. Jeroboam II., to deliver Israel from the Syrians (2 K. xiii. 5). In the Psalms are numerous petitions to God to save from the effects of sin (Ps. xxxix. 8, lxxix. 9, &c.). Isaiah appropriates the term "Saviour" to Jehovah (xliii. 11), and connects it with the notions of justice and righteousness (xlv. 21, lx. 16, 17); adduces it as the special manner in which Jehovah reveals Himself to man (xlv. 15); hints at the means to be adopted in passages where he connects "Saviour" with "REDEEMER" (xli. 14, xlix. 26, lx. 16, &c.), and with "ransom" (xliii. 3, &c.). (See also Zech. ix. 9; Hos. i. 7, &c.) In the N. T. the term "Saviour" is especially applied to the Lord JESUS CHRIST (Lk. ii. 11; Jn. iv. 42, &c.). He wrought the miracles that were to be the credentials of the MESSIAH; He laid down the principles of the Gospel morality, until He had established in the minds of the Twelve the conviction that He was the Christ of God. Then He taught that His work included suffering as well as teaching (Mat. xvi. 20, 21, xx. 28, &c.). The words of the institution of the LORD'S SUPPER speak most distinctly of a SACRIFICE (Mat. xxvi. 27, 28, &c.). In John iii. 14, 15, under the figure of the brazen serpent lifted up, the atoning virtue of the Lord's death is fully set forth (comp. vi. 51, 53, x. 11, 17, 18, xvii. 17, 19, &c.). The apostles, after the RESURRECTION, preach no moral system, but a belief in and love of Christ, the crucified and risen Lord, through whom, if they repent, men shall obtain SALVATION (Acts ii., iii. 18, viii., comp. Is. liii., &c.). We are able to complete from the Epistles our account of the teaching of the apostles on the doctrine of ATONEMENT (2 Cor. v. 21; Gal. iii. 13; 1 Tim. ii. 5; Heb. vii. 25; 1 Pet. ii. 24; 1 Jn. ii. 1, 2, &c.). The teaching of the N. T. on the effects of the death of Jesus may be thus roughly described (so Archbishop Thomson, original author of this article): (I.) God sent His Son into the world to redeem lost and ruined man from SIN and DEATH, and the Son willingly took upon Him the form of a servant for this purpose; and thus the Father and the Son manifested their love for us. (II.) God the Father laid upon His Son the weight of the sins of the whole world, so that He bare in His own body the wrath which men must else have borne, because there was no other way of escape for them; and thus the Atonement was a manifestation of Divine justice. (III.) The effect of the Atonement thus wrought is, that man is placed in a new position, freed from the dominion of sin, and able to follow holiness; and thus the doctrine of the Atonement ought to work in all the hearers a sense of love, of obedience, and of self-sacrifice. In shorter words, the sacrifice of the death of Christ is a proof of Divine love, and of Divine justice, and is for us a document of obedience. FAITH; HEAVEN; JUSTIFICATION; LOVE; RANSOM; REPENTANCE; RIGHTEOUS; SAINT, &c.

Saw (Heb. māgērāh, massôr). Egyptian saws, so far as has yet been discovered, were single-handed, though Jerome has been thought to allude to circular saws. The teeth, as in modern Oriental saws, usually incline toward the handle, instead of away from it like ours. They have, in most cases, bronze blades, apparently attached to the handles by leathern thongs, but some of those in the British Museum have their blades let into them like our knives. A double-handed iron saw has been found at Nimrud. No evidence exists of the use of the saw applied to stone in Egypt, nor without the double-handed saw does it seem likely that this should be the case; but we read of sawn stones used in the Temple (1 K. vii. 9). The saws "under" or "in" which David is said to have placed his captives were of iron. The expression in 2 Sam. xii. 31 does not necessarily imply torture, but the word "cut" in 1 Chr. xx. 3 can hardly be understood otherwise. HANDICRAFT; PUNISHMENTS; WAR.

* Scales, the A. V. translation of the Heb. peles = a BALANCE, Ges. (Is. xl. 12), also translated "weight" (Prov. xvi. 11). FISH.

Scar'let. COLORS.

Scep'tre [sep'ter] (Fr. fr. Gr., see below). The Hebrew term shēbet, like its Greek equivalent skēptron, and our derivative sceptre, originally meant a ROD or STAFF. It was thence specifically applied to the shepherd's crook (Lev. xxvii. 32; Mic. vii. 14), and to the wand or sceptre of a ruler. The sceptre of the Egyptian kings resembled a plough. The use of the staff as a symbol of authority was not confined to kings; it might be used by any leader, as in Judg. v. 14, where for "pen of the writer," as in the A. V., we should read "sceptre of the leader" (so Mr. Beran). The allusions to the sceptre are all of a metaphorical character, and describe it simply as one of the insignia of supreme power (Gen. xlix. 10; Num. xxiv. 17; Ps. xlv. 6; Is. xiv. 5; Am. i. 5; Zech. x. 11; Wis. x. 14; Bar. vi. 14). The sceptre of the Jewish kings was probably made of wood. That of the Persian monarch is described as "golden," i. e. probably of massive gold (Esth. iv. 11). A carved ivory staff discovered at Nimrud is supposed to have been a sceptre.

Sce'va [see-] (L. fr. Gr. = furnished, prepared, Schl.), a Jew residing at Ephesus at St. Paul's second visit to that town (Acts xix. 14-16), described as a high-priest (Gr. archiereus, A. V. "chief of the priests"), either as having exercised the office at Jerusalem, or as being chief of one of the twenty-four classes. His seven sons were exorcists. DEMONIAIC; EXORCIST.

* Schlim [shin] (a German spelling of Heb. shin = a tooth, Ges.), the twenty-first letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.), shin being the same letter with the point differently placed. WRITING.

* Schlism [sizm], an Anglicized form of Gr. schisma (1 Cor. i. 10 marg., xi. 18 marg., xii. 25), usually translated "division" (Jn. vii. 43, ix. 16, &c.), o: "rent" (Mat. ix. 16; Mk. ii. 21).

* School [skool] occurs in the A. V. only in Acts xix. 9 as the translation of Gr. scholē = leisure; hence a school, a place of learned leisure, where a teacher and his disciples came together, and held discussions and disputations (Rbn. N. T. Lxx.). EDUCATION; PHILOSOPHY; PROPHECY.

Sci'ence [si-] (Fr. fr. L. scientia = knowledge). In the A. V. this word occurs only in Dan. i. 4 as the translation of Heb. madda, and in 1 Tim. vi. 20 as the translation of Gr. gnōsis, both being elsewhere literally and usually rendered "knowledge." St. Paul is speaking of the "knowledge" of which both the Judaizing and the mystic sects of the apostolic age continually boasted, against which he so urgently warns men (1 Cor. viii. 1, 7), the counterfeit of the true knowledge which he prizes so highly (xii. 8, xiii. 2; Phil. i. 9; Col. iii. 10). MAGI; PHILOSOPHY.

* Scorn. LAUGH.

Scorpi-on (Heb. 'akrāb; Gr. skorpion), the common name of certain well-known animals of the class Arachnida and family Scorpionida (genus: Scorpio, Linn.). Scorpions (so Mr. Gosse, in Fairbairn) "agree with spiders in breathing by means of lung-sacs, but differ from them by having large extended palpi (or feelers) with pincer-shaped extremities, and an abdomen divided into distinct segments, and invested in a crustaceous integument (or crust-like shell)." They are mentioned in Deut. viii. 15; Ez. ii. 6; Lk. x. 19, xi. 12; Rev. ix. 3, 5, 10). The wilderness of Sinai was inhabited by scorpions at the time of the Exodus, and to this day these animals are common in the same district, as well as in some parts of PALESTINE. Ehrenberg enumerates five species as occurring near Mount Sinai, some of which are found also, with other species, in Lebanon. Scorpions are generally found in dry and in dark places, under stones and in ruins, chiefly in warm climates. They are carnivorous in their habits, and move along in a threatening attitude with the tail elevated. The sting, which is situated at the extremity of the tail, has at its base a gland which secretes a poisonous fluid, which is discharged into the wound by two minute orifices at its extremity. In hot climates the sting often occasions much suffering, and sometimes alarming symptoms. The "scorpions" of 1 K. xii. 11, 14, and 2 Chr. x. 11, 1, have clearly no allusion to the animal, but to some instrument of scourging—probably a whip armed with iron points (so Mr. Houghton)—unless indeed the expression is a mere figure. Celsius thinks the "scorpion" scourge was the spiny stem of what the Arabs call Hedek, the Solanum melongena, variety exculentum, i. e. egg-plant (allied to the tomato).

Scorpion.

Scour'ing [skurj-]. The punishment of scourging was prescribed by the Law in the case of a betrothed bondwoman guilty of unchastity, and perhaps in the case of both the guilty persons (Lev. xix. 20). The instrument of punishment in ancient Egypt, as it is also in modern times generally in the East, was usually the stick, applied to the soles of the feet—bastinado. Under the Roman method the culprit was stripped, stretched with cords or thongs on a frame, and beaten with rods. After the Porcian law, B. C. 300, Roman citizens were exempted from scourging, but slaves and foreigners were liable to be beaten even to death. ADULTERY; PUNISHMENTS; SCORPION.

Screech'-owl. OWL.

Scribe, pl. Scribes (fr. L. scriba = writer; Gr. grammateus; Heb. sôphêr, pl. sôphêrim). I. Name. (1.) Three meanings (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article) are connected with the Heb. verb sôphar, the root of sôphêr, sôphêrim—(a.) to write, (b.) to set in order, (c.) to count. The sôphêrim or scribes were so called because they wrote out the Law, or because they classified and arranged its precepts, or because they counted with scrupulous minuteness every clause and letter it contained. The traditions of the Scribes were in favor of the last of these etymologies. The second fits in best with the military functions connected with the word in the earlier stages of its history. The authority of most Hebrew scholars is with the first. The Greek equivalent (grammateus) answers to the derived rather than the original meaning of the word. The grammateus or scribe of a Greek state was not the mere writer, but the keeper and registrar of public documents (Thucydides, iv. 118, vii. 10; so in Acts xix. 35). (2.) The name of KIRJATH-SEPHER (Josh. xv. 15; Judg. i. 12) may possibly connect itself with some early use of the title. In Judg. v. 14 the Hebrew word (A. V. "writer") appears to point to military functions of some kind. The "pen of the writer" of the A. V. here is probably the rod or sceptre of the commander numbering or marshalling his troops. Three men are mentioned as successively filling the office of Scribe under David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii. 17, xx. 25;

1 K. iv. 3; KING). We may think of them as the king's secretaries, writing his letters, drawing up his decrees, managing his finances (compare 2 K. xii. 10). At a later period the word again connects itself with the act of numbering the military forces of the country (Jer. li. 25, and probably Is. xxxiii. 18). Other associations, however, began to gather round it about the same period. The zeal of Hezekiah led him to foster the growth of a body of men whose work it was to transcribe old records, or to put in writing what had been handed down orally (Prov. xxv. 1). To this period accordingly belongs the new significance of the title. It no longer designates only an OFFICER of the king's court, but a class, students and interpreters of the Law, boasting of their wisdom (Jer. viii. 8). (3.) The seventy years of the CAPTIVITY gave a fresh glory to the name. The exiles would be anxious to preserve the sacred books, the laws, the hymns, the prophecies of the past. Ezr. vii. 10—"to seek the Law of the LORD, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments"—describes the high ideal of the new office. The Scribes publicly read and expounded the Law, perhaps also translated it from the already obsolescent Hebrew into the Aramaic of the people (Neh. viii. 8-13). (4.) Of the time that followed we have but scanty records. The Scribes' office apparently became more and more prominent. They appear as a distinct class, "the families of the Scribes," with a local habitation (1 Chr. ii. 55). They compile, as in the two Books of Chronicles, extracts and epitomes of larger histories (1 Chr. xxix. 29; 2 Chr. ix. 29).—II. Development of Doctrine. (1.) Of the Scribes of this period, except EZRA and ZADOK (Neh. viii. 9, xiii. 13), we have no names. A later age honored them collectively as the men of the Great Synagogue. (CANON; SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT.) Never, perhaps, was so important a work done so silently. In the words of later Judaism they devoted themselves to the mikrâ (i. e. recitation, "reading," as in Neh. viii. 8), the careful study of the text, and laid down rules for transcribing it with the most scrupulous precision. (2.) A saying is ascribed to SIMON the Just (B. C. 300-290), which embodies the principle on which they had acted, and enables us to trace the next stage of the growth of their system. "Our fathers have taught us," he said, "three things, to be cautious in judging, to train many scholars, and to set a fence about the Law." They wished to make the Law of Moses the rule of life for the whole nation and for individual men. The Jewish teacher could recognize no principles beyond the precepts of the Law. (3.) In this as in other instances, the idolatry of the letter was destructive of the very reverence in which it had originated. Step by step the Scribes were led to conclusions at which we may believe the earlier representatives of the order would have started back with horror. Decisions on fresh questions were accumulated into a complex system of casuistry. The new precepts, still transmitted orally, more precisely fitting in to the circumstances of men's lives than the old, came practically to take their place. The "Words of the Scribes" were honored above the Law. The right relation of moral and ceremonial laws was not only forgotten, but absolutely inverted. (4.) The first work of the Scribes in our Lord's time was to report the decisions of previous Rabbis. These were the Halâkhôth (the current precepts of the schools)—precepts binding on the conscience. From these grew up the Mishna, and afterward the Gemara, which together constitute the Talmud. (OLD TESTAMENT, B; PHARISEES.) (5.) But the sacred books were not studied as a code of laws only. To search into their meaning had from the first belonged to the ideal office of the Scribe. But here also the book suggested thoughts which could not logically be deduced from it. The fruit of their interpretative effort appears in the Midrashim (= searchings, investigations, commentaries) on the several books of the O. T. The process by which the meaning, moral or mystical, was elicited, was known as Haggadah (= saying, opinion). The mystical school of interpretation culminated in the Kabbalah (= reception, the received doctrine). Every letter, every number, became pregnant with mysteries. (OLD TESTAMENT, B.)—III. History. (1.) The names of the earlier Scribes passed away, as has been said, mostly unrecorded. Simon the Just (about B. C. 300-290) appears as the last of the men of the Great Synagogue, the beginner of a new period. The names of the times that followed—Antigonus of Socho, Zadok, Boëthus—connect themselves with the rise of the first opposition (SADDUCEES) to the traditional system which was growing up. (PHILOSOPHY.) The tenet of the Sadducees, however, was embraced by only a small minority. It tended, by maintaining the sufficiency of the letter of the Law, to destroy the very occupation of a Scribe, and the class, as such, belonged to the party of its opponents. The words "Scribes" and "PHARISEES" were bound together by the closest possible alliance (Mat. xxiii.; Lk. v. 30). To understand their relation to each other in our Lord's time, or their connection with His life and teaching, we must look back to what is known of the five pairs of teachers who represented the scribal succession. (2.) The two names that stand first in order are Joses ben-Joezer, a priest, and Joses ben-Jochanan (about B. C. 140-130). The precepts ascribed to them indicate a tendency to a greater elaboration of all rules connected with ceremonial defilement. The struggle with the Syrian kings (ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES; MACCABEES, &c.) had turned chiefly on questions of this nature, and it was the wish of the two teachers to prepare the people for any future conflict by founding a fraternity (the Habërim or Chabërim = associates) bound to the strictest observance of the Law. (ASSIDEANS.) (3.) Joshua ben-Perachiah and Nithai of Arbela were contemporary with John Hyrcanus (about B. C. 135-108), and enjoyed his favor till toward the close of his reign, when caprice or interest led him to pass over to the Sadducees. (4.) The secession of Hyrcanus involved the Pharisees, and therefore the Scribes as a class, in difficulties, and a period of confusion followed. The meetings of the Sanhedrim were suspended or became predominantly Sadducean. Under his successor, Alexander Jannæus, the influence of Simon ben-Shetach over the queen-mother Salome reëstablished for a time the ascendancy of the Scribes. The Sanhedrim once again assembled, with none to oppose the dominant Pharisaic party. The return of Alexander from his campaign against Gaza again turned the tables. Eight hundred Pharisees took refuge in a fortress, were besieged, taken, and put to death. Joshua ben-Perachiah, the venerable head of the order, was driven into exile. Simon ben-Shetach, his successor, had to earn his livelihood by spinning flax. The Sadducees failed, however, to win the confidence of the people. On the death of Jannæus his widow Alexandra favored the Scribes, and Simon ben-Shetach and Judah ben-Tabbai entered on their work as joint teachers. Under them the juristic side of the Scribe's functions became prominent. Their rules turn chiefly on the laws of evidence. They showed what sacrifices they were prepared to make in support of those laws. Judah, rebuked by his colleague for having unlawfully condemned a false witness to death, resolved never to give judgment without consulting Simon, and threw himself daily on the grave of the condemned man, imploring pardon. Simon, having sentenced his own son to death, allowed the execution to go on, the son also urging it, after the witnesses confessed that they had spoken falsely. (5.) The two that followed, Shemaiah and Abtalion, were proselytes themselves, or the sons of proselytes; but their preëminence in the knowledge of the Law raised them to this office. The high-priest was jealous of them. Shemaiah checked the growing love of titles of honor (RABBI, &c.). Abtalion rebuked the tendency to new opinions. The two attempted to check the rising power of Herod in his bold defiance of the Sanhedrim. When he showed himself to be irresistible, they had the wisdom to submit, and were suffered to continue their work in peace. Its glory was, however, in great measure, gone. The doors of their school were no longer thrown open to all comers so that crowds might listen to the teacher. A fixed fee had to be paid on entrance. On the death of Shemaiah and Abtalion there were no qualified successors to take their place. Two sons of Bethera, otherwise unknown, for a time occupied it, but were themselves conscious of their incompetence. (6.) Hillel (born about B. C. 112<sup>1</sup>), "the son of David," was the noblest and most genial representative of his order, the best fruit which the system of the Scribes was capable of producing. It is instructive to mark at once how far he prepared the way for the higher teaching which was to follow, how far he inevitably fell short of it. He came from Golah in Babylonia to study under Shemaiah and Abtalion. He worked to earn his livelihood and pay the fees for attendance; but one day, unable to find employment and pay the fee, he eagerly listened at a window outside till the snow lay on him six cubits high (!), and the teachers then received him as a student without payment. In the earlier days of his activity Hillel had as his colleague Menahem, probably = the Essene Manaen of Josephus. He, however, and a large number of his followers, entered the service of Herod, and abandoned at once their calling as Scribes and their habits of devotion. The place thus vacant was soon filled by Shammai. The two were held in nearly equal honor. One was the president, the other the vice-president, of the Sanhedrim. They did not teach, however, as their predecessors had done, in entire harmony with each other. Within the party of the Pharisees, within the order of the Scribes, there came for the first time to be two schools with distinctly opposed tendencies, one (that of Shammai) vehemently, rigidly orthodox, the other orthodox also, but with an orthodoxy which, in the language of modern politics, might be classed as liberal conservative. The points on which they differed were almost innumerable, e. g. as to the causes and degrees of uncleanness, as to the law of contracts or of wills, &c. The school of Shammai were most scrupulous in regard to uncleanness, rigidly sabbatarian, and strict in maintaining the marriage-law. (DIVORCE; SABBATH; UNCLEAN MEATS, &c.) Yet Shammai himself was said to be rich, luxurious, self-indulgent. Hillel was poor to the day of his death. (7.) The teaching of Hillel showed some capacity for wider thoughts. His personal character was more lovable and attractive. While on the one side he taught as from a mind well stored with the traditions of the elders, he was, on the other, any thing but a slavish follower of those traditions. He was the first to lay down principles for an equitable construction of the Law with a dialectic precision which seems almost to imply a Greek culture. His teaching as to the year of release, divorce, &c., was an adaptation to the times or the temper of the age. In one memorable rule we find the nearest approach yet made to the great commandment of the Gospel: "Do nothing to thy neighbor that thou wouldest not that he should do unto thee." (8.) The contrast showed itself in the conduct of the followers not less than in the teachers. The disciples of Shammai were fierce, appealed to popular passions, and used the sword to decide their controversies. Out of that school grew the party of the Zealots, fierce, fanatical, vindictive. Those of Hillel were like their master (compare, e. g., the advice of Gamaliel, Acts v. 34-42), cautious, gentle, tolerant, unwilling to make enemies, content to let things take their course. One sought to impose upon the PROSELYTE from heathenism the full burden of the Law, the other to treat him with some sympathy and indulgence. (9.) Outwardly the teaching of our Lord must have appeared to men different in many ways from both (Mat. vii. 29, ix. 36, &c.). But in most of the points at issue between the two parties, He must have appeared in direct antagonism to the school of Shammai, in sympathy with that of Hillel (vii. 12, xii. 1-14, xv. 1-11; Jn. v. 1-16, &c.). So far, on the other hand, as the temper of the Hillel school was one of mere adaptation to the feeling of the people, cleaving to tradition, wanting in the intuition of a higher life, the teaching of Christ must have been felt as unsparingly condemning it. (10.) Hillel himself lived, according to the tradition of the Rabbis, to the great age of 120 (see note <sup>1</sup>), and may therefore have been present among the doctors of Lk. ii. 46, and Gamaliel, his grandson and successor, was at the head of this school during the whole of the ministry of Christ, as well as in the early portion of the history of the Acts. We are thus able to explain the fact, which so many passages in the Gospels lead us to infer, the existence all along of a party among the Scribes themselves, more or less disposed to recognize Jesus of Nazareth as a teacher (Mk. x. 17, xii. 34; Lk. xxiii. 50, 51; Jn. iii. 1, vii. 51, xii. 42).—IV. Education and Life. (1.) The special training for a Scribe's office began, probably, about the age of thirteen. According to the Mishna the child began to read the Mikrá (= SCRIPTURE) at five, and the Mishna at ten. Three years later every Israelite became a child of the Law, and was bound to study and obey it. The great mass of men rested in the scanty teaching of their synagogues, in knowing and repeating their Tephillin, the texts inscribed on their phylacteries. (FRONTLERS.) For the boy who was destined by his parents, or who devoted himself to the calling of a Scribe, something more was required. He made his way to Jerusalem, and applied for admission to the school of some famous Rabbi. If he were poor, it was the duty of the synagogue of his town or village to provide for the payment of his fees, and in part also for his maintenance. The master and his scholars met, the former sitting on a high chair, the elder pupils on a lower bench, the younger on the ground, both literally "at his feet." The class-room might be the chamber of the Temple set apart for this purpose, or the private school of the Rabbi. The education was chiefly catechetical, the pupil submitting cases and asking questions, the teacher examining the pupil (Lk. ii.). Parables entered largely into the method of instruction. (EDUCATION; PARABLE.) (2.) After a sufficient period of training, probably at the age of thirty, the probationer was solemnly admitted to his office. The presiding Rabbi pronounced the formula, "I admit thee, and thou art admitted to the Chair of the Scribe," solemnly ordained him by the imposition of hands, and gave to him, as the symbol of his work, tablets on which he was to note down the sayings of the wise, and the "key of knowledge" (compare Lk. xi. 52), with which he was to open or to shut the treasures of Divine wisdom. (3.) There still remained for the disciple after his admission the choice of a variety of functions, the chances of failure and success. He might rise to high places, become a doctor of the Law, an arbitrator in family litigations (xii. 14), the head of a school, a member of the Sanhedrim. He might have to content himself with the humbler work of a transcriber, copying the Law and the Prophets for the synagogues, or Tephillin for the devout, or a notary writing out contracts of sale, covenants of espousals, bills of repudiation. The position of the more fortunate was of course attractive enough. Theoretically the Scribe's office was not to be a source of wealth. It is doubtful how far the teacher appropriated the pupil's fees. The indirect payments were, however, considerable. (4.) In regard to social position there was a like contradiction between theory and practice. The older Scribes had had no titles (RABBI); Shemaiah warned his disciples against them. In our Lord's time the passion for distinction was insatiable. Drawing to themselves, as they did, nearly all the energy and thought of Judaism, the priesthood was powerless to compete with them. Unless the Priest became a Scribe also, he remained in obscurity. (5.) The character of the order was marked under these influences by a deep, incurable hypocrisy, all the more perilous because, in most cases, it was unconscious. We must not infer from this that all were alike tainted, or that the work which they had done, and the worth of their office, were not recognized by Him who rebuked them for their evil. WRITING.

Scrip (Heb. yalkút, tsiklon; Gr. pétra), a BAG or sack in which shepherds, travellers, &c., carried their food or other necessities (1 K. xvii. 40; 2 K. iv. 42 margin; Mat. x. 10; Mk. vi. 8; Lk. ix. 3, x. 4, xxii. 35, 36). The scrip of the Galilean peasants was of leather, used especially to carry their food on a journey, and slung over their shoulders. A similar article is still used by the Syrian shepherds.

Scripture (fr. L. scriptura = a writing; = Heb. celháb; Gr. graphé; see below), a distinctive name applied, individually and collectively, to the books included in the BIBLE. (See CANON, INSPIRATION, and the articles on the various books of the OLD TESTAMENT and NEW TESTAMENT.) In the earlier books we read of the LAW, the Book of the Law. In Ex. xxxii. 16, the Commandments written on the tables of testimony are said to be "the writing

(Heb. michtab) of God." In Dan. x. 21, where the A. V. has "the Scripture of Truth," the words do not probably mean more than a true writing (so Prof. Plumptre, &c.; Gesenius, Stuart, &c., translate this the book of truth, i. e. the book of God's decrees, the book which contains what is or will be true or accordant with facts). The thought of the Scripture as a whole is hardly to be found in them. This first appears in 2 Chr. xxx. 5, 18 ("as it was written," A. V.; cac-ethub, Heb.; kata ten graphen, LXX.), and is probably connected with the profound reverence for the Sacred Books which led the earlier Scribes to confine their own teaching to oral tradition, and gave therefore to the Writing a distinctive preëminence (compare "it is written," Mat. iv. 4, 6, xxi. 13, &c.). The Greek word, as will be seen, kept its ground in this sense. A slight change passed over that of the Hebrew and led to the substitution of another. The word celhabin (= writings) was used, in the Jewish arrangement of the O. T., for a part and not the whole of the O. T. (the Hagiographa; Bibl., III. 3). In the Mishna we find the Mikrá (Neh. viii. 8, A. V. "reading," i. e. the thing read or recited, recitation) used to designate the collective Sacred Books.—In the N. T. the Gr. graphé, A. V. "Scripture," is in the singular applied often to this or that passage (i. e. Scripture declaration, promise, prophecy, &c.) quoted from the O. T. (Mk. xii. 10; Lk. iv. 21; Jn. xiii. 18, xix. 37; Rom. ix. 17; Gal. iii. 8, &c.). In Acts viii. 32, it takes a somewhat larger extension, as denoting the writing of Isaiah; but in ver. 35 the more limited meaning reappears. (On 2 Tim. iii. 16 and 2 Pet. i. 20, see INSPIRATION, I. 2, and III. 1). In the Gr. pl. graphai, A. V. "scriptures," the collective meaning is prominent (Mat. xxi. 42, xxii. 29; Jn. v. 39; Acts xvii. 11; 1 Cor. xv. 3, &c.). We have "all the Scriptures" (Lk. xxiv. 27), "the holy Scriptures" (Rom. i. 2), "the Scriptures of the prophets" (xvi. 26). In 2 Pet. iii. 16 we find an extension of the term to the Epistles of St. Paul; but it remains uncertain whether "the other Scriptures" are the Scriptures of the O. T. exclusively, or include other writings of the N. T. In 2 Tim. iii. 15 the Gr. ta hiera grammata (= the sacred writings; compare "writings" of Moses, Jn. v. 47) answers to "The Holy Scriptures" of the A. V.

* Scroll [o as in note] = a MS. roll. The A. V. thus correctly translates in Is. xxxiv. 4 the Heb. sepher, and in Rev. vi. 14 the Gr. biblion (each usually translated "book"). NEW TESTAMENT; OLD TESTAMENT; WRITING.

* Scarvy. MEDICINE.

* Seythe (Jer. l. 16 marg.). AGRICULTURE; SICKLE. Seyth-l-an [sith-] (fr. Gr. Skuthés) occurs in Col. iii. 11 as a generalized term for rude, ignorant, degraded. The same view of Scythian barbarism appears in 2 Mc. iv. 47, and 3 Mc. vii. 5. The Scythians dwelt mostly on the north of the Black Sea and the Caspian, stretching thence indefinitely into inner Asia, and were regarded by the ancients as standing extremely low in point of intelligence and civilization. MAGOG; SCYTHOPOLIS.

Seythop'olis (L. fr. Gr. = the city of the Scythians) = BETH-SHEAN, now Beisan (Jd. iii. 10; 2 Mc. xii. 29). A mound close to it on the W. is called Tell Shuk, in which possibly a trace of Scythopolis may linger. The LXX. and Pliny attribute the origin of the name Scythopolis to the Scythians, who, in the words of the Byzantine historian George Syncellus, "overran Palestine, and took possession of Baisan, which from them is called Scythopolis."

This has been in modern times generally referred to the invasion recorded by Herodotus (i. 104-6), when the Scythians (MAGOG; SCYTHIAN), after their occupation of Media, passed through Palestine on their road to Egypt (about B. C. 600). Reland, however (who doubted the truth of Herodotus's account), and, after him, Gesenius and Grimm, make Scythopolis a corruption of Succothopolis, i. e. the chief town of the district of Succoth; but this would be naming the most important place in the region after one comparatively unknown; and besides, this derivation, if true, would rather have made the Gr. name Skénopolis, L. Scenopolis. Dr. Robinson thinks that Scythopolis may have been named after the Scythians, not literally, but as = rude people, barbarians (SCYTHIAN), in which sense the term might well be applied to the wild Arabs, who then, as now, inhabited the ghôr, and at times may have had possession of Beth-shean. Scythopolis was the largest city of the DECAPOLIS, and the only one of the ten which lay W. of Jordan. It was surrounded by a district of its own of the most abundant fertility. About A. D. 65 the heathen inhabitants massacred (so Josephus) 13,000 Jews. It became the seat of a Christian bishop, and its name is found in the lists of signatures as late as the Council of Constantinople, A. D. 536. It was plundered by Saladin and burnt A. D. 1183. The latest mention of it under the title of Scythopolis is probably that of William of Tyre, about A. D. 1185. The population of Beisan is about 500 (Rbn. iii. 332).

* Seyth-o-pol'i-tans [sith-] = inhabitants of SCYTHOPOLIS (2 Mc. xii. 30).

Sea. The Sea (Heb. yám, pl. yammim) is used in Scripture to denote—1. The collection of waters encompassing the land, or what we call, in a more or less definite sense, "the Ocean" (Gen. i. 10; Deut. xxx. 13, &c.). 2. Some portion of this, as the Mediterranean Sea (Deut. xi. 24; SEA, THE GREAT), or the RED SEA (Ex. xv. 4, &c.). 3. Inland lakes, whether of salt or fresh water. (GENNESARET, SEA OF; SEA, THE SALT, &c.). 4. Any great collection of water, as the NILE (Is. xviii. 2; Nah. iii. 8, &c.), or the EUPHRATES (Jer. li. 36).—The common Gr. word for "sea" in the N. T. is thalassa (in LXX. = Heb. yám), which occurs more than ninety times; the Gr. pelagos, especially denoting the high or open sea, being translated once "sea" (Acts xvii. 5), and once with thalassa following "the depth of the sea" (Mat. xviii. 6). The qualities or characteristics of the sea and sea-coast mentioned in Scripture are, 1. The SAND, whose abundance on the coast both of Palestine and Egypt furnishes so many illustrations (Gen. xxii. 17, xli. 49; Judg. vii. 12; 1 Sam. xiii. 5; 1 K. iv. 20, 29; Is. x. 22, &c.). 2. The shore (Gen. xxii. 17; Ex. xiv. 30, &c.). 3. Creeks or inlets (Acts xvii. 39). 4. Harbors (Gen. xlix. 13; Ps. cvii. 30; BRACHES, &c.). 5. Waves or billows (Ps. xlii. 7, lxxv. 7, &c.). It may be remarked that almost all the figures of speech taken from the sea in Scripture, refer either to its power or its danger. The place "where two seas met" (Acts xvii. 41; MELITA) perhaps means where two currents, caused by the intervention of the island, met and produced an eddy, which made it desirable at once to ground the ship. EARTH.

Sea, Melt'en [o pronounced as in no], i. e. melted sea, or one made of melted metal. In the place of the LAYER of the Tabernacle, Solomon caused a laver to be cast for a similar purpose, which from its size was called a sea. It was made partly or wholly of the BRASS, or rather copper, which had been captured by David from "Tibhath and Chun, cities of Hadarezer king of Zobah" (1 K. vii. 23-26; 1 Chr. xviii. 8). Its dimensions were:—Height, 5 cubits; diameter, 10 cubits; circumference, 30 cubits; thickness, 1 handbreadth; and it is said to have been capable of containing 2,000, or according to 2 Chr. iv. 5, 3,000 baths. Below the brim there was a double row of "knops," 10 (i. e. 5 + 5) in each cubit. These were probably a running border or double fillet of tendrils, and fruits, said to be gourds of an oval shape. The brim itself, or lip, was wrought "like the brim of a cup, with flowers of lilies," i. e. curved outward like a lily or lotus flower. The laver stood on twelve oxen, three toward each quarter of the heavens, and all looking outward. It was mutilated by Ahaz, by being removed from its basis of oxen and placed on a stone base, and was finally broken up by the Assyrians (2 K. xvi. 14, 17, xxv. 13). Josephus says that the form of the sea was hemispherical, and that it held 3,000 baths, i. e. 25,920 gallons. (WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.) The question arises, which occurred to the Jewish writers themselves, how the contents of the laver, as they are given in the sacred text, are to be reconciled with its dimensions. The Jewish writers supposed that it had a square hollow base for 3 cubits of its height, and 2 cubits of the circular form above. A far more probable suggestion is that of Thenius, in which Keil agrees, that it was of a bulging form below, but contracted at the mouth to the dimensions named in 1 K. vii. 23. The laver is said to have been supplied in earlier days by the Gibeonites, afterward by a conduit from the pools at Bethlehem.

* Sea, the East. SEA, THE SALT.

* Sea, the Great = the sea now known as the Mediterranean Sea (Num. xxxiv. 6, 7; Josh. i. 4, ix. 1, xv. 12, 47, xxiii. 4; Ez. xvii. 10, 15, 19, 20; Dan. vii. 2); also called "the uttermost sea" (Deut. xi. 24), "the utmost sea" (xxxiv. 2; Joel ii. 20), "the sea of the Philistines" (Ex. xxiii. 31), "the hinder sea" (Zech. xiv. 8), or "the sea" simply (Gen. xlix. 13; Ps. lxxx. 11, cvii. 23, &c.). This sea, the largest with which the Hebrews were acquainted, washes the western coast of PALESTINE. It is 2,300 miles in length, and 1,200 in its greatest width, and averages more than half a mile in depth. It covers an area of 1,000,000 square miles. It separates Africa from Europe, and partially from Asia. It communicates with the Atlantic Ocean only by the Strait of Gibraltar, through which it receives water, as its loss from evaporation exceeds all its supply from rains and rivers. Its water is saltier than that of the Atlantic. "The shores of the Mediterranean have for thousands of years been the principal seats of civilization. The most important periods of the history of mankind have been determined by the rule of different nations over the countries bordering on this vast inland ocean. The Egyptians, the Phenicians, the Hebrews, the Greeks, Romans, Carthaginians, and Saracens flourished there under distinct forms of society" (New American Cyclopædia, article "Mediterranean Sea"). For the biblical relations of the Mediterranean, see ACCO; ALEXANDRIA; COMMERCE; EGYPT; GREECE; ITALY; JONAH; JOPPA; LIBYA; MELITA; PAUL; SEA; SHIP, &c.

Sea, the Salt <sup>1</sup> (Heb. yām hammelah or -lach; see SEA and SALT), the usual, and perhaps the most ancient name for the remarkable lake, which to the Western world is now generally known as the Dead Sea.—I. Names. 1. This name, "the Salt Sea," is found in Gen. xiv. 3; Num. xxxiv. 3, 12; Deut. iii. 17; Josh. iii. 16, xii. 3, xv. 2, 5, xviii. 19. 2. Another, and possibly a later name, is the "sea of the plain" (ARABAH; PLAIN), which is found in Deut. iv. 49, and 2 K. xiv. 25; and combined with the former—"the sea of the plain, (even) the salt sea"—in Deut. iii. 17 and Josh. iii. 16, xii. 3. 3. In the prophets (Ez. xlvii. 18; Joel ii. 20; Zech. xiv. 8 [A. V. "the former sea"]]) it is entitled "the East sea." 4. In Ez. xlvii. 8, it is styled "the sea" and distinguished from "the great sea"—the Mediterranean (ver. 10). (SEA, THE GREAT.) 5. In 2 Esd. v. 7 it is called "the SODOMITISH SEA." Josephus once calls it "the lake of Sodom." 6. In the Talmudical books it is called both the "Sea of Salt," and "Sea of Sodom." 7. Josephus, and before him Diodorus Siculus, names it, from its asphalt or bitumen (SLIME), "Lake Asphaltitis," or "Lake Asphaltites" = the Asphaltic Lake. 8. The name "Dead Sea" appears to have been first used in Greek by Pausanias and Galen, and in Latin (Mare Mortuum) by Justin, or rather by the older historian, Trogius Pompeius (about a. c. 10), whose work he epitomized. It is used by Eusebius, Jerome, &c. 9. The Arabic name is Bahr Lūt = the Sea of Lot.—II. Description. 1. The so-called DEAD SEA is the final receptacle of the river JORDAN, the lowest and the largest of the three lakes which interrupt the rush of its downward course. It is the deepest portion of that very deep natural fissure which runs like a furrow from the Gulf of 'Akabah to the range of Lebanon, and from the range of Lebanon to the extreme N. of Syria. 2. The lake is of an oblong form, of tolerably regular contour, interrupted only by a large and long peninsula which projects from the eastern shore, near its southern end, and virtually divides the expanse of the water into two portions, connected by a long, narrow, and somewhat devious passage. It lies between 31° 6' 20" and 31° 46' N. latitude nearly; and between 35° 24' and 35° 37' E. longitude nearly. It is thus from N. to S. about 40 geographical, or 46 English miles long. Its greatest width (some 3 miles S. of 'Ain Jidy) is about 9 geographical miles, or 10½ English miles. The ordinary area of the upper portion is about 174 square geographical miles; of the channel, 29; and of the lower portion or "the lagoon," 46; in all about 250 square geographical miles. At its northern end the lake receives the stream of the Jordan; on its eastern side the Zerka Ma'in (the ancient Callirrhoe [LASHA?], and possibly the more ancient EN-EGLAIM), the Mojib (ARNON), and the Beni-Hemad (on the map just N. of the Wady ed-Dera'ah, or 20); on the S. the Kurâhy or el-Ahay (in the Ghôr es-Sâfieh), and the Tufileh; and on the W. that of 'Ain Jidy. These are probably all perennial, though variable, streams; but, in addition, the beds of the torrents which lead through the mountains E. and W., and over the flat shelving plains both N. and S. of the lake, show that in the winter a very large quantity of water must be poured into it. There are also all along the western side a considerable number of springs—some fresh, some salt, some warm and fetid—which appear to run continually, and all find their way into its waters. The lake has no outlet. 3. The depression of its surface, and the depth which it attains below that surface, combined with the absence of any outlet, render it one of the most remarkable spots on the globe. According to the observations of Lieutenant Lynch, the surface of the lake in May, 1848, was 1,316.7 feet below the level of the Mediterranean at Jaffa; according to the observations of the French Expedition of Duc de Luynes in 1864, the surface was 1,286 feet below the Mediterranean. The upper portion, according to Lieutenant Lynch, is a perfect basin, descending rapidly till it attains, at about one-third of its length from the N. end, a depth of 1,808 feet. Immediately W. of the upper extremity of the peninsula, however, this depth decreases suddenly to 386 feet, then to 114, and by the time the west point of the peninsula is reached, to 18 feet. Below this the southern portion is a mere lagoon of almost even bottom, varying in depth from 12 feet in the middle to 3 at the edges. 4. The level of the lake is liable to variation according to the season of the year. Since it has no outlet, if more water is supplied from the clouds and streams than the evaporation can carry off, as in winter, the lake will rise until the evaporating surface is so much increased as to restore the balance. On the other hand, should the evaporation drive off a larger quantity than the supply, as in summer, the lake will descend until the surface becomes so small as again to restore the balance. The extreme differences in level resulting from these causes have not yet been carefully observed. 5. The change in level necessarily causes a change in the dimensions of the lake. This chiefly affects the southern end. The shore of that part slopes up from the water with an extremely gradual incline. Over so flat a beach a very slight rise in the lake would send the water a considerable distance. Dr. Anderson, the geologist of the American expedition, conjectured that the water occasionally extended as much as eight or ten miles S. of its position then. On the peninsula, the acclivity of which is much greater than that of the southern shores of the lagoon, and in the early part of the summer (June 2d), Irby and Mangles found the "high-water mark a mile distant from the water's edge." At the northern end the shore being steeper, the water-line probably remains tolerably constant. The variation in breadth will not be so much. 6. The mountains which form the walls of the great fissure in whose depths the lake is contained, continue a nearly parallel course through its entire length. Viewed from the beach at the northern end of the lake, there is little perceptible difference between the two ranges. Each is equally bare and stern to the eye. On the left the eastern mountains stretch their long, hazy, horizontal line, till they are lost in the dim distance. The western mountains on the other hand do not appear so continuous, since the Râs el-Feshkhah projects so far as to conceal the southern portion of the range when viewed from most points. 7. Of the eastern side but little is known. One traveller in modern times (Seetzen in 1807) has succeeded in forcing his way along its whole length. Both Dr. Robinson from 'Ain Jidy, and Lieut. Molyneux from the surface of the lake, record their impression that the eastern mountains are much more lofty than the western, and much more broken by clefts and ravines. In color they are brown or red—a great contrast to the gray and white tones of the western mountains. Both sides of the lake, however, are alike in the absence of vegetation—almost entirely barren and scorched, except where a spring or perennial stream nourishes reeds, thorn-bushes, stunted palms, acacias, &c. 8. Seetzen started in January, 1807, from the ford of the Jordan through the upper country, by Jebel At-târûs and the ravine of the Wady Môjib to the peninsula; returning immediately after by the lower level, as near the lake as it was possible to go. He was on foot, with but a single guide. He represents the general structure of the mountains as limestone, capped in many places by basalt, and having at its foot a red ferruginous sandstone, which forms the immediate margin of the lake. The rocks lie in a succession of enormous terraces, apparently more vertical in form than those on the W. The streams of the Môjib and Zerka Ma'in issue forth from portals of dark-red sandstone of romantic beauty, the overhanging sides of which no ray of sun ever enters. Palms are numerous; but except near the streams there is no vegetation. Lynch found volcanic formations on the eastern shore, a whole mountain S.

of Wady Zerka Ma'in appearing "one black mass of scorïæ and lava" (Expedition to Dead Sea, 280, 369). Between Wady Zerka Ma'in and the Jordan volcanic eruptions have produced immense flows of basaltic rock. Among other smaller basaltic streams, three were found on the E. border of the Dead Sea, S. of the little plain of Zara (Report by M. Lartet, geologist in Duc de Luynes's French expedition in 1864, noticed in Journal of Sacred Literature, July, 1865). 9 One remarkable feature of the northern portion of the eastern heights is a plateau which divides the mountains half-way up, apparently forming a gigantic landing-place in the slope, and stretching northward from the Wady Zerka Ma'in. 10. The western shores of the lake have been more investigated than the eastern, although they cannot be said to have been yet more than very partially explored. Some travellers have passed over their entire length: as De Sauley in January, 1851; Poole in November, 1855; Tristram in January, 1864, &c. Others have passed over considerable portions of it, as Dr. Robinson in 1838, Messrs. Wolcott and Tipping in 1842, Lieut. Lynch in 1848, Lieut. Van de Velde in 1852, Mr. Holman Hunt in 1854, &c. 11. The western range preserves for the greater part of its length a course hardly less regular than the eastern. The Râs el-Feshkhah is one of the few spurs from the range—a bold headland at the mouth of the Kidron, which interrupts the view from the N. The coast-line is low, with indentations and irregularities, from Râs el-Feshkhah to Râs Mersad (Trm. 253, 255). 12. The accompanying woodcut represents the view looking southward from the spring of 'Ain Jidy, a point about 700 feet above the water. It is taken from a drawing by Mr. Tipping, and gives a good idea of the course of that portion of the western heights, and of their ordinary character. 13. The portion actually represented in this view is described by Dr. Anderson as "varying from 1,200 to 1,500 feet in height, bold and steep, admitting nowhere of the ascent or descent of beasts of burden, and practicable only here and there to the most intrepid climber." 14. Further south the mountain-sides assume a more abrupt and savage aspect, and in the Wady Zuweirah, and still more at Sebbeh—the ancient Masada—reach a pitch of rugged and repulsive, though at the same time impressive, desolation, which perhaps cannot be exceeded anywhere on the face of the earth. Beyond Udum the mountains continue their general line, but the district at their feet is occupied by a mass of lower eminences, which, advancing inward, gradually encroach on the plain at the S. end of the lake, and finally shut it in completely (see § 22; AKRABIM.) 15. The region on the top of the western heights was probably at one time a wide table-land, rising gradually toward the high lands which form the central line of the country. It is now cut up by deep and difficult ravines, separated by steep and inaccessible summits; but portions of the table-

lands still remain in many places to testify to the original conformation. The material is a soft white cretaceous limestone, containing a good deal of sulphur. The surface is entirely desert, with no sign of cultivation. 16. Between 'Ain Jidy' and 'Ain Terdeh' the summit is a table-land 740 feet above the lake. Further N., above 'Ain Terdeh', the summit of the pass is 1,305.75 feet above the lake, the height of the plain between the Wady en-Nur (Kidron) and Gumran is given by Mr. Poole at 1,340 feet. This appears also to be about the height of the rock of Sebbeh, and of the table-land on the eastern mountains N. of Wady Zerka Ma'in, and coincides nearly with the ocean level. 17. A beach of varying width skirts the foot of the mountains on the western side. Above 'Ain Jidy' it consists mainly of the deltas of the torrents—fan-shaped banks of dibris of all sizes, at a steep slope, spreading from the outlet of the torrent. In one or two places—as at the mouth of the Kidron and at 'Ain Terdeh'—the beach may be 1,000 or 1,400 yards wide, but usually it is much narrower, and often is reduced to almost nothing by the advance of the headlands. For its major part it is impassable. Below 'Ain Jidy', however, a marked change occurs in the character of the beach. Alternating with the shingle, solid deposits of a new material, soft friable chalk, marl, and gypsum, with salt, begin to make their appearance. The width of the beach thus formed is considerably greater than that above 'Ain Jidy'. From the Birket el-Khuil (a shallow depression on the shore, which forms a natural salt-pan) to the wady S. of Sebbeh, a distance of six miles, it is from one to two miles wide, and is passable for the whole distance. One feature of the beach is the line of driftwood which encircles the lake, and marks the highest, or the ordinary high, level of the water. 18. At the southwest corner of the lake, below where the wadis Zuweirah and Mahawel break down through the enclosing heights, the beach is encroached on by the salt mountain or ridge of Khashm Udum (Khashm [so Robinson] = cartilage of the nose; Udum = Sodom). This remarkable ridge, which has a breadth of from a mile to a mile and a half, and a height of from 300 to 400 feet, and extends "from its northern end for three miles N. E. and S. W., and then for three miles further due N. and S. (magnetic)," "is a solid mass of rock-salt of a greenish-white transparency, covered at the top with a loose crust of dibris of gravel, rolled flints, and gypsum, but chiefly with a chalky marl. . . . Portions of the salt-cliff are continually splitting off and falling, leaving perpendicular faces, and when this is not the case, the dibris is far too loose and steep to permit of any climbing. Wide as the hill is, there is no plateau on the top, but a front of little peaks and ridges, furrowed and scarped angularly in every direction" (Trm. 322-5). Mr. Tristram ascended one pinnacle with great difficulty. Between the north end of Khashm Udum and the lake is a mound covered with stones and bearing the name of Um Zighal (the "Sodom" of M. de Sauley). It is about sixty feet in diameter and ten or twelve high, evidently artificial, and not improbably the remains of an ancient structure. 19. It follows from the fact that the lake occupies a portion of a longitudinal depression, that its northern and southern ends are not enclosed by highland, as its east and west sides are. (ARABAH; JORDAN; PALESTINE.) 20. A small piece of land lies off the shore about half-way between the entrance of the Jordan and the western side of the lake. It is nearly circular in form. Its sides are sloping, and therefore its size varies with the height of the water. When Mr. Grove went to it in September, 1858, it was about 100 yards in diameter, 10 or 12 feet out of the water, and connected with the shore by a narrow neck or isthmus of about 100 yards in length. It is an island when the water is at its full height. 21. Beyond the island the northwestern corner of the lake is bordered by a low plain, extending up to the foot of the mountains of Neb Musa, and S. as far as Ris Feshkiah. This plain must be considerably lower than the general level of the land N. of the lake, since its appearance implies that it is often covered with water. A similar plain (the Ghór el-Belka, or Ghór Seisaban) appears to exist on the N. E. corner of the lake between the mouth of the Jordan and the slopes of the mountains of Moab. 22. The southern end is like the northern, a wide plain, the el-Ghór. It has been visited by but few travellers. The plain is bounded on the W. and S., below the Khashm Udum, by a tract thickly studded with a confused mass of unimportant eminences (AKRABBIM), "low cliffs and conical hills," of chalky indurated marl. In height they vary from 50 to 150 feet. In color they are brilliant white. All along their base are springs, the overflow from which forms a tract of marsh-land, overgrown with canes, tamarisks, thorn and other shrubs, with here and there a stunted palm (see § 14, above). 23. The waters of two-thirds of the ARABAH drain northward into the plain at the S. of the lake, and thence into the lake itself. The Wady el-Jeib—the principal channel by which this vast drainage is discharged on to the plain—is very large, "a huge channel," "not far from half a mile wide," "bearing traces of an immense volume of water, rushing along with violence, and covering the whole breadth of the valley." 24. The eastern boundary of the plain is formed by the mountains of MOAB and EDOM, which, adjacent to the lake, consist of sandstone, red and yellow, with conglomerate containing porphyry and granite. 25. The plain itself consists of two very distinct sections, divided by a line running nearly N. and S. Of these the western is a region of salt and barrenness, bounded by the salt mountain of Khashm Udum. (SODOM.) Near the lake it bears the name of es-Sabkah, i. e. the plain of salt mud. "This is a large flat of at least six by ten miles from N. to S., occasionally flooded," "the whole formed of fine sandy mud" (Trm. 332-3). 26. The eastern section of the plain, divided from the Sabkah by a dense thicket of reeds, almost impenetrable, is a thick copse of shrubs similar to that around Jericho, and, like that, cleared here and there in patches where the Ghawdrinch, or Arabs of the Ghór, cultivate their wheat, durra (MILLET), barley, and indigo, and set up their wretched villages. This fertile district, abounding in trees of various kinds, and well watered, is called the Ghór es-Sifieh. Mr. Tristram makes its length from N. to S. ten or twelve miles, and its greatest width three miles. 27. The eastern mountains which form the background to this district of woodland are no less naked and rugged than those on the opposite side of the valley. They consist, according to Seetzen, Poole, and Lynch, of a red sandstone, with limestone above it—the sandstone in horizontal strata with vertical cleavage. Travellers concur in estimating them as higher than those on the W., and as preserving a more horizontal line to the S. After passing from the Ghór es-Sifieh to the N., a salt plain is encountered resembling the Sabkah, and like it overflowed by the lake when high. With this exception the mountains come down abruptly to the water on the whole eastern side of the lagoon. 28. The peninsula which projects from the eastern shore and forms the north enclosure of the lagoon appears to bear, among the Arabs, the names Ghór el-Mzara'ah and Ghór el-Lisán. 29. Its entire length from N. to S. is about ten geographical miles—and its breadth from five to six—though these dimensions are subject to some variation according to the time of year. It appears to be formed entirely of recent aqueous deposits, late or post-tertiary, very similar to, if not identical with, those which face it on the western shore, and with the "mounds" which skirt the plains at the S. and N. W. of the lake. It consists of a friable carbonate of lime intermixed with sand or sandy marls, and with frequent masses of sulphate of lime (gypsum). The whole is impregnated strongly with sulphur, and with salt. At the N. it is worn into a short ridge or mane, with very steep sides and serrated top. Toward the S. the top widens into a table-land, over which is a very scanty growth of shrubs. On the W., S., and N. E. are steep declivities to the shore. On the E. the highland descends to a depression which appears to run across the isthmus. Into this valley lead the mountain torrents from the E. (Wady ed-Dera'ah or Kerak, &c.). Here is a wretched village called Mzra'ah. 30. There seems no reason to doubt that this peninsula is the remnant of a bed of aqueous strata deposited when the water of the lake stood very much higher than it now does, but gradually being disintegrated and carried down into the depths of the lake. It may have been deposited either by the general action of the lake, or by the special action of a river, possibly in the direction of Wady Kerak. 31. The extraordinary difference between the depth of the two portions of the lake—N. and S. of the peninsula—has been already alluded to. The former is a bowl, which at one place attains the depth of more than 1,300 feet, while the average depth along its axis may be taken as not far short of 1,000. On the other hand, the southern portion is a flat plain, a very few feet only below the surface. The channel connecting the two portions gradually increases in depth from S. to N. 32. Thus the circular portion below the peninsula, and a part of the channel, form a mere lagoon. This portion, and the plain at the S. as far as the rise or offset at which the ARABAH commences, would appear to have been left by the last great change in the form of the ground at a level not far below its present one, and consequently much higher than the bottom of the lake itself. But surrounded on three sides by highlands, the waters of which have no other outlet, it has become the delta into which those waters discharge themselves. 33. The water of the lake is not less remarkable than its other features. Its most obvious peculiarity is its great weight. Its specific gravity has been found to be 12·28; i. e. a gallon of it weighs over 12½ lbs. instead of 10 lbs., the weight of distilled water. The buoyancy of its water is a common theme of remark by the travellers who have been upon it or in it. Dr. Robinson "could never swim before, either in fresh or salt water," yet here he "could sit, stand, lie, or swim without difficulty." 34. Of the weight and inertia of its water, the American expedition under Lieut. Lynch had practical experience. In the gale in which the party were caught on their first day on the lake, between the mouth of the Jordan and the 'Ain Fakhkhah, "it seemed as if the bows of the boats were encountering the sledgehammers of the Titans." When, however, "the wind abated, the sea rapidly fell; the water, from its ponderous quality, settling as soon as the agitating cause had ceased to act." At ordinary times there is nothing remarkable in the action of the surface of the lake. Its waves rise and fall, and surf beats on the shore, just like the ocean. 35. One or two phenomena of the surface may be mentioned. Many travellers mention that the turbid yellow stream of the Jordan is distinguishable for a long distance in the lake. Lines of foam on its surface are also mentioned. The haze or mist which perpetually broods over the water is the result of the prodigious evaporation. 36. The remarkable weight of this water is due to the very large quantity of mineral salts which it holds in solution. From the analysis of the United States expedition it appears that each gallon of the water, weighing 12½ lbs., contains nearly 3½ lbs. (3.319) of matter in solution—an immense quantity when we recollect that sea-water, weighing 10½ lbs. per gallon, contains less than ½ lb. Of this 3½ lbs. nearly 1 lb. is common salt (chloride of sodium); about 2 lbs. chloride of magnesium, and less than ½ lb. chloride of calcium (or muriate of lime). The most unusual ingredient is bromide of magnesium, which exists in truly extraordinary quantity. The magnesium compounds impart a nauseous and bitter flavor to the water. 37. The sources of the components of the water may be named generally without difficulty. The lime and magnesia proceed from the dolomitic limestone of the surrounding mountains; from the gypsum which exists on the shores, nearly pure, in large quantities; and from the carbonate of lime and carbonate of magnesia, found on the peninsula and elsewhere. The chloride of sodium is supplied from Khashm Uduim, and the copious brine-springs on both shores. Balls of nearly pure sulphur (probably the deposit of some sulphurous stream) are found in the neighborhood of the lake, on the peninsula, on the western beach and the northwestern heights, and on the plain S. of Jericho. Manganese, iron, and alumina have been found on the peninsula, and the other constituents are the product of the numerous mineral springs which surround the lake, and the washings of the aqueous deposits on the shores, which are gradually restoring to the lake the salts they received from it ages back when covered by its waters. The strength of these ingredients is heightened by the continual evaporation. 38. It has been long supposed that no life whatever existed in the lake. But recent facts show (so Mr. Grove) that some inferior organizations can and do find a home even in these salt and acrid waters. The Cabinet of Natural History at Paris contains a fine specimen of a coral called Stylophora pistillata, which is stated to have been brought from the lake in 1837 by the Marquis de l'Escalopier, and has every appearance of having been a resident there, and not an ancient or foreign specimen. Ehrenberg discovered microscopic animalcules, molluscs, &c., viz. 11 species of Polygaster, 2 of Polythalamia, and 5 of Phytolitharia, in mud and water brought home by Lepsius, the mud having been taken from the N. end of the lake, one hour N. W. of the Jordan. The copious phosphorescence mentioned by Lynch is also a token of the existence of life in the waters.<sup>3</sup> 39. The statements of ancient travellers and geographers, that no living creature could exist on the shores of the lake, or bird fly across its surface, are amply disproved by later travellers. The canebrakes of 'Ain Fakhkhah, and the other springs on the margin of the lake, harbor snipe, partridges, ducks, nightingales, and other birds, as well as frogs; hawks, doves, and hares are found along the shore, and the thickets of 'Ain Jidy contain "innumerable birds." Ducks and other birds swim and dive in the water. 40. Of the temperature of the water more observations are necessary before any inferences can be drawn. Lynch states that a stratum at 59° Fahrenheit is almost invariably found at ten fathoms below the surface. Between Wady Zerka and 'Ain Terâbeh the temperature at surface was 76°, gradually decreasing to 62° at 1.044 feet deep, with the exception just named. At other times, and in the lagoon, the temperature ranged from 82° to 90°, and from 5° to 10° below that of the air. 41. Nor does there appear to be any thing inimical to life in the atmosphere of the lake or its shores, except what naturally proceeds from the great heat of the climate. The Ghawârinah and Rashûideh Arabs, who inhabit the southern and western sides and the peninsula, are described as a poor stunted race; but this is easily accounted for by the heat and relaxing nature of the climate, and by their meagre way of life. 42. For the botany of the Dead Sea, see the article PALESTINE, Botany II. 43. The birds and animals mentioned by Lynch and Robinson have been already named (§ 39, above). Mr. Tristram saw at the N. end traces of the leopard, wild boar, wolf, hyena, jackals, foxes, jerboas, marmots; he obtained a hare (Lepus Sinaiticus); he mentions also numerous birds—the black stork, eagle, raven (Corvus umbrinus), king-fisher (Alcedo isipda), wheatear (Saxicola Deserti), Norfolk plover, pochard-ducks, partridges (the Greek and Her's), warblers, red-shanks, sandpipers, gulls, &c. (Trm. 242-8). Near 'Ain Fakhkhah he found a small sand-colored night-jar (Caprimulgus Tamaricis), and a coney (Hyrax Syriacus), rats, porcupine mice, gazelles, ibex, &c. (Trm. 250-8). At the S. end he found in the Sabbah such birds as the ruddy sheldrake (Canarca rutile), the common red-shank, the little stint (Tringa minuta), the ash-colored martin (Cotyle paludris), dotterels, &c.; in the Ghôr es-Sâfiel, numerous doves (Turtur risorius and Turtur Egyptius), bulbuls, or Palestine nightingales (Iros xanthopygius), hopping thrush, shrikes, sun-bird, sparrow (Passer Moabiticus), Abyssinian lark, pipits, wagtails, ravens, kites, vultures, &c. (Trm. 338, 336, 344). (PALESTINE, Zoology; PARTRIDGE, &c.) 44. The appearance of the lake does not fulfil the idea conveyed by its popular name. "The Dead Sea."

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Tristram notices the abundance of dead land-shells, and of very small dead fish, &c., found on the beach near the mouth of the Jordan, and says: "It is quite certain that no form of either vertebrate or molluscan life can exist for more than a very short time in the sea itself, and that all that enter it are almost immediately poisoned and salted down." At the southern end near Uduim, "some of our party employed themselves in searching, but without avail, for life in the Dead Sea, and especially for any traces of the coral (Stylophora pistillata), exhibited in the Museum of Paris as from hence. No person who has examined the southern portion of the lake can for one instant believe that this specimen, or any other coral, ever came from it, unless as a semi-fossil, though microscopic crustaceans may possibly be found, as they live in the salt lagoons close to the shore, but which are not so strongly impregnated with salt" (Trm. 245, 244).

says a recent traveller, "did not strike me with that sense of desolation and dreariness which I suppose it ought. I thought it a pretty, smiling lake—a nice ripple on its surface." Seetzen enthusiastically extols the beauties of the view from the delta at the mouth of the Wady Mójib, and the advantages of that situation for a permanent residence. 45. The truth lies, as usual, somewhere between these two extremes. The lake certainly is not a gloomy, deadly, smoking gulf. But, with all the brilliancy of its illumination, its frequent beauty of coloring, the fantastic grandeur of its enclosing mountains, and the tranquil charm afforded by the reflection of that unequalled sky on the no less unequalled mirror of the surface—with all these there is something in the prevalent sterility and the dry, burnt look of the shores, the overpowering heat, the occasional smell of sulphur, the dreary salt marsh at the southern end, and the fringe of dead driftwood round the margin, which must go far to excuse the title which so many ages have attached to the lake, and which we may be sure it will never lose. 46. This singular lake has a peculiar connection with the Biblical history. In the topographical records of the Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua, it forms one among the landmarks of the boundaries of the whole country as well as of the inferior divisions of Judah and Benjamin (see above, I., 1, 2). It is also named as a landmark in the account of the restoration of the coast of Israel under Jeroboam II. (2 K. xiv. 25; comp. Num. xxxiv. 8–12). The name also occurs in the imagery of the prophets (see above, I., 3, 4). The N. T. does not contain the name. "The Salt Sea" is also mentioned as having been in the time of Abraham the Vale of Siddim (Gen. xiv. 3; SIDDIM, THE VALE OF). 47. Mr. Grove claims that the evidence of the spot is sufficient to show that no material change has taken place in the upper and deeper portion of the lake for a period very long anterior to the time of Abraham, and that in the lower portion—the lagoon and the plain below it—if any change has occurred, it appears to have been rather one of reclamation than of submersion—the gradual silting up of the district by the torrents which discharge their contents into it. Mr. Grove proposes, as a possible explanation of the clause "which is the Salt Sea" in Gen. xiv. 3, the hypothesis that some temporary fluctuation in the level of the lake may have laid under water the district S. of the lagoon, and thus made the Vale of Siddim (assumed to have been that plain) for the time, perhaps for some years, a part of "the Salt Sea;" but thinks it more natural to consider this clause (which in his view is a note long afterward added to the text; see PENTATEUCH) as representing that the present lake covered a district which in historic times had been permanently habitable dry land. Mr. Grove maintains, however, that the Vale of Siddim "was somewhere N. of the lake, perhaps on the plain at its N. W. corner (SIDDIM, THE VALE OF), and that the cities of Sodom, Gomorrah, &c., were also situated to the N. of the lake. "It has usually been assumed," says Dr. Robinson, "that this lake has existed only since the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah; . . . but . . . every circumstance goes to show that a lake must have existed in this place, into which the Jordan poured its waters, long before the catastrophe of Sodom. The great depression of the whole broad Jordan valley and of the northern part of the ARABIA, the direction of its lateral valleys, as well as the slope of the high western desert toward the N., all go to show that the configuration of this region, in its main features, is coeval with the present condition of the surface of the earth in general; and not the effect of any local catastrophe at a subsequent period. It seems also to be a necessary conclusion, that the Dead Sea anciently covered a less extent of surface than at present" (Rbn. ii. 188). Dr. Robinson maintains what has been—at least, until very recently—the almost universal opinion, that the cities of the plain and the Vale of Siddim were at the S. end of the Dead Sea, and "that the fertile plain is now in part occupied by the southern bay, or that portion of the sea lying S. of the peninsula" (ii. 189). 48. The destruction of Sodom, Gomorrah, &c., is recorded in Gen. xix. 24 ff. as having occurred in the time of ABRAHAM. (CHRONOLOGY.) The catastrophe which destroyed them is described as a shower of ignited sulphur descending from the skies. Mr. Tristram, who, with Mr. Grove and others, places the cities of the plain at the N. end of the Dead Sea, and maintains that they were not submerged, found in the Wady el-Mahawrat, which leads down to the Dead Sea at the N. end of Khashm Urdum, traces of volcanic action, of which he says, "The whole appearance points to a shower of hot sulphur and an irruption of bitumen upon it, which would naturally be calcined and impregnated by its fumes; and this at a geological period quite subsequent to all the diluvial and alluvial action of which we have such abundant evidence. The vestiges remain exactly as the last relics of a snow-drift remain in spring—an atmospheric deposit" (Trm. 356–7). (See above, § 8.) Dr. Robinson, holding that the cities and the Vale of Siddim were at the S. part of the present sea (see § 47), explains Gen. xix. 24 ff. by supposing that in a tempest of thunder and lightning, the accompaniments perhaps of an earthquake or of some volcanic action, or of both, these masses of bitumen (which were in the Vale of Siddim, probably a depression in the plain adjacent to the Salt Sea, and at least near to Sodom and Gomorrah [xiv. 2, 3, 10]) were ignited by the lightning, and a conflagration produced which not only destroyed the cities, but also consumed and scooped out the surface of the plain itself; so that the waters of the lake, rushing in, spread themselves out over the once fertile tract (Rbn. Phys. Geog. 234–5). Mr. Grove also admits that the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah may have been by volcanic action, but thinks it can have had no connection with that far more ancient event which opened the great valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, and at some subsequent time cut it off from communication with the Red Sea, by forcing up between them the tract of the Wady Arabah.

Seal (Heb. hōthām or chōthām; Gr. sphragis). The importance attached to seals in the East is so great that without one no document is regarded as authentic. The use of some method of sealing is obviously, therefore, of remote antiquity. Among such methods used in Egypt at a very early period were engraved stones, pierced lengthwise, and hung by a string or chain from the arm or neck, or set in rings for the finger. The most ancient form used for this purpose was the scarabæus (the beetle), formed of precious or common stone, or even of blue pottery or porcelain, on the flat side of which the inscription or device was engraved. Cylinders of stone or pottery bearing devices were also used as signets. But in many cases the seal consisted of a lump of CLAY, impressed with the seal and attached to the document, whether of papyrus or other material, by strings. The use of clay in sealing is noticed in Job xxxviii. 14, and the signet-ring as an ordinary part of a man's equipment in the case of Judah (Gen. xxxviii. 18), who probably, like many modern Arabs, wore it suspended by a string from his neck or arm (Cant. viii. 6). The RING or the seal as an emblem of authority in Egypt, Persia, &c., is mentioned in the cases of Pharaoh with Joseph

Engraved signets were in use among the Hebrews in early times, as is evident in the description of the high-priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 11, 36, xxxix. 6), and the work of the ENGRAVER as a distinct occupation is mentioned in Ecclesi. xxxviii. 27. Se'ba (Heb. drinker or drunkard? R. S. Poole; fr. Ethiopic = a man? Ges.; pl. Sebdim: A. V. incorrectly rendered "Sabaeans") heads the list of the sons of CUSH. NIMROD, mentioned at the close of the list, ruled at first in Babylonia, and apparently afterward in Assyria: of the names between Seba and Nimrod, probably some belong to Arabia. We thus may conjecture (so Mr. R. S. Poole) a curue of Cushite settlements, one extremity of which is to be placed in Babylonia, the other, if prolonged far enough in accordance with the mention of the African Cush, in ETHIOPIA (see below). Besides the mention of Seba in the list of the sons of Cush (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chr. i. 9), there are but three, or, as some hold, four notices of the nation (Ps. lxxii. 10; Is. xliii. 3, xlv. 14 [A. V. "Sabaeans, men of stature"]). The doubtful notice is in Ez. xxiii. 42, in a difficult passage: "and with men of the multitude of Adam (so Mr. Poole; A. V. 'men of the common sort,' margin 'multitude of men') were brought drunkards (A. V. margin; but the A. V. text has 'Sabaeans,' and the Keri reads 'people of Seba') from the wilderness, which put bracelets upon their hands, and beautiful crowns upon their heads." The first clause would seem to favor the idea that a nation is meant, but the reading of the Hebrew text and A. V. margin is rather supported by what follows the mention of the "drunkards." These passages seem to show (if we omit the last) that Seba was a nation of Africa, bordering on or included in Cush, and in Solomon's time independent and of political importance. Herodotus speaks of the Ethiopians as the tallest and handsomest men in the world (compare Is. xlv. 14, above). No ancient Ethiopian kingdom of importance could have excluded the island of Meroë, and therefore this one of Solomon's time may be identified with that which must have arisen in the period of weakness and division of Egypt that followed the empire, and have laid the basis of that power that made Shebek, or Sabaco, able to conquer Egypt, and found the Ethiopian dynasty which ruled that country as well as Ethiopia. Josephus says that Saba (= Seba) was the ancient name of the Ethiopian island and city of Meroë, but he writes for Seba, in the notice of the Noachian settlements, Sabas. The island of Meroë lay between the Astaboras (modern Atbara), the most northern tributary of the NILE, and the Astapus (modern Bahr el-Azrak or "Blue River"), the eastern of its two great confluent; it is also described as bounded by the Astaboras, the Astapus, and the Atasobas, the latter two uniting to form the Blue River, but this is essentially the same thing. It was in the time of the kingdom rich and productive. The chief city was Meroë, which was an oracle of Jupiter Ammon. The remains of the city Meroë are (so Gesenius, &c.) between 16 and 17° N. lat. on the Nile near Shendy.

Se'bat. MONTH.

Se'a-rah (fr. Heb. = enclosure, Ges.), one of the six cities of Judah in the "wilderness" (DESER'T 2), i. e. the tract bordering on the Dead Sea (Josh. xv. 61). Its position is not known.

Sech-e-m'as [sek-] (Gr. fr. Heb. = SHECHANIAH).

1. SHECHANIAH 2 (1 Esd. viii. 29).—2. SHECHANIAH 3 (viii. 32).

Se'chu [-ku] (Heb. watch-tower, Ges.), a place (1 Sam. xix. 22 only), apparently lying on the route between Saul's residence, Gibeah, and Ramah (Ramathaim-zophim), that of Samuel. It was noted for "the great well" (or rather cistern) which it contained. If Saul started from GIBEAH 5 (Tuleil el-Ful), and if Nebay Samuel is RAMAH 2, then Bir Neb'ala (the well of Neb'ala), alleged by Schwarz to contain a large pit, would be in a suitable position for the great well of Sechu (so Mr. Grove).

Se-can'dus (L. second, favorable), a Thessalonian Christian who went with the Apostle Paul from Corinth as far as Asia, on his return to Jerusalem from his third missionary tour (Acts xx. 4).

Seed-e-l'as (L. = ZEDEKIAH). 1. Father of Maa-seiah (Bar. i. 1), and apparently identical with the false prophet in Jer. xxix. 21, 22.—2. ZEDEKIAH, king of Judah (Bar. i. 8).

* Seed. AGRICULTURE; CHILD; CORN; SEED-TIME, &c.

* Seed'-time. AGRICULTURE; PALESTINE, Climate; RAIN; SOWING.

Seer = one who sees, especially one who sees into the future. PROPHET.

* Seethe [th as in this], to = to boil (Ex. xvi. 23, xxxix. 19, &c.). COOKING; LENTILES; MILK, &c.

Se'gub (Heb. elevated, Ges.). 1. Youngest son of HIEL the Bethelite, who rebuilt JERICHO (1 K. xvi. 34). Rabbinical tradition says he died when his father had set up the gates of the city.—2. Son of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 21, 22).

Selr [seer] (Heb. rough, rugged, Ptr.; hairy, shaggy, Ges.). 1. A HORITE chief or phylarch who originally inhabited the land of EDOM (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 21; 1 Chr. i. 38; see No. 2 below).—2. "The land of Selr" (Gen. xxxii. 3, xxxvi. 30), or Mount Selr (xiv. 6, xxxvi. 8, 9; Deut. i. 2, ii. 1, 5; Josh. xiv. 4; 2 Chr. xx. 10, 22, 23; Ez. xxxv. 2, 3, 7, 15), or Selr simply (Gen. xxxiii. 14, 16; Num. xxiv. 18; Deut. i. 44, ii. 4, 8, 12, 22, 29, xxxiii. 2; Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7; Judg. v. 4; 2 Chr. xx. 23, xxv. 11, 14; Is. xxi. 11; Ez. xxv. 8); the original name of the mountain-ridge extending along the east side of the valley of ARABAH, from the Dead Sea to the Elanitic Gulf; also called EDOM. The name may either have been derived (so Porter, with Gesenius, &c.) from Seir the Horite, chief of the aboriginal inhabitants (Gen. xxxvi. 20), or, what is perhaps more probable, from the rough aspect of the whole country. The Mount Seir of the Bible had the ARABAH on the W. (Deut. i. 1, 8); it extended as far S. as the head of the Gulf of 'Akabab (ver. 8); its eastern border ran along the base of the mountain-range where the plateau of ARABIA begins. Its northern border Mr. Porter would place at "the Mount HALAK that goeth up to Seir, even unto Baal-gad" (Josh. xi. 17), and he would identify this Mount Halak with the line of "naked" (halák = "naked") white hills or cliffs (AKRABBIM) which runs across the great valley about eight miles S. of the Dead Sea, forming the division between the Arabah proper and the deep Chór N. of it, and appearing, when viewed from the shore of the Dead Sea, as a line of hills shutting in the valley, and extending up to the mountains of Seir. Wilton (The Negeb, 73, n.) and Rowlands (in Fairbairn) distinguish "the land of Seir" or "Seir" from "Mount Seir," making the former extend further W. or N. W. than the latter and embrace a part of "the south country" of JUDAH. Wilton identifies Mount Halak with Jebel Yelek, and Rowlands with Jebel el-Halal, both situated S. W. from Beersheba, one about seventy-five miles, the other about fifty.—3. "Mount Seir;" one of the landmarks on the north boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 10 only). It lay westward of Kirjath-jearim, and between it and Beth-shemesh. If Kuriet el-'Enab be the former, and Ain-shems the latter of these two, then Mount Seir must be the ridge between the Wady 'Aly and the Wady Ghurdb. The name may be derived from some incursion by the Edomites which has escaped record, or more probably from some peculiarity in the form or appearance of the spot. Whether this has any connection with SEIRATH, is doubtful (so Mr. Grove).

Selrath [see-] (fr. Heb. = a she-goat, Ges.), the place to which Ehud fled after his murder of Eglon (Judg. iii. 26, 27). It was in "Mount Ephraim" (27), a continuation, perhaps, of the same wooded shaggy hills (such seems to be the signification of SEIR and Seirath) which stretched even so far S. as to enter the territory of Judah (Josh. xv. 10).

Sel'sa (Is. xvi. 1) and Sel'sah (2 K. xiv. 7) (Heb. sela', a rock, Ges.; in LXX. Petra), rendered "the rock" (Judg. i. 36; 2 Chr. xxv. 12; Ob. 3), probably the famous city and stronghold of EDOM, later known as "Petra," the ruins of which are found in Wady Músa, S. of the Dead Sea, about two days' journey N. of the top of the gulf of 'Akabab, and three or four S. from Jericho. It was taken by Amaziah, and called JOKTHEEL, but seems to have afterward come under the dominion of MOAB. In the end of the fourth century B. C. it was the headquarters of the Nabatheans. (NEBAIOTH.) About 70 B. C. it was the residence of the Arab princes named ARETAS. It was by Trajan reduced to subjection to the Roman empire. The city Petra lay, though at a high level, in a hollow shut in by mountain-cliffs of reddish sandstone, and approached only by a narrow ravine (from twelve feet to forty or fifty feet wide), through which, and across the city's site, the river winds. The principal ruins are—(1.) el-Khuzneh (= the treasure), an edifice (an ancient temple, or a dwelling for the dead?), forming a portion of the lofty mass of rock, and having a beautiful façade, with columns and statues and elaborately sculptured ornaments of delicate workmanship and soft coloring; (2.) the theatre, which might seat perhaps 3,500 persons; (3.) a tomb with three rows of columns; (4.) a tomb with a Latin inscription; (5.) ruined bridges; (6.) a triumphal arch; (7.) Zub Far'ôn, a lone column connected with the foundations of a temple; (8.) Kusr Far'ôn (= Pharaoh's castle), the only structure of mason-work now standing.

Selâ-ham-mah'le-koth (Heb. the cliff of escapes or of divisions; more literally rock of the escapes), a rock or cliff in the wilderness of Maon, the scene of one of David's remarkable escapes from Saul (1 Sam. xxiii. 28). No identification has yet been suggested.

* Sel'ah (fr. Heb.) = SELA, a city of EDOM (2 K. xiv. 7).

Selah (Heb., see below). This word, which is only found in the poetical books of the O. T., occurs seventy-one times in the Psalms, and three times in Habakkuk. In sixteen Psalms it is found once, in fifteen twice, in seven three times, and in one four times—always at the end of a verse, except in Ps. lv. 19 [Heb. 20], lvii. 3 [Heb. 4], and Hab. iii. 3, 9, where it is in the middle, though at the end of a clause. All the Psalms in which it occurs, except eleven (iii., vii., xxiv., xxxii., xlviii., l., lxxxii., lxxxiii., lxxxvii., lxxxix., cxlii.), have also the musical direction, "to the chief musician" (compare also Hab. iii. 19); and in these exceptions we find the Hebrew words mizmôr (A. V. "Psalm;" POETRY, HEBREW), "SHIGGAION," or "MASCHIL," which sufficiently indicate that they were intended for music. Besides these, in the titles of the Psalms in which Selah occurs, we meet with the musical term "ALAMOTH" (xvi.), "AL-TASCHITH" (lvii., lix., lxxv.), "GITTITH" (lxxxii., lxxxiv.), "MAHALATH LEANOTH" (lxxxviii.), "MICHAM" (lvii., lix., lx.), "NEGINAH" (lxi.), "NEGINOTH" (iv., liv., lv., lviii., lxxvi.; compare Hab. iii. 19), and "SHU-SHAN-EDUTH" (lx.); and on this association alone might be formed a strong presumption that, like these, Selah itself is a term which had a meaning in the musical nomenclature of the Hebrews. What that meaning may have been is now a matter of pure conjecture. In by far the greater number of instances the Targum renders the word by "forever," in Ps. xlviii. 8 [Heb. 9] "forever and ever." In Ps. xlix. 13 [Heb. 14] it has "for the world to come;" in Ps. xxxix. 5 [Heb. 6] "for the life everlasting;" and in Ps. cxl. 5 [Heb. 6] "continually." This interpretation, adopted by the majority of Rabbinical writers, is purely traditional, based upon no etymology whatever, yet followed by Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Jerome, and the Peshito Syriac in some instances. That this rendering is manifestly inappropriate in some passages, e. g. Ps. xxi. 2 [Heb. 3], xxxii. 4, lxxxi. 7 [Heb. 8], and Hab. iii. 3, and superfluous in others, as Ps. xlv. 8 [Heb. 9], lxxxiv. 4 [Heb. 5], lxxxix. 4 [Heb. 5], was pointed out long since by Aben Ezra. In the Psalms the uniform rendering of the LXX. is Gr. diapsalma. The Vulgate omits it entirely. The rendering of the LXX., &c., is as traditional as that of the Targum, and has no foundation in any known etymology. With regard to the meaning of diapsalma itself there is great doubt. Jerome enumerates various opinions; that diapsalma denotes a change of metre, a cessation of the Spirit's influence, or the beginning of another sense. Aben Ezra (on Ps. iii. 3) expressed his opinion that Selah was a word of emphasis, used to give weight and importance to what was said, and to indicate its truth. Kimchi explained it as a musical term, signifying a raising or elevating the voice. Gesenius makes Selah the imperative from the verb sâlâh, and hence = rest! pause! "Its use seems to have been, in chanting the words of the Psalms, to direct the singer to rest, to pause a little, while the instruments played an interlude or symphony. It is a sign of pause" (Gesenius, Hebrew Lexicon, translated by Robinson, 1854). Ewald derives Selah from sâlâh, to rise, and regards the phrase "Higgaion, Selah," in Ps. ix. 16 [Heb. 17], as the full form, signifying "music, strike up!"—an indication that the voices of the choir were to cease while the instruments alone came in. Hengstenberg follows Gesenius, De Wette, &c., in the rendering pause! but refers it to the contents of the psalm, and understands it of the silence of the music in order to give room for quiet reflection. If this were the case, Selah at the end of a psalm would be superfluous. Fürst makes Selah = to the end, i. e. ended, pause of the song; and says it may refer mainly to the musical accompaniment. Sommer (followed by Keil, &c.) regards Selah as having an essentially religious aim, the words with which it is connected being such as before all others would come up in remembrance before Jehovah, and says, "It is placed by the poet at the passages, where, in the Temple-song, the choir of priests, standing opposite to that of the Levites, sounded the trumpets (Heb. sâlâh), and with the powerful tones of this instrument, the words just spoken were marked and borne upward to Jehovah's ear. This intercessory music of the priests was probably sustained on the part of the Levites by the vigorous tones of the psalter and harp; hence the Greek term diapsalma. The same appears further from the full phrase, 'Higgaion, Selah' (Ps. ix. 16), the first word denoting the sound of the stringed instruments (xcii. 3); the latter, the blast of the trumpets, both of which would here sound together. The less important word (Higgaion) disappeared when the expression was abbreviated, and Selah alone remained" (B. S. v. 72 ff.). Davidson says:—"The word denotes elevation or ascent, i. e. loud, clear. The music which commonly accompanied the singing was soft and feeble. In cases where it was to burst in more strongly during the silence of the song, Selah was the sign. At the end of a verse or strophe, where it commonly stands, the music may have readily been strongest and loudest." Augusti thought it was an exclamation, like hallelujah! and the late Prof. Lee classed it among the interjections, and rendered it praise! Beyond the fact that Selah is a musical term, we know absolutely nothing about it (so Mr. Wright).

Sel'ed (Heb. exultation, Ges.), son of Nadab, a descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 30).

Sel-e-mi'a (L. = SHELMIAN), one of the five men "ready to write swiftly," whom Esdras was commanded to take (2 Esd. xiv. 24).

Sel-e-mi'as (Gr.) = SHELMIAN 1 (1 Esd. ix. 34).

Sel-leu'el-a [se-lu'she-a; in L. pronounced sel-lu-si'ah] (L. fr. Gr., named from its founder = the city of Seleucus; see below), a town near the mouth of the Orontes, was practically the seaport of ANTIOCH 1. The distance between the two towns was about sixteen miles. We are expressly told that St. Paul, in company with Barnabas, sailed from Seleucia at the beginning of his first missionary circuit (Acts xiii. 4); and it is almost certain that he landed there on his return from it (xiv. 26). This strong fortress and convenient seaport was constructed by the first Seleucus, a successor of Alexander the Great, and here he was buried. It is mentioned in 1 Mc. xi. 8. It retained its importance in Roman times, and in St. Paul's day it had the privileges of a free city. The remains are numerous, including an immense excavation extending from the higher part of the city to the sea, two piers (called "Paul" and "Barnabas") of the old harbor, &c.

Se-leu-cus (L. fr. Gr.) IV. Phil-op-a-tor (Gr. loving his father), "king of ASIA" (2 Mc. iii. 3), i. e. of the provinces included in the Syrian monarchy of the Seleucidæ; son and successor of ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT. He took part in the disastrous battle of Magnesia (B. C. 190), and three years afterward, on the death of his father, ascended the throne. He was murdered, after a reign of twelve years (B. C. 175), by HELIOPORUS, one of his own courtiers (Dan. xi. 20). His son DEMETRIUS I. SOTER, whom he had sent, while still a boy, as hostage to Rome, gained the crown in 162 B. C. (1 Mc. vii. 1; 2 Mc. xiv. 1). The general policy of Seleucus toward the Jews, like that of his father (iii. 2, 3), was conciliatory, and he undertook a large share of the expenses of the Temple-service (iii. 3, 6). On one occasion, by the false representations of SIMON 3, he was induced to make an attempt to carry away the treasure deposited in the Temple, by means of the same Heliodorus who murdered him. The attempt signally failed, but it does not appear that he afterward showed any resentment against the Jews (iv. 5, 6); though his want of money to pay the enormous tribute due to the Romans may have compelled him to raise extraordinary revenues (compare his title "a raiser of taxes" in Dan. xi. 20). SYRIA.

* Sell'er. COLORS; COMMERCE; FAIRS; MARKET, &c.

Sem (Gr.) = SHEM the patriarch (Lk. iii. 36).

Sem-a-ch'il'ah [-ki-] (fr. Heb. = Jehovah sustains him, Ges.), a Levite, son of SHEMAIAH 9 (1 Chr. xxvi. 7).

Sem-e-i (Gr. = SHIMEI). 1. SHIMEI 14 (1 Esd. ix. 33).—2. SHIMEI 16 (Esth. xi. 2).—3. Father of Matathias in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Lk. iii. 26).

Se-mel'il-us (fr. Gr.) = SHIMSHAI (1 Esd. ii. 16, 17, 25, 30).

Sem-it'le (fr. SEM = SHEM) Lan'gna-gzs. SHEMITIC LANGUAGES.

Se-na'ah (Heb. thorny, Ges.). The "children of Sennaah" are enumerated among the "people of Israel" who returned from the Captivity with Zerubabel (Ezr. ii. 35; Neh. vii. 38). In Neh. iii. 3, the name is given with the Hebrew article, HASSENAAH. The names in these lists are mostly those of towns; but Sennaah does not occur elsewhere in the Bible as a town. The Magdal-Senna, or "great Senna" of Eusebius and Jerome, seven miles N. of Jericho, however, is not inappropriate in position. Bertheau suggests that Sennaah represents not a single place but a district; but there is nothing to corroborate this (so Mr. Grove).

* Sen'ate, the A. V. translation of Gr. gerousia = (so Kbn. N. T. Lex.) eldership, i. e. the elders, taken collectively (Acts v. 21 only). ELDER.

Se'meh (Heb. thorn, thorn-bush), the name of the southern one—that toward GEBA—of the two isolated rocks which stood in the "passage of MICH-MASH" (1 Sam. xiv. 4). BOZZE.

Se'nir (Heb. coat-of-mail, or cataract, Ges.; see below). This name occurs twice in the A. V., viz. 1 Chr. v. 23, and Ez. xxvii. 5; but the Hebrew word occurs in Deut. iii. 9, and Cant. iv. 8, though some Hebrew copies have shénir here (so Gesenius), and the A. V. has SHENIR. It is the Amorite name for the mountain (or perhaps rather a portion of the mountain) in the N. of Palestine which the Hebrews called HERMON. Abulfeda reports that the part of Anti-Lebanon N. of Damascus—that usually denominated Jebel esh-Shurky, "the East Mountain"—was in his day called Senir.

Sen-nach-e-rib [-nak-] (L.; Heb. Sanhêrib or San-chêrib; fr. Sansc. = conqueror of armies, Bohlen, Ges.; see below), the son and successor of SARGON, king of ASSYRIA. His name in the Assyrian inscriptions is read by Rawlinson Tin-akki-irib, which is understood to mean "Sin (or the Moon) increases brothers:" an indication that he was not the first-born of his father. We know little or nothing of Sennacherib during his father's lifetime. From his name, and from Polyhistor's mention (after Berosus) that his brother held the tributary kingdom of Babylon, we may gather that he was not the eldest son, and not the heir to the crown till the year before his father's death. (NINEVEH.) Sennacherib mounted the throne B. C. 702. His first efforts were directed to crushing the revolt of Babylonia, which he invaded with a large army. MERODACH-BALADAN ventured on a battle, but was defeated and driven from the country. Sennacherib then made Belibus, an officer of his court, viceroy, and, quitting Babylonia, ravaged the lands of the Aramean tribes on the Tigris and Euphrates, whence he carried off 200,000 captives. The next year he made war on the independent tribes in Mount Zagros, and reduced a portion of Media. In his third year (B. C. 700) he turned his arms toward the West, chastised Sidon, took tribute from Tyre, Araduz, and the other Phœnician cities, as well as from Edom and Ashdod, besieged and captured Ascalon, made war on Egypt, which was still dependent on Ethiopia, took LIBNAH and LACHISH on the Egyptian frontier, and, having probably concluded a convention with his chief enemy, finally marched against HEZEKIAH, king of Judah. It was at this time (so Rawlinson) that "Sennacherib came up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them," &c. (2 K. xviii. 13-16). In B. C. 699 Sennacherib invaded Babylonia for the second time. He made a second expedition into Palestine, perhaps in this same year. Hezekiah had again revolted, and claimed the protection of Egypt. Instead, therefore, of besieging Jerusalem, the Assyrian king marched past it to the Egyptian frontier, attacked once more Lachish and Libnah, but apparently failed to take them, sent messengers from the former to Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 17), and on their return without his submission wrote him a threatening letter (xix. 14). TIRHAKAH was hastening to the aid of the Egyptians when an event occurred which relieved both Egypt and Judea from their danger. In one night the Assyrians lost, either by a pestilence or by some more awful manifestation of Divine power (ANGELS III.), 185,000 men! The camp immediately broke up—the king fled. Sennacherib reached his capital in safety, and was not deterred from engaging in other wars, though he seems thenceforward to have carefully avoided Palestine. In his fifth year he led an expedition into Armenia and Media; after which, from his sixth to his eighth year, he was engaged in wars with Susiana and Babylonia. From this point his annals fail us. Sennacherib reigned twenty-two years. The date of his accession is fixed by the Canon of Ptolemy to B. C. 702, the first year of Belibius or Elibus. The date of his death is marked in the same document by the accession of Asaridanus (ESAR-HADDON) to the throne of Babylon in B. C. 680. The monuments are in exact conformity with these dates (so Rawlinson), for the twenty-second year of Sennacherib (but none later) has been found upon them. It is impossible to reconcile these dates with the chronology of Hezekiah's reign, according to the present Hebrew text. Some suppose that in 2 K. xviii. 13 and Is. xxxvi. 1 the year has been altered by a copyist from "twenty-seventh" to "fourteenth." Others suppose a dislocation as well as alteration of the text. Sennacherib was one of the most magnificent of the Assyrian kings. He seems to have been the first who fixed the seat of government permanently at Nineveh, which he carefully repaired and adorned with splendid buildings. His greatest work is the grand palace at Koyunjik. He built also, or repaired, a second palace at Nebbi Yunus, confined the Tigris to its channel by an embankment of brick, restored the ancient aqueducts, &c. (NINEVEH.) He also erected monuments in distant countries, one, a rock-hewn tablet, at the mouth of the Nahr el-Kelb, two hours from Beirût. Of the death of Sennacherib it is only known that, "as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god, Adrammelech and Sharezer his sons smote him with the sword, and escaped into the land of Armenia" (2 K. xix. 37; Is. xxxvii. 38). THRONE.

Sen'u-ah (Heb., properly Hassenuah = the bristling, Ges.), a Benjamite, the father of Judah, who was second over the city after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 9); = HASENUAH.

Se-o'rim (Heb. barley, Ges.), chief of the fourth of the twenty-four courses of priests instituted by David (1 Chr. xxiv. 8).

Sephar (Heb. a numbering, census, Ges.). It is written, after the enumeration of the sons of Joktan, "and their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east" (Gen. x. 30). The immigration of the Joktanites was probably from W. to E., and they occupied the southwestern portion of the peninsula. (ARABIA.) The undoubted identifications of Arabian places and tribes with their Joktanite originals are included within these limits, and point to Sephar as the eastern boundary. There appears to be little doubt that the ancient seaport town called Dhafâri or Zafâri, and Dhafâr or Zafâr, without the inflexional termination, represents the Biblical site or district (so Mr. E. S. Poole, with most critics). It appears to preserve the name mentioned in Gen. x. 30, and to be in the district anciently so named. It is situated on the coast, in the province of Hadramaut, and near the district which adjoins that province on the E., called Esh-Shîr. M. Fresnel tells us that Zafâr, pronounced by the modern inhabitants Isfâr, is now the name of a series of villages situate some of them on the shore, and some close to the shore, of the Indian Ocean, between Mirbât and Kûs-Sâjir, extending a distance of two days' journey, or seventeen or eighteen hours, from E. to W. Proceeding in this direction, those near the shore are named Tâkah, El-Dahâreez, El-Beled, El-Hâfeh, Salâhah, and Arkad. The first four are on the sea-shore, and the last two at a small distance from it. El-Beled, otherwise called Harkâm, is, in M. Fresnel's opinion, the ancient Zafâr. It is on a small peninsula lying between the ocean and a bay, and the port is on the land-side of the town. The classical writers mention Sapphar metropolis or Saphar, the capital of the Sappharitæ, placed by Ptolemy near the Homeritæ.

Seph'a-rad (Heb. fr. Assyrian = boundary, limit, Wr.), a place whence the captive Jews were to return to possess the cities of the South (Ob. 20 only). Its situation is uncertain. (1.) The reading of the LXX., heôs (= as far as) Ephrathâ, is probably a mere conjecture. (2.) The reading of the Vulgate, Bosporus (Cimmerian, or Thracian?), was adopted by Jerome from his Jewish instructor. The Targum Jonathan and the Peshito-Syriac, and from them the modern Jews, interpret Sepharad as Syria (Iapamia and Iymania). (3.) Others have suggested the identity of Sepharad with Sippbara in Mesopotamia, but that is more probably SEPHARVATIM. (4.) The name has perhaps been discovered in the cuneiform Persian inscriptions of Nakh-i-Rustum and Behistun; and also in a list of Asiatic nations given by Niebuhr. In the latter it occurs between "Cappadocia" and "Ionia." De Sacy was the first to propose the identification of this with Sepharad, and subsequently it was suggested by Lassen that S-Pa-Ra-D = SARDIS, the ancient capital of Lydia. Winer and Pusey approve this identification. (5.) Ewald considers that Sepharad has a connection with Zarephath in the preceding verse; and suggests that the true reading is Sepharam, and that it is to be found in a place three hours from 'Akka (Acco), i. e. doubtless the modern Shefa 'Omar. (6.) Michaelis suggests that the "Spartans" of 1 Mc. xii. 15 are accurately "Sepharadites."

Seph-ar-va'im (L. fr. Heb. dual; see below), mentioned by Sennacherib in his letter to Hezekiah as a city whose king had been unable to resist the Assyrians (2 K. xix. 13; Is. xxxvii. 13; compare 2 K. xviii. 34). It is coupled with Hena and Ava, or Ivah, towns on the Euphrates above Babylon. Again, it is mentioned, in 2 K. xvii. 24, where it is again joined with Ava, and also with Cuthah and Babylon. These indications justify us in identifying the place with the famous town of Sippara or Sippbara, on the Euphrates above Babylon, near the site of the modern Mosab. The dual form indicates that there were two Sipparas, one on either side of the river. Berosus called Sippara, "a city of the sun;" and in the inscription it bears the same title, being called Ti-par-sha Shamash, or "Sippara of the Sun"—the sun being the chief object of worship there (compare 2 K. xvii. 31). SEPHARVITES.

*Se-pharvites = people of SEPHARVATIM, who burnt their children in the fire to ADRAMMELECH and ANAMMELECH, 2 K. xvii. 31).

Se-ph'e'la, the Gr. form of the Heb. hash-Sheph'elâh, the native name for the southern division of the low-lying flat district which intervenes between the central highlands of the Holy Land and the Mediterranean (1 Mc. xii. 38), the other and northern portion of which was known as SHARON. The Hebrew name occurs throughout the topographical records of Joshua, the historical works, and the topographical passages in the Prophets. In these passages, however, the word is treated in the A. V. not as a proper name, but as a mere appellative, and rendered "the vale," "the valley," "the plain," "the low plains," and "the low country." (JUDAH 1 (II.); LOW COUNTRY; PALESTINE, II., §§ 29, 30, &c.; PLAIN 6; VALLEY 5.) The name is retained in the old versions, and was actually in use down to the fifth century. No definite limits are mentioned to the Shephelah, nor is it probable that there were any. In Josh. xv. 33-47 "the valley" (Heb. hash-Shephelah) contains forty-three "cities," as well as the hamlets and temporary villages dependent on them. Of these, as far as our knowledge avails us, the most northern was EKRON, the most southern GAZA, and the most eastern NEZIB (about seven miles N. N. W. of Hebron). A large number of these towns, however, were situated not in the plain, nor even on the western slopes of the central mountains, but in the mountains themselves.

Sep'tu-a-gint (fr. L. septuaginta = 70; see below). The causes which produced this GREEK version of the OLD TESTAMENT, the number and names of the translators, the times at which different portions were translated, are all uncertain (so Prof. Selwyn, original author of this article).—Printed Editions. It appears at the present day in four principal editions. 1. The Complutensian Polyglott (OLD TESTAMENT, I., § 3), A. D. 1514-1517. 2. The Aldine Edition, Venice, A. D. 1518. 3. The Roman Edition, edited under Pope Sixtus V., A. D. 1587. 4. Facsimile Edition of the Alexandrine MS. (NEW TESTAMENT, I., § 28, A), by H. H. Baber, A. D. 1816. The texts of 1 and 2 were probably formed by collation of several MSS. The Roman edition, 3, is printed from the venerable Vatican MS. (NEW TESTAMENT, I., § 28, B). A transcript of this MS., prepared by Cardinal Mai, was published at Rome, by Vercelloni, in 1857; this edition is not so accurate as to preclude the necessity of consulting the MS. The Facsimile Edition, 4, by Mr. Baber, is printed with types made after the form of the letters in the Alexandrine MS. Other editions are—Walton's Polyglott, 1657; Cambridge edition, 1663; Grabe, Oxford, 1707-1720, reprinted by Breitinger, Zurich, 1730; Bos, Franker (Netherlands), 1709; Holmes, continued by Parsons, Oxford, 1798-1827; Oxford edition, by Gaisford, 1848; Tischendorf's editions, Leipsic, 1850, 1856, &c.; Field, 1859, &c.—Manuscripts. The various readings given by Holmes and Parsons enable us to judge, in some measure, of the character of the several MSS., and of the degree of their accordance with the Hebrew text. They are distinguished thus by Holmes: the uncial by Roman numerals, the cursive by Arabic figures. Among them may be specially noted, with their probable dates and estimates of value as given by Holmes in his Preface to the Pentateuch:—

The texts of these MSS. differ considerably from each other, and consequently differ in various degrees from the Hebrew original. The following are the results of a comparison of the readings in Ex. i. -viii.:—1. Several of the MSS. agree well with the Hebrew; others differ very much. 2. The chief variance from the Hebrew is in the addition or omission of words and clauses. 3. Taking the Roman text as the basis, there are found eighty places (a) where some of the MSS. differ from the Roman text, either by addition or omission, in agreement with the Hebrew; twenty-six places (b) where differences of the same kind are not in agreement with the Hebrew. There is therefore a large balance against the Roman text, in point of accordance with the Hebrew. 4. Those MSS. which have the largest number of differences of class (a) have the smallest number of class (b). There is evidently some strong reason for this close accordance with the Hebrew in these MSS. 5. The divergence between the extreme points of the series of MSS. may be estimated from this statement:

No. 72 differs from the Roman text in 40 places, with Heb.
" 59 " " " " " " " " " " " "	4 " against "
" 59 " " " " " " " " " " " "	40 " with "
" 59 " " " " " " " " " " " "	9 " against "

Between these and the Roman text lie many shades of variety. The Alexandrine text is about half-way between the two extremes;

Differing from Roman text in 25 places, with Hebrew.

But whence these varieties of text? Was the Version at first more in accordance with the Hebrew, as in 72 and 59, and did it afterward degenerate into the less accurate state of the Vatican MS.? Or was the Version at first less accurate, like the Vatican text, and afterward brought, by critical labors, into the more accurate form of the MSS. which stand highest in the scale? History supplies the answer. Jerome speaks of two copies, one older and less accurate (koiné [Gr.] = common), fragments of which are believed to be represented by the still extant remains of the old Latin Version; the other more faithful to the Hebrew, which he took as the basis of his own new Latin Version. He also speaks of the corruption of the ancient translation, and the great variety of copies used in different countries. Origen, finding great discordance in the several copies in the LXX., laid this version side by side with the other three translations of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus; and, taking their accordance with each other as the test of their agreement with the Hebrew, marked the copy of the LXX. with an obelos ÷, where he found superfluous words, and supplied the deficiencies of the LXX. by words taken from the other versions, with an asterisk *, prefixed. From Eusebius we learn that this work of Origen was called Tetrapla, the fourfold Bible. But this was only the earlier and the smaller portion of Origen's labors: he rested not till he had acquired the knowledge of Hebrew, and compared the Septuagint directly with the Hebrew copies. The result of his subsequent labors was embodied in the Hexapla or sixfold Bible, in which he arranged the four above-mentioned translations with two or three others and the Hebrew text in separate columns, so that the whole could be seen at one view. From Jerome we learn that in the Hexapla the Hebrew text was placed in one column in Hebrew letters, in the next column in Greek letters. The fate of this to be as ancient as the Vatican (II.). NEW TESTAMENT, I., § 28, x.

laborious work is unknown. It was brought from Tyre and laid up in the library at Cesarea, and there probably perished by the flames, A. D. 653. One copy, however, had been made by Pamphilus and Eusebius, of the column containing the corrected text of the Septuagint, with Origen's asterisks and obeli, and the letters denoting from which of the other translators each addition was taken. This copy is probably the ancestor of those MSS. which now approach most nearly to the Hebrew, and are entitled Hexaplar. To these main sources of our existing MSS. must be added the recensions of the Septuagint mentioned by Jerome and others, viz. those of Lucian of Antioch and Hesychius of Egypt, not long after the time of Origen. Each of these had a wide range: that of Lucian (supposed to be corrected by the Hebrew) in the Churches from Constantinople to Antioch; that of Hesychius in Alexandria and Egypt; while the churches lying between these two regions used the Hexaplar text copied by Eusebius and Pamphilus.—I. History of the Version. Before attempting to ascertain whence came the ancient text called koiné or common, which was current before the time of Origen, we may notice—(a.) This version was highly esteemed by the Hellenistic Jews before the coming of Christ. An annual festival was held at ALEXANDRIA in remembrance of the completion of the work. The manner in which it is quoted by the writers of the N. T. proves that it had been long in general use. It was found wherever the Greek language prevailed, or Jews were settled among Gentiles. To the wide dispersion of this version we may ascribe in great measure that general persuasion which prevailed over the whole East of the near approach of the Redeemer. (MESSIAH.) (b.) Not less wide was the influence of the Septuagint in the spread of the Gospel. Many of the Jews assembled at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, from Asia Minor, Africa, Crete, and Rome, used the GREEK language; from Antioch and Alexandria in the East, to Rome and Massilia (Marseilles) in the West, the voice of the Gospel sounded forth in Greek. For a long period the Septuagint was the O. T. of the far larger part of the Christian Church. (CANON.)—Can we now find any clear, united, consistent testimony to the origin of the Septuagint? 1. Where? 2. When? 3. By whom? 4. Whence the title? 1. The only point in which all agree is that Alexandria was the birthplace of the Version. 2. The Version was made, or at least commenced, in the time of the earlier Ptolemies, in the first half of the third century B. C. 3. By whom was it made? The following are some of the traditions current among the Fathers:—Irenæus relates that Ptolemy Lagi, wishing to adorn his Alexandrian Library with the writings of all nations, requested from the Jews of Jerusalem a Greek version of their Scriptures; that they sent seventy elders well skilled in the Scriptures and in later languages; that the king separated them from one another, and bade them all translate the several books. When they came together before Ptolemy and showed their versions, God was glorified, for they all agreed exactly, from beginning to end, in every phrase and word, so that all men may know that the Scriptures are translated by the inspiration of God. Justin Martyr gives the same account, and adds that he was taken to see the cells where the interpreters worked. Epiphanius says that the translators were divided into pairs, in thirty-six cells, each pair being provided with two scribes; and that thirty-six versions, agreeing in every point, were produced, by the gift of the Holy Spirit. Among the Latin Fathers Augustine adheres to the inspiration of the translators. But Jerome boldly throws aside the whole story of the cells and the inspiration, and refers to the relation of Aristæus, or Aristæas, and to Josephus, the former being followed by the latter. This (so called) letter of Aristæas to his brother Philocrates is still extant. It gives a splendid account of the origin of the Septuagint; of the embassy and presents sent by King Ptolemy to the high-priest at Jerusalem, by the advice of Demetrius Phalereus, his librarian, fifty talents of gold and fifty talents of silver, &c.: the Jewish slaves whom he set free, paying their ransom himself; the letter of the king; the answer of the high-priest; the choosing of six interpreters from each of the twelve tribes, and their names; the copy of the Law, in letters of gold; their arrival at Alexandria on the anniversary of the king's victory over Antigonus; the feast prepared for the seventy-two, which continued for seven days; the question proposed to each of the interpreters in turn, with the answers of each; their lodging by the sea-shore; and the accomplishment of their work in seventy-two days, by conference and comparison. This is the story which probably gave to this version the title of the Septuagint. A simpler account, and probably more genuine, is that given by ARISTOBOLUS I (second century B. C.): "Before Demetrius Phalereus a translation had been made, by others, of the history of the Hebrews' going forth out of Egypt, and of all that happened to them, and of the conquest of the land, and of the exposition of the whole Law. . . . But the entire translation of our whole Law was made in the time of the king named Philadelphus, a man of greater zeal, under the direction of Demetrius Phalereus." The Prologue of the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach (ECCLESIASTICUS) makes mention of "the Law itself, the Prophets, and the rest of the books," having been translated from the Hebrew into another tongue. The letter of Aristæas was received as genuine and true for many centuries; but the general belief of scholars now is, that it was the work of some Alexandrian Jew, whether with the object of enhancing the dignity of his Law, or the credit of the Greek version, or for the meaner purpose of gain. But the Pseudo-Aristæas had a basis of fact for his fiction; on three points of his story there is no material difference of opinion, and they are confirmed by the study of the Version itself:—(1.) The Version was made at Alexandria. (2.) It was begun in the time of the earlier Ptolemies, about B. C. 280. (3.) The Law (i. e. the Pentateuch) alone was translated at first. But by whom was the Version made? As Hody justly remarks, "it is of little moment whether it was made at the command of the king or spontaneously by the Jews; but it is a question of great importance whether the Hebrew copy of the Law, and the interpreters (as Pseudo-Aristæas and his followers relate), were summoned from Jerusalem, and sent by the high-priest to Alexandria." The Version itself bears upon its face the marks of imperfect knowledge of Hebrew, and exhibits the forms and phrases of the Macedonic Greek prevalent in Alexandria, with a plentiful sprinkling of Egyptian words. The reader of the LXX. will readily agree with Hody's conclusion—that, whether by the king's command or by the Jews spontaneously, it was made by Alexandrine Jews. The question as to the moving cause which gave birth to the Version is one which cannot be so decisively answered either by internal evidence or by historical testimony. The balance of probability must be struck between the tradition of the king's intervention and the simpler account suggested by the facts of history, and the phenomena of the Version itself. It is well known that, after the Jews returned from the Captivity of Babylon, having lost in great measure the familiar knowledge of the ancient Hebrew, the readings from the Books of Moses in the synagogues of Palestine were explained to them in the Chaldaic tongue, in Targums or Paraphrases; and the same was done with the Books of the Prophets, when, at a later time, they also were read in the synagogues. (OLD TESTAMENT, B; VERSIONS, ANCIENT [TARGUM].) The Jews of Alexandria had probably still less knowledge of Hebrew; their familiar language was Alexandrian Greek. They had settled in Alexandria in large numbers soon after the time of Alexander, and under the earlier Ptolemies. They would naturally follow the same practice as their brethren in Palestine; the Law first and afterward the Prophets would be explained in Greek, and from this practice would arise in time an entire Greek Version. 4. Whence the title? It seems unnecessary to suppose, with Eichhorn, that the title Septuagint arose from the approval given to the Version by an Alexandrian Sanhedrim of seventy or seventy-two; that title appears sufficiently accounted for above by the prevalence of the letter of Aristeas, describing the mission of seventy-two interpreters from Jerusalem.—II. Character of the Septuagint. A minute examination shows that the Hebrew MSS. used by the Greek translators were not pointed as at present, that they were written without intervals between the words, and that the present final forms of the letters caph, mēm, nūn, pē, taddēy (WRITING), were not then in use. In a few cases the translators appear to have preserved the true pointing and division of the words where the Masorets have gone wrong. (A.) Is the Septuagint faithful in substance?—1. It has been clearly shown by Hody, Frankel, &c., that the several books were translated by different persons, without any comprehensive revision to harmonize the several parts. Names and words are rendered differently in different books; particular words and phrases are used in some books and not in others. 2. Thus the character of the Version varies much in the several books, that of the Pentateuch being the best. 3. The poetical parts are, generally speaking, inferior to the historical, the original abounding with rarer words and expressions. The Psalms and Proverbs are perhaps the best of the poetical parts. 4. In the Major Prophets (probably translated nearly 100 years after the Pentateuch) some of the most important prophecies are sadly obscured. Ezekiel and the Minor Prophets (speaking generally) seem to be better rendered. 5. Supposing the numerous glosses and duplicate renderings, which have evidently crept from the margin into the text, to be removed, and forming a rough estimate of what the Septuagint was in its earliest state, we may perhaps say of it that it is the image of the original seen through a glass not adjusted to the proper focus; the larger features are shown, but the sharpness of definition is lost.—(B.) We have anticipated the answer to the second question—Is the Version minutely accurate in details?—but will give a few examples. (1.) The same word in the same chapter is often rendered by differing words, as "will pass over" in Ex. xii. 13, 23. (2.) Differing words by the same word, as "will pass through" and "will pass over" in xii. 23. (3.) The Divine names are frequently interchanged, as "Lord" for "God," and "God" for "Jehovah." (4.) Proper names are sometimes translated, sometimes not, as "Pisgah" translated in Deut. iii. 27, but not in xxxiv. 1. (5.) The translators are often misled by the similarity of Hebrew words, as "for thy works" instead of "for thy sake" in Gen. iii. 17. In very many cases the error may be thus traced to the similarity of some of the Hebrew letters (e. g. dāleth and rēsh, hē and tāv, yōd and vāv; see WRITING); in some it is difficult to see any connection between the original and the Version. (6.) Besides the above deviations, and many like them, which are probably due to accidental causes, the change of a letter, or doubtful writing in the Hebrew, there are some passages which seem to exhibit a studied variation in the LXX. from the Hebrew (e. g. Gen. ii. 2; Ex. xii. 40). Frequently the strong expressions of the Hebrew are softened down, where human parts are ascribed to God (e. g. Ex. iv. 16). The Version is therefore not minutely accurate in details.—(C.) We shall now be prepared to weigh the tradition of the Fathers, that the Version was made by inspiration. If there be such a thing as an inspiration of translators, it must be an effect of the Holy Spirit on their minds, enabling them to do their work of translation more perfectly than by their own abilities and acquirements; to overcome the difficulties arising from defective knowledge, from imperfect MSS., from similarity of letters, from human infirmity and weariness; and so to produce a copy of the Scriptures, setting forth the Word of God, and the history of His people, in its original truth and purity. If the Septuagint Version satisfies this test, it will be found not only substantially faithful, but minutely accurate in details; it will be, in short, a republication of the original text, purified from the errors of human hands and eyes, stamped with fresh authority from Heaven. This is a question to be decided by facts, by the phenomena of the Version itself. We will simply declare our own conviction that, instead of such a Divine republication of the original, we find a marked distinction between the original and the Septuagint—a distinction well expressed in the words of Jerome: "There the Spirit predicts things to come; here learning and abundance of words translates what it understands."—III. What, then, are the benefits to be derived from the study of the Septuagint?—1. For the O. T. The Septuagint gives evidence of the character and condition of the Hebrew MSS. from which it was made, with respect to vowel points and the mode of writing. Being made from MSS. far older than the Masoretic recension, the Septuagint often indicates readings more ancient and more correct than those of our present Hebrew MSS. and editions; and often speaks decisively between the conflicting readings of the present MSS. (e. g. Ps. xvi. 10, xxii. 17; Hos. vi. 5). In Gen. iv. 8 a clause ("Let us go into the field"), which Prof. Selwyn and others consider necessary to the sense, is contained in the LXX., but not in the Hebrew; but some of the best interpreters sustain the Hebrew text here, though they translate the preceding Hebrew word (rayyōmer, literally and usually = "and said") differently—the translation of Gesenius being and said sc. it, viz. what God has told him (Cain) in ver. 7; of First, and spoke, viz. from ver. 7; of A. V. "and talked," &c. In all these cases Prof. Selwyn does not attribute any paramount authority to the Septuagint on account of its superior antiquity to the extant Hebrew MSS.; but takes it as an evidence of a more ancient Hebrew text, as an eye-witness of the texts, 280 or 180 years B. C. 2. The close connection between the O. and N. T. makes the study of the Septuagint extremely valuable, and almost indispensable to the theological student. It was manifestly the chief storehouse from which the apostles drew their proofs and precepts. (OLD TESTAMENT, C.) 3. Further, the language of the Septuagint is the mould in which the thoughts and expressions of the apostles and evangelists are cast. In this Version Divine Truth has taken the Greek language as its shrine, and adapted it to the things of God. Hence the Septuagint is a treasury of illustration for the Greek Testament. 4. The frequent citations of the LXX. by the Greek Fathers, and of the Latin Version of the LXX. by the Fathers who wrote in Latin, form another reason for the study of the Septuagint. 5. On the value of the Septuagint as a monument of the Greek language in one of its most curious phases, this is not the place to dwell.—IV. Objects to be attained by the Critical Scholar. 1. A question of much interest still waits for a solution: the relation between the Septuagint and the SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH. 2. For the critical scholar it would be a worthy object of pursuit to ascertain, as nearly as possible, the original text of the Septuagint as it stood in the time of the apostles and Philo. The critic would probably take as his basis the Roman edition, from the Vatican MS., as representing most nearly the ancient (koiné or common) texts. The collection of fragments of Origen's Hexapla, by Montfaucon, &c., would help him to eliminate the additions to the LXX. from other sources, and to purge out the glosses and double renderings; the citations in the N. T. and in Philo, in the early Christian Fathers, both Greek and Latin, would render assistance of the same kind; and perhaps the most effective aid of all would be found in the fragments of the Old Latin Version collected by Sabatier in three volumes folio (Rheims, 1743). Another work of more practical and general interest still remains to be done, viz. to provide a Greek version, accurate and faithful to the Hebrew original, for the use of the Greek Church, and of students reading the Scriptures in that language for purposes of devotion or mental improvement. Ser-ra'h [-ra'yah], or Ser-a-l'ah (Heb. warrior of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. The king's SCRIBE or secretary in David's reign (2 Sam. viii. 17). (SHAVSHA).—2. HIGH-PRIEST in Zedekiah's reign, taken captive by Nebuzaradan and slain at Riblah (2 K. xxv. 18; 1 Chr. vi. 14; Jer. lii. 24).—3. Son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite; one of the captains who came to Gedaliah (2 K. xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8).—4. Son of Kenaz, and brother of OTHNIEL; father of JOAB 2 (1 Chr. iv. 13, 14).—5. Ancestor of Jehu, a Simeonite chief (iv. 33).—6. One of "the children of the province" who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 2); = AZARIAH 20.—7. Father or ancestor of Ezra the scribe (vii. 1); = No. 2?—8. A priest, or priestly family, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 2).—9. A priest and "ruler of the house of God" after the Captivity (compare AZARIAH 7); son of Hilkiah (xi. 11).—10. Head of a priestly house which went up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (xii. 1, 12).—11. Son of Neriah, and brother of Baruch

(Jer. li. 59, 61). He went with Zedekiah to Babylon in the fourth year of his reign, or, as the Targum has it, "in the mission of Zedekiah," and is described in Heb. as sar mēnūhāh or mēnūchāh (literally "prince of rest;" A. V. "a quiet prince;" margin "or, prince of MENCHUA, or, chief CHAMBER-LAIN"), a title interpreted by Kimchi as = chamberlain; by Gesenius as perhaps = chief of the quarters, i. e. quartermaster-general. Perhaps (so Mr. Wright) he was an officer who took charge of the royal caravan on its march, and fixed the place where it should halt (Maurer, Hitzig, &c.). Seraiah was commissioned by the prophet Jeremiah to take with him on his journey the roll in which he had written the doom of Babylon, and sink it in the midst of the Euphrates, as a token that Babylon should sink, never to rise again (Jer. li. 60-64).—12. Son of Azriel; one of those commanded by Jehoiakim to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch (xxxvi. 26).

Ser'a-phim (Heb. pl. sērāphim = elevated ones, princes, Ges., Fil., &c.; burning ones, or angels of fire, Kimchi, &c. [compare sārāph = "fiery serpent"]), an order of celestial beings whom Isaiah beheld in vision standing above JEHOVAH as He sat upon His throne (Is. vi. 2). They are described as having each of them three pairs of wings, with one of which they covered their faces (a token of humility); with the second they covered their feet (a token of respect); while with the third they flew. They seem to have borne a general resemblance to the human figure, for they are represented as having a face, a voice, feet, and hands (ver. 6). Their occupation was twofold—to celebrate the praises of Jehovah's holiness and power (ver. 3), and to act as the medium of communication between heaven and earth (ver. 6). From their antiphonal chant ("one cried unto another") we may conceive them to have been ranged in opposite rows on each side of the throne. The idea of a winged human figure was not peculiar to the Hebrews; among the sculptures found at Mourghaub in Persia, we meet with a representation of a man with two pairs of wings, springing from the shoulders, and extending, the one pair upward, the other downward, so as to admit of covering the head and the feet. ANGELS; CHERUBIM.

Ser'ed (Heb. fear, Ges.), first-born of ZEBULON, and ancestor of the SARDITES (Gen. xlv. 14; Num. xxvi. 26).

Ser'gi-us (L., the name of the members of a certain Roman clan) Pan'ius (L. = PAUL), proconsul (A. V. "DEPUTY") of CYPRUS when the Apostle PAUL visited that island with Barnabas on his first missionary tour (Acts xiii. 7 ff.). He is described as an intelligent man, truth-seeking, eager for information from all sources within his reach. Thus he was led first to admit to his society ELYMAS the Magian, and afterward to seek out the missionary strangers and learn from them the nature of the Christian doctrine. On becoming acquainted with the apostle he examined at once the claims of the Gospel, and yielded his mind to the evidence of its truth.

Ser'jeant, the A. V. translation of Gr. rhakōchos, literally a rod-holder, a licitor, an officer who attended on certain Roman magistrates of the higher class and executed their decrees (Acts xvi. 35, 38). Such an officer at Rome bore a bundle of rods, but in a province a staff or wand (Hackett, Ayre, &c.).

Ser'on (Gr.), a general of Antiochus Epiphanes, in chief command of the Syrian army; defeated at Beth-horon by Judas Maccabeus, B. C. 166 (1 Mc. iii. 13, 24).

Serpent (fr. L.), the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. nāḥāsh or nāchāsh, the generic name of a "serpent" (Gen. iii. 1 ff., xlix. 17; Ex. iv. 3, vii. 15; Num. xxi. 6 ff., &c., frequently in O. T.).—2. Heb. pl. participle construct zōhāšēy or zōchāšēy (from zāhal or zāchal) = crawling ones, crawlers, serpents, Ges. (Deut. xxxii. 24 only), also translated "worm" (Mic. vii. 17 only).—3. Heb. sārāph (in part), literally (so Gesenius) burning, fiery, hence poisonous, venomous, deadly, as an attribute of a serpent, from the burning inflammation caused by its bite; translated "fiery serpent" (Num. xxi. 8; Is. xiv. 29, xxx. 6), and "fiery" (Num. xxi. 6; Deut. viii. 15, nāḥāsh or nāchāsh being expressed in both these). In Isaiah "flying" (Heb. mē'ōphēph) is connected with sārāph (see below).—4. Heb. tanīn (Ex. vii. 9, 10, 12), elsewhere translated "DRAGON," "WHALE," &c.—5. Gr. herpeton (Jas. iii. 7 only), elsewhere translated literally "creeping thing" (Acts x. 12, xi. 6; Rom. i. 23).—6. Gr. ophis, uniformly and properly translated "serpent" in N. T. (Mat. vii. 10, x. 16, xxiii. 33, &c.); in LXX. = No 1.—The following are the principal Biblical allusions to this animal:—Its subtlety is mentioned in Gen. iii. 1; its wisdom is alluded to by our Lord in Mat. x. 16; the poisonous properties of some species are often mentioned (ADDER; ASP; VIPER); the sharp "tongue" of the serpent is poetically mentioned as the instrument of poison in Ps. cxi. 3 and Job xx. 16 ("the viper's tongue shall slay him"); in other places (e. g. Prov. xiii. 32; Eccl. x. 8, 11; Num. xxi. 9), the venom is correctly ascribed to the bite, while in Job xx. 14 the "GALL" is said to be the poison; the serpents' habit of lying concealed in hedges is alluded to in Eccl. x. 8, and in holes of walls, in Am. v. 19; their dwelling in dry sandy places, in Deut. viii. 15; their wonderful mode of progression is mentioned by the author of Prov. xxx. 19, as one of the things which were too wonderful for him; the oviparous nature of most of the order is alluded to in Is. lix. 5, where the A. V., however, has "cockatrice," margin "ADDER." The art of taming and charming serpents is of great antiquity, and is alluded to in Ps. lviii. 5; Eccl. x. 11; Jer. viii. 17; probably in Jas. iii. 7. (SERPENT-CHARMING.) It was under the form of a serpent that the devil seduced Eve: hence in Scripture SATAN is called "the old serpent" (Rev. xii. 9; compare 2 Cor. xi. 3). The part which the serpent played in the Temptation and Fall (Gen. iii.; ADAM; EVE) is full of deep and curious interest. First, we note the subtlety ascribed to this reptile. It was an ancient belief, both amongst Orientals and the people of the Western world, that the serpent was endued with a large share of sagacity. The particular wisdom alluded to by our Lord refers, it is probable, to the sagacity displayed by serpents in avoiding danger. The disciples were warned to be as prudent in not incurring unnecessary persecution. It has been supposed by many commentators that the serpent, prior to the Fall, moved along in an erect attitude, as Milton represents him in Paradise Lost, i. But an erect mode of progression is utterly incompatible with the structure of a serpent, whose motion on the ground is effected by the mechanism of the vertebral column and the multitudinous ribs which, like so many pairs of levers, enable it to move its body from place to place; consequently, had the snakes before the Fall moved in an erect attitude, they must have been formed on a different plan altogether. All the fossil serpents hitherto found differ in no essential respects from modern representatives of the order. The sun and moon were in the heavens before they were appointed "for signs and for seasons, and for days and years." (RAINBOW.) Cain was "cursed from the earth" without any essential change in his mental and physical constitution. The typical form of the serpent and its mode of progression were in all probability the same before the Fall as after it: but subsequent to the Fall its form and progression were to be regarded with hatred and disgust by all mankind, and thus the animal was cursed "above all cattle," and a mark of condemnation was forever stamped upon it. That part of the curse is literally fulfilled which speaks of the enmity henceforth to exist between the serpent and mankind, though this has more especial reference to the devil whose instrument the serpent was in his deceit. There is no more difficulty in Satan's being permitted to use the serpent for his purpose in Eden than in the possession of the swine by the demons in Mat. viii. 32 (DEMONIACS), or in the serpent's use of language in Gen. iii. than in the ass's address to Balaam in Num. xxii. 28, 30. (MAGIC; MIRACLES.) Serpents are said in Scripture to "eat dust" (Gen. iii. 14; Is. lxxv. 25; Mic. vii. 17); these animals, which for the most part take their food on the ground, do consequently swallow with it large portions of sand and dust. "Almost throughout the East," writes Dr. Kalisch, "the serpent was used as an emblem of the evil principle, of the spirit of disobedience and contumacy. A few exceptions only can be discovered. The Phenicians adored that animal as a beneficent genius; and the Chinese consider it as a symbol of superior wisdom and power, and ascribe to the kings of heaven (tiên-hoang) bodies of serpents. Some other nations fluctuated in their conceptions regarding the serpent. The Egyptians represented the eternal spirit Kneph, the author of all good, under the mythic form of that reptile; they understood the art of taming it, and embalmed it after death; but they applied the same symbol for the god of revenge and punishment (Tithrambo), and for Typhon, the author of all moral and physical evil; and in the Egyptian symbolical alphabet the serpent represents subtlety and cunning, lust and sensual pleasure." (IDOLATRY.)—The evil spirit in the form of a serpent appears in the Ahriman or lord of evil who, according to the doctrine of Zoroaster, first taught men to sin under the guise of this reptile. (PERSIANS.)—Serpents are divided into two great sections—the poisonous, embracing all those with movable tubular fangs and poison-bags in the upper jaw, and constituting (so Col. C. H. Smith, in Kitto) not quite one-fifth of the whole number (ADDER; ASP; VIPER)—and the colubrine, embracing those destitute of this apparatus, but not therefore always innocuous.—Much has been written on the question of the "fiery serpents" of Num. xxi. 6, 8 and Deut. viii. 15, with which it is usual erroneously (so Mr. Houghton) to identify the "fiery flying serpent" of Is. xxx. 6, and xiv. 29. There is no occasion to refer the venomous snakes in question to the kind of which Niebuhr speaks, and which the Arabs at Basra denominate Heie surnurie, or Heie thiðre, "flying serpents," which obtained that name from their habit of "springing" from branch to branch of the date-trees they inhabit. The species of poisonous snake which destroyed the Israelites in the Arabian desert may have been the Cerastes, or the Naia Haje, or any other venomous species frequenting Arabia. (ADDER; ASP.) Mr. Houghton supposes that some kind of flying lizard (Draco, Dra- coecella, or Dracunculus), of formidable appearance, though harmless, may have been as terrible to the Hebrews as a venomous snake, and may thus denote the "fiery flying serpent" of Isaiah (l. c.), which he says can have no existence in nature. Mr. Gosse (in Fairbairn) would refer the "fiery flying serpent" to the poisonous Egyptian cobra (Naja Haje; Asp), which, when excited, erects its head and fore parts perpendicularly to the height of four feet or more, raises and brings forward its anterior ribs so as to stretch the skin of that part into a broad and thin flattened disk, and sways its head and disk gently from side to side with a motion like a hovering bird, till suddenly it strikes its victim. Monstrous forms of snakes with birds' wings occur on the Egyptian sculptures. SERPENT, BRAZEN.

Serpent, Brazen. When the murmuring Israelites in the wilderness were bitten by the "fiery serpents" (SERPENT), and many died in consequence, Moses was directed to make a serpent of brass, and put it on a pole, that the bitten Israelites might look upon it and live (Num. xxi. 5-9). The scene of the history, determined by a comparison of Num. xxi. 3, and xxxiii. 42, must have been either ZALMONAH or PUNON. I. The truth of the history will, in this place, be taken for granted. (INSPIRATION; MIRACLES; PENTATEUCH.) To most of the Israelites it must have seemed as strange then as it did afterward to the later Rabbis, that any such symbol should be employed. The Second Commandment appeared to forbid the likeness of any living thing. The golden calf had been destroyed as an abomination. What reason was there for the difference? In part, of course, the answer may be, that the Second Commandment forbade, not all symbolic forms as such, but those that men made for themselves to worship; but the question still remains, why was this form chosen? It is hardly enough to say, with Jewish commentators, that any outward means might have been chosen, or, with most Christian interpreters, that it was intended to be a type of CHRIST. (SALVATION.) If the words of our Lord in Jn. iii. 14, 15, point to the fulfilment of the type, there must yet have been another meaning for the symbol. Two views have been held. One, maintaining that the SERPENT was the representative of evil, claims that to present the serpent-form as deprived of its power to hurt, impaled as the trophy of a conqueror, was to assert that evil, physical and spiritual, had been overcome, and thus help to strengthen the weak faith of the Israelites in a victory over both. To some writers (Ewald, Patrick, Jackson, Vitringa, &c.) this has commended itself as the simplest and most obvious view. Others, again, have started from a different ground. They look to Egypt as the starting-point for all the thoughts which the serpent could suggest, and they find there that it was worshipped as a good deity, the symbol of health and life. Contrasted as these views appear, they have, it is believed, a point of contact (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article). The idea primarily connected with the serpent in the history of the Fall, as throughout the proverbial language of Scripture, is that of wisdom (Gen. iii. 1; Mat. x. 16; 2 Cor. xi. 3). Wisdom, apart from obedience to a divine order, allying itself to man's lower nature, passes into cunning. Man's nature is envenomed and degraded by it. But wisdom, the self-same power of understanding, yielding to the divine law, is the source of all healing and restoring influences, and the serpent-form thus becomes a symbol of deliverance and health. The Israelites were taught that it would be so to them in proportion as they ceased to be sensual and rebellious.—II. The brazen serpent next appears as an object of worship. Hezekiah's zeal leads him to destroy it. (NEHUSHTAN.) We are left to conjecture when the worship began, or what was its locality. All that we know of the reign of Ahaz makes it probable that it was under his auspices that it received a new development. The church of St. Ambrose, at Milan, has boasted for nearly nine centuries of possessing the brazen serpent which Moses set up in the wilderness.—III. When the material symbol had perished, its history began to suggest deeper thoughts to the minds of men. The writer of the Book of Wisdom sees in it "a sign of salvation;" "he that turned himself toward it was not saved by the thing that he saw, but by Thee that art the Saviour of all" (Wis. xvi. 6, 7). The Targum of Jonathan paraphrases Num. xxi. 8: "He shall be healed if he direct his heart unto the Name of the Word of the Lord." Philo, with his characteristic taste for an ethical, mystical interpretation, represents the history as a parable of man's victory over his lower sensuous nature. The facts just stated may help us to enter into the bearing of the words of Jn. iii. 14, 15.—IV. A full discussion of the typical meaning here unfolded belongs to Exegesis rather than to a Dictionary. It will be enough to note here that which connects itself with facts or theories already mentioned. On the one side, the typical interpretation has been extended to all the details—that the pole was like the cross in form, the serpent was nailed to it as Christ was nailed, and represented His being made sin for us, &c. On the other, it has been maintained that the serpent was from the beginning, and remains still, exclusively the symbol of evil; that the lifting-up of the Son of Man answered to that of the serpent, because on the cross the victory over the serpent was accomplished. In the spiritual as in the historical interpretation, both theories may have an element of truth. FAITH; MEDICINE; OLD TESTAMENT, B; POISON; SAVIOUR.

Serpent-charming. There can be no question at all of the remarkable power which, from time immemorial, has been exercised by certain people in the East over poisonous serpents. The art is distinctly mentioned in the Bible. (SERPENT.) The usual species operated upon, both in Africa and in India, are the hooded snakes (Naja tripudians, and Naia Haje) and the horned Cerastes. (ADDER; ASP.) That the charmers frequently, and perhaps generally, extract the poison-fangs before the snakes are subjected to their skill, there is much probability for believing; but that this operation is not always attended to is clear from the testimony of Bruce and numerous other writers. Some have supposed that the practice of taking out or breaking off the poison-fangs is alluded to in Ps. lviii. 6, "Break their teeth, O God, in their mouth." The serpent-charmer's usual instrument is a flute. Those who professed the art of taming serpents were called by the Hebrews mēnahāshim or mēnachāshim, while the art itself was called lahash or tachash (Jer. viii. 17; Eccl. x. 11); but these terms were not always used in this restricted sense. DIVINATION 8; EXCHANTMENTS 8.

Se'rag (Heb. shoot, branch, Ges.), in N. T. SARUCH; a PATRIARCH, son of Reu, and great-grandfather of Abraham. His age is given in the Hebrew Bible as 230 years (Gen. xi. 20-23); 30 years before he begat NAHOR 1, and 200 years afterward. (CHRONOLOGY.) Bochart conjectures that the town of Seruj, a day's journey from Charræ in Mesopotamia, was named from this patriarch. Suidas and others ascribe to him the deification of dead benefactors of mankind. Epiphanius states that, though in his time idolatry took its rise, yet it was confined to pictures.

* Servant (fr. L.) = "one who serves or does services, voluntarily or involuntarily" (Webster's Dict.). This word is the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. ēnōsh once (1 Sam. xxiv. 7, Heb. 8), usually and literally "MAN."—2. Heb. na'ar (Num. xxii. 22; Judg. vii. 10, xii. 11, xix. 3, 9, 11, 13; Ru. ii. 5, 6; 1 Sam. ii. 13, 15, ix. 3, 6, 7, 8, 10, 22, 27, x. 14, xvi. 18, xxi. 2 [Heb. 3], xxv. 19; 2 Sam. ix. 9, xiii. 17, 28, 29, xvi. 1, xix. 17 [Heb. 18]; 1 K. xviii. 43, xix. 8; 2 K. iv. 12, 24, 25, 38, v. 20, 23, vi. 15, viii. 4, xix. 6; Neh. iv. 16, 22, 23 [Heb. 10, 16, 17], v. 10, 15, 16, vi. 5, xiii. 19; Esth. ii. 2, vi. 3, 5; Job i. 15-17; Is. xxxvii. 6), once literally "boy" (Gen. xxv. 27), often "lad" (xxi. 12 ff., xxii. 5, 12, &c.), "young man" (xiv. 24, xviii. 7, xxii. 3, 5, 19, &c.), "child" (Judg. xiii. 5 ff.; 1 Sam. i. 22 ff., &c.), "babe" (Ex. ii. 6), &c.—3. Heb. participle mishāreth (fr. shārath = to wait on, serve, minister, A. V., Ges., &c.) (Ex. xxxiii. 11; Num. xii. 28; 2 Sam. xiii. 17, 18; 2 K. vi. 15; Prov. xxix. 12), once translated "servitor" (2 K. iv. 43), usually and properly "MINISTER."—4. Heb. 'ebed, found in the O. T. about 800 times, and usually rendered "servant" (Gen. ix. 25-27, xiv. 15, &c.), sometimes "man-servant" (xii. 16, xx. 14, &c.), "bondman" (xliii. 18, xlv. 9, 33, &c.), &c. The kindred Heb. verb 'abad (= to labor, till, work, serve, &c., A. V., Ges., &c.) (1 Chr. xix. 9), or its participle 'ōbēd (Gen. xlix. 15; 2 K. x. 19, &c.), is sometimes translated "servant." The Chal. 'ābēd in Ezr. iv. 11, v. 11, &c. = Heb. 'ebed. Both the verb and noun are applied to those who have been bought with money or are slaves, to common soldiers and court-officers who are styled "servants" of their chief, to tributary nations, to worshippers or ministers of God, &c.—5. Heb. šāchir (in part), translated "hired servant" (Ex. xi. 45; Lev. xxii. 10, xxv. 6, 40, 50, 53; Deut. xv. 18, xxiv. 14), also translated "hiring" (Job vii. 1, 2, &c.), &c.—6. Gr. diakonos (Mat. xxii. 13, xxiii. 11; Mk. ix. 35; Jn. ii. 5, 9, xii. 26; Rom. xvi. 1), also translated "MINISTER" and "DEACON." (DEACONESS.)—7. Gr. doulos, occurring in N. T. nearly 150 times, and usually translated "servant" (Mat. viii. 9, x. 24, 25, &c.), sometimes "bond" (1 Cor. xii. 13; Gal. iii. 28, &c.), = a bondman, slave, servant, properly by birth, but is applied (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) to both involuntary and voluntary service, denoting court-officers and worshippers or ministers of God as well as slaves, and in LXX. = No. 4. Of kindred words, the plural adjective doula is twice used (Rom. vi. 19 only, A. V. "servants"); the verb douloō is translated "to become servant" (vi. 18, 22), "to make servant" (1 Cor. ix. 19), "to bring into bondage" (Acts vii. 6; 2 Pet. ii. 19), "to be under bondage" (1 Cor. vii. 15), "in bondage" (Gal. iv. 3), and in a passive participle is translated "given," i. e. enslaved (Tit. ii. 3); the verb douleō is ordinarily translated "to serve" (Mat. vi. 24 twice; Lk. xv. 29, &c.), sometimes "to be in bondage" (Jn. viii. 33; Acts vii. 7; Gal. iv. 9), and "to do service" (iv. 8, 25; Eph. vi. 7; 1 Tim. vi. 2); douleia uniformly = "bondage" (Rom. viii. 15, 21; Gal. iv. 24, v. 1; Heb. ii. 15); doulē = "handmaid" (Lk. i. 38) or "handmaiden" (48; Acts ii. 18); and the compound verb doulōxogēō = "to bring into subjection" (1 Cor. ix. 27 only).—8. Gr. therapōn = an attendant or minister of God, viz. Moses (Heb. iii. 5 only).

—9. Gr. oikētēs = a house-companion, domestic, Rbn. N. T. Lex. (Lk. xvi. 13; Rom. xiv. 4; 1 Pet. ii. 18), once "household servant" (Acts x. 7). Both No. 9 and 8 in LXX. are used for No. 4.—10. Gr. pais (Mat. viii. 6, 8, 13, xii. 18, xiv. 2; Lk. i. 54, 69, vii. 7, xv. 26; Acts iv. 25), also translated "man-servant" (Lk. xii. 45), often literally "child" (Mat. ii. 16, xvii. 18, xxi. 15; Lk. ii. 43, ix. 42; Acts iv. 27, 30), also "young man" (xx. 12), "son" (Jn. iv. 51; Acts iii. 13, 26), "maiden" (Lk. viii. 51), "maid" (54); in LXX. = No. 2 and 4.—11. Gr. hupēretēs (Mat. xxvi. 58; Mk. xiv. 54, 65; Jn. xviii. 36), also translated "OFFICER" and "MINISTER." The kindred verb hupēreteō is translated "to serve" (Acts xiii. 36), "to minister" (xx. 34, xxiv. 23).—12. Gr. mishthōs (in part), translated "hired servant" (Lk. xv. 17, 19 only); in LXX. = No. 5.—13. Gr. mishthōs (in part), translated "hired servant" in Mk. i. 20, and "hiring" in Jn. x. 12, 13 twice; in LXX. = No. 5. LORD; SLAVE.

* Servitor = a SERVANT or attendant (2 K. iv. 43). MINISTER.

Se'sis (Gr.) = SHASHAI (1 Esd. ix. 34).

Sesthel (Gr.) = BEZALEEL of the sons of Pahath-moab (1 Esd. ix. 31).

Seth (Gr. fr. Heb. = SHETH; see below) (Gen. iv. 25, 26, v. 3-9; Lk. iii. 38), the third son of ADAM; father of Enos, and ancestor of NOAH; = SHETH. The signification of his name is "appointed" or "put" in the place of the murdered Abel; but Ewald thinks that another signification, which he prefers, is indicated in the text, viz. "seedling," or "germ." In the fourth century there existed in Egypt a sect calling themselves Sethians, who regarded Seth as a divine effluence or virtue, and are classed by Neander among those Gnostic sects which, in opposing Judaism, approximated to paganism. GIANT 2; PATRIARCH.

Se'thar (Heb. hidden, Ges.), the Asherite spy, son of Michael (Num. xiii. 13).

* Settle [-tl] (= a part settled or sunk lower), the A. V. translation of Heb. 'āzārāh (Ez. xliii. 14 thrice, 17, 20, xlv. 19), elsewhere translated (by A. V., Gesenius, Fürst) "court" sc. of the Temple (2 Chr. iv. 9 twice, vi. 13). In the passages from Ezekiel, Gesenius explains the Hebrew word as = a ledge around the altar, formed by drawing in or diminishing the part above, an offset, terrace; Fürst regards it as metaphorically = a ledge or border of the altar, and Fairbairn (on Ez.) also translates ledge.

Sev'en (Heb. sheba'; Gr. hepta), in the sacred literature of the Hebrews, may fairly be termed the representative symbolic NUMBER—the keystone on which the symbolism of numbers depends. The views of Biblical critics as to the origin of this symbolism may be ranged under two heads, according as the symbolism is attributed to theoretical speculations as to the internal properties of the number itself, or to external associations of a physical or historical character. According to the former view (Bähr, &c.), the symbolism of the number seven would be traced back to the symbolism of its component elements three and four, the first of which = Divinity, and the second = Humanity, whence seven = Divinity + Humanity, or, in other words, the unity between God and Man, as effected by the manifestations of the Divinity in creation and revelation. This theory is seductive from its ingenuity, and its appeal to the imagination, but there appears to be little foundation for it (so Mr. Bevan, original author of this article). The second class of opinions attribute the symbolism of the number seven to external associations, and may be subdivided into two sorts, according as the symbolism is supposed to have originated in the observation of purely physical phenomena, or in the peculiar religious enactments of Mosaism. The influence of the number seven was not restricted to the Hebrews; it prevailed among the Persians (Esth. i. 10, 14), among the ancient Indians, among the Greeks and Romans to a certain extent, and probably among all nations where the WEEK of seven days was established, as in China, Egypt, Arabia, &c. The wide range of the word seven is in this respect an interesting and significant fact: it is the only numeral, except "six," which the Shemitic languages have in common with the Indo-European. In the countries above enumerated, the institution of seven as a cyclical number is attributed to the observation of the changes of the moon, or to the supposed number of the planets. The peculiarity of the Hebrew view consists in the special dignity of the seventh, and not simply in that of seven. We cannot trace back the peculiar associations of the Hebrews farther than to the point when the seventh day was consecrated to the purposes of religious rest. Assuming this, therefore, as our starting-point, the first idea associated with seven would be that of religious periodicity. The SABBATH, being the seventh day, suggested the adoption of seven as the coefficient, so to say, for the appointment of all sacred periods. (FESTIVALS; JUBILEE; SABBATICAL YEAR, &c.) From the idea of periodicity, it passed by an easy transition to the duration or repetition of religious proceedings; and thus seven days were appointed as the length of the Feasts of Passover and Tabernacles; seven days for the ceremonies for the consecration of priests, &c.; seven things to be offered in sacrifice (oxen, sheep, goats, pigeons, wheat, oil, wine); seven victims to be offered on any special occasion, as in Balaam's sacrifice (Num. xxiii. 1), and especially at the ratification of a treaty, the notion of seven being embodied in the Hebrew term (nishba') signifying to swear, literally meaning to do seven times (Gen. xxi. 28). The number seven, having thus been impressed with the seal of sanctity as the symbol of all connected with the Divinity, was adopted generally as a cyclical number, with the subordinate notions of perfection or completeness (iv. 15; Lev. xvi. 18, 28; Ps. lxxix. 12; Prov. vi. 31; Mat. xviii. 21). It is mentioned in numerous passages (e. g. Job v. 19; Jer. xv. 9; Mat. xii. 45) in a sense analogous to that of a "round number," but with the additional idea of sufficiency and completeness (see also Gen. xli. 2-7; Josh. vi. 4; 2 K. v. 10; NUMBER; SEVEN, THE, &c.). The foregoing applications of the number seven become of great practical importance in connection with the interpretation of some of the prophetic portions of the Bible, and particularly of the Apocalypse. We have but to run over the chief subjects of that book (the seven churches, seals, trumpets, vials, angels, spirits before the throne, &c.), to see the necessity of deciding whether the number is to be accepted in a literal or metaphorical sense—in other words, whether it represents a number or a quality. The decision of this question affects not only the number seven, but also the number which stands in antagonism to seven, viz. the half of seven, which appears under the form of forty-two months =  $3\frac{1}{2}$  years (Rev. xiii. 5), twelve hundred and sixty days, also =  $3\frac{1}{2}$  years (xi. 3, xii. 6), and again a time, times, and half a time =  $3\frac{1}{2}$  years (xii. 14). If seven express the notion of completeness, then half-seven = incompleteness and the secondary ideas of suffering and disaster: if the one represent divine agency, the other may represent human agency. OLD TESTAMENT, B; PROPHECY.

* Sev'en, the (Acts xxi. 8, compare vi. 3 ff.), commonly regarded as deacons of the Church in Jerusalem, or as appointed to an office out of which grew that of DEACON.

* Sev'en Stars, the = the PLEIADÆ.

* Se-ve'neh (Heb.) = SYENE (Ez. xxix. 10 marg.).

* Sev'en-ty, the. 1. The seventy disciples sent by our Lord into the places which He was about to visit (Lk. x. 17, comp. 1).—2. The phrase is also used (not in the Scriptures) to denote the translators of the SEPTUAGINT version of the O. T., or the Septuagint itself.

* Sex-ta'ri-us (L.; Gr. zestis) = (so Rbn. N. T. Lxx.) nearly one pint English (Mk. vii. 4 margin). POT 12; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

* Sha-al-ab'blin (Heb.) = SHAAALBIM, a town of Dan, named between IR-SHEMESH and AJALON (Josh. xix. 42).

* Sha-al'blim (Heb. city of foxes, Ges.), one of the towns held by the original inhabitants of Canaan after the general conquest (Judg. i. 35); mentioned with Ajalon again in Josh. xix. 42 ("SHAAALABBIN"), and with BETH-SHEMESH both there and in 1 K. iv. 9, in the last passage as making up one of Solomon's commissariat districts; site unknown. SHAAALBONITE.

* Sha-al'bon-lte (fr. Heb., see below), the. Eliahba the Shaalbonite was one of David's thirty-seven heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 32; 1 Chr. xi. 33). He was the native of a place named Shaalbon, unmentioned elsewhere, unless = SHAAALIM or SHAAALBIM.

* Sha'aph (Heb. division, Ges.). 1. Son of Jahdai (1 Chr. ii. 47).—2. Son of CALEB 1 by his concubine Maachah (ii. 49).

* Sha-a-ra'im (fr. Heb. dual = two gates, Ges.), a city of Judah (Josh. xv. 36, A. V. incorrectly "Shairaim"), mentioned again in the account of the rout which followed the fall of Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 52); probably somewhere W. of Shureikeh (Socoh 1), on the lower slopes of the hills, where they subside into the great plain. We find the name in a list of the towns of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 31), occupying the same place with SHAR'HEN and SHILHIM, in the corresponding lists of Joshua. It is impossible (so Mr. Grove) that the same Shaaraim can be intended, and indeed it may be a mere corruption of one of the other two names.

* Sha-ash'gaz (Heb. fr. Pers. = beauty's servant) [= so Bohlen]? Ges.), the eunuch in the palace of Ahasuerus who had the custody of the women in the second house (Esth. ii. 14). HEGAI.

Shab'-be-thal, or Shab'-beth'-a-l (Heb. sabbath-born, Ges.). 1. A Levite who assisted Ezra in investigating the marriages with foreigners (Ezr. x. 15); apparently the same who with Jeshua and others instructed the people in the knowledge of the Law (Neh. viii. 7).—2. One of the chiefs of the Levites after the return from Babylon (xi. 16); possibly = No. 1.

Sha-chl'a [-ki-] (fr. Heb. shāchēyāh = accusation, Ges.). Many Hebrew MSS. and editions have Shābē-yāh, Ges., which would become Shabiah according to the analogy of the A. V., a son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chr. viii. 10).

Shad-dai, or Shad'-da-l (Heb. shadday = the Almighty, Ges.), an ancient name of God, rendered "ALMIGHTY" everywhere in the A. V. In all passages of Genesis, except xlix. 25, in Ex. vi. 3, and in Ez. x. 5, it is found in connection with el, "God," El-Shaddai being there rendered "God Almighty," or "the Almighty God." It occurs six times in Genesis (xvii. 1, xxviii. 3, xxxv. 11, xliiii. 14, xlviii. 3, xlix. 25), once in Exodus (vi. 3), twice in Numbers (xxiv. 4, 16), twice in Ruth (i. 20, 21), thirty-one times in Job, twice in the Psalms (lxviii. 14 [Heb. 15], xci. 1), once in Isaiah (xliii. 6), twice in Ezekiel (i. 24, x. 25), and once in Joel (i. 15). In Genesis and Exodus it is found in what are called the Elohist portions of those books (PENTATEUCH), in Numbers in the Jehovistic portion, and throughout Job the name Shaddai stands in parallelism with Elohim, and never with JEHOVAH.

* Shad'-ow. CLOUD; DARKNESS; DEATH; OLD TESTAMENT, B; PROPHET.

Shad'-rach [-drak] (fr. Pers. = rejoicing in the way [so Bohlen], or royal [so Benfey]? Ges.), the Chaldean name of HANANIAH 7, the chief of the "three holy children," who were cast into the burning fiery furnace, and miraculously preserved (Dan. i.—iii.). (MESHACH; DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO, 1, a.) After their deliverance from the furnace, we hear no more of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego in the O. T.; and they are spoken of in the N. T. only in the pointed allusion to them as having "through faith quenched the violence of fire" (Heb. xi. 33, 34). But there are repeated allusions to them in the BOOKS OF MACCABEES, and the martyrs of the Maccabean period seem to have been much encouraged by their example (1 Mc. ii. 59, 60; 3 Mc. vi. 6; 4 Mc. xiii. 9, xvi. 3, 21, xviii. 12).

Sha'-ge (Heb. erring, Ges.), father of Jonathan the Hararite, one of David's "valiant men" (1 Chr. xi. 34). SHAMMAH 5.

Sha-ha-ra'-lm (fr. Heb. = *the two dawn*s, Ges.), a Benjamite whose history and descent are alike obscure in the present text (1 Chr. viii. 8). It has been proposed to remove the full stop from the end of verse 7, and read on thus: "and [Gera] begat Uzza and Abihud, and Shaharaim he begat in the field of Moab," &c. He had three wives and nine children.

Sha-haz'l-mah (fr. Heb. = heights, Ges.), a city of Issachar, apparently between Tabor and the Jordan (Josh. xix. 22 only).

Shal'em (Heb. whole, sound, safe, Ges.). Mr. Grove believes that this word in Gen. xxxiii. 18 should not be taken as a proper name, but that the sentence should be rendered, "Jacob came safe to the city of SHECHEM," though he considers it remarkable that there should be a modern village named Salim in a position to a certain degree consistent with the requirements of the narrative when so interpreted:—viz. three miles E. of Nablus (the ancient Shechem), and therefore between it and the Jordan Valley, where verse 17 leaves Jacob settled. But he adduces several considerations which weigh very much against this being more than a fortuitous coincidence. (1.) If Shalem was the city in front of which Jacob pitched his tent, then it certainly was the scene of the events of chapter xxxiv.; and Jacob's well and Joseph's tomb must be removed from the situation in which tradition has so appropriately placed them to some spot further E. and nearer to Salim. (2.) Though E. of Nablus, Salim does not appear to lie near any actual line of communication between it and the Jordan Valley. (3.) With the exception of the LXX., Peshito-Syriac, and Vulgate, among the ancients, and Luther's and the A. V. among the moderns, the unanimous voice of translators and scholars is in favor of treating shalēm as a mere appellative. Salim does not appear to have been visited by any traveller.

Shal'im (fr. Heb. = foxes' region, Ges.; see below), the Land of; a district through which Saul passed on his journey in quest of his father's asses (1 Sam. ix. 4 only). The name in the original, properly Sha'atim, had no connection with SHALEM, or with the modern Salim, E. of Nablus. Mr. Grove conjectures that the district may = the "land of SHUAL."

Shal'-sha (fr. Heb. = triad, Ges.), the Land of; one of the districts traversed by Saul when in search of the asses of Kish (1 Sam. ix. 4 only). It apparently lay between "Mount Ephraim" and the "land of SHALIM," a specification which with all its evident preciseness is irreco gnizable. The difficulty is increased by placing Shalisha with some at Sāris or Khirbet Sāris, a village a few miles W. of Jerusalem. If the land of Shalisha contained, as it not impossibly did, the place called BAAL-SHALISHA (2 K. iv. 42), then the whole disposition of Saul's route would be changed (so Mr. Grove).

Shal'-le-eth [-keth] (Heb. a casting-down, or falling, Ges.), the Gate; one of the gates of the "house of Jehovah," whether by that be intended the sacred tent of David or the Temple of Solomon (1 Chr. xxvi. 16). It was the gate "to the causeway of the ascent," and is identified by Mr. Grove with the Bab Silaleh, or Sinsleh, which enters the western wall of the Haram, about 600 feet from the southwestern corner of the Haram wall.

Shal'lum (Heb. retribution, Ges.). 1. Fifteenth king of Israel, and son of Jabesh, conspired against ZACHARIAH 1, son of Jeroboam II., killed him, brought the dynasty of JEHU to a close (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF), and was made king, but after reigning in Samaria for a month only, was in his turn dethroned and killed by MENAHEM (2 K. xv. 10–15).—2. Husband (or son, according to the LXX. in 2 K.) of HULDAH the prophetess (2 K. xxii. 14; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 22) in the reign of Josiah. He appears to have been keeper of the priestly vestments in the Temple.

—3. A descendant of SHESHAN (1 Chr. ii. 40, 41).—4. Son of Josiah, king of Judah; known as JEHOIAHAZ (iii. 15; Jer. xxii. 11).—5. Son of Shaul the son of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 25).—6. A HIGH-PRIEST, son of Zadok and ancestor of Ezra (vi. 12, 13; Ezr. vii. 2); = MESHULLAM 7.—7. A son of NAPHTALI (1 Chr. vii. 13).—8. Chief of a family of porters or gatekeepers of the eastern gate of the Temple (ix. 17). His descendants were among those who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45).

—9. Son of Kore, a Korahite (1 Chr. ix. 19, 31); probably (so Lord A. C. Hervey) = MESHELEMIAN and SHELEMIAN 6.—10. Father of Jehizkiah, an Ephraimite (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).—11. One of the porters of the Temple who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 24).—12. One of the sons of Bani, husband of a foreign wife (x. 42).—13. Son of Haloehesh and ruler of a district (PART) of Jerusalem. He and his daughters helped to repair the wall (Neh. iii. 12).—14. Uncle of Jeremiah and father of Hanameel (Jer. xxxii. 7); perhaps = No. 2 (so Lord A. C. Hervey).—15. Father or ancestor of MAASEIAH 19 (Jer. xxxv. 4); perhaps = No. 9.

Shal'lun (Heb. probably = SHALLUM, Ges.), son of Col-hozeh, and ruler of a district ("PART") of Mizpah, repaired the fountain-gate and the wall of the pool of Siloah (Neh. iii. 15).

Shal'mal, or Shal'mai (Heb. my thanks, Ges.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 46, "Shamlai" margin; Neh. vii. 48, Heb. "Salmal").

Shal'man (Heb.) = SHALMANESER, king of Assyria (Hos. x. 14).

Shal-man-e'ser [-zer] (Heb. fr. Pers. = reverential toward fire? Bohnen), the Assyrian king who reigned immediately before SARGON, and probably immediately after TIGLATH-PILESER. He can scarcely have ascended the throne earlier than B. C. 730, and possibly not till a few years later (so Rawlinson). Soon after his accession he led the forces of Assyria into Palestine, where HOSHEA, the last king of Israel, had revolted against his authority (2 K. xvii. 3). Hoshea submitted and consented to pay him a fixed tribute annually, but soon after concluded an alliance with the king of Egypt, and withheld his tribute in consequence. In B. C. 723 Shalmaneser invaded Palestine for the second time, and, as Hoshea refused to submit, laid siege to SAMARIA. The siege lasted to the third year (B. C. 721), when the Assyrian arms prevailed (2 K. xvii. 4-6, xviii. 9-11). It is uncertain whether Shalmaneser conducted the siege to its close, or was succeeded by Sargon before the city was taken.

Sham-a-r'ah (fr. Heb. = SHEMARIAH), son of Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 19).

* Sham'bles [-blz], the A. V. translation of Gr. makellon = (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) a meat-market, or place for the sale of provisions of all kinds (1 Cor. x. 25). Meats might first be offered in SACRIFICE to idols, and, after the heathen priest and altar had received their shares, might then be taken to the market to be sold. A Christian might buy or eat such meats, unless informed of the idolatrous relation, when he was to abstain for the sake of others. IDOLATRY.

Shamed (Heb. in some MSS., = extinction, persecution, Ges.; but most read SHAMER or SHEMER), one of the sons of Elpaal the Benjamite "who built Ono and Lod, with the towns thereof" (1 Chr. viii. 12).

Shamer (Heb. kept, preserved, lees of wine, Ges.). 1. A Merarite Levite, ancestor of Ethan (1 Chr. vi. 46).—2. SHOMER 1, son of Heber, an Asherite (vii. 34).

Sham'gar (Heb. perhaps = SANGAR [see SANGAR-NEBO], or fr. Ar. = fleeing, Fii.), JUDGE of Israel after EHUD, and before BARAK, though possibly contemporary with the latter, since he seems to be spoken of in Judg. v. 6, as a contemporary of Jael, if the reading is correct. Lord A. C. Hervey con-jectures from his being "son of Anath" that Shamgar may have been of the tribe of Naphtali, since BETH-ANATH is in that tribe. In the days of Shamgar, Israel was in a most depressed condition, and the whole nation was cowed (Judg. v. 6). At this conjuncture Shamgar was raised up to be a deliverer. With no arms in his hand but an ox-goad (iii. 31; compare 1 Sam. xiii. 21), he made a desperate assault upon the PHILISTINES, and slew 600 of them. But it was reserved for Deborah and Barak to complete the deliverance.

Sham'huth (Heb. = SHAMMAH, Ges.), the fifth captain for the fifth month in David's arrangement of his army (1 Chr. xxvii. 8); = SHAMMOTH.

Sham'ir (Heb. a thorn, ADAMANT, A. V., Ges.). 1. A town in the mountain district of Judah (Josh. xv. 48 only); probably eight or ten miles S. of Hebron, but not yet discovered (so Mr. Grove).—2. A place in Mount Ephraim, the residence and burial-place of TOLA the judge (Judg. x. 1, 2). It is singular that this judge, a man of Issachar, should have taken up his official residence out of his own tribe. Schwarz would identify Shamir with Sânûr (BETHULIA ?); Van de Velde proposes Khîrbet Sammer, a ruined site ten miles E. S. E. of Nâblus (SHECHEM).

Sham'ir (see above), a Kohathite, son of Micah, or Michah, the first-born of UZZIEL (1 Chr. xxiv. 24).

* Sham'lai = SHALMAI (Ezr. ii. 46 margin).

Sham'ma (Heb. desolation, Ges.), an Aserite chief, son of Zophar (1 Chr. vii. 37).

Sham'mah (Heb. astonishment, desolation, Ges.). 1. An Edomite "DUKE," son of Reuel the son of Esau (Gen. xxxv. 13, 17; 1 Chr. i. 37).—2. Third son of Jesse, and brother of David (1 Sam. xvi. 9, xvii. 13); = SHIMEA 4, SHIMEAH 1, and SHIMMA.—3. One of the three greatest of David's mighty men. He was with him during his outlaw life in the cave of Adullam, and signalized himself by defending a piece of ground full of lentiles against the Philistines on one of their marauding incursions. This achievement gave him a place among the first three heroes, who, on another occasion, cut their way through the Philistine garrison, and brought David water from the well of Bethlehem (2 Sam. xiii. 11-17). Keil and Bertheau suppose that, by a copyist's error, several verses have been omitted from the parallel passage in 1 Chr. xi. 13 after the words "to battle," and that the discrepancy between the field of "lentiles" in 2 Sam., and of "barley" in 1 Chr., arose from a transposition in the letters of the original Hebrew word. Kennicott proposes in both cases to read "barley."—4. "The HARODITE," one of David's thirty "valiant men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 25); called "SHAMMOTH the Harodite" in 1 Chr. xi. 27, and (so Mr. Wright, Gesenius, &c.) in 1 Chr. xxvii. 8 "SHAMHUTH the Izrahite." Kennicott maintained the true reading in both to be "Shamboth the Harodite."—5. In the list of David's thirty "valiant men" in 2 Sam. xxiii. 32, 33, we find "Jonathan, Shammah the Hararite;" while in the corresponding verse, 1 Chr. xi. 34, it is "Jonathan, the son of Shage the Hararite." Combining the two, Kennicott proposes to read "Jonathan, the son of Shamma, the Hararite," i. e. JONATHAN 2.

Sham'mai, or Sham'mai (Heb. desolated, Ges.). The name of three descendants of Judah. 1. Son of Onam (1 Chr. ii. 28, 32).—2. Son of Rekem (ii. 44, 45).—3. Brother of Miriam and Ishlah the founder of Eshtemoa (iv. 17).

Sham'moth (Heb. desolations, Ges.), "the Harorite," one of David's "valiant men" (1 Chr. xi. 27); = SHAMMUAH 4 and SHAMHUTH.

Sham-ma'a (Heb. = SHIMEA, Ges.). 1. The Reubenite spy, son of Zaccur (Num. xiii. 4).—2. Son of David, by Bath-sheba (1 Chr. xiv. 4); = SHAMMUAH and SHIMEA 1.—3. A Levite, father of Abda (Neh. xi. 17); = SHEMAIAH 6.—4. The representative of the priestly family of Bilgah, or Bilgai, in the days of Joiakim (xii. 18).

Sham-mu'ah (fr. Heb.) = SHAMMUA 2 and SHIMEA 1, son of David (2 Sam. v. 14).

Sham'she-ral (Heb., fr. SHIMSHAI and SHIMRI, Ges.), a Benjamite chief, son of Jeroham (1 Chr. viii. 26).

Shapham (Heb. cold, or bald, shaven? Ges.), a Gadite of Bashan (1 Chr. v. 12).

Shaphan (Heb. = CONEY, A. V.), the scribe or secretary of King JOSIAH; son of Azaliah (2 K. xxii. 3; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8); father of Ahikam (2 K. xxii. 12; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 20), Elasah (Jer. xxix. 3), and Gemariah (xxxvi. 10-12); and grandfather of Gedaliah (xxxix. 14, xl. 5, 9, 11, xli. 2, xliii. 6), Michaiah (xxxvi. 11), and probably of Jaazaniah (Ez. viii. 11). There seems (so Mr. Wright) no sufficient reason for supposing that Shaphan the father of Ahikam, and Shaphan the scribe, were different persons. Shaphan the scribe appears on an equality with the governor of the city and the royal recorder, with whom he was sent by the king to Hil-kiah to take an account of the money collected by the Levites for the repair of the Temple and to pay the workmen (2 K. xxii. 4; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 9; compare 2 K. xii. 10). Ewald calls him Minister of Finance. On this occasion HILKIAH communicated his discovery of a copy of the Law, which he had probably found while making preparations for the repair of the Temple. (PENTATEUCH.) Shaphan was then apparently an old man, for his son AHIKAM must have been in a position of importance, and his grandson GEDALIAH was already born. Shaphan probably died before the fifth year of Jehoiakim, eighteen years later, when we find Elishama was scribe (Jer. xxxvi. 12).

Shaphat (Heb. judge, Ges.). 1. The Simeonite spy, son of Hori (Num. xiii. 5).—2. Father of the prophet ELISHA (1 K. xix. 16, 19; 2 K. iii. 11, vi. 31).—3. One of the six sons of Shemaiah in the royal line of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 22).—4. A Gadite in Bashan (v. 12).—5. Son of Adlai, and keeper of David's oxen in the valleys (xxvii. 29).

Shapher (Heb. pleasantness, Mount (Num. xxxiii. 23), the name of a desert-station where the Israelites encamped; supposed by Mr. Rowlands (in Fbn.) to be at Jebel 'Ardif, a conspicuous conical mountain in the desert sixty or seventy miles S. S. W. of Beer-sheba. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Shar'al, or Shar'a-l (Heb. Jehovah frees him [so Sim.]? Ges.), one of the sons of Bani in Ezra's time, husband of a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 40).

Sha-ra'im (fr. Heb.) = SHAAARAIM (Josh. xv. 36 only).

Shar'ar (Heb. twist, cord, Ges.), father of Ahiam the Hararite (2 Sam. xxiii. 33); = SACAR.

Sha-re-zer (fr. Pers. = prince of fire, Ges.), a son and murderer of SENNACHERIB (2 K. xix. 37, &c.). ADRAAMELECH 2.

Sharon [shair'on] (Heb. plain, Ges.). 1. A district of the Holy Land, always called in the original "the Sharon" (1 Chr. v. 16, xxvii. 29; Is. xxxiii. 9, xxxv. 2, lxx. 10; Cant. ii. 1; Acts ix. 35, A. V. "SARON"). It is that broad rich tract of land which lies between the mountains of the central part of the Holy Land and the Mediterranean—the region extending from CESAREA to JOPPA. A general sketch of the district is given under PALESTINE, II., §§ 31 ff. (ROSE).—2. The "Sharon" of 1 Chr. v. 16 is distinguished from the western plain by not having the article. It is also apparent from the passage itself that it was some district E. of Jordan, in the neighborhood of GILEAD and BASHAN. The name has not been met with in that direction. Dr. Stanley suggests that Sharon may here = the Mishor = PLAIN 4.

Shar'on-ite [shair-] (fr. Heb. = one from SHARON), the; Shitrai, who had charge of the royal herds pastured in Sharon (1 Chr. xxvii. 29) is the only Sharonite mentioned in the Bible.

Sha-ra'hen (Heb. pleasant lodging? Ges.), a town named in Josh. xix. 6 only, among those allotted within Judah to Simeon; apparently = SHILHIM (xv. 32), and SHAAARAIM (1 Chr. iv. 31). Whether these are different places, or different names of the same place, or mere variations of copyists, it is perhaps impossible now to determine. Knobel would identify it with Tell Sherfah, about ten miles W. of Beer-sheba, at the head of the Wady Sherfah, a position not unsuitable. Wilton (The Negeb) and Rowlands (in Fairbairn, under "South Country") would identify it with Khirbet es-Serām (= ruins of Serām), an ancient site in Wady es-Serām, E. of el-Aujeh (AZEM), near which is el-Birein (= the wells), a fertile spot with four wells of good water.

Sha'shal, or Shash'a-l (Heb. whitish? Ges.), one of the sons of Bani in Ezra's time, who put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 40).

Sha'shak (Heb. eagerness, longing [so Sim.]? Ges.), a Benjamite, son of Beriah (1 Chr. viii. 14, 25).

Shaul, or Shaul (Heb. = SAUL). 1. Son of Simeon by a Canaanitish woman (Gen. xli. 10; Ex. vi. 15; Num. xxvi. 13; 1 Chr. iv. 24), and founder of the family of the SHALITES.—2. One of the kings of Edom (i. 48, 49); = SAUL 1.—3. A Kohathite, son of Uziah (vi. 24).

* Shaul-ites, or Shaul'ites, the = the descendants of SAUL 1 (Num. xxvi. 13).

Sha'veh (Heb. a plain, Ges.), the Val'ley of (Heb. 'emek; see VALLEY 1), a name found only in Gen. xiv. 17—"the valley of Shaveh, which is the king's dale." This is generally identified with "the KING'S DALE" of 2 Sam. xviii. 18, placed by Josephus (vii. 10, § 3), and by mediæval and modern tradition in the immediate neighborhood of JERUSALEM. Robinson (Phys. Geog. 101) regards it as the upper part of the Kidron valley, near the tombs of the Judges. Stanley (246 f., 478) thinks the "king's dale," or "valley of Shaveh," was E. of the Jordan, near the spot where ABSALOM fell. MELCHIZEDEK; SALEM 1.

Sha'veh-kir-i-a-ta'im (fr. Heb. = the plain of KIRIATHAIM, Ges.), mentioned (Gen. xiv. 5) as the residence of EMIM at the time of Chedorlaomer's incursion; probably the valley in or by which the town of KIRIATHAIM lay.

Shav'sha (Heb., a corruption of SERAIAH, Ges.), the royal secretary in the reign of David (1 Chr. xviii. 16); = SERAIAH 1, SHEVA 1, and SHISHA. KING; SCRIBE.

Shawm. In the Prayer-book version of Ps. xcvi. 7, "with trumpets also and shawms" is the rendering of what stands in the A. V. "with trumpets and sound of CORNET." The "shawm" was a musical instrument resembling the clarinet.

* Sheaf. AGRICULTURE; FIRST-FRUITS; PASSOVER, II. 3, g, &c.

She'al (Heb. an asking, Ges.), one of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 29).

She'al'ti-el (Heb. I have asked him of God, Ges.)

father of ZERUBBABEL (Ezr. iii. 2, 8, v. 2; Neh. xii. 1; Hag. i. 1, 12, 14, ii. 2, 23); = SALATHIEL.

She-a-ri'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah estimates, Ges.), one of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 38, ix. 44).

Shear'ing-house (Heb. béyth 'eked; see below), the, a place on the road between Jezreel and Samaria, at which Jehu, on his way to the latter, encountered forty-two members of the royal family of Judah, whom he slaughtered at the well or pit attached to the place (2 K. x. 12, 14). The A. V. margin gives as the literal meaning of the name—"house of binding of the shepherds;" Gesenius gives house of the shepherds' hamlet. The LXX., Eusebius and Jerome, Gesenius, &c., make it a proper name, BETH-EKED. Eusebius mentions it as a village of Samaria "in the great plain [of Esdraelon] fifteen miles from Legeon" (MEGIDDO).

She'ar-j'a'shub (fr. Heb. = the remnant shall return, be converted, Ges.), son of ISAIAH the prophet (Is. vii. 3). The name, like that of MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, had a mystical significance (compare Is. x. 20-22).

* Sheath. ARMS, I. 1.

* Sheaves, plural of SHEAF. AGRICULTURE.

She'ba (Heb. sheba' = seven, or an oath, compare BEER-SHEBA). 1. Son of Bichri; a Benjamite from the mountains of Ephraim (2 Sam. xx. 1-22), the last chief of the Absalom insurrection, described as a "man of Belial." He must have been a person of some consequence, from the immense effect produced by his appearance. It was in fact all but an anticipation of the revolt of Jeroboam. The occasion seized by Sheba was the emulation, as if from loyalty, between the northern and southern tribes on David's return (1, 2). The king might well say, "Sheba the son of Bichri shall do us more harm than did Absalom" (6). Sheba traversed the whole of Palestine, apparently rousing the population, JOAB following in full pursuit. It seems to have been his intention to establish himself in the fortress of ABEL-BETH-MAACIAH, famous for the prudence of its inhabitants (18). That prudence was put to the test on the present occasion. Joab's terms were—the head of the insurgent chief. A woman of the place undertook the mission to her city, and proposed the execution to her fellow-citizens. The head of Sheba was thrown over the wall, and the insurrection ended.—2. A Gadite chief in Bashan (1 Chr. v. 13).

She'ba (Heb. shēbā; compare Ethiopic = man, Ges.). 1. A son of RAAMAH, son of CUSH (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chr. i. 9).—2. A son of JOKTAN (Gen. x. 28; 1 Chr. i. 22).—3. A son of JOKSHAN, son of KETURAH (Gen. xxv. 3; 1 Chr. i. 32). This article (originally by Mr. E. S. Poole) considers, I., the history of the Joktanite Sheba; and, II., the Cushite Sheba and the Keturahite Sheba together.—I. It has been shown, under ARABIA, &c., that the Joktanites were among the early colonists of southern Arabia, and that the kingdom which they there founded was, for many centuries, called the kingdom of Sheba, after one of the sons of Joktan. They appear to have been preceded by an aboriginal race, described by the Arabian historians as of gigantic stature. But besides these extinct tribes, there are the evidences of Cushite settlers, who probably preceded the Joktanites. Sheba seems to have been the name of the great south Arabian kingdom and the peoples which composed it, until that of Himyer took its place in later times. On this point much obscurity remains. The apparent difficulties of the case are reconciled by supposing, as M. Caussin de Perceval has done, that the kingdom and its people received the name of Sheba (Ar. Sebā), but that its chief and sometimes reigning family or tribe was that of Himyer. In the Bible, the Joktanite Sheba, mentioned genealogically in Gen. x. 28, recurs, as a kingdom, in the account of the visit of the queen of Sheba to King Solomon (1 K. x.). That the queen was of Sheba in Arabia, and not of Seba the Cushite kingdom of Ethiopia, is unquestionable (so Mr. Poole); Josephus and some of the Rabbinical writers, and the Ethiopian (or Abyssinian) Church, refer her to the latter. The Arabs call her Bilkus (or Yelkamah or Balkamah), a queen of the later Himyerites of the first century A. C., according to M. Caussin. The other passages in the Bible which seem to refer to the Joktanite Sheba are Is. lx. 6 (where reference is made to the commerce from Sheba along the western borders of Arabia, but possibly referring to the Cushite or Keturahite Sheba), and Jer. vi. 20. In Ps. lxxii. 10, the Joktanite Sheba is undoubtedly meant. The kingdom of Sheba embraced the greater part of the Yemen, or Arabia Felix. Its chief cities, and probably successive capitals, were Seba, San'a' (UZAL), and Zafar (SEPHAR). Seba was probably the name of the city, and generally of the country and nation; but the statements of the Arabian writers are conflicting on this point. Ma-rīb was another name of the city, or of the fortress or royal palace in it. Near Sebā was the famous dike of El-'Arim, said by tradition to have been built by Lukmān the 'Adite, to store water for the inhabitants of the place, and to avert the descent of the mountain-torrents. The catastrophe of the rupture of this dike is an important point in Arab history, and marks the dispersion in the second century of the Joktanite tribes. This, like all we know of Sebā, points irresistibly to the great importance of the city as the ancient centre of Joktanite power. The history of the Sabæans has been examined by M. Caussin de Perceval, but much remains to be adjusted before its details can be received as trustworthy, the earliest safe chronological point being about the commencement of our era. An examination of the existing remains of Sabæan and Himyerite cities and buildings will, it cannot be doubted, add more facts to our present knowledge. The ancient buildings are of massive masonry, and evidently of Cushite workmanship or origin. Later temples, and palaces, temples, of which the Arabs give us descriptions, were probably of less massive character; but Sabæan art is an almost unknown and interesting subject of inquiry. The religion celebrated in those temples was cosmic; but this subject is too obscure and too little known to admit of discussion in this place. (IDOLATRY).—II. Sheba, son of Raamah son of Cush, settled somewhere on the shores of the Persian Gulf. Mr. E. S. Poole identifies his settlement with the ruins of an ancient city called Sebi, on the island of Awāl (one of the "Bahrein Islands"). It was this Sheba that carried on the great Indian traffic with Palestine, in conjunction with, as Mr. Poole holds, the other Sheba, son of Jokshan son of Keturah, who, like DEDAN, appears to have formed, with the Cushite of the same name, one tribe. The trade is mentioned in Ez. xxvii. 22, 23, and possibly in Is. lx. 6 and Jer. vi. 20 (see above in I.). The predatory bands of the Keturahites are mentioned in Job i. 15, vi. 19.

She'ba (Heb. an oath, or seven; compare BEER-SHEBA), a city of Simeon (Josh. xix. 2); probably (so Mr. Grove) = SHEMA, which stands next to Mol-adah, in the list of the cities of the south of Judah (xv. 26). This suggestion is supported by the reading (Samaa) of the Vatican LXX. Some (Fairbairn, &c.) suppose Sheba a mere repetition of part of the preceding Beer-sheba, and this is favored by the number of names in xix. 2-6 being fourteen with Sheba, but said to be thirteen, and the omission of Sheba in 1 Chr. iv. 28.

She'bah (fr. Heb. shib'ēah, fem. of sheba = seven, Ges.; "an oath," A. V. margin; see above), the famous well which gave its name to the city of BEER-SHEBA (Gen. xxvi. 33), the fourth of the series of wells dug by Isaac's people.

She'bam (fr. Heb. = coolness, or fragrance, Ges.), one of the towns in the pastoral district E. of Jordan—demanded by and finally ceded to the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Num. xxxii. 3 only); probably = SHIBMAH and SIBMAH.

Sheb-a-ni'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah has made grow up? Ges.). 1. A Levite in Ezra's time, who took part in the psalm of thanksgiving and confession (Neh. ix. 4, 5). He sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 10).—2. A priest, or priestly family, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 4, xii. 14); = SHECHANIAH 7.—3. Another Levite who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 12).—4. One of the priests appointed by David to blow with the trumpets before the ark of God (1 Chr. xv. 24).

Sheb'a-rim (Heb. breaches, ruins, as of walls, Ges.; see below), a place named in Josh. vii. 5 only, as one of the points in the flight from Ai; perhaps (so Mr. Grove) a spot where there were fiasures or rents in the soil, gradually deepening till they ended in a sheer descent or precipice to the ravine by which the Israelites had come from Gilgal; site unknown.

She'ber (Heb. a breaking, Sim.), son of CALEB 1 by his concubine Maachah (1 Chr. ii. 48).

Sheb'na (Heb. youth? Ges.), a person of high position in Hezekiah's court, holding at one time the office of prefect of the palace (Is. xxii. 15), but subsequently (so Mr. Bevan, &c.) the subordinate office of secretary (xxxvi. 3; 2 K. xix. 2). Shebna was denounced by ISAIAH on account of his pride, luxury, &c. (Is. xxii. 16 ff.). From the omission of his father's name, it has been conjectured that he was the first of his family to attain distinction, perhaps a foreigner. Some have supposed "Shebna the scribe" a different person from Shebna "the treasurer," that was "over the house."

Sheb'u-el (Heb. captive of God, Ges.). 1. A descendant of Gershom (1 Chr. xxiii. 16, xxvi. 24), who was ruler of the treasures of the house of God; = SHUBAEL 1. He is the last descendant of Moses of whom there is any trace.—2. One of the fourteen sons of Heman the minstrel, chief of the thirteenth band of twelve in the Temple-choir (xxv. 4); = SHUBAEL 2.

Shee-a-ni'ah (fr. Heb. = SHECHANIAH). 1. Chief of the tenth course of priests in David's reign (1 Chr. xxiv. 11).—2. A priest or Levite in Hezekiah's reign, appointed to distribute portions to priests (2 Chr. xxxi. 15).

Sheeh-a-ni'ah [shek-] (fr. Heb. = familiar with Jehovah, Ges.). 1. A descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 21, 22).—2. Ancestor of some descendants of Parosh who returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 3).—3. Ancestor of another family who returned with Ezra (viii. 5). In this verse it has been supposed that some name is omitted, and that perhaps the reading should be: "of the sons of Zattu, Shechaniah, the son of Jahaziel."—4. Son of Jehiel the sons of Elam, proposed a covenant to put away the foreign wives (Ezr. x. 2).—5. Father of SHEMAIAH 2 (Neh. iii. 29).—6. Son of Arah, and father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (vi. 18).—7. Head of a priestly family who returned with Zerubbabel (xii. 3); = SHEBANIAH 2. Compare SHECANIAH 1.

She'chem [-kem] (Heb. shoulder, ridge), also written SICHEM (L. form), and SYCHEM; a celebrated city of Palestine. It has been made a question whether the place was so called from SHECHEM 1, the son of Hamor (Gen. xxxiii. 18 ff.), or whether he received his name from the city. The import of the name favors, certainly, the latter supposition (so Prof. Hackett, original author of this article). The Hebrew etymology indicates that the place was situated on some mountain or hill-side; and that presumption agrees with Josh. xx. 7, which places it in Mount Ephraim (see also 1 K. xii. 25), and with Judg. ix. 9, which represents it as under the summit of Gerizim, which belonged to the Ephraim range. The other Biblical intimations in regard to its situation are only indirect (Gen. xxxiii. 18? SHALEM; xxxvii. 12, &c.; Judg. xxi. 1; Jn. iv. 5; SYCHAR). But the historical and traditional data outside of the Bible are abundant and decisive. Josephus describes Shechem as between GERIZIM and EBAL. The present Nābulus is a corruption merely of Neapolis; and Neapolis succeeded the more ancient Shechem (Josephus, Epiphanius, Jerome, &c.). The city received its new name (Gr. Neapolis = new city) from Vespasian, and on coins still extant is called Flavia Neapolis. Its situation, nearly midway between Judea and Galilee, and thus a "thoroughfare" on this important route, accounts for another name, written Mabortha or Mabartiha by Josephus (B. J. iv. 8, § 1), and Mamortha by Pliny (from Heb. Ma'abarta = passage, Olshausen), which it bore among the natives. The ancient town, in its most flourishing age, may have extended further up the side of Gerizim than the modern Nābulus, and further eastward toward the opening into the valley from the plain. Josephus says that more than ten thousand Samaritans (inhabitants of Shechem are meant) were destroyed by the Romans on one occasion. The population, therefore, must have been much greater than Nābulus with its present dimensions would contain. The situation of the town is one of surpassing beauty. It lies in a sheltered valley, protected by Gerizim on the S., and Ebal on the N. The feet of these mountains, where they rise from the town, are not more than 500 yards apart. The bottom of the valley is about 1,800 feet above the level of the sea, and the top of Gerizim 800 feet higher still. The site of the present city, believed to have been also that of the Hebrew city, is exactly on the water-summit; and streams issuing from the numerous springs there, flow down the opposite slopes of the valley, spreading verdure and fertility in every direction. Travellers vie with each other in the enthusiastic language which they employ to describe the scene that bursts here so suddenly upon them on arriving in spring or early summer at this paradise of the Holy Land. "The whole valley," says Dr. Robinson, "was filled with gardens of vegetables, and orchards of all kinds of fruits, watered by fountains, which burst forth in various parts and flow westward in refreshing streams. It came upon us suddenly like a scene of fairy enchantment. We saw nothing to compare with it in all Palestine. Here, beneath the shadow of an immense mulberry-tree, by the side of a purling rill, we pitched our tent for the remainder of the day and night. . . . We rose early, awakened by the songs of nightingales and other birds, of which the gardens around us were full." The allusions to Shechem in the Bible are numerous, and show how important the place was in Jewish history. Abraham, on his first migration to the Land of Promise, pitched his tent and built an altar under the OAK (or Terebinth, A. V. "PLAIN") of Moreh at Shechem. "The Canaanite was then in the land;" and it is evident that the region, if not the city, was already in possession of the aboriginal race (Gen. xii. 6). When Jacob arrived here after his sojourn in Mesopotamia (xxxiii. 18, xxxiv.), Shechem was a Hivite city, of which Hamor, the father of Shechem, was the head-man. At this time the patriarch purchased from that chieftain "the parcel of the field," which he subsequently bequeathed, as a special patrimony, to his son Joseph (xliii. 22; Josh. xxiv. 32; Jn. iv. 5). The field lay undoubtedly on the rich plain of the Mukhna, E. of the city, and its value was the greater on account of the well which Jacob had dug there, so as not to be dependent on his neighbors for a supply of water. The defilement of DINAH, Jacob's daughter, and the capture of Shechem and the massacre of all the male inhabitants by SIMEON and LEVI, are events of this period (Gen. xxxiv. 1 ff.). The oak under which Abraham had worshipped, survived to Jacob's time (xxxv. 1-4). (MEONENIM, PLAIN OF.) In the distribution of the land after its conquest by the Hebrews, Shechem fell to Ephraim (Josh. xx. 7), but was assigned to the Levites, and became a city of refuge (xxi. 20, 21). It was the scene of the renewed promulgation of the Law, when its blessings were heard from Gerizim and its curses from Ebal, and the people bowed their heads and acknowledged Jehovah as their king and ruler (Deut. xxvii. 11; Josh. ix. 33-35). Here Joshua assembled the people, shortly before his death, and delivered to them his last counsels (xxiv. 1, 25). After the death of Gideon, ABIMELECH 3, his bastard son, induced the Shechemites to revolt from the Hebrew commonwealth and elect him king (Judg. ix.). Upon this JOTHAM 1 delivered his parable of the trees to the men of Shechem from the top of Gerizim (ix. 22 ff.). In revenge for his being expelled, after a reign of three years, Abimelech destroyed the city, and, as an emblem of the fate to which he would consign it, sowed the ground with salt (ix. 34-45). It was soon restored, however, for all Israel assembled at Shechem, and Rehoboam, Solomon's successor, went thither to be inaugurated as king (1 K. xii.). Here the ten tribes renounced the house of David, and transferred their allegiance to Jeroboam (xii. 16), under whom Shechem became for a time the capital of his kingdom. The people of Shechem doubtless shared the fate of the inhabitants of SAMARIA, and were, most of them at least, carried into captivity (2 K. xvii. 5, 6, xviii. 9 ff.). But SHALMANESER, the conqueror, sent colonies from Babylonia to occupy the place of the exiles (xvii. 24). It would seem (so Prof. Hackett) that there was another influx of strangers, at a later period, under ESAR-haddon (Ezr. iv. 2). "Certain from Shechem," &c., possibly Cuthites, i. e. Babylonian immigrants who had become proselytes or worshippers of Jehovah, were slain by ISHMAEL 6 on their way to Jerusalem (Jer. xli. 5 ff.). From the time of the origin of the Samaritans, the history of Shechem, which became their principal city, blends itself with that of this people, and of their sacred mount, GERIZIM. (SAMARIA 3; SAMARITAN PRISTATEUCH.) Shechem reappears in the N. T. It is the SYCHAR of John iv. 3, near which the Saviour conversed with the Samaritan woman at Jacob's Well. In Acts vii. 16, Stephen reminds his hearers that certain of the patriarchs (meaning Joseph, as we see in Josh. xxiv. 32, and following, perhaps, some tradition as to Jacob's other sons) were buried at "SYCHEM," i. e. Shechem.—The population of Nablus, the modern representative of Shechem, is (so Prof. Hackett, after Dr. Rosen) about 5,000, mostly Mohammedans, but including 500 Greek Christians, 150 Samaritans, and a few Jews. The estimate of Rev. J. Mills (in Fairbairn) is 10,000 in all, viz. 150 Samaritans, 500 to 600 native Christians, 100 Jews, the rest Arabs. The enmity between the Samaritans and Jews is as inveterate still, as it was in the days of Christ. The main street follows the line of the valley from E. to W., and contains a well-stocked bazaar. Most of the other streets cross this: here are the smaller shops and the workstands of the artisans. Most of the streets are narrow and dark, as the houses hang over them on arches, very much as in the closest parts of Cairo. (HOUSE; JERUSALEM.) The houses are of stone, and of the most ordinary style, except those of the wealthy sheikhs of Samaria who live here. There are no public buildings of any note. The Kenisch or synagogue of the Samaritans is a small edifice, perhaps three or four centuries old, in the interior of which there is nothing remarkable, unless it be an alcove, screened by a curtain, in which their sacred writings are kept. Nabulus has five mosques, two of which, according to a tradition in which Mohammedans, Christians, and Samaritans agree, were originally churches. Dr. Rosen says that the inhabitants boast of the existence of not less than eighty springs of water within and around the city. He gives the names of twenty-seven of the principal of them. Some of the gardens are watered from the fountains, while others have a soil so moist as not to need such irrigation. The OLIVE, as in the days when Jotham delivered his famous parable, is still the principal tree. Figs, almonds, walnuts, mulberries, grapes, oranges, apricots, pomegranates, are abundant. The valley of the Nile itself hardly surpasses Nabulus in the production of vegetables of every sort. Being, as it is, the gateway of the trade between Jaffa and Birût on the one side, and the Transjordanic districts on the other, and the centre also of a province so rich in wool, grain, and oil, Nabulus becomes, necessarily, the seat of an active commerce, and of a comparative luxury to be found in very few of the inland Oriental cities. Here are manufactured many of the coarser woollen fabrics, delicate silk goods, cloth of camel's hair, and especially soap.—“Jacob's Well” (Jn. iv. 6, 12) lies about a mile and a half E. of the city, close to the lower road, and just beyond the wretched hamlet of Balûta. Among the Mohammedans and Samaritans it is known as Bir-el-Yakûb, or 'Ain Yakûb; the Christians sometimes call it Bir-es-Samariyeh (= the well of the Samaritan woman). Formerly there was a square hole opening into a carefully-built vaulted chamber, about ten feet square, in the floor of which was the true mouth of the well. Now a portion of the vault has fallen in and completely covered up the mouth, so that nothing can be seen above but a shallow pit half filled with stones and rubbish. The well is deep—seventy-five feet when last measured—and there was probably a considerable accumulation of rubbish at the bottom. Sometimes it contains a few feet of water, but at others it is quite dry. It is entirely excavated in the solid rock, perfectly round, nine feet in diameter, with the sides hewn smooth and regular. Of all the special localities of our Lord's life, this is almost the only one absolutely undisputed. The tradition, in which Jews and Samaritans, Christians and Mohammedans, all agree, goes back at least to the early part of the fourth century. The well and the plot of ground round it were bought by the Greek Church in 1859 for the purpose of building over it (Rev. J. Mills, in Fairbairn).—The “Tomb of Joseph” lies about a quarter of a mile N. of the well, exactly in the centre of the opening of the valley between Gerizim and Ebal. It is a small square enclosure of high whitewashed walls, surrounding a tomb of the ordinary kind, but placed diagonally to the walls, instead of parallel, as usual. A rough pillar used as an altar, and black with the traces of fire, is at the head, and another at the foot of the tomb. In the walls are two slabs with Hebrew inscriptions, and the interior is almost covered with the names of pilgrims in Hebrew, Arabic, and Samaritan. Beyond this there is nothing to remark in the structure itself. The local tradition of the tomb, like that of the well, is as old as the beginning of the fourth century.

She'chem (see above). 1. Son of Hamor the chieftain of the Hivite settlement of SHECHEM at the time of Jacob's arrival (Gen. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 2-26; Josh. xxiv. 32; Judg. ix. 28); the seducer of DINAH; slain by SIMEON and LEVI.—2. A man of Manasseh, of the clan of Gilead, and head of the SHECHEMITES (Num. xxvi. 31; Josh. xvii. 2).—3. A Gileadite, son of Shemida, the younger brother of No. 2 (1 Chr. vii. 19).

She'chem-ites, the = the family of SHECHEM 3, son of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 31; compare Josh. xvii. 2).

She-chi'nah (Chal. and later Heb. = a dwelling), a term not found in the Bible, but used by the later Jews, and borrowed by Christians from them, to express the visible majesty of the Divine Presence, especially when resting, or dwelling, between the Cherubim on the mercy-seat in the Tabernacle, and in the Temple of Solomon; but not in Zerubbabel's Temple, for it was one of the five particulars which the Jews reckon to have been wanting in the second Temple. The use of the term is first found in the Targums, where it forms a frequent periphrasis for God, considered as dwelling among the children of Israel, on Zion, between the Cherubim, &c., and is thus used, especially by Onkelos, to avoid ascribing corporeity to God Himself. In Ex. xxv. 8, where the Hebrew and A. V. have “Let them make me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them,” Onkelos has, “I will make my Shechinah to dwell among them.” In xxix. 45, 46, for “I will dwell among the children of Israel,” &c., Onkelos has “I will make my Shechinah to dwell,” &c. In Ps. lxxiv. 2, for “this Mount Zion wherein thou hast dwelt,” the Targum has “wherein thy Shechinah hath dwelt.” In the description of the dedication of Solomon's Temple (1 K. viii. 12, 13), the Targum of Jonathan runs thus: “The Lord is pleased to make His Shechinah dwell in Jerusalem. I have built the house of the sanctuary for the house of thy Shechinah for ever.” And in 1 K. vi. 13, for “I will dwell among the children of Israel,” Jonathan has “I will make my Shechinah dwell.” In Is. vi. 5 he has the combination, “the glory of the Shechinah of the King of ages, the Lord of Hosts;” and in the next verse he paraphrases “from off the altar,” by “from before His Shechinah on the throne of glory in the lofty heavens that are above the altar.” Compare also Num. v. 3, xxxv. 34; Ps. lxxviii. 17, 18, cxxxv. 21; Is. xxxiii. 5, lvii. 15; Joel iii. 17, 21, and numerous other passages. On the other hand (so Lord A. C. Hervey, original author of this article), the Targums never render “the cloud” or “the glory,” by Shechinah.—Though, as we have seen, the Jews reckoned the Shechinah among the marks of the Divine favor which were wanting to the second Temple, they manifestly expected the return of the Shechinah in the days of the Messiah. Thus Hag. i. 8, “build the house, and I will take pleasure in it, and I will be glorified, saith the Lord,” is paraphrased by Jonathan, “I will cause my Shechinah to dwell in it in glory.” So also in Zech. ii. 10, viii. 3, and Ez. xliii. 7, 9.—As regards the visible manifestation of the Divine Presence dwelling among the Israelites, to which the term Shechinah has attached itself, the idea which the different accounts in Scripture convey is that of a most brilliant and glorious light, enveloped in a cloud, and usually concealed by the cloud, so that the cloud itself was for the most part alone visible; but on particular occasions the glory appeared (Ex. xliii. 21, 22, xvi. 7, 10, xix. 9 ff., xl. 34 ff.; Lev. ix. 6, 23; Num. ix. 15, 16, xiv. 10, xvi. 19, 42, xx. 6; Deut. xxxi. 15; 1 K. viii. 10, 11, &c.). (ARK OF THE COVENANT; CHERUBIM; CLOUD, PILLAR OF; FIRE, I. 2; MERCY-SEAT, &c.) The allusions in the N. T. to the Shechinah are not unfrequent. Thus in the account of the Nativity, the words, "Lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them" (Lk. ii. 9), followed by the apparition of "the multitude of the heavenly host," recall the appearance of the Divine glory on Sinai, when "He shined forth from Paran, and came with ten thousands of saints" (Deut. xxxiii. 2; compare Ps. lxxviii. 17; Acts vii. 53; Heb. ii. 2; Ez. xliii. 2). The "God of glory" (Acts vii. 2, 55), "the cherubims of glory" (Heb. ix. 5), "the glory" (Rom. ix. 4), and other like passages, are distinct references to the manifestations of the glory in the O. T. When we read in Jn. i. 14, that "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory;" or in 2 Cor. xii. 9, "that the power of Christ may rest upon me;" or in Rev. xxi. 3, "Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them," we have not only references to the Shechinah, but are distinctly taught to connect it with the incarnation and future coming of MESSIAH, as type with antitype. It should also be specially noticed that the attendance of ANGELS is usually associated with the Shechinah. These are most frequently called (Ez. x., xi.) CHERUBIM; but sometimes, as in Is. vi., SERAPHIM (compare Rev. iv. 7, 8). The predominant association, however, is with the cherubim, of which the golden cherubim on the mercy-seat were the representation.

Shed-e-ur (fr. Heb. = darting of fire, Ges.), father of Elizur, the chief of Reuben at the Exodus (Num. i. 5, ii. 10, vii. 30, 35, x. 18).

Sheep. The Hebrew words denoting sheep are ayil = "a ram" (Gen. xv. 9, xxii. 13 twice, &c.); car = "a LAMB;" cebes or ceeb (= a he-lamb, Ges.), usually translated "lamb" (xxx. 40; Ex. xxix. 38 ff., &c.), fem. cibadh (= ewe-lamb, Gen. xxi. 28 ff., &c.), or cibadh (translated "lamb," Lev. v. 6 only); tsón, tsóné, or tsóné, (= a flock or flocks, i. e. small cattle, sheep and goats, Ges.), usually translated "flock" (Gen. iv. 4, xiii. 5, &c.), or "sheep" (iv. 2, xii. 16; Num. xxxii. 24, &c.), sometimes "cattle" (Gen. xxx. 39 ff., &c.), or "small cattle" (Eccl. ii. 7 only); râhél or râchél fem., translated "ewe" (Gen. xxxi. 38, xxxii. 14 [Heb. 15]), or "sheep" (Cant. vi. 6; Is. liii. 7); sch (= one of a flock, i. e. a sheep or goat), translated in Gen. xxii. 7 and Ex. xii. 3, &c., "lamb" (margin "kid"), in Ex. xxii. 1 [xxi. 37 Heb.] and Deut. xvii. 1, &c., "sheep" (margin "goat"), &c.; tdch (= a lamb, young and tender, Ges.), twice translated "LAMB." The Greek words are probaton, uniformly translated "sheep" (Mat. vii. 15, ix. 36, &c.); poinnê and poinnion (both = a flock, especially of sheep, Rbn. N. T. Lex.), both uniformly translated "flock" (xxvi. 31; Lk. ii. 8, xii. 32; Acts xx. 28, 29, &c.).—Sheep were an important part of the possessions of the ancient Hebrews and of Eastern nations generally. The first mention of sheep occurs in Gen. iv. 2. They were used in the sacrificial offerings, both the adult animal (Ex. xx. 24; 1 K. viii. 63; 2 Chr. xxix. 38) and the "LAMB" 3, i. e. "a male from one to three years old," but young lambs of the first year were more generally used in the offerings (Ex. xxix. 38; Lev. ix. 3, xii. 6; Num. xxviii. 9, &c.). No lamb under eight days old was allowed to be killed (Lev. xxii. 27). Sheep and lambs formed an important article of food (1 Sam. xxv. 18; 1 K. i. 19, iv. 23; Ps. xlv. 11, &c.). The wool was used as clothing (Lev. xiii. 47; Deut. xxii. 11; Prov. xxxi. 13; Job xxxi. 20, &c.). "Rams' skins dyed red" were used as a covering for the Tabernacle (Ex. xxv. 5). Sheep and lambs were sometimes paid as tribute (2 K. iii. 4). Immense numbers of sheep were reared in Palestine, &c., in Biblical times (1 K. viii. 63; 1 Chr. v. 21; 2 Chr. xv. 11, xxx. 24; Job xlii. 12, &c.). Sheep-shearing is often alluded to (Baxquets; Gen. xxxi. 19, xxxviii. 13; Deut. xv. 19; 1 Sam. xxv. 4; Is. liii. 7, &c.). Sheep-dogs were employed in Biblical times. (Dog.) Shepherds in Palestine and the East generally go before their flocks, which they induce to follow by calling to them (compare Jn. x. 4; Ps. lxxvii. 20, lxxx. 1), though they also drove them (Gen. xxxiii. 13). The following quotation from Hartley's Researches in Greece and the Levant, p. 321, is strikingly illustrative of Jn. x. 1-16: "Having had my attention directed last night to the words in Jn. x. 3, I asked my man if it was usual in Greece to give names to the sheep. He informed me that it was, and that the sheep obeyed the shepherd when he called them by their names. This morning I had an opportunity of verifying the truth of this remark. Passing by a flock of sheep, I asked the shepherd the same question which I had put to the servant, and he gave me the same answer. I then bade him call one of his sheep. He did so, and it instantly left its pasturage and its companions, and ran up to the hands of the shepherd with signs of pleasure and with a prompt obedience which I had never before observed in any other animal. It is also true in this country that 'a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him.' The shepherd told me that many of his sheep were still wild, that they had not yet learned their names, but that by teaching them they would all learn them." The common sheep of Syria and Palestine are the broad-tail (Ovis laticaudatus), and a variety of the common sheep of this country (Ovis Aries) called the Bidoween according to Russell (Aleppo, ii. p. 147). The broad-tailed kind has long been reared in Syria. The tail (or more correctly, the rump) is a mass of marrow-like fat which spreads over the whole rump and down the caudal extremity nearly to the end, and may weigh ordinarily from ten to fifteen pounds. The fat tail of the sheep is probably alluded to in Lev. iii. 9, vii. 3, &c., as the fat and the whole rump that was to be taken off hard by the backbone and consumed on the altar. The cooks in Syria use this mass of fat instead of Arab BUTTER, which is often rancid (Thn. i. 138-9). The whole passage in Gen. xxx. which bears on the subject of Jacob's stratagem with Laban's sheep is involved in considerable perplexity, and Jacob's conduct in this matter has been severely and uncompromisingly condemned by some writers. It is altogether impossible (so Mr. Houghton) to account for the complete success which attended his device of setting peeled rods before the ewes and she-goats as they came to drink in the water-troughs, on natural grounds. We must agree with the Greek Fathers and ascribe the production of Jacob's spotted sheep and goats to Divine agency. In Gen. xxxi. 5-13, Jacob expressly states that his success was due to Divine interference. God was only helping Jacob to obtain that which justly belonged to him, but which Laban's rapacity refused to grant. As the sheep is an emblem of meekness, patience, and submission, it is expressly mentioned as typifying these qualities in the person of our Blessed Lord (Is. liii. 7; Acts viii. 32, &c.). The relation that exists between Christ, "the chief Shepherd," and His members, is beautifully compared to that which in the East is so strikingly exhibited by the shepherds to their flocks. CORNET; DRESS; EWE; GOAT; HERD; LAMB; LEATHER; MILK; POT 8; RAM; SACRIFICE; SHEARING-HOUSE; SHEEP-COTE; SHEPHERD, &c.

Broad-tailed Sheep.

* Sheep'-cote, properly = a building for sheltering SHEEP (1 Sam. xxiv. 8; 2 Sam. vii. 8; 1 Chr. xvii. 7). COTES; SHEEP-FOLD.

* Sheep'-fold = a fold or enclosure for SHEEP (Num. xxxii. 16; Judg. v. 16; Ps. lxxviii. 70; Jn. x. 1), often furnished with a shed or covered part for protection from storms, &c. Dr. Thomson (i. 299) describes sheep-folds in Syria as built in shel-merely kept in the yard. In the summer months the shepherds sleep with their flocks where they are pastured, with only a stout hedge or palisade of thorn-bushes to protect them from wild beasts.

Sheep'-gate, the (Heb. sha'ar hats-son), one of the gates of JERUSALEM as rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 1, 32, xii. 39). It stood between the tower of MEAH and the chamber of the corner (iii. 32, 1) or gate of the guard-house (xii. 39, A. V. "prison-gate"). The latter seems to have been at the angle formed by the junction of the wall enclosing the Temple with that of the city of Jerusalem proper, having the sheep-gate on the N. of it. The sheep-gate may therefore have been at or near the Bab el-Kattanin (so Mr. Grove). Robinson (i. 343) would place it on the S. of the Temple (BETHESDA); tradition identifies it with St. Stephen's gate, &c. SHEEP-MARKET.

Sheep'-mar-ket, the (Jn. v. 2). The word "market" is an interpolation of our translators, possibly after Luther. The original Gr. word is probatiké (adj. = of sheep), to which should probably be supplied not "market," but gate (Gr. pulé), as in the LXX. version of the passages in Nehemiah quoted in the foregoing article. BETHESDA.

* Sheep'-mas-ter (2 K. iii. 4). SHEPHERD.

* Sheep'-shear-ers. ABSALOM; BANQUETS; NABAL; SHEARING-HOUSE; SHEEP, &c.

She-ha-ri'ah (fr. Heb. = Jehovah seeks him, Ges.), a Benjamite chief, son of Jeroham (1 Chr. viii. 26).

Shek'el [shek'l], (Heb.), originally a certain weight, hence applied to a denomination of money, and subsequently to a coin of that weight. The shekel of the Maccabees (so Rbn. N. T. Lex., &c.) is estimated at sixty cents. The didrachm (Mat. xvii. 24 margin, text twice "TRIBUTE"), in the time of the N. T. and Josephus, = the Jewish half-shekel, i. e. thirty cents. MONEY; PENNY; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

She'lah (Heb. petition, Ges.). 1. Third son of JUDAH 1, the youngest by the daughter of Shuah; ancestor of the SHELANITES (Gen. xxviii. 5, 11, 14, 26, xvi. 12; Num. xxvi. 20; 1 Chr. ii. 3, iv. 21).—2. (Heb. missile, shoot, sprout, Ges.) SALAH the son of Arphaxad (1 Chr. i. 18, 24).

She'lan-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of SHELAH 1 (Num. xxvi. 20).

She-le-mi'ah (fr. Heb. = MESHELEMIAH, Ges.). 1. One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 39).—2. Father of Hananiah (Neh. iii. 30). (HANANIAH 10).—3. A priest in Nehemiah's time; one of the treasurers of tithes (xiii. 13).—4. Father of JEHUCAL, or Jucal, in Zedekiah's time (Jer. xxxvii. 3).—5. Father of Irijah, the captain of the ward who arrested Jeremiah (xxxvii. 13).—6. The same as MESHELEMIAH and SHALLUM 9 (1 Chr. xxvi. 14).—7. Another of the sons of Bani (compare No. 1) who had married a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 41).—8. Ancestor of JEHUDI in Jehoikim's time (Jer. xxxvi. 14).—9. Son of Abdeel; one of those ordered by Jehoikim to take Baruch and Jeremiah (xxxvi. 26).

She'leph (Heb. a drawing out, selection, Sim.), the second in order of the sons of JOKTAN (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chr. i. 20). The tribe which sprang from him has been satisfactorily identified, both in modern and classical times; as well as the district of tered spots, and consisting of yards defended by wide stone-walls crowned with sharp thorns (HEDGE) and low flat buildings. In cold weather the flock is shut up in the building, but in ordinary weather the Yemen named after him. Sheleph is found where we should expect to meet with him (so Mr. E. S. Poole), in the district of Sulaf, which appears to be the same as Niebuhr's Silfie, written in his map Selfa (Ar. Sulafeyeh?), in N. lat. 14½°, about sixty miles nearly S. of San'd (UZAL). Besides this geographical trace of Sheleph, we have the ancient tribe of Shelif or Shulaf in the Yemen. ARABIA.

She'lesh (Heb. triad, Ges.), son of Helem (1 Chr. vii. 35).

She'le-mi, or She-le'mi (Heb. pacifc, Ges.), an Asherite, father of Abihud (Num. xxxiv. 27).

She'le-mith, or She-le'mith (Heb. pacifc, love of peace, Ges.). 1. Daughter of Dibri, a Danite; wife of an Egyptian. Their son was stoned for blasphemy (Lev. xxiv. 11).—2. Daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 19).—3. A Kohathite Levite, chief of the Izharites (xxiii. 18); = SHELOMOTH.—4. A Levite descended from Eliezer the son of Moses; an overseer or treasurer of dedicated things in David's reign (xxvi. 25, 26, 28).—5. A Gershonite, son of SHIMEI 17 (xxiii. 9).—6. According to the present text, the sons of Shelomith, with the son of JOSIPHIAH at their head, returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 10).—7. A son of Rehoboam by Machab (2 Chr. xi. 20).

She'le-moth, or She-le'moth (Heb.) = SHELOMITH 3 (1 Chr. xxi. 22).

She-la-mi-el (Heb. friend of God, Ges.), son of Zurishaddai, and prince of Simeon at the Exodus (Num. i. 6, ii. 12, vii. 36, 41, x. 19).

Shem (Heb. sign, name, Ges.), in N. T. SEM, eldest son of NOAH (so Mr. Bullock; see JAPHETH), born (Gen. v. 32) when his father had attained the age of 500 years. He was ninety-eight years old, married, and childless, at the time of the Flood. After it, he, with his father, brothers, sisters-in-law, and wife, received the blessing of God (ix. 1), and entered into the covenant. Two years afterward he became the father of ARPHAXAD (xi. 10), and other children were born to him subsequently (x. 21 ff., &c.). With the help of his brother Japheth, he covered the nakedness of their father which CANAAN and HAM did not care to hide. In the prophecy of NOAH (ix. 25-27), the first blessing falls on Shem. He died at the age of 600 years.—Assuming that the years ascribed to the patriarchs in the present copies of the Hebrew Bible are correct (CHRONOLOGY; PATRIARCH), it appears that METHUSelah, who in his first 243 years was contemporary with Adam, had still nearly 100 years of his long life to run after Shem was born. And when Shem died, ABRAHAM was 148 years old, and Isaac had been nine years married. There are therefore but two links—Methuselah and Shem—between Adam and Isaac. So that the early records of the Creation and Fall of man, which came down to Isaac, would challenge (apart from their INSPIRATION) the same confidence which is readily yielded to a tale that reaches the hearer through two well-known persons between himself and the original chief actor in the events related.—The portion of the earth occupied by the descendants of Shem (x. 21-31) intersects the portions of Japheth and Ham, and stretches in an uninterrupted line from the Mediterranean Sea to the Indian Ocean. Beginning at its northwestern extremity with Lydia (Lcb), it includes Syria (ARAM), Chaldea (ARPHAXAD), parts of Assyria (ASSHUR), of Persia (ELAM), and of the Arabian Peninsula (JOKTAN). GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST; MELCHIZEDEK; SHEMITIC LANGUAGES; TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

She'ma (Heb. hearing, sound, rumor, Ges.), a city of the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 26). In the list of the towns of Simeon selected from the south of Judah, SHEBA takes the place of Shema, probably by an error of transcription or a change of pronunciation. Wilton (The Negeb) and Rowlands (in Fairbairn, under "South Country") suppose Shema (in LXX. Salmas) at a mound, Rujm Selameh, about twelve miles W. S. W. of Sebbeh (Masada).

She'ma (see above). 1. A Reubenite, ancestor of Bela (1 Chr. v. 8); = SHEMAIAH 4?—2. A Benjamite, one of the chiefs of Aijalon who drove out the inhabitants of Gath; son of Elpaal (viii. 13); probably = SHIMHI.—3. One, probably a priest, who stood at Ezra's right hand when he read the Law to the people (Neh. viii. 4).

Shem'a-ah, or She-ma'ah (Heb. = SHEMA?), a Benjamite of Gibeath, and father of Ahiezer and Joash, David's warriors (1 Chr. xii. 3).

She-ma'ah [-ma'yah], or She-ma'-lah (Heb. Jehovah hears him, Ges.). 1. A prophet in the reign of Rehoboam. When the king had assembled 150,000 men of Benjamin and Judah to reconquer the northern kingdom after its revolt, Shemaiah was commissioned to charge them to return to their homes, and not to war against their brethren (1 K. xii. 22; 2 Chr. xi. 2). His second and last appearance upon the stage was upon the occasion of the invasion of Judah and siege of Jerusalem by Shishak, king of Egypt (xii. 5, 7). He wrote a chronicle containing the events of Rehoboam's reign (xii. 15).—2. The son of Shechaniah, among the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 22). He was keeper of the east gate of the city, and assisted Nehemiah in restoring the wall (Neh. iii. 29). Lord A. C. Hervey would omit "and the sons of Shechaniah, Shemaiah" from 1 Chr. iii. 22, and make the following Shemaiah = SHIMEI 5 in ver. 19. (GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST).—3. Ancestor of Ziza, a prince of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 37); perhaps = SHIMEI 6.—4. Son of Joel, a Reubenite; perhaps = SHEMA 1 (v. 4).—5. Son of Haashub; a Merarite Levite after the Captivity (ix. 14; Neh. xi. 15).—6. Father of Obadiah, or Abda, a Levite (1 Chr. ix. 16); = SHAMUA 3.—7. A Levite, chief of the sons of Elizaphan in David's reign (xv. 8, 11).—8. A Levite, son of Nethaneel; a scribe in David's time who registered the courses of the priests (xxiv. 6).—9. A Levite porter, eldest son of Obed-edom the Gittite (xxvi. 4, 6, 7).—10. A descendant of Jeduthan the singer; assisted in purifying the Temple in Hzekiah's reign (2 Chr. xxix. 14); = No. 22?—11. One of the sons of Adonikam who returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 13).—12. One of the "chief men" whom Ezra sent for to his camp by the river of Ahava, for the purpose of obtaining Levites and ministers for the Temple from "the place Casiphia" (viii. 16).—13. A priest of the family of Harim, who put away his foreign wife at Ezra's bidding (x. 21).—14. A layman of Israel, son of another Harim, who also had married a foreigner (x. 31).—15. Son of Delaiah the son of Mehetabeel; a prophet hired by Tobiah and Sanballat to frighten Nehemiah (Neh. vi. 10).—16. Head of a priestly house who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 8). His family (or ancestor) went up with Zerubbabel, was represented in the time of Joiakim by Jehonathan (xii. 6, 18), and may be the one mentioned in xii. 35.—17. One who went in the procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (xii. 34); supposed by Mr. Wright to be one of the princes of Judah, but perhaps = the priest in x. 8 (No. 16).—18. One of the choir on the same occasion (xii. 36). Mr. Wright and Dr. W. L.

Alexander make him a Levite. (MATTANIAH 2.)—19. A priest who blew a trumpet on the same occasion (xii. 42).—20. "Shemaiah the Nehelamite," a false prophet denounced by Jeremiah for teaching rebellion against the Lord (Jer. xxix. 24-32).—21. A Levite sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people the Law (2 Chr. xvii. 8).—22. A Levite or priest in Hezekiah's reign, appointed to distribute portions to the priests (xxxi. 15); perhaps = No. 10.—23. A Levite in Josiah's reign, who assisted at the solemn passover (xxxv. 9).—24. Father of the prophet URIJAH 4 (Jer. xxvi. 20).—25. Father of DELAIAH 4 (xxxvi. 12).

Shem-a-ri'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah keeps, Ges.). 1. One of the Benjamite warriors who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 5).—2. One of the family of Harim, a layman who put away his foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 32).—3. One of the family of Bani, under the same circumstances as No. 2 (x. 41).

Shem-e-ber (Heb. lofty flight, Ges.), king of Zebonim, and ally of the king of Sodom when attacked by CHEDORLAOMER (Gen. xiv. 2).

Shemer (Heb. kept, preserved, leas, Ges.), the owner of the hill on which the city of SAMARIA was built (1 K. xvi. 24), and after whom it was named by its founder Omri, who bought the site for two silver talents.

She-mi'da (Heb. fame of wisdom, Ges.), a Manassite, son of Gilead and ancestor of the SHEMIDAITES (Num. xxvi. 32; Josh. xvii. 2); = SHEMIDAH.

She-mi'dah (fr. Heb.) = SHEMIDA (1 Chr. vii. 19). She-mi'da-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of SHEMIDA (Num. xxvi. 32). They obtained their lot among the male children of Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 2).

Shem'i-nith (Heb., see below). The title of Psalm vi. is: "To the chief Musician on Neginoth upon Sheminith," or "the eighth," as the A. V. margin has it. A similar direction is found in the title of Psalm xii. (comp. 1 Chr. xv. 21). The LXX. and Vulgate, in both passages, render "for the eighth." The Geneva Version gives "upon the eighth tune." Most Rabbinical writers, as Rashi and Aben Ezra, follow the Targum on the Psalms in regarding it as a harp with eight strings; but this depends upon a misconstruction of 1 Chr. xv. 21. Gesenius, Dr. G. F. Oehler (in Fairbairn), B. Davies, D. D. (in Kitto), &c., think it denotes the bass, in opposition to ALAMOTH = the treble. Others, with the author of Shille

Haggibborim, interpret "the sheminith" as the octave. Mr. Wright regards it as most probable that Sheminith denotes a certain air known as the eighth, or a certain key in which the Psalm was to be sung (comp. ALJELETH SHAHAR, &c.). MUSIC.

She-mir'a-moth (Heb. name most high, or heaven most high, Ges.). 1. A Levite of the second degree, appointed to play "with a psaltery on ALAMOTH," in the choir formed by David (1 Chr. xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5).—2. A Levite, one of those sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people the Law (2 Chr. xvii. 8).

Shem-it'le (fr. SHEM) Lan-guages and Writ'ing. Introduction, §§ 1-5.—1. The expressions, "Shemitic family," and "Shemitic languages," are based, as is well known, on a reference to Gen. x. 21 ff. (SHEM; TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.) The obvious inaccuracy of the expression has led to an attempt to substitute others, such as Western Arabic, or Syro-Arabic—this last bringing at once before us the two geographical extremes of this family of languages; but the earlier, though incorrect designation, has maintained its ground, and for convenience we shall continue to use it. 2. It is impossible to lay down with accuracy the boundaries of the area occupied by the tribes employing so-called Shemitic dialects. For general purposes, the highlands of Armenia may be taken as the northern boundary—the river Tigris and the ranges beyond it as the eastern—and the Red Sea, the Levant, and certain portions of Asia Minor as the western. 3. Varieties of the great Shemitic language-family are found in the following localities within the area named: In those ordinarily known as Syria, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Assyria, there prevailed Aramaic dialects of different kinds, e. g. Biblical Chaldaic—that of the Targums and of the Syriac versions of Scripture—to which may be added other varieties of the same stock—such as that of the Palmyrene inscriptions—and of different Sabian fragments. Along the Mediterranean seaboard, and among the tribes settled in Canaan, must be placed the home of the language of the canonical books of the O. T., among which were interspersed some relics of that of the Phenicians. In the south, amid the seclusion of Arabia, was preserved the dialect destined at a subsequent period so widely to surpass its sisters in the extent of territory over which it is spoken. A variety, allied to this last, has been long domiciliated in Abyssinia. The following table is given by Prof. Max Müller:

Shemitic Family.

There is much that is probable in the notion held by more than one scholar, that the spoken dialect of the Shemitic tribes external to Arabia (in the earliest periods of their history) closely resembled, or was in fact a better variety of Aramaic. 4. The history of the Shemitic people tells us of various movements undertaken by them, but supplies no remarkable instances of their assimilating. Though carrying with them their language, institutions, and habits, they are not found to have struck root, but remained strangers and exotics in several instances, passing away without traces of their occupancy.

And the same inveterate isolation still characterizes tribes of the race, when on new soil. 5. The peculiar elements of the Shemitic character exercised considerable influence on their literature. Indeed, accordance is seldom more close, than in the case of the Shemitic race (where not checked by external causes), between the generic type of thought, and its outward expression. Like other languages, this one is mainly resolvable into monosyllabic primitives. These monosyllabic primitives may still be traced in particles, and words least exposed to the ordinary causes of variation. But differences are observable in the principal parts of speech—the verb and the noun. Secondary notions, and those of relation, are grouped round the primary ones of meaning in a single word, susceptible of various internal changes according to the particular requirement. By formation, mainly internal (or contained within the root form), are expressed the differences between noun and verb, adjective and substantive. Another leading peculiarity of this branch of languages, is the absence (save in the case of proper names) of compound words—to which the Japhetic family is indebted for so much life and variety. In the Shemitic family—agglutination, not logical sequence—interdependent roots, not compound appropriate derivations from the same root, are used to express respectively a train of thought, or different modifications of a particular notion.

§§ 6-13. Hebrew Language. Period of Growth.—6. The HEBREW language is a branch of the so-called Shemitic family, extending over a large portion of Southwestern Asia. In the north (or Aram, comprehending Syria, Mesopotamia, Babylonia), and under a climate partially cold and ungenial—near tribes of a different origin, not unfrequently masters by conquest—the Shemitic dialect became in places harsher, and its general character less pure and distinct. Toward the south, opposite causes contributed to maintain the language in its purity. Originally, the language of the Hebrews presented more affinities with the Aramaic, in accordance with their own family accounts, which bring the patriarchs from the N. E.—more directly from northern Mesopotamia.—7. Two questions, in direct connection with the early movements of the ancestors of the subsequent Hebrew nation, have been discussed with great earnestness by many writers—the first bearing on the causes which set the family of TERAH in motion toward the south and west; the second, on the origin and language of the tribes in possession of Canaan at the arrival of Abraham. Scripture only tells us that, led in a way which they knew not, chosen Shemitic wanderers (ABRAHAM), of the lineage of Arphaxad, set forth on the journey fraught with such enduring consequences to the history of the world, as recorded in Scripture, in its second stage of progress. There is nothing unreasonable in the thought, that the movement of Terah from Ur of the Chaldees was caused by Divine suggestion, acting on a mind ill at ease in the neighborhood of Cushite thought and habits. The leading particulars of that memorable journey are preserved to us in Scripture, which is also distinct upon the fact, that the new-comers and the early settlers in Canaan found no difficulty in conversing. On what grounds is the undoubted similarity of the dialect of the Terahites, to that of the occupants at the time of their immigration, to be explained? Of the origin of its earliest occupants (GIANTS; ZAMZUMIM), history records nothing certain. Some claim for the early inhabitants of Asia Minor a Japhetic origin. Others affirm the descent of these early tribes from LUD, the fourth son of Shem, and their migration from Lydia to Arabia Petrea and the southern borders of Palestine. 8. Another view is that put forward by Sir Henry Rawlinson, and shared by other scholars. “Either from ancient monuments, or from tradition, or from the dialects now spoken by their descendants, we are authorized to infer that at some very remote period, before the rise of the Shemitic or Aryan nations, a great Scythic” (= Hamitic) “population must have overspread Europe, Asia, and Africa, speaking languages all more or less dissimilar in their vocabulary, but possessing in common certain organic characteristics of grammar and construction” (Rawlinson). And this statement would appear, in its leading features, to be historically sound (so Archdeacon Ormerod, original author of this article). As was to be anticipated, both from its importance and from its extreme obscurity, few subjects connected with Biblical antiquities have been more warmly discussed than the origin of the Canaanitish occupants of Palestine. Looking to the authoritative records (Gen. ix. 18, x. 6, 15-20) there would seem to be no reason for doubt as to the Hamitic origin of these tribes. Nor can the singular accordances discernible between the language of these Canaanitish (= Hamitic) occupants and the Shemitic family be justly pleaded in bar of this view of the origin of the former. “If we examine the invaluable ethnography of the Book of Genesis we shall find that, while Ham is the brother of Shem, and therefore a relationship between his descendants and the Shemitic nations is fully recognized, the Hamites are described as those who previously occupied the different countries into which the Aramean race afterward forced their way. Thus Scripture (Gen. x. ff.) attributes to the race of Ham not only the aboriginal population of Canaan, with its wealthy and civilized communities on the coast, but also the mighty empires of Babylon and Nineveh, the rich kingdoms of Sheba and Havilah in Arabia Felix, and the wonderful realm of Egypt. There is every reason to believe—indeed in some cases the proof amounts to demonstration—that all these Hamitic nations spoke languages which differed only dialectically from those of the Syro-Arabic family” (Quarterly Review, lxxviii. 173). (PHENICIANS; PHILISTINES).—9. Connected with this subject of the relationship discernible among the early descendants of Noah is that of the origin and extension of the art of writing among the Shemites. Did the Terahite branch of the Shemitic stock acquire the art of writing from the PHENICIANS, or Egyptians, or Assyrians—or was it evolved from given elements among themselves? (See § 28, below.)—10. Between the dialects of Aram and Arabia, that of the Terahites occupied a middle place. This dialect has been ordinarily designated as that of the Hebrews. (HEBREW).—11. Many causes, all obvious and intelligible, combine to make difficult, if not impossible, any formal or detached account of the Hebrew language, anterior to its assuming a written shape. The extant remains of Hebrew literature are destitute of any important changes in language, during the period from Moses to the Captivity. A certain and intelligible amount of progress, but no considerable or remarkable difference (according to one school), is really observable in the language of the PENTATEUCH, the Books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, the Kings, the Psalms, or the prophecies of Isaiah, Hosea, Amos, Joel, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Jeremiah—widely separated from each other by time as are many of these writings. At the first sight, and to modern judgment, much of this appears strange, and possibly untenable; but an explanation of the difficulty is sought in the unbroken residence of the Hebrew people, without removal or molestation. An additional illustration of the immunity from change is to be drawn from the history of the other branches of the Shemitic stock (Aramaic and Arabic).—12. Moreover, is it altogether a wild conjecture to assume as not impossible, the formation of a sacred language among the chosen people, at so marked a period of their history as that of Moses? Such a language would be the sacred and learned one—that of the few—and no clearer proof of the limited hold exercised by this classical Hebrew on the ordinary language of the people can be required than its rapid withdrawal, after the Captivity, before a language composed of dialects hitherto disregarded, but still living in popular use.—13. A few remarks may not be out of place here with reference to some leading linguistic peculiarities in different books of the O. T. For ordinary purposes the old division into the golden and silver ages (divided by the CAPTIVITY) is sufficient. A detailed list of peculiarities observable in the PENTATEUCH is given by Scholz, divided under lexical, grammatical, and syntactical heads. With the style of the Pentateuch that of Joshua very closely corresponds. In the Book of Ruth the style points to an earlier date, the asserted Aramaisms being probably relics of the popular dialect. The same linguistic peculiarities are observable in the Books of Samuel. The Books of Job and Ecclesiastes contain many asserted Aramaisms, which have been pleaded in support of a late origin of these two poems. In the case of the first, it is argued (on the other side) that these peculiarities are not to be considered so much poetical ornaments as ordinary expressions and usages of the early Hebrew language, affected necessarily to a certain extent by intercourse with neighboring tribes. As respects the Book of Ecclesiastes, the case is more obscure, as in many instances the peculiarities of style seem rather referable to the secondary Hebrew of a late period of Hebrew history than to an Aramaic origin. In addition to roughness of diction, so-called Aramaisms are to be found in the remains of Jonah and Hosea, and expressions closely allied in those of Amos. This is not the case in the writings of Nahum, Zephaniah, and Habakkuk, and in the still later ones of the minor prophets; the treasures of past times, which filled their hearts, served as models of style. In the case of Ezekiel, Jewish critics (Zunz, &c.) have sought to assign its peculiarities of style and expression to a secondary Hebrew origin. The peculiarities of language in Daniel belong to another field of inquiry; and under impartial consideration more difficulties may be found to disappear, as in the case of those with regard to the asserted Greek words. With these exceptions (if so to be considered), few traces of dialects are discernible in the small remains still extant, for the most part composed in Judah and Jerusalem. The Aramaic elements are most plainly observable in the remains of some of the less educated writers. The general style of Hebrew prose literature is plain and simple, but lively and pictorial, and rising with the subject, at times, to considerable elevation. But the requisite elevation of poetical composition, and the necessity (from the general use of parallelism; see POETRY, HEBREW) for enlarging the supply of striking words and expressions at command, led to the introduction of many expressions which we do not commonly find in Hebrew prose literature. For the origin and existence of these we must look especially to the Aramaic. But from the earliest period of the existence of a literature among the Hebrew people to B. C. 600, the Hebrew language continued singularly exempt from change. From that period the Hebrew dialect will be found to give way before the Aramaic.

§§ 14-19. Aramaic Language. Scholastic Period.—14. The language ordinarily called Aramaic is a dialect of the great Shemitic family, deriving its name from the district over which it was spoken, ARAM (= the high or hill country). In general practice Aram (the SYRIA of the Greeks and Romans) was divided into Eastern and Western. The dialects of these two districts were severally called Chaldaic and Syriac—designations not happily chosen, but, like “Shemitic,” of too long currency to be changed without great inconvenience. The eastern boundary of the Shemitic languages is obscure; but this much may be safely assumed, that this family had its earliest settlement on the upper basin of the Tigris, from which extensions were doubtless made to the S. (ASSYRIA; BABEL; CHALDEA; CHALDEANS; NINEVEH).—15. Without entering into the discussions respecting the exact propriety of the expressions, it will be sufficient to follow the ordinary division of the Aramaic into the Chaldaic or Eastern, and the Western or Syriac dialects. (1.) The earliest extant fragments of Aramaic are in Dan. ii. 4-vii. 28; Ezr. iv. 8-vi. 18, vii. 12-26; Jer. x. 11. Affinities are to be traced, without difficulty, between these fragments, which differ again in some very marked particulars from the earliest Targums. (2.) The Syro-Chaldaic originals of several of the Apocryphal books are lost; many Hebraisms were engrafted on the Aramaic as spoken by the Jews, but the dialect of the earlier Targums contains a perceptibly smaller amount of such admixture than later compilations. (3.) The language of the Gemaras (PHARISEES) is extremely composite—that of the Jerusalem Gemara being less pure than that of Babylon. Still lower in the scale are those of the fast-expiring Samaritan dialect and that of Galilee. (4.) The curious book Zohar—an adaptation of Aramaic expressions to Vudai-zing Gnosticism (PHILOSOPHY, I.)—among its foreign additions, contains very many from the Arabic. (5.) The Massorah (OLD TESTAMENT, A), brief and symbolical, is chiefly remarkable for what may be called vernacular peculiarities. (6.) The Christian or ecclesiastical Aramaic is that ordinarily known as Syriac—the language of early Christianity, as Hebrew and Arabic, respectively, of the Jewish religion and Mohammedanism.—The three leading varieties of the West-Aramaic dialect are thus described: (a.) The dialect of Galilee appears to have been marked by confusion of letters—פ (Pe) and ב (Beth), כ (Caph) with ק (Kaph) and aphæresis of the guttural—a habit of connecting words otherwise separate—carelessness about vowel-sounds,—and the substitution of ח (ch) or chā final for ה (hā).

(WRITING.) (b.) The Samaritan dialect appears to have been a compound of the vulgar Hebrew with Aramaic. A confusion of the mute letters, and also of the gutturals, with a predilection for the letter ש (Shin), has been noticed. (SAMARIA; SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH.) (c.) The dialect called that of Jerusalem or Judea, between which and the purer one of the Babylonish Jews so many invidious distinctions have been drawn, seems to have been variable, from frequent changes among the inhabitants—and also to have contained a large amount of words different from those in use in Babylonia—besides being somewhat incorrect in its orthography.—The small amount of real difference between the two branches of Aramaic has been often urged as an argument that making any division is superfluous. But it has been well observed by Fürst, that each is animated by a very different spirit. The chief relics of Chaldaic, or Eastern Aramaic—the Targums—are filled with traditional faith in the varied pages of Jewish history. Western Aramaic, or Syriac literature, on the other hand, is essentially Christian. Accordingly, the tendency and linguistic character of the first is essentially Hebrew, that of the second Hellenic. One is full of Hebraisms, the other of Hellenisms.—16. Perhaps few lines of demarcation are traced with greater difficulty than those by which one age of a language is separated from another. This is remarkably the case in respect of the cessation of the Hebrew, and the ascendancy of the Aramaic, or, as it may be put, in respect of the date at which the period of growth terminates, and that of exposition and scholasticism begins, in the literature of the chosen people.—17. In the scholastic period, of which we now treat, the schools of the prophets (EDUCATION; PROPHET) were succeeded by "houses of inquiry." Two ways only of extending the blessings hence derivable, seem to have presented themselves to the national mind—by commentary (largum) and inquiry (dérash). In the first of these—Targumic literature, but limited openings occurred for critical studies; in the second, still fewer. The vast storehouse of Hebrew thought reaching through so many centuries—known by the name of the Talmud (PHARISEES)—and the collections of a similar nature called the Midrashim, extending in the case of the first, dimly but tangibly, from the period of the Captivity to the times of Rabbi Asher, the closer of the Talmud (A. D. 426), contain comparatively few accessions to linguistic knowledge. (VERSIONS, ANCIENT [TARGUM].)—18. Of the other main division of the Aramaic language—the Western or Syriac dialect—the earliest existing document is the Peshito version of the Scriptures, of the second century. (VERSIONS, ANCIENT [SYRIAC].) Various sub-dialects (Palmyrene, &c.; see § 15, a. b. c.) probably existed within the wide area over which this dialect was current. The Syrian dialect is thickly studded with foreign words—Arabic, Persian, Greek, and Latin, especially with the third. A comparison of this dialect with the Eastern branch will show that they are closely allied in all the most important peculiarities of grammar and syntax, as well as in their store of original words—the true standard in linguistic researches. After the fall of Jerusalem the chief seat of Syriac learning and literature was at Edessa—from A. D. 440, at Nisibis. Before the eighth and ninth centuries its decline had commenced; and after the tenth and eleventh centuries it may be said to have died out.—19. The Chaldaic paraphrases of Scripture are exceedingly valuable for the light which they throw on Jewish manners and customs, and the meaning of passages otherwise obscure, as likewise for many happy renderings of the original text, and for the Christian interpretation put by their authors on controverted passages (in reference to the MESSIAH, &c.). A comparative estimate is not yet attainable, as to what in Targumic literature is the pure expression and development of the Jewish mind, and what is of foreign growth. But, as has been said, the Targums and kindred writings are of considerable dogmatical and exegetical value; and a similar good work has been effected by means of the cognate dialect, Western Aramaic or Syriac. From the third to the ninth century, Syriac was to a great part of Asia—what in their spheres Hellenic Greek and mediæval Latin have respectively been—the one ecclesiastical language of the district named.

§§ 20–24. Arabic Language. Period of Revival.—20. The early population of Arabia, its antiquities and peculiarities, have been described under

ARABIA. We find Arabia occupied by a confluence of tribes, the leading one of undoubted Ishmaelitic descent—the others of the seed or lineage of Abraham, and blended by alliance, language, neighborhood, and habits. Before these any aboriginal inhabitants must have disappeared. We have seen that the peninsula of Arabia lay in the track of Cushite civilization, in its supposed return-course toward the N. E. There may now be found abundant illustration of the relationship of the Himyaritic with the early Shemitic; and the language of the Ehkili (or Mahrah) presents us with the singular phenomenon of a dialect less Arabic than Hebrew, and possessing close affinity with the Ghez, or Ethiopian.—21. The affinity of the Ghez (CUSH ? the sacred language of ETHIOPIA) with the Shemitic has been long remarked. In its lexical peculiarities, the Ghez is said to resemble the Aramaic, in its grammatical the Arabic. The alphabet is very curious, differing from Shemitic alphabets in the number, order, and name and form of the letters, by the direction of the writing, and especially by the form of vowel notation. Each consonant contains a short r—the vowels are expressed by additions to the consonants. The alphabet thus consists of 202 signs (syllabic). This language and character have now been succeeded for general purposes by the Amharic—probably at first a kindred dialect with the Ghez, but now altered by subsequent extraneous additions.—22. Internal evidence demonstrates that the Arabic language, when it first appears on the field of history, was being gradually developed in its remote and barren peninsular home. A well-known legend speaks of the present Arabic language as being a fusion of different dialects, effected by the tribe of Koreish settled round Mecca, and the reputed wardens of the Caaba. In any case, the paramount purity of the Koreishite dialect is asserted by Arabic writers on grammar. The recognition of the Koran, as the ultimate standard in linguistic as in religious matters, established in Arabic judgment the superior purity of the Koreishite dialect. That the Arabs possessed a literature anterior to the birth of Mohammed, and expressed in a language marked with many grammatical peculiarities, is beyond doubt. Even in our own times, scholars have seemed unwilling altogether to abandon the legend—how at the fair of Okadh goods and traffic—wants and profit—were alike neglected, while bards contended amid their listening countrymen, anxious for such a verdict as should entitle their lays to a place among the Moallakat, i. e. those suspended in the Caaba, or national temple at Mecca. But the appearance of Mohammed put an end for a season to commerce and bardic contests; nor was it until the work of conquest was done that the faithful resumed the pursuits of peace. The earliest reliable relics of Arabic literature are only fragments, to be found in what has come down to us of Pre-Islamite compositions. And various arguments have been put forward against the probability of the present form of these remains being their original one. Their obscurities, it is contended, are less those of age than of individual style, while their uniformity of language is at variance with the demonstrably late cultivation and ascendancy of the Koreishite dialect. Another, and not a feeble argument, is the utter absence of allusion to the early religion of the Arabs.—The style of the Koran is very peculiar. Assuming that it represents the best forms of the Koreishite dialect about the middle of the seventh century, we may say of the Koran, that its linguistic approached its religious supremacy. The Koran may be characterized as marking the transition from versification to prose, from poetry to eloquence.—23. With regard to the value of Arabic in illustration, two different judgments obtain. According to one, all the lexical riches and grammatical varieties of the Shemitic family are to be found combined in the Arabic.—24. Another school maintains very different opinions. The comparatively recent date (in their present form at least) and limited amount of Arabic remains are pleaded against its claims as a standard of reference in respect of the Hebrew. Its verbal copiousness, elaborate mechanism, subtlety of thought, wide and diversified fields of literature, cannot be called in question. But it is urged (and colorably) that its riches are not all pure metal, and that no great attention to etymology has been evinced by native writers on the language. Undoubtedly schools such as that of Albert Schultens († 1730) have unduly exalted the value of Arabic in illustration; but in what may be designated as the field of lower criticism its importance cannot be disputed. (VEASIONS, ANCIENT [ARABIC].)

§§ 25–32. Structure of the Shemitic Languages.—25. The question as to whether any large amount of primitives in the Shemitic languages is fairly deducible from imitation of sounds, has been answered very differently by high authorities. Gesenius thought instances of onomatopoeia very rare in extant remains, although probably more numerous at an early period. Hoffmann's judgment is the same, in respect of Western Aramaic. On the other hand, Rénan qualifies his admission of the identity of numerous Shemitic and Japhetic primitives by a suggestion that these, for the most part, may be assigned to biliteral words, originating in the imitation of the simplest and most obvious sounds. But more probably "the 400 or 500 roots which remain as the constituent elements in different families of languages are not interjections, nor are they imitations. They are phonetic types, produced by a power inherent in human nature" (Max Müller).—26. The inquiry, as to the extent of affinity still discernible between Shemitic and Japhetic roots, belongs to another article. (TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.) Nothing in the Scripture which bears upon the subject can be fairly pleaded against such an affinity being possible. But in treating the Shemitic languages in connection with Scripture, it is most prudent to turn away from this tempting field of inquiry to the consideration of the simple elements—the primitives—the true base of every language, in that these rather than the mechanism of grammar are to be regarded as exponents of internal spirit and character.—27. Humboldt has named two very remarkable points of difference between the Japhetic and Shemitic language-families. The first peculiarity is the triliteral root (as the language is at present known)—the second the expression of significations by consonants, and relations by vowels—both forming part of the flexions within words, so remarkable in the Shemitic family. In Humboldt's opinion, the prevalent triliteral root was substituted for an earlier or biliteral, as being found impracticable and obscure in use. Traces of this survive in the rudest, or Aramaic, branch, where what is pronounced as one syllable, in the Hebrew forms two, and in the more elaborate Arabic three—e. g. kāl, katal, katala (= to kill). Much has been written as to whether this peculiarity is original or secondary. Dr. S. Davidson has thus stated the case:—"A uniform root-formation by three letters or two syllables developed itself out of the original monosyllabic state by the addition of a third letter. This tendency to enlargement presents itself in the Indo-Germanic also: but there is this difference, that in the latter monosyllabic roots remain besides those that have been enlarged, while in the other they have almost disappeared." In this judgment most will agree.—28. Was the art of writing invented by Moses and his contemporaries, or from what source did the Hebrew nation acquire it? It can hardly be doubted that the art of writing was known to the Israelites in the time of Moses. Great difference of opinion has prevailed as to which of the Shemitic peoples may justly claim the invention of letters. The award to the PHENICIANS, so long unchallenged, is now practically set aside. A more probable theory would seem that which represents letters as having passed from the Egyptians to the Phenicians and Hebrews. Either people may have acquired this accomplishment from the same source, at the same time and independently—or one may have preceded the other, and subsequently imparted the acquisition. As the Hebrew and Phenician alphabets correspond, and the character is less Phenician than Hebrew, the latter people would seem to have been the first possessors of this accomplishment, and to have imparted it subsequently to the Phenicians. The theory (now almost passed into a general belief) of an early uniform language overspreading the range of countries comprehended in Gen. x., serves to illustrate this question. According to the elaborate analysis of Lepsius, the original alphabet of the language-family, of which the Shemitic formed a part, stood as follows:—

Weak Gutturals.	Labials.	Gutturals.	Dentals.
Aleph = A	Beth + Gimel + Daleth = Media
He = E + I	Vav + Heth + Teth = Aspirates
Ghain = O + u	Pe + Kaph + Tau = Tenuis

As the processes of enunciation became more delicate, the liquids Lamed, Mem, Nun, were apparently interposed as the third row, with the original S, Samech, from which were derived Zain, Tsaddi, and Shin—Caph (soft k), from its limited functions, is apparently of later growth; and the separate existence of Resh, in many languages, is demonstrably of comparatively recent date, as distinguished from the kindred sound Lamed. In Yod, as in Kuph and Lamed, Lepsius finds remains of the ancient vowel-strokes, which carry us back to the early syllabic symbols, whose existence he maintains with great force and learning.—29. On the history of the formation of the written characters among the Hebrews, see WRITING.—The history of the characters, ordinarily used in the Syriac (or Western) branch of the Aramaic family, is blended with that of those used in Judea. Like the square characters, they were derived from the old Phenician, but passed through some intermediate stages. The first variety is that known by the name of Estrangelo—a heavy cumbrous character found in use in the very oldest documents. Concurrently with this, are traces of the existence of a smaller and more cursive character, very much resembling it. There are also other varieties, slightly differing—e. g. the Nestorian—but that in ordinary use, is the Peshito = simple (or lineal, according to some). Its origin is somewhat uncertain, but probably may be assigned to the seventh century of our era.—Until a comparatively short time before the days of Mohammed, the art of writing appears to have been practically unknown among the Arabs. For the Himyarites guarded with jealous care their own peculiar character—the musnad, or elevated; in itself unfitted for general use. Possibly different tribes might have possessed approaches to written characters; but about the beginning of the seventh century, the heavy cumbrous Cufic character (so called from Cufa, the city where it was most early used) appears to have been generally adopted. It was said to have been invented by Muramar-Ibn Murrat, a native of Babylonian Irak. But the shapes and arrangements of the letters indicate their derivation from the Estrangelo. About the tenth century a smaller and more flowing character, the Nishki, was introduced by Ibn Moklah, which, with considerable alterations and improvements, is that ordinarily in present use.—30. As in the Hebrew and Aramaic branches, so in the Arab branch of the Semitic family, various causes rendered desirable the introduction of diacritical signs and vowel points, which took place toward the close of the seventh century of our era—not, however, without considerable opposition at the outset. At first a simple mark or stroke, like the diacritical line in the Samaritan MSS., was adopted to mark unusual significations. A further and more advanced stage, like the diacritical points of the Aramaic, was the employment of a point above the line to express sounds of a high kind, like a and o—one below, for feebler and lower ones, like i and e—and a third in the centre of the letters, for those of a harsher kind, as distinguished from the other two.—31. The reverence of the Jews, for their sacred writings, would have been outraged by any attempts to introduce an authoritative system of interpretation at variance with existing ones. To reduce the reading of the Scriptures to authoritative and intelligible uniformity was the object of the Masorets, by means of a system of vowels and accents. (OLD TESTAMENT, A.) The system has been carried out with far greater minuteness in the Hebrew, than in the two sister dialects. The Arabic grammarians did not proceed beyond three signs for a, i, u; the Syriac added e and o, which they represented by figures borrowed from the Greek alphabet, not very much altered. The system of accents bears rather on the relation of words and the members of sentences, than on the construction of individual words.—32. A comparison of the Semitic languages, as known to us, presents them as very unevenly developed. In their present form the Arabic is undoubtedly the richest; but it would have been rivalled by the Hebrew had a career been vouchsafed equally long and favorable to this latter.

Shem'u-el (Heb. = SAMUEL). 1. Son of Ammi-hud; appointed from the tribe of Simeon to divide the land of Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 20).—2. SAMUEL the prophet (1 Chr. vi. 33).—3. Son of Tola; a chief of Issachar (vii. 2).

Shen (Heb. tooth, Ges.), a place mentioned to define the position of EBEN-EZER; perhaps a tooth-shaped rock or peak (1 Sam. vii. 12 only); site unknown.

She-na'zar (fr. Heb. = fiery tooth? Ges.), son of SALATHIEL, or Shealtiel (1 Chr. iii. 18).

She'nir (fr. Heb.) = SENIR = Mount HERMON (Deut. iii. 9; Cant. iv. 8).

* She'el [o as in toll] (Heb. sh'el). HELL.

She'pham (Heb. cold, or bareness, place naked of trees, Ges.), a place mentioned only by Moses as between HAZAR-ENAN and RIBLAH, on the eastern boundary of the Promised Land (Num. xxxiv. 10, 11); site unknown. The Targum Pseudojonathan, Saadiah, &c., render the name by Apameia; but it seems uncertain whether by this they intend the Greek city of that name on the Orontes, fifty miles below Antioch, or use it as = Baniās or DAN, as Schwarz affirms.

Sheph-a-th'ah (fr. Heb. = SHEPHATHIAH), a Benjamite, father of MESHULLAM 6 (1 Chr. ix. 8); properly "SHEPHATHIAH," as in the A. V. of 1611, &c.

Sheph-a-t'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah defends, Ges.). 1. Fifth son of David; born of his wife Abital at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 Chr. iii. 3).—2. Ancestor of a family, 372 of whom returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 4; Neh. vii. 9); and eighty males, with Zebadiah at their head, with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 8).—3. Ancestor of certain children of Solomon's servants, who came up with Zerubbabel (ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59).—4. A descendant of Perez, or Pharez, the son of Judah; ancestor of Athaiah (xi. 4).—5. Son of Mattan; one of the princes of Judah who counselled Zedekiah to put Jeremiah in the dungeon (Jer. xxxviii. 1).—6. A Benjamite, father of MESHULLAM 6 (1 Chr. ix. 8 in some copies; SHEPHATHIAH).—7. "The HARPURITE," one of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 5).—8. Son of Maachah, and chief of the Simeonites in David's reign (xvii. 16).—9. Son of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xxi. 2).

Shep'herd (Heb. rō'eh = one who feeds a flock, a shepherd, herdsman, Ges.), translated usually "shepherd," as in Gen. xlix. 4 and Ex. ii. 17, 19, &c., also "PASTOR," as in Jer. ii. 8, xvii. 16, &c., "herdsman," as in Gen. xlii. 7, 8, &c., &c.; rō'i = "shepherd," Is. xxxviii. 12; Zech. xi. 17; bōkēr (= herdsman, also shepherd, Ges.), translated "herdsman," Am. vii. 14; nōkēd (= a keeper of flocks, and in a wider sense, of any cattle, a shepherd, herdsman, sheep-owner, cattle-breeder, Ges.), translated "sheep-master" in 2 K. iii. 4, "herdsman" in Am. i. 1; Gr. poimēn (= one who tends herds or flocks, a shepherd, herdsman, Rbu. N. T. Lex.), in N. T. uniformly translated "shepherd," as in Mat. ix. 36, xiv. 32, &c.; archipoimēn = "chief shepherd," 1 Pet. v. 4.—In a nomadic state of society every man is more or less a shepherd. The progenitors of the Jews in the patriarchal age were nomads, and their history is rich in scenes of pastoral life. (PASTORAL.) The occupation of tending the flocks was undertaken, not only by the sons of wealthy chiefs (Gen. xxx. 29 ff., xxxvii. 12 ff.), but even by their daughters (xxix. 6 ff.; Ex. ii. 19). The Egyptian captivity did much to implant a love of settled abode, and we find the tribes which still retained a taste for shepherd-life selecting their own quarters apart from their brethren in the Transjordanic district (Num. xxxii. 1 ff.). Henceforward in Palestine Proper the shepherd held a subordinate position. (AGRICULTURE.)—The office of the Eastern shepherd, as described in the Bible, was attended with much hardship, and even danger. He was exposed to the extremes of heat and cold (Gen. xxxi. 40); his food frequently consisted of the precarious supplies afforded by nature, such as the fruit of the "sycamore" or Egyptian fig (Am. vii. 14), the "husks" of the carob-tree (Lk. xv. 16), and perchance the locusts and wild honey which supported John the Baptist (Mat. iii. 4); he had to encounter the attacks of wild beasts, occasionally of the larger species, such as lions, wolves, panthers, and bears (1 Sam. xvii. 34; Is. xxxi. 4; Jer. v. 6; Am. iii. 12); nor was he free from the risk of robbers or predatory hordes (Gen. xxxi. 39). To meet these various foes the shepherd's equipment consisted of the following articles:—A MANTLE, made probably of sheepskin with the fleece on, which he turned inside out in cold weather, as implied in the comparison in Jer. xliii. 12; a SCRIP or wallet, containing a small amount of food (1 Sam. xvii. 40); a sling (ARMS, I. 4); and a STAFF, which served both as a weapon against foes, and a crook for the management of the flock (ib.; Ps. xxiii. 4; Zech. xi. 7). If the shepherd was at a distance from his home, he was provided with a light TENT (Cant. i. 8; Jer. xxxv. 7), the removal of which was easily effected (Is. xxxviii. 12). In certain localities, moreover, towers were erected for the double purpose of spying an enemy at a distance, and protecting the flock. (TOWER.)—The routine of the shepherd's duties appears to have been as follows:—In the morning he led forth his flock from the fold (Jn. x. 4), which he did by going before them and calling to them, as is still usual in the East (SHEEP); arrived at the pasturage, he watched the flock with the assistance of dogs (Job xxx. 1; Dog), and, should any sheep stray, he had to search for it until he found it (Ez. xxxiv. 12; Lk. xv. 4); he supplied them with water, either at a running stream or at troughs attached to wells (Gen. xxix. 7, xxx. 38; Ex. ii. 16; Ps. xxiii. 2); at evening he brought them back to the fold, and reckoned them to see that none were missing, by passing them "under the rod" as they entered the door of the enclosure (Lev. xxvii. 32; Ez. xx. 37), checking each sheep as it passed, by a motion of the hand (Jer. xxxiii. 13); and, finally, he watched the entrance of the fold (SHEEP-FOLD) through the night, acting as porter (Jn. x. 3). The shepherd's office thus required great watchfulness, particularly by night (Lk. ii. 8; comp. Nah. iii. 18). It also required tenderness toward the young and feeble (Is. xl. 11), particularly in driving them to and from the pasturage (Gen. xxxiii. 13). In large establishments there were various grades of shepherds, the highest being styled "rulers" (Gen. xlvii. 6), or "chief shepherds" (1 Pet. v. 4): in a royal household the title of abbir (= mighty) was bestowed on the person who held the post (A. V. "chiefest," 1 Sam. xxi. 7). The hatred of the Egyptians toward shepherds (Gen. xlv. 34) may have been mainly due (so Mr. Bevan; but see EGYPT) to their contempt for the sheep itself, which appears to have been valued neither for food nor generally for sacrifice, the only district where they were offered being about the Natron lakes. It may have been increased by the memory of the Shepherd invasion. "Shepherd" is applied metaphorically to princes (Is. xlv. 28; Ez. xxxiv. 2 ff., &c.), teachers (Eccl. xii. 11), to Jehovah (Ps. xxiii. 1, lxxx. 1, &c.), to the Lord Jesus Christ (Jn. x. 11, 14, 16; Heb. xiii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 25, v. 4, &c.). BARN; GOAT; GRASS; HERD; LAMB; PASTOR; PASTURE; SHEARING-HOUSE; SHEEP-MASTER, &c.).

She'phi (Heb. a wearing away, naked hill, Ges.), son of Shobal, of the sons of Seir (1 Chr. i. 40); = SHEPHO.

She'pho (Heb. smoothness) = SHEPHI (Gen. xxxvi. 23).

She-phu'phan (Heb. serpent, Ges.; comp. ADDER 4), a son of Bela, the first-born of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 5); = SHUPHAM, and MUPPIM, also (so Lord A. C. Hervey) SHUPPIM.

She'rah (Heb. kinswoman, Ges.), daughter of Ephraim, or of Beriah (1 Chr. vii. 24), and foundress of the two Beth-horons, and of UZZEN-SHERAH.

*Sherd = a fragment of an earthen vessel = POTSHERD.

Sher-e-M'ah (fr. Heb. = heat of Jehovah? Ges.), a Merarite Levite, of the family of Mahli, one of those (loosely called "priests" in verse 24; comp. Josh. iii. 3) who joined Ezra at the river of Ahava, and had charge of the gold, silver, and vessels offered for the Temple (Ezr. viii. 18, 24). When Ezra read the Law to the people, Sherebiah was among the Levites who assisted him (Neh. viii. 7). He took part in the psalm of confession and thanksgiving at the solemn fast after the Feast of Tabernacles (ix. 4, 5), sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 12), and was among the chief of the Levites who belonged to the choir (xii. 8, 24).

She'resh (Heb. root, Ges.), son of Machir the son of Manasseh by his wife Maachab (1 Chr. vii. 16).

She-re'zer (fr. Pers. = SHAREZER), one of the messengers sent in the fourth year of Darius by the people who had returned from the Captivity to inquire concerning fasting in the fifth month (Zech. vii. 2). REGEN-MELICH.

*Sher'ifs, the A. V. translation of Chal. pl. tiphtáyé, found in Dan. iii. 2, 3 only. Gesenius makes the Chaldee = persons learned in the law, lawyers; First interprets judges, the name of certain high officials among the Babylonians. A sheriff in the United States is now the chief officer of a county, whose business it is to execute the laws, the orders of judges, &c.; in Great Britain he acts also as judge in certain cases.

She'shach (Heb., see below), in Jer. xxv. 26, li. 41, a synonym either for Babylon or for Babylonia. According to some commentators, it represents "Babel" on a principle well known to the later Jews—the substitution of letters according to their position in the alphabet, counting backward from the last letter, for those which hold the same numerical position, counting in the ordinary way. It may well be doubted, however, if this fanciful practice is as old as Jeremiah. Sir H. Rawlinson has observed that the name of the moon-god, which was identical, or nearly so, with that of the city of Abraham, Ur (or Hūr), "might have been read in one of the ancient dialects of Babylon as Shishaki." Sheshach may stand for Ur, Ur itself, the old capital, being taken to represent the country (so Rawlinson).

She'shal (Heb. whitish? Ges.), one of the three sons of Anak who dwelt in Hebron (Num. xiii. 22), and were driven thence and slain by Caleb at the head of the children of Judah (Josh. xv. 14; Judg. i. 10).

She'shan (Heb. lily? Ges.), a descendant of Jerahmeel the son of Hezron; father of AHLAI (1 Chr. ii. 31, 34, 35).

Shesh-baz'zar (fr. Pers. = fire-worshipper? Ges.), the Chaldean or Persian name given to ZERUBBABEL (Ezr. i. 8, 11, v. 14, 16; 1 Esd. ii. 12, 15). The Jewish tradition, that Sheshbazzar is Daniel, is utterly without weight.

Sheth (Heb., see below). 1. The patriarch SETH (1 Chr. i. 1).—2. In the A. V. of Num. xxiv. 17, the Heb. Shéth is rendered as a proper name, but there is reason to regard it as an appellative, and to translate, instead of "the sons of Sheth," "the sons of tumult," the wild warriors of Moab (compare Jer. xlviii. 45).

She'thar (fr. Pers. = a star), one of the seven princes of Persia and Media, who had access to the king's presence, and were the first men in the kingdom, in the third year of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 14).

She'thar-boz'nai, or -boz'nai-l (fr. Pers. = star of splendor), a Persian officer of rank, having a command in the province "on this side the river" under Tatnai the satrap, in the reign of Darius Hystaspis (Ezr. v. 3, 6, vi. 6, 13). He joined with Tatnai and the Apharsachites in trying to obstruct the progress of the Temple in the time of Zerubbabel, and in writing a letter to Darius, of which a copy is preserved in Ezra v.

She'va (Heb., a corruption of SERAIAH, Ges.). 1. The scribe or royal secretary of David (2 Sam. xx. 25); = SERAIAH 1, SHISHA, and SHAVSHA.—2. Son of CALEB 1 by his concubine Maachah (1 Chr. ii. 49).

Shew'-bread [sho'-bred] (Heb. lehen [or lechem], pānim [or happānim] = bread of the face or faces, i. e. of the presence of Jehovah; see below) (Ex. xxv. 30, xxxv. 13, xxxix. 36, &c.), also called "bread of ordering" (1 Chr. ix. 32 marg.), "the continual bread" (Num. iv. 7), and "hallowed bread" (1 Sam. xxi. 4-6). Within the Ark it was directed that there should be a table of shittim-wood (i. e. acacia), two cubits in length, a cubit in breadth, and a cubit and a half in height, overlaid with pure gold, and "having a golden crown to the border thereof round about," i. e. a border or list, in order, as we may suppose, to hinder that which was placed on it from by any accident falling off. This table is described in Ex. xxv. 23-30, and the bas-reliefs within the Arch of Titus represent it as it existed in the Herodian Temple. This representation, shown in the cut, and obviously accurate, exhibits the hand of one of the slaves who is carrying the table, as of about equal breadth with the border, according to the words of Exodus, "and thou shalt make unto it a border of a handbreadth round about." 2 Chr. iv. 19 mentions "the tables whereon the shew-bread was set," and at ver. 8 we read of Solomon making ten tables. The table of the second Temple was carried away by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mc. i. 22), and a new one made at the refurbishing of the sanctuary under Judas Maccabeus (iv. 49). Afterward Ptolemy Philadelphus presented a magnificent table. The table stood in the sanctuary together with the seven-branched candlestick and the altar of incense. Every Sabbath twelve newly-baked loaves were put on it in two rows, six in each, and sprinkled with incense (the LXX. add salt), where they remained till the following Sabbath. Then they were replaced by twelve new ones, the incense was burned, and they were eaten by the priests in the Holy Place, out of which they might not be removed. Besides these, the shew-bread table was adorned with dishes, spoons, bowls, &c., of pure gold (Ex. xxv. 29).—The twelve loaves plainly answer to the twelve tribes (compare Rev. xxii. 2), though Josephus and Philo regarded them as representing the twelve months. The meaning of the rite is left in Scripture unexplained, although it is referred to as one of the leading and most solemn appointments of the sanctuary (comp. 2 Chr. xiii. 10, 11). But the first name we find given it is obviously the dominant one, A. V. "shew-bread," literally bread of the face or of the faces, or using the latter term in its oft-recurring secondary sense, bread of the presence, i. e. of Jehovah (the Heb. pānim being used only in the plural, and therefore applied equally to the face or presence of one person and of many). Spencer and others consider it bread offered to God as was the "MEAT-OFFERING," a symbolical meal for God somewhat answering to a heathen Leicisternium (in which the images of the gods, lying on pillows, were placed in the streets and food of all kinds set before them, Andrews' Freund's L. Lex.). But Bähr remarks, and justly, that the Heb. pānim (= presence) is applied solely to the table and the bread, not to the other furniture of the sanctuary, the altar of incense, or the golden candlestick. There is something, therefore, peculiar to the former which is denoted by the title. Of the Angel of God's Presence (Is. lxiii. 9; comp. Ex. xxxiii. 14, 15; Deut. iv. 37) it is said that God's "NAME is in Him" (Ex. xxxiii. 20). The Presence and the Name may, therefore, be taken as equivalent. Both, in reference to their context, indicate the manifestation of God to His creatures. Hence, as the name stands for He or Himself, so Face for Person: to see the Face, for, to see the Person. The Bread of the Face is therefore that bread through which God is seen, i. e. with the participation of which the seeing of God is bound up, or through the participation of which man attains the sight of God. Whence it follows that we have not to think of bread merely as such, as the means of nourishing the bodily life, but as spiritual food, as a means of appropriating and retaining that life which consists in seeing the face of God (so Mr. Garden, after Bähr). Fairbairn says: "The shew-bread was only a more special and stated form of the bread or MEAT-OFFERING, which was a very common accompaniment of the bloody sacrifices; and was a symbol of the moral excellence, or spiritual fruit, which the covenant people were bound to render to Jehovah. It consequently took the aspect of something given or presented by them to God, received 'from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant' (Lev. xxiv. 8), and with the meat-offerings generally was called by God, 'My offering, My bread made by fire, for a sweet savor unto Me' (Num. xxviii. 2). The Tabernacle was the Lord's peculiar dwelling in Israel, and this table of shew-bread was continually to exhibit an image of the fruitfulness in all well-doing which the people were called to be ever rendering Him from the field of His inheritance."

Shib'bo-leth (Judg. xii. 6), the Hebrew word which the Gileadites under Jephthah made use of at the passages of the Jordan, after a victory over the Ephraimites, to test the pronunciation of the sound sh by those who wished to cross over the river. The Ephraimites, it would appear, in their dialect substituted for sh the simple sound s; and the Gileadites, regarding every one who failed to pronounce sh as an Ephraimite, and therefore an enemy, put him to death accordingly. The word "Shibboleth," which has now a second life in the English language in a new signification (viz. a party test, or some minute point of difference, the importance of which is magnified in controversy), has two meanings in Hebrew: 1st, an ear of wheat or other grain; 2dly, a stream or flood (Ps. lxi. 2, 15): and it was, perhaps, in the latter sense that this particular word suggested itself to the Gileadites, the Jordan being a rapid river. There is no mystery in this particular word. Any word beginning with the sound sh would have answered equally well as a test.

Shib'mah (fr. Heb.) = SIRMAH, a city of Reuben (Num. xxxii. 38); probably = SHEBAM.

Shi'e'ron (Heb. drunkenness, Ges.), one of the landmarks at the western end of the N. boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 11, only). It lay between EKRON ('Akir) and JABNEEL (Yebna), the port at which the boundary ran to the sea. No trace of the name has been discovered between these two places, which are barely four miles apart.

Shile'd. ARMS, II., 5, 6.

Shig-ga'lon [-ga'yon] (Heb., see below) (Ps. vii. 1), a particular kind of Psalm; the specific character of which is now not known. In the singular number the word occurs only in the inscription of Ps. vii. In the inscription to IIabakkuk's Ode (Hab. iii. 1) the word occurs in the plural; but the Hebrew phrase in which it stands ('al shiggyónôth) is deemed almost unanimously, as it would seem, by modern Hebrew scholars to mean after the manner of the Shiggaion, and to be merely a direction as to the kind of musical measures by which the ode was to be accompanied (so Mr. Twisleton). Gesenius and Fürst concur in deriving it from Heb. shiggâh, in the sense of magnifying or extolling with praises, and justify this derivation by kindred Syriac words. Shiggaion would thus mean a hymn or psalm; but its specific meaning, if it has any, as applicable to the seventh Psalm, would continue unknown. Ewald, Rüdiger (continuation of Gesenius's Thesaurus), and Delitzsch derive it from Heb. shâgâh, in the sense of reeling, as from wine, and consider the word to be somewhat equivalent to a dithyrambus. Gesenius's Heb. and Eng. Lex. (edited by Robinson, 1854) explains the word as = "a hymn, or rather a dithyrambic ode, i. e. erratic, wild, enthusiastic." De Wette, Lee, and Hitzig interpret the word as a psalm of lamentation, or a psalm in distress, as derived from Arabic. Hupfeld conjectures that shiggaion = SHIGGAION, Ps. ix. 16, in the sense of poem or song. The versions give no help. In the A. V. of Hab. iii. 1, the rendering is "upon shigionoth," as if shigionoth were some musical instrument. Gesenius (ed. by Robinson, 1854) translates this "in the manner of dithyrambic songs."

* Shig-i-o'noth. SHIGGAION.

Shi'hon (fr. Heb. = a ruin, Ges.), in some copies correctly "Shion," a town of Issachar, named only in Josh. xix. 19, between Haphraim and Anaharath. Eusebius and Jerome mention it as then existing "near Mount Tabor." The only name at all resembling it at present in that neighborhood is the Chirbet Shi'in of Dr. Schulz, 1½ miles N. W. of De-bûrîeh. (DAHERATH.) The identification is, however, very uncertain.

Shi'hor (Heb. black, turbid) of Egypt (1 Chr. xiii. 5) is spoken of as one limit of the kingdom of Israel in David's time, the entering in of Hamath being the other. It must correspond to "the Shihor which is before Egypt" (Josh. xiii. 8), A. V. "Sihor," and probably designates the stream of the Wady el-'Arish. RIVER OF EGYPT.

Shi'hor-ib'nath (Heb., see below), named only in Josh. xix. 26 as one of the landmarks of the bound-dary of Asher. Nothing is known of it. By the ancient translators and commentators the names are taken as belonging to two distinct places. But modern commentators, beginning perhaps with Masius, have inclined to consider Shihor as identical with the name of the Nile, and Shihor-ibnath to be a river. They interpret the Shihor-ibnath as the glass river, and identify it with the Belus of Pliny, the present Nahr Na'mân. But this theory is surely very far-fetched. There is nothing (so Mr. Grove) to indicate that Shihor-ibnath is a stream at all, except the agreement of the first part (SHIHOR) with a rare word used for the Nile. Porter (in Kitto) suggests that it may be some little town on the bank of one of the streamlets which fall into the Mediterranean between Carmel and Dor.

Shil'hi (Heb. armed? Ges.), father of Azubah, Jehoshaphat's mother (1 K. xii. 42; 2 Chr. xx. 31).

Shil'him (Heb. armed men, Ges.; fountains, Fû.), a city in the S. of Judah, named between Lebaoth and Ain, or Ain-rimmon (Josh. xv. 32); apparently = SHAARAIM and SHARUHEN. The juxtaposition of Shilhim and Ain has led to the conjecture that they = the SALIM and ENON of John the Baptist; but their position in the S. of Judah seems to forbid this.

Shil'lem (Heb. requital, recompense, Ges.), son of Naphtali, and ancestor of the family of the SHILLEMITES (Gen. xlii. 24; Num. xxvi. 49); = SHALLUM 7.

Shil'lem-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of Shillem the son of Naphtali (Num. xxvi. 49).

Shi-lo'ah (Heb. shilôah or shilôach = a sending of water, i. e. a conduit, aqueduct, Ges.; sent [abstract for concrete, Ges.], Jn. ix. 7), the WATERS of, a certain soft-flowing stream (Is. viii. 6); no doubt = the waters of SILLOAM—the only perennial spring of Jerusalem.

Shi'lôh (Heb., see below), in the A. V., is once used as the name of a person, in a very difficult passage in Gen. xlix. 10. I. Supposing the A. V. translation correct, the word = Peaceable, or Pacific, and the allusion is either to SOLOMON, whose name has a similar signification, or to the expected MESSIAH, who in Is. ix. 6 is expressly called the Prince of Peace (Gesenius [formerly], Hengstenberg, Rabbi Woguel, Bush [on Gen. i. c., and in Kitto], Prof. Douglas [in Fbn.], Ayre, &c.).—The objections to this translation, supposing the Heb. text to be correct as it stands, are thus presented by Mr. Twisleton: (1.) "Shiloh" occurs nowhere else in Hebrew as the name or appellation of a person. (2.) The only other Hebrew word, apparently, of the same form, is GILOH (Josh. xv. 51; 2 Sam. xv. 12), the name of a city, and not of a person. (3.) By translating the word as it is translated everywhere else in the Bible, viz. as the name of the city in Ephraim where the Ark of the Covenant so long remained (see next article), a sufficiently good meaning (see II., below) is given to the passage without any violence to the Hebrew language, and, indeed, with a precise grammatical parallel elsewhere (compare 1 Sam. iv. 12).—II. Taking Shiloh to be the name of the city, Mr. Twisleton thus translates: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff (A. V. 'law-giver') from between his feet, till he shall go to Shiloh." And, in this case, the allusion would be to the primacy of Judah in war (Judg. i. 1, 2, xx. 18; Num. ii. 8, x. 14), which was to continue until the Promised Land was conquered, and the Ark of the Covenant was solemnly deposited at Shiloh. This translation, suggested by Teller (1766), has been, with modifications, favored by Eichhorn, Hitzig, Tuch, Bleek, Ewald, Delitzsch, Rödiger, Kalisch, Luzzatto, Davidson, Fürst, &c. To this translation Prof. Douglas (in Fbn.) objects—(1.) There is no evidence that the city Shiloh existed in Jacob's time, or, if it did then exist, that it bore this name, or, if it then existed under this name, that Jacob spoke to his sons of a place so entirely unimportant and apparently unconnected with them. (2.) What had Judah to do with coming to Shiloh, more than the other tribes—Judah, of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood? (3.) Why is Judah's lead or rule limited to the time anterior to his coming to Shiloh? The prophecy had reference to things which should befall them "in the last days" (ver. 1). (4.) Does this interpretation harmonize in any way with the facts in the case? Before this "coming to Shiloh," Judah had only a very limited amount of honor, the power and authority being first in the hands of Moses and Aaron the Levites, next in those of Joshua the Ephraimite. Nor is there any evidence that the coming to Shiloh was a turning-point in the relations of Judah to the other tribes or to the heathen. It had as much primacy after Joshua's death as before.—III. Another translation adopted by Gesenius, Vater, Knobel, &c., makes Shiloh here = rest. The passage would then run thus: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah . . . till rest come, and the nations obey him;" and the reference would be to the Messiah, who was to spring from the tribe of Judah.—IV. Another explanation of Shiloh, on the assumption that it is not the name of a person, is a translation by various learned Jews, apparently countenanced by the Targum of Jonathan, and adopted by Luther and Calvin, that the Heb. Shiloh = his son, i. e. the son of Judah (in the sense of the Messiah), from a supposed word Shil, "a son." There is, however, no such word in known Hebrew.—V. There are other translations which presuppose a different reading from that in the present Hebrew text. Thus the Vulgate and Douay Bible translate "till he come that is to be sent." The LXX. translation has, "till the things reserved for him come." Mr. Twissleton, without adopting any of these different readings, admits the possibility that the correct reading may have been lost. He, however, claims that whatever interpretation of the present reading may be adopted, the one entitled to the least consideration is that which supposes the prophecy relates to the birth of Christ as occurring in the reign of Herod just before Judea became a Roman province, against which he argues—(1.) that it is impossible reasonably to regard the dependent rule of King Herod the Idumean as an instance of the sceptre being still borne by Judah; (2.) that for more than 400 years from the destruction of the Temple by Nebuchadnezzar the Jews were deprived of their independence, being subject successively to the Chaldeans, Persians, and successors of Alexander, and that the sceptre had departed from Judah, when the Maccabees (a Levitical family) ruled. But Prof. Douglas (in Fbn.) claims that something of Judah's sceptre still remained, a total eclipse being no proof that the day is at an end—that the proper fulfilment of the prophecy did not begin till David's time, and is consummated in Christ according to Lk. i. 32, 33. MESSIAH; PROPHET.

Shil'oh (Heb. probably = place of rest, peace, quiet, Ges.; see above), the name of a place described in Judg. xxi. 19 as "on the N. side of Bethel, on the E. side of the highway that goeth up from Bethel to Shechem, and on the S. of Lebonah." In agreement with this, the traveller at the present day (so Prof. Hackett, original author of this article), going N. from Jerusalem, lodges the first night at Beitin (= BETIKL); the next day, at the distance of a few hours, turns aside to the right, in order to visit Seilûn, the Arabic for Shiloh; and then passing through the narrow Wady, which brings him to the main road, leaves el-Lebbân (= LEBONAH) on the left, as he pursues "the highway" to Nâblus (= SHECHEM). Shiloh was one of the earliest and most sacred of the Hebrew sanctuaries. The ARK OF THE COVENANT, kept at Gilgal, during the progress of the Conquest (Josh. xviii. 1 ff.) was at Shiloh from the last days of Joshua to the time of Samuel (xviii. 10; Judg. xviii. 31; 1 Sam. iv. 3). Here Joshua divided among the tribes the portion of the region W. of Jordan, which had not been already allotted (Josh. xviii. 10, xix. 51). In this distribution, or an earlier one, Shiloh fell within the limits of Ephraim (xvi. 5). The seizure here of the "daughters of Shiloh" by the Benjamites is recorded as preserving one of the tribes from extinction (Judg. xxi. 19-23). Here ELI judged Israel and died; here Hannah's vow was uttered; here SAMUEL was brought up and called to the prophetic office (1 Sam. i.-iv.). The ungodly conduct of Eli's sons occasioned the loss of the Ark of the Covenant, which had been carried into battle against the Philistines, and Shiloh from that time sank into insignificance. It stands forth in the Jewish history as a striking example of the Divine indignation (Ps. lxxviii. 60; Jer. vii. 12). ABIAJAH the prophet (SHILONITE) had his abode there in the time of Jeroboam I. (1 K. xi. 29, xii. 15, xiv. 1, &c.). The people there after the time of the exile appear to have been Cuthites who had adopted some of the forms of Jewish worship (Jer. xli. 5; compare 2 K. xvii. 30; SHECHEM).—The contour of the region indicates very closely where the ancient town must have stood. A Tell, or moderate hill, rises from an uneven plain, surrounded by other higher hills, except a narrow valley on the S., which hill would naturally be chosen as the principal site of the town. The Tabernacle may have been pitched on this eminence, where it would be a conspicuous object on every side. The ruins found there at present consist chiefly of the remains of a comparatively modern village, with which some large stones and fragments of columns are intermixed, evidently from much earlier times. Near a ruined mosque flourishes an immense oak. Just beyond the precincts of the hill stands a dilapidated edifice, called by the natives "the mosque of Seilûn." At the distance of about fifteen minutes from the main site is a fountain, approached through a narrow dale. Its water is abundant, and, according to a practice very common in the East, flows first into a pool or well, and thence into a larger reservoir, from which flocks and herds are watered. Shiloh was secluded, and therefore favorable to acts of worship and religious study. The yearly festivals celebrated there brought together assemblages which would need the supplies of water and pasturage so easily obtained in such a place. TAANATH-SHILOH; TABERNACLE.

Shi'lo'ul (Heb., see below) occurs in the A. V. only in Neh. xi. 5, where it should be rendered (so Mr. Grove) "the Shilonite," i. e. the descendant of Shelah the youngest son of Judah. SHILONITES.

Shi'lo-nite (fr. Heb.), the = the native or resident of SHILOH:—a title ascribed only to ABIAJAH 1 (1 K. xi. 29, xii. 15, xv. 29; 2 Chr. ix. 29, x. 13).

Shi'lo-altre (fr. Heb. = SHILONI), the, mentioned among the descendants of Judah dwelling in Jerusalem after the Captivity (1 Chr. ix. 5); doubtless the members of the house of SHELAH, more accurately SHELANITES. ASAIAH 3.

Shil'shah (Heb. triad, Ges.), an Asherite chief, son of Zophah (1 Chr. vi. 37).

Shim'e-a (Heb. rumor, Ges.). 1. Son of David by Bath-sheba (1 Chr. iii. 5).—2. A Merarite Levite (vi. 30); = SHAMNUA 2 and SHAMNUAH.—3. A Gershonite Levite, ancestor of Asaph the minstrel (vi. 39).—4. Brother of David (xx. 7); = SHAMMAH 2, SHIMMA, and SHIMEAH 1.

Shim'e-ah (Heb. = SHIMEA, Ges.; see No. 2). 1. Brother of David, and father of Jonathan and Jonathanab (2 Sam. xxi. 21); = SHAMMAH 2, SHIMEA 4, and SHIMMA.—2. (Heb. = SHIMEAM). A descendant of Jehiel the father of Gibeon (1 Chr. viii. 32); = SHIMEAM.

Shim'e-am (Heb. fame, rumor? Ges.), a Benjamite, son of Mikloth (1 Chr. ix. 38); = SHIMEAH 2.

Shim'e-ath (Heb. fem. = SHIMEAH, Ges.), an Ammonitess, mother of Jozachar, or Zabad, one of the murderers of King Joash (2 K. xii. 21; 2 Chr. xxiv. 26).

* Shim'e-ath-ites (fr. Heb. = descendants of Shim'e-ah, Ges.), the, a family of scribes at Jabez (1 Chr. ii. 55). TIRATHITES.

Shim'e-i (Heb. renowned, Ges.). 1. Son of Gershom the son of Levi (Num. iii. 18; 1 Chr. vi. 17, xxiii. 7, 10 [compare No. 17, 18]; Zech. xii. 13); = SHIMI in Ex. vi. 17.—2. Son of Gera; a Benjamite of the house of Saul, who lived at BAHURIM. When DAVID and his suite were seen descending the long defile, on his flight from Absalom (2 Sam. xvi. 5-13), the whole feeling of the clan of Benjamin burst forth without restraint in the person of Shimei. He ran along the ridge, cursing, throwing stones at the king and his companions, and when he came to a patch of dust on the dry hill-side, taking it up, and throwing it over them. Abishai was so irritated, that, but for David's remonstrance, he would have darted across the ravine (xvi. 9) and torn or cut off his head. The whole conversation is remarkable, as showing what may almost be called the slang terms of abuse prevalent in the two rival courts (so Dean Stanley). The royal party passed on; Shimei following them with his stones and curses as long as they were in sight.—The next meeting was very different. The king was now returning from his successful campaign. Just as he was crossing the Jordan, in the ferry-boat or on the bridge (xix. 18), the first person to welcome him on the western, or perhaps even on the eastern side, was Shimei, who may have seen him approaching from the heights above. He threw himself at David's feet in abject penitence, and David guaranteed his life with an oath in consideration of the general jubilee and amnesty of the return (ver. 18-23). But the king's suspicions were not set at rest by this submission; and on his deathbed he recalls the whole scene to the recollection of his son Solomon (1 K. ii. 8, 9). Solomon gave Shimei notice that from henceforth he must consider himself confined to the walls of Jerusalem on pain of death. He was to build a house in Jerusalem. Shimei accepted the condition (ii. 36, 37). For three years the engagement was kept. At the end of that time, for the purpose of capturing two servants who had escaped to Gath, he went out on his ass, and made his journey successfully (ii. 40). On his return, the king took him at his word, and he was slain by Benaiah (ii. 41-46).—3. One of Solomon's adherents at the time of Adonijah's usurpation (1 K. i. 8). Unless he = No. 4, or = Shim'e-ah, or Shammah, David's brother, it is impossible to identify him.—4. Solomon's commissary in Benjamin; son of Elah (iv. 18).—5. Son of Pedaiiah, and brother of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 19). (GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST; SHEMAIAH 2).—6. A Simeonite, son of Zacchur (iv. 26, 27); = SHEMAIAH 3?—7. Son of Gog, a Reubenite (v. 4); = SHEMA 1?—8. A Gershonite Levite, son of Jahath (vi. 42).—9. Son of Jeduthun, and chief of the tenth division of the singers (xxv. 17).—10. The Ramathite who was over David's vineyards (xxvii. 27).—11. A Levite of the sons of Heman, who took part in the purification of the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 14); = No. 12?—12. A Levite in Hezekiah's reign, brother and assistant of CONONIAH (xxxi. 12, 13); = No. 11?—13. A Levite in Ezra's time who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 23).—14. One of the sons of Hashum, who put away his foreign wife at Ezra's command (x. 33).—15. A son of Bani, also husband of a foreign wife (x. 38).—16. A Benjamite, son of Kish, and ancestor of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5).—17. A Merarite Levite, son of LIBNI 2 (1 Chr. vi. 29); supposed by some = No. 1, something having been, in their view, omitted in the verse. (UZZA 4).—18. A Levite chief belonging to the family of Laadan the Gershonite (xxiii. 9); different (so Bertheau, on Chr. l. c.) from the brother of Laadan in ver. 7, 10 (compare No. 1).

Shim'e-on (Heb. = SIMON), a layman of Israel, of the sons of Harim, husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 31).

Shim'hi (fr. Heb. = SHIMEI), a Benjamite; apparently = SHEMA 2 (1 Chr. viii. 21).

Shim'l, or Shi'ml (Heb.) = SHIMEI 1 (Ex. vi. 17).

Shim'ites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of Shimi or SHIMEI 1, the son of Gershom (Num. iii. 21).

Shim'ma (fr. Heb.) = SHIMEA 4, third son of Jesse, and brother of David (1 Chr. ii. 13).

Shim'on (Heb. desert, Ges.). The four sons of Shimon are enumerated in an obscure genealogy of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 20).

Shim'rath (Heb. watch, guard, Ges.), a Benjamite chief, son of Shimhi (1 Chr. viii. 21).

Shim'ri (Heb. watchful, Ges.). 1. A Simeonite, son of Shemaiah (1 Chr. iv. 37).—2. Father of Jediael, one of David's "valiant men" (xi. 45).—3. A Kohathite Levite in Hezekiah's reign, who assisted in purifying the Temple (2 Chr. xxix. 13).

Shim'ron (fr. Heb.) = SHIMRON the son of Issachar (1 Chr. vii. 1, erroneously in some copies).

Shim'rou (Heb. watch, guard, Ges.), a city of Zebulun, whose king assisted Jabin, king of Hazor, against Joshua (Josh. xi. 1, xix. 15); perhaps = SHIMRONMERON. Schwarz proposes to identify it with the Simonias of Josephus, now Semānieh, a village a few miles W. of Nazareth.

Shim'ron (see above), fourth son of Issachar (Gen. xvi. 18; Num. xxvi. 24; 1 Chr. vii. 1, in some copies), and head of the family of the SHIMRONITES; = SHIMRON.

Shim'ron-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the family of SHIMRON, son of Issachar (Num. xxvi. 24).

Shim'ron-me'ron (Heb. watch post of Meron, watch-height; Ayre; guard of a fertile place, Fü.). The king of Shimron-meron (probably, though not certainly, = SHIMRON) was one of the thirty-one kings vanquished by Joshua (Josh. xii. 20). The old Jewish traveller hap-Parchi (so Mr. Grove) fixes Shimron-meron at two hours E. of En-gannim (Jenu), S. of the mountains of Gilboa, at a village called in his day Dar Meron. Reland (so Porter, in Kitto) identifies Shimron and Shimron-meron with the village of Semūnieh, W. of Nazareth. The Jews at Safed (so Wln. ii. 313) identify Shimron-meron with the village of Meirōn, where are the reputed tombs of Hillel, Shammai, and other ancient holy Rabbis.

Shim'shal (Heb. sunny, Ges.), a Persian official in Samaria, scribe or secretary of REHUM (Ezr. iv. 8, 9, 17, 23). He was apparently an Aramean, for the letter which he wrote to Artaxerxes against the Jews was in Syriac (iv. 7), and the form of his name favors this supposition.

Shinar (Heb. the country of the two rivers? Rawlinson; compare MESOPOTAMIA), apparently the ancient name of the great alluvial tract through which the TIGRIS and EUPHRATES pass before reaching the sea—the tract known in later times as CHALDEA or BABYLONIA. It was a plain country where brick had to be used for stone, and SLIME for mortar (Gen. xi. 3). Among its cities were BABEL (Babylon), ERECH, CALNEH, and ACCAD (x. 10). The name is also found in Gen. xiv. 1; Is. xi. 11; Dan. i. 2; Zech. v. 11. The native inscriptions contain no trace of the term, which seems to be purely Jewish, and unknown to any other people (so Rawlinson). At least it is extremely doubtful whether there is really any connection between Shinar and Singara or Sinjar. Singara was the name of a town in Central Mesopotamia, well known to the Romans.

Ship, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. ḥnīyāh (the common word for ship) uniformly (Gen. xlix. 13; Deut. xxviii. 68; Jon. i. 3-5, &c.). The kindred ḥnī (= a ship, or rather collectively ships, a fleet, navy, Ges.) is translated "navy" (1 K. ix. 27, x. 11, 22 thrice), once "a navy of ships" (ix. 26), and once "galley" (Is. xxxiii. 21).—2. Heb. ṣēphnāh (Jon. i. 5 only) = a ship, specifically with a deck, Ges.—3. Heb. ṭai = a ship, so called as being set up, built, Ges. (Num. xxiv. 24; Is. xxxiii. 21; Ez. xxx. 9; Dan. xi. 30).—4. Gr. naus = a ship, vessel, Rbn. N. T. Lex. (Acts xxvii. 41 only); in LXX. = No. 1.—5. Gr. ploion = a ship, vessel, Rbn. N. T. Lex. (Mat. iv. 21, 22, and more than sixty other places), once "shipping" (Jn. vi. 24); in LXX. = No. 1 and 2. The diminutive plōiarion (= a small vessel, boat, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) is translated "small ship" (Mk. iii. 9), "little-ship" (iv. 36; Jn. xxi. 8), "boat" (vi. 22 twice, 23).—No one writer in the whole range of Greek and Roman literature (says Dr. Howson, original author of the remainder of this article) has supplied us with so much information concerning the merchant-ships of the ancients as St. Luke in the narrative of St. Paul's voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii., xxviii.). It is important to remember that he accomplished it in three ships: first the ADAMYTTIAN (ADRAMYTTIUM) vessel which took him from CESAAREA to MYRA, probably a coasting vessel of no great size (xxvii. 1-6); secondly, the large Alexandrian (ALEXANDRIA, note <sup>1</sup>) corn-ship, in which he was wrecked on the coast of Malta (xxvii. 6-xxviii. 1; MELITA); and thirdly, another large Alexandrian corn-ship, in which he sailed from Malta by SYRACUSE and RHEGIUM to PUTCOLI (xxviii. 11-13). (1.) Size of Ancient Ships. The narrative which we take as our chief guide affords a good standard for estimating this. The ship in which St. Paul was wrecked had 276 persons on board (Acts xxvii. 87), besides a cargo of wheat (10, 38); and all these passengers seem to have been taken on to PUTCOLI in another ship (xxviii. 11) which had its own crew and cargo. In the English transport-ships, prepared for carrying troops, it is a common estimate to allow a ton and a half per man. The ship in which Josephus was wrecked, in the same part of the Levant, had 600 souls on board. A large Alexandrian corn-vessel described by Lucian appears to have measured 1,100 or 1,200 tons. If, then, we say that an ancient merchant-ship might range from 500 to 1,000 tons, we are clearly within the mark. (2.) Steering Apparatus. Some commentators have fallen into strange perplexities from observing that in Acts xxvii. 40 ("the fastenings of the rudders;" A. V. "rudder-bands," Gr. hai zeukteriai tōn pedaliōn) St. Luke uses the plural. Ancient ships were in truth not steered at all by rudders fastened or hinged to the stern, but by means of two paddle-rudders, one on each quarter, acting in a rowlock or through a porthole, as the vessel might be small or large. The "governor" or steersman would only use one paddle-rudder (Gr. pedalion, A. V. "helm," Jas. iii. 4) at a time. When four anchors were let go at the stern, both paddles must be lashed up, lest they should interfere with the ground-tackle; when the ship was to be steered again, and the anchor-ropes were cut, the lashings must be unfastened (Acts xxvii. 29, 40). (3.) Build and Ornaments of the Hull. Probably there was no very marked difference between the bow (A. V. "foreship," ver. 30; "forepart," ver. 41) and the stern (A. V. "hind-part," ver. 41; see Mk. iv. 38). The "held" (A. V. "the sides of the ship," Jon. i. 5) would present no special peculiarities. One characteristic ornament, rising in a lofty curve at the stern or the bow, is familiar to us in works of art, but no allusion to it occurs in Scripture. That personification of ships, which seems to be instinctive, led the ancients to paint an eye on each side of the bow. The "sign" of the ship which took the apostle on from Malta to Pozzuoli (Acts xxviii. 11) was CASTOR and POLLUX; and the symbols of these heroes were doubtless painted or sculptured on each side of the bow. (BENCHES.) (4.) Undergirders. The imperfection of the build, and still more (see below, 6) the peculiarity of the rig, in ancient ships, resulted in a greater tendency than in our times to the starting of the planks, and consequently to leaking and foundering. Hence it was customary to take on board peculiar contrivances, suitably called "helps" (xxvii. 17), as precautions against such dangers. These were simply cables or chains, which in case of necessity could be passed round the frame of the ship, at right angles to its length, and made tight. This process, called frapping (A. V. "undergirding"), has also been found necessary in modern experience. (5.) Anchors. Probably the ground-tackle of Greek and Roman sailors was quite as good as our own. Ancient anchors were similar in form to those used now, except that they were without flukes. Two allusions to anchoring are found in the N. T., one in a very impressive metaphor concerning Christian hope (Heb. vi. 19). The other passage is part of the literal narrative of St. Paul's voyage at its most critical point. The ship in which he was sailing had four anchors on board, and these were all employed in the night, when the danger of falling on breakers was imminent. The sailors on this occasion anchored by the stern (Acts xxvii. 29). (6.) Masts, Sails, Ropes, and Yards.

These were collectively called in Gr. skēus or skēous = apparatus or gear (A. V. "tackling," xxvii. 19; "sail," 17). The rig of an ancient ship was more simple and clumsy than that employed in modern times. Its great feature was one large mast, with one large square sail fastened to a yard of great length. (Egyr.) Hence the strain upon the hull and the danger of starting the planks were greater than under the present system, which distributes the mechanical pressure more evenly over the whole ship. Not that there were never more masts than one, or more sails than one on the same mast, in an ancient merchantman. But these were repetitions, so to speak, of the same general unit of rig. The Gr. arlemōn, A. V. "mainsail," Dr. Howson regards as "undoubtedly the foresail," which "would be almost necessary in putting a large ship about;" others (Rbn. N. T. Lex., L. & S., &c.) make it the top-sail. In the O. T. the "mast" is mentioned (Is. xxxiii. 23); and from Ez. xxvii. 8 we learn that cedar-wood from Lebanon was sometimes used for this part of ships. In Prov. xxiii. 34 the top of a ship's mast is probably intended (so Dr. Howson, with A. V., Gesenius, Stuart, &c.). Ropes (CORD; Acts xxvii. 32) and sails are mentioned in Is. xxxiii. 23; and from Ez. xxvii. 7 we learn that the latter were often made of Egyptian LINEN. In Ez. xxvii. 29, oars are distinctly mentioned; and it seems that oak-wood from Bashan was used in making them. In Is. xxxiii. 21 we have "galley with oars," literally a ship of oar, i. e. an oared vessel. Another feature of the ancient, as of the modern ship, is the flag at the top of the mast. (ENSIGN.) (7.) Rate of Sailing. St. Paul's voyages furnish excellent data for approximately estimating this; and they are quite in harmony with what we learn from other sources. We must notice here, however (what commentators sometimes curiously forget), that winds are variable. Thus the voyage between TROAS and PHILIPPI, accomplished on one occasion (Acts xvi. 11, 12) in two days, occupied on another occasion (xx. 6) five days. With a fair wind an ancient ship would sail fully seven miles an hour (xxvii. 2, 3, xxviii. 13). (8.) Sailing before the wind, and near the wind. The rig which has been described is, like the rig of Chinese junka, peculiarly favorable to a quick run before the wind (xvi. 11, xxvii. 16). It would, however, be a great mistake to suppose that ancient ships could not work to windward. The superior rig and build, however, of modern ships enable them to sail nearer to the wind than was the case in classical times. A modern ship, if the weather is not very boisterous, will sail within six points of the wind (the whole circle of the compass-card being divided into thirty-two equal parts or points).

To an ancient vessel, of which the hull was more clumsy, and the yards could not be braced so tight, it would be safe to assign seven points as the limit (compare xx. 6, xxvii. 3-8, xxviii. 12, 13). (9.) Lying-to. A ship that could make progress on her proper course, in moderate weather, when sailing within seven points of the wind, would lie-to in a gale, with her length making about the same angle with the direction of the wind. This is done when the object is, not to make progress at all hazards, but to ride out a gale in safety; and this was done in St. Paul's ship when she was undergirded and the boat taken on board (xxvii. 14-17) under the lee of CLAUDA. The wind was E. N. E. (EUROCLYDON), the ship's bow would point N. by W., the direction of drift (six points being added for lee-way) would be W. by N., and the rate of drift about a mile and a half an hour. (10.) Ship's Boat. This appears prominently in the narrative of the voyage (xxvii. 16, 32). Every large merchant-ship must have had one or more boats. It is evident that the Alexandrian corn-ship in which St. Paul was sailing from Fair Havens, and in which the sailors, apprehending no danger, hoped to reach PHENICE, had her boat towing behind, but it was taken on board with difficulty under the lee of CLAUDA. When the ship was at anchor the night before she was run aground, the sailors lowered the boat from the davits with the selfish desire of escaping, on which St. Paul spoke to the soldiers, who cut the ropes and the boat fell off. (11.) Officers and Crew. In Acts xxvii. 11 we have both "master" (Gr. kubernētēs; "shipmaster" in Rev. xviii. 17) and "owner of the ship" (Gr. nauklērōs). The latter is the owner (in part or in whole) of the ship or the cargo, receiving also (possibly) the fares of the passengers. The former has the charge of the steering. In Jas. iii. 4 "the governor" (Gr. euthunōn) is simply the steersman for the moment. The word for "shipmen" (Acts xxvii. 27, 30) and "sailors" (Rev. xviii. 17) is simply the plural of the usual Greek term nautēs = shipman, sailor, seaman, Rbn. N. T. Lex. In Ez. xxvii. 8 ff. they are called "mariners," "rowers" in ver. 26, &c.<sup>1</sup> (12.) Storms and Shipwrecks. The first century of the Christian era was a time of immense traffic in the Mediterranean; and many vessels must have been lost there every year by shipwreck, and (perhaps) as many by foundering. This last danger would be much increased by the form of rig described above. Besides this, the ancients had no compass, and very imperfect charts and instruments, if any at all; and, dependent as they were on the heavenly bodies, the danger was much greater than now in bad weather, when the sky was overcast, and "neither sun nor stars in many days appeared" (Acts xxvii. 20). Hence, also the winter season was considered dangerous, and, if possible, avoided (9). Certain coasts were much dreaded, especially the African Syrtis ("QUICKSANDS," 17). The danger indicated by breakers (29), and the fear of falling on rocks, are matters of course. St. Paul's experience seems to have been full of illustrations of all these perils. We learn from 2 Cor. xi. 25 that, before the voyage to Rome, he had been three times wrecked, and once "a night and a day in the deep," probably floating on a spar. These circumstances give force to his metaphor of a "shipwreck" (1 Tim.

l. 19) in speaking of those who had apostatized from the faith. We may here notice the caution with which, on the voyage from Troas to Patara (Acts xx. 18-19, xxi. 1), the sailors anchored for the night during the period of dark moon, in the intricate passages between the islands and the main; the evident acquaintance of the sailors of the Adramyttian ship with the currents on the coasts of Syria and Asia Minor (xxvii. 2-5); and the provision for taking soundings in case of danger, the measurements being apparently the same as those customary with us (28). (13.) Boats on the Sea of Galilee. In the narratives of the call of the disciples to be "fishers of men" (Mat. iv. 18-22; Mk. i. 16-20; Lk. v. 1-11), there is no special information concerning the characteristics of these boats. In the account of the storm and the miracle on the lake (Mat. viii. 23-27; Mk. iv. 35-41; Lk. viii. 22-25), it is instructive to compare the three narratives; and we observe that Luke is more technical in his language than Matthew, and Mark than Luke. Mark mentions the "pillow," or boatman's cushion on which our Saviour was sleeping. With the large population round the Lake of Tiberias, there must have been a vast number both of fishing-boats and pleasure-boats of various sizes, and boat-building must have been an active trade on its shores. Josephus (B. J. ii. §§ 8-10) collected for an expedition against Tiberias all the boats on the lake, 230 in number, but put only four men in each. (GENESARET, SEA OF.) (14.) Merchant-Ships in the O. T. The earliest passages where seafaring is alluded to in the O. T. are—Gen. xlix. 13, in the prophecy of Jacob concerning Zebulun; Num. xxiv. 24, in Balaam's prophecy; Deut. xxviii. 68, in one of the warnings of Moses; Judg. v. 17, in Deborah's Song. Next after these it is natural to mention the illustrations and descriptions connected with this subject in Job ix. 26; and in Psalms xlviii. 7, civ. 26, cvii. 23. To these add Prov. xxiii. 34, xxx. 19, xxxi. 14. Solomon's own ships may have suggested some of these illustrations (1 K. ix. 26; 2 Chr. viii. 18, ix. 21). We must notice the disastrous expedition of Jehoshaphat's ships from Ezion-geber (1 K. xxii. 48, 49; 2 Chr. xx. 36, 37). The passages which remain are in the prophets (Is. ii. 16, xxiii. 1, 14, xlii. 14, lx. 9; Ez. xxvii.; Jon. i. 8-16). In Dan. xi. 40 we touch the subject of ships-of-war. (15.) Ships-of-War in the Apocrypha. Military operations both by land and water are prominent subjects in the Books of Maccabees (1 Mc. viii. 23-32; 2 Mc. iv. 20). "Ships-of-war" are mentioned in 1 Mc. xv. 8, and "galleys" in 2 Mc. iv. 20. The monument erected by Simon Maccabeus on his father's grave at MODIN had on it, with other ornaments and military symbols, "ships carved, that they might be seen of all that sail on the sea" (1 Mc. xiii. 29). At Joppa, the resident Jews, with wives and children, 200 in number, were induced to go into boats and were drowned (2 Mc. xii. 3, 4). Some allusion to seafaring is also made in Wis. v. 10, xiv. 1; Eccles. xxxiii. 2, xliii. 24; 1 Esd. iv. 23. ACCO; COMMERCE; FISH; JOPPA; NOAH; PAUL; PHENICIA; RED SEA; SEA; SEA, THE GREAT; TARSHISH; TYRE; WIND; ZIDON, &c.

Shi'phl, or Shiph'l (Heb. abundant, Ges.), father of Ziza, a Simeonite prince in Hezekiah's time (1 Chr. iv. 37).

Shiph'mite (fr. Heb.), the, probably = the native of SHEPHAM (so Mr. Grove): Gesenius makes it = one from SIPHOTH (1 Chr. xxvii. 27).

Shiph'rah (Heb. = brightness, beauty R. S. Poole), one of the two midwives of the Hebrews who disobeyed the command of Pharaoh to kill the male children (Ex. i. 16-21). פֶּאֶה 8.

Shiph'tan (Heb. judicial, Ges.), father of KEMUEL 2, a prince of Ephraim (Num. xxxiv. 24).

Shi'sha (Heb., a corruption of SERAIAH, Ges.), father of Elihoreph and Ahiah, the royal secretaries in the reign of Solomon (1 K. iv. 5); apparently SHAVSHA.

Shi'shak (Heb. fr. —?), king of EGYPT, the Sheshenk I. of the monuments, first sovereign of the Bubastite twenty-second dynasty (so Mr. R. S. Poole, original author of this article). Chronology. The reign of Shishak offers the first determined synchronisms of Egyptian and Hebrew history. The synchronism of Shishak and Solomon, and that of Shishak and Rehoboam may be nearly fixed, as shown in article CHRONOLOGY. The first year of Shishak would about correspond to the twenty-sixth of Solomon, and the twentieth to the fifth of Rehoboam. The data supplied by the monuments would lead Mr. Poole to place the accession of Sheshenk I. B. C. 960 or 983, or else seven years later than each of these dates. The Biblical date of Sheshenk's conquest of Judah has been computed to be B. C. about 969, and this having taken place in his twentieth year, his accession would have been A. C. about 988. The progress of Assyrian discovery has, however, induced some writers to propose to shorten the chronology by taking thirty-five years as the length of Manasseh's reign, in which case all earlier dates would have to be lowered twenty years. The proposed reduction would place the accession of Sheshenk I. B. C. about 968, but these data are too approximative for us to lay any stress upon minute results from them.—History. The origin of the royal line of which Sheshenk I. was the head is extremely obscure. Mr. Birch's discovery that several of the names of the family are Semitic has led to the supposition that it was of Assyrian or Babylonian origin. Lepsius gives a genealogy of Sheshenk I. from the tablet of Har-pa-son from the Serapeum, in which Sheshenk I. is the son of a chief Namuret, whose ancestors, excepting his mother, who is called "royal mother" (not as Lepsius gives it, "royal daughter"), are all untitled persons, and, all but the princess, bear foreign, apparently Semitic names. But, as M. de Rougé (who would trace the line to that of the high-priest kings) observes, this genealogy cannot be conclusively made out from the tablet.—Sheshenk I., on his accession, must have found the state weakened by internal strife and deprived of much of its foreign influence. In the time of the later kings of the Rameses family, two, if not three, sovereigns had a real or titular authority; but before the accession of Sheshenk their lines had probably been united: certainly toward the close of the twenty-first dynasty a Pharaoh was powerful enough to lead an expedition into Palestine and capture Gezer (1 K. ix. 16). Sheshenk took as the title of his standard, "He who attains royalty by uniting the two regions [of Egypt]." He himself probably married the heiress of the Rameses family, while his son and successor Usarken (ZERAH 3) appears to have taken to wife the daughter, and perhaps heiress, of the Tanite twenty-first dynasty. Probably it was not until late in his reign that he was able to carry on the foreign wars of the earlier king who captured Gezer. It is observable that we trace a change of dynasty in the policy that induced Sheshenk at the beginning of his reign to receive the fugitive JEROBAM (1 K. xi. 40). The king of Egypt does not seem to have commenced hostilities during the powerful reign of Solomon. It was not until the division of the tribes, that, probably at the instigation of Jeroboam, he attacked Rehoboam. The following particulars of this war are related in the Bible: "In the fifth year of king Rehoboam, Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem, because they had transgressed against the Lord, with twelve hundred chariots, and threescore thousand horsemen: and the people [were] without number that came with him out of Egypt; the Lubim, the Sukkilm, and the Cushim. And he took the fenced cities which [pertained] to Judah, and came to Jerusalem" (2 Chr. xii. 2-4). Shishak did not pillage Jerusalem, but exacted all the treasures of his city from Rehoboam, and apparently made him tributary (5, 9-12, especially 8). The narrative in Kings mentions only the invasion and the exaction (1 K. xiv. 25, 26). The strong cities of Rehoboam were thus enumerated: "And Rehoboam dwelt in Jerusalem, and built cities for defence in Judah. He built even Beth-lehem, and Etam, and Tekoa, and Beth-zur, and Shoco, and Adullam, and Gath, and Mareshah, and Ziph, and Adoraim, and Lachish, and Azekah, and Zorah, and Aijalon, and Hebron, which [are] in Judah and in Benjamin fenced cities" (2 Chr. xi. 5-10). Shishak has left a record of this expedition, sculptured on a wall of the great temple of El-Karnak. (THEBES.) It is a list of the countries, cities, and tribes, conquered or ruled by him, or tributary to him. In this list Champollion recognized a name which he translated incorrectly "the kingdom of Judah," and was thus led to trace the names of certain cities of Palestine. Of these Dr. Brugsch and Mr. Poole agree in identifying the names of Taanach, Shunem, Rehob, Haphraim, Adoraim, Mahanaim, Gibeon, Beth-horon, Kedemoth, Aijalon, Megiddo, Bileam or Ibleam, Alemeth, Shoco, Beth-tappuah, Hagarites, Negeb (= the South of Judah), &c. The list contains three classes of names mainly grouped together—(1.) Levitical and Canaanite tribes of Israel; (2.) cities of Judah; (3.) Arab tribes S. of Palestine. It is evident that Jeroboam was not at once firmly established, and that the Levites especially held to Rehoboam. Therefore it may have been Jeroboam's policy to employ Shishak to capture their cities. From the part of the list where the cities in Rehoboam's actual territory occur fourteen names have been erased.—The Pharaohs of the empire passed through northern Palestine to push their conquests to the Euphrates and Mesopotamia. Shishak, probably unable to attack the Assyrians, attempted the subjugation of Palestine and the tracts of Arabia which border Egypt, knowing that the Arabs would interpose an effectual resistance to any invader of Egypt. He seems to have succeeded in consolidating his power in Arabia, and we accordingly find Zerah in alliance with the people of Gerar, if we may infer this from their sharing his overthrow.

Shit'rai, or Shit'ra-i (Heb. undertending letters or books? Ges.; Jah is arbitrator, Fii.), a Sharonite who was over David's herds that fed in Sharon (1 Chr. xxvii. 29).

Shit'tah-tree, Shit'tim (Heb. shittah, pl. shittim, see below), is without doubt correctly referred to some species of Acacia, a genus of leguminous trees or shrubs, of which three or four species occur in the Bible lands. The wood of this tree—perhaps the Acacia Seyal is more definitely signified—was extensively employed in the construction of the tabernacle, ark of the covenant, table of shew-bread, altars, &c. (Ex. xxv., xxvi., xxxvi., xxxvii., xxxviii.). The Egyptian name of the Acacia is sont, sant, or santh.

"The wild acacia (Mimosa [or Acacia] Nilotica), under the name of sont, everywhere represents the seneh or senna of the Burning Bush" (Stanley, 21). The Hebrew term is, by Jablonski, Celsius, &c., derived from the Egyptian word. The Shittah-tree of Scripture is by some thought to refer more especially to the Acacia Seyal, though perhaps the Shittah-tree (Acacia Seyal).

Acacia Nilotica and Acacia Arabica may be included under the term. The Acacia Seyal is very common in some parts of the peninsula of Sinai. These trees are more common in Arabia than in Palestine, though there is a valley on the W. side of the Dead Sea, the Wady Seyal, which derives its name from a few acacia-trees there. The Acacia Seyal, like the Acacia Arabica, yields the well-known substance called gum arabic which is obtained by incisions in the bark, but it is impossible to say whether the ancient Jews were acquainted with its use. From the tangled thickets into which the stem of this tree expands, Stanley well remarks that hence is to be traced the use of the plural Shittim, the singular number occurring once only in the Bible. Besides the Acacia Seyal, another species, the Acacia tortilis, is common on Mount Sinai. Although none of the above-named trees are sufficiently large to yield planks ten cubits long by one and a half cubits wide, which was the size of the boards that formed the Tabernacle (Ex. xxxvi. 21), an acacia that grows near Cairo, the Acacia Senaria, would supply boards of the required size. There is, however, no evidence that this tree ever grew in the peninsula of Sinai, and there is no necessity to limit the meaning of the Heb. keresh (translated "board") to a single plank (comp. its collective sense in "BENONES," Ez. xxvii. 6; and our on board), but it may denote "two or more boards joined together" (so Mr. Houghton). These acacias, which are for the most part tropical plants, must not be confounded with the leguminous tree (Robinia pseudo-acacia), popularly known in England as the acacia-tree, which is usually called in the United States the locust-tree, and belongs to the sub-order Papilionacea. The true acacias, most of which possess hard and durable wood, belong to the sub-order Mimoseae.

Shit'tim (Heb. acacias, Ges.; see above), the place of Israel's encampment between the conquest of the Transjordanic highlands and the passage of the Jordan (Num. xxxiii. 49, xxv. 1; Josh. ii. 1, iii. 1; Mic. vi. 5). Its full name appears to be given in the first passage—ABEL-SHITTIM = the meadow (or moist place) of the acacias. It was in the Arabah or Jordan Valley, opposite Jericho. The "valley of Shit-tim" (VALLEY 8) of Joel iii. 18 is thought by most interpreters to be the valley through which the KINROSS flows to the Dead Sea (Henderson).

* Shit'tim-wood = the wood of the SHITTAN-TREE.

Shi'za (Heb. loved, Ges.; brightness, Fül.), a Reubenite, father of Adina (1 Chr. xi. 42).

Sho'a (Heb., see below), a proper name which occurs only in Ez. xxiii. 23, in connection with Pekod and Koa. The three apparently designate districts of Assyria with which the southern kingdom of Judah had been intimately connected, and which were to be arrayed against it for punishment. Rashi remarks on Pekod, Shoa, and Koa, "The interpreters say that they signify officers, princes, and rulers." Gesenius takes them as appellatives, making shoa' = rich, opulent; and Fürst makes them proper names. Those who take Shoa as an appellative refer to the usage of the word in Job xxxiv. 19 (A. V. "rich") and Is. xxxii. 5 (A. V. "bountiful"). But a consideration of the latter part of Ez. xxiii. 23, and the fondness which Ezekiel elsewhere shows for playing upon the sound of proper names (as in xxvii. 10, xxx. 5), lead to the conclusion that in this case Pekod, Shoa, and Koa are proper names also (so Mr. Wright, original author of this article). The only name which has been found at all resembling Shoa is that of a town in Assyria, mentioned by Pliny, "Sue in rupibus" (i. e. Sue in the rocks), near Gaugamela, and W. of the Orontes mountain-chain.

Sho'b b (Heb. apostate, rebellious, Ges.). 1. Son of David by Bath-sheba (2 Sam. v. 14; 1 Chr. iii. 5, xiv. 4).—2. Son of CALEB 1 by his wife Azubah (ii. 18).

Sho'bach [-bak] (Heb. pouring, Ges.), the general of HADARIZER, king of the Syrians of ZOBAB, who was defeated by David at Helem. Shobach was wounded, and died on the field (2 Sam. x. 15-18). In 1 Chr. xix. 16, 18, he is called SHOPACH.

Sho'bal, or Sho'ba-i (Heb. taking captive, Ges.), ancestor of certain porters or doorknockers of the Temple, who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45).

Sho'bal (Heb. flowing, or a shoot?, Ges.). 1. Second son of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 20; 1 Chr. i. 38); a "DUKE" or phylarch of the Horites (Gen. xxxvi. 29).—2. Son of Caleb the son of Hur, and "father" or founder of Kirjath-jearim (1 Chr. ii. 50, 52).—3. One of the "sons" or descendants of Judah; father of Reaiah (iv. 1, 2); possibly = No. 2.

Sho'bek (Heb. forsaking, Ges.), a chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 24).

Sho'bi (Heb. = SHOBAI, Ges.), son of NAHASH of Rabbah of the children of Ammon (2 Sam. xvii. 27). He was one of the first to meet David at Mahanaim on his flight from Absalom, and brought him supplies of food, &c.

Sho'co (fr. Heb.) = SOCOH (2 Chr. xi. 7).

Sho'cho [-ko] (fr. Heb.) = SOCOH (2 Chr. xxviii. 18).

Sho'choh [-ko] (fr. Heb.) = SOCOH (1 Sam. xvii. 1).

Shoe [shoo]. SANDAL.

Sho'mer (Heb. a keeper, Ges.). 1. An Asherite (1 Chr. vii. 32); = SHAMER 2.—2. Mother (so Gesenius, Fürst, &c.) of Jehozabad, who slew King Joash (2 K. xii. 21); = SHIMRITH.

Sho'phach [-fak] (Heb.) = SHOBACH (1 Chr. xix. 16, 18).

Sho'phan (Heb. hidden?; nakedness, bareness, Fül.), one of the fortified towns E. of Jordan rebuilt by the tribe of Gad (Num. xxiii. 35). ATROTH.

Sho-shan'nim (Heb., see below). "To the chief musician upon Shoshannim" is a musical direction in Ps. xlv., lxix., to the leader of the Temple-choir, and most probably indicates the melody after or in the manner of (A. V. "upon") which the Psalms were to be sung (so Mr. Wright). As "Shoshannim" literally = "lilies," it has been suggested that the word denotes lily-shaped instruments of music (Simonis), perhaps cymbals. Hengstenberg and J. A. Alexander regard this and analogous expressions as having respect to the subject or contents, lilies in Ps. xlv. being a natural emblem of female beauty, and in lxix. referring to the delightful consolations and deliverances experienced or hoped for. Ben Zeb regards Shoshannim as an instrument of psalmody, and Junius and Tremellius, after Kimchi, render it herachorda, an instrument with six strings, referring it to the Heb. root shach = siz. MUSIC; POETRY, HEBREW; SHOSHANNIM-EDUTH; SHUSHAN-EDUTH.

Sho-shan'nim-eduth (Heb., see below). In the title of Ps. lxxx. is found the direction "to the chief musician upon Shoshannim-eduth," which appears, according to the most probable conjecture, to denote the melody or air after or in the manner of which the Psalm was to be sung. As the words now stand in Hebrew they signify "lilies, a testimony," and the two are separated by a large distinctive accent. In themselves they have no meaning in the present text, and must therefore be regarded as probably a fragment of the beginning of an older Psalm with which the choir were familiar (so Mr. Wright). Prof. J. A. Alexander renders the words, "As to lilies. A testimony." SHOSHANNIM.

* Shower. RAIN.

Shu'a (Heb. riches, Ges.). 1. A Canaanite of Adullam, father of Judah's wife (1 Chr. ii. 3); = SHUAH 3.—2. Daughter of Heber, an Asherite (vii. 32).

Shu'ah (Heb. pit, Ges.; see No. 3). 1. Son of ABRAHAM by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chr. i. 32). (SHUHITE).—2. A descendant of Judah; brother of Chelub (iv. 11).—3. (fr. Heb.) = SHUA, father of Judah's wife (Gen. xxxviii. 2, 12).

Shu'al (Heb. a fox or jackal, Ges.), an Asherite chief, son of Zophai (1 Chr. vii. 36).

Shu'al (see above), the Land of, a district named only in 1 Sam. xiii. 17. It is pretty certain from the passage that the land of Shu'al lay N. of Michmash. If therefore it be identical with the "land of Shalim" (1 Sam. ix. 4)—as is not impossible—we obtain the first and only clew yet obtained to Saul's journey in quest of the asses (so Mr. Grove). The name Shu'al has not yet been identified.

Shu'ba-el [-ba-el or -bel; compare Michael] (Heb. = SHEBUEL, Ges.). 1. SHEBUEL 1 the son of Geshom (1 Chr. xxiv. 20).—2. SHEBUEL 2 the son of Heman (xxv. 20).

Shu'ham (Heb. pit-digger? Ges.), son of Dan, and ancestor of the SHUHAMITES (Num. xxvi. 42); = HUSHIM 1.

Shu'ham-ites, the = the descendants of SHUHAM, or HUSHIM, the son of Dan (Num. xxvi. 42, 43).

Shu'bite (fr. Heb. = descendant of SHUHAM 1, Ges., Rln., &c.). This ethnic appellative "Shuhite" is frequent in the Book of Job, but only as the epithet of BILGAD. The local indications of the Book of Job point to a region on the western side of Childea, bordering on Arabia; and exactly in this locality, above Hil and on both sides of the Euphrates, are found, in the Assyrian inscriptions, the Tukki, a powerful people. It is probable that these were the Shuhites (so Rawlinson).

Shu'lim-ites (fr. Heb., see below), the, one of the personages in the poem of Solomon's Song (vi. 13). The name denotes a woman belonging to a place called Shulem. The only place bearing that name of which we have any knowledge is SHULEM. Hence Mr. Grove supposes that the Shulamite who was the object of Solomon's passion was Abishag. CANTICLES.

Shu'muth-ites (fr. Heb. sing. = native [or descendant] of Shu'muth = garlic), a place or person otherwise unknown, Ges., the, one of the four families who sprang from Kirjath-jearim (1 Chr. ii. 53).

Shu'nam-mite (fr. Heb.), the = the native of SHUNEM, as is plain from 2 K. iv. 1. It is applied to two persons:—ABISHAG, the nurse of King David (1 K. i. 8, 15, ii. 17, 21, 22), and the nameless hostess of Elisha (2 K. iv. 12, 25, 36).

Shu'ne'm (Heb. two resting-places? Ges.), a city of Issachar (Josh. xix. 18), named between Chazulloth and Haphraim. It was the place of the Philistines' encampment before the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxviii. 4), the residence of the Syrianite woman who showed hospitality to Elisha and whose son was restored to life by him (2 K. iv. 8), and the native place of Abishag (1 K. i. 8). By Eusebius and Jerome it is mentioned twice: as five miles S. of Mount Tabor, and then known as Silen; and as a village in the territory of Sebaste (Samaria) called Sauin. The latter of these two identifications probably refers to Shur (BATHULIA?). The other has more in its favor, and nearly agrees with the position of the present Solan, a village on the southwestern flank of Jebel Duky (Little Hermon), three miles N. of Jezreel, five miles from Gilboa (Jebel Fut'a'a), full in view of the sacred spot on Mount Carmel, and situated in the midst of the finest corn-fields in the world. Robinson and most writers identify Shunem with Solan.

Shu'ni (Heb. quiet, Ges.), son of Gai, and founder of the family of the Sauinites (Gen. xlv. 16; Num. xxvi. 15).

Shu'pham (fr. Heb. Sheph'ph'am = SHEPHUPHAN, Ges.). SHUPPIH.

Shu'pham-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of SHUPHAM, or SHEPHUPHAN the Benjamite (Num. xxvi. 39).

Shup'pim (Heb. serpents? Ges.; compare ANDER 4). 1. In the genealogy of Benjamin "Shuppim and Hup'pim, the children of Ir," are reckoned in 1 Chr. vii. 12 (compare 15). Ir = IRI 1 the son of Bela the son of Benjamin, so that Shuppim was the great-grandson of Benjamin. Lord A. C. Hervey makes Shuppim = SHUPHAM = SHEPHUPHAN = MUPPIH, and conjectures that Shuppim or Shephuphan was a son of Benjamin, whose family was reckoned with that of Ir or Iri. Dr. P. Holmes (in Kitto) makes SHUPHAM = SHEPHUPHAN = MUPPIH, and really a grandson (Son) of Benjamin; but regards Shuppim, in accordance with 1 Chr. vii., as a great-grandson of Benjamin and nephew of Shupham, and as having perhaps, on becoming the head of a flourishing family, taken the place of his deceased or obscure uncle in the organization of the Benjamite clans.—2. One of the Levite porters or doorkeepers mentioned in 1 Chr. xxvi. 16. Bertheau, &c., suppose this name inserted by a copyist's error.

Shur (Heb. a wall), a place just without the eastern border of Egypt. Hagar fled from Sarah, and was found by an angel "in the wilderness, by the fountain in the way to Shur" (Gen. xvi. 7). Abraham afterward "dwelt between Kadush and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar" (xx. 1). The first clear indication of its position occurs in the account of Ishmael's posterity. "And they dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria" (xxv. 18; compare 1 Sam. xv. 7, xxvii. 8). The wilderness of Shur was entered by the Israelites after they had crossed the Red Sea (Ex. xv. 22, 23). It was also called the Wilderness of ETHAM (Num. xxxiii. 8). Shur may have been a fortified town E. of the ancient head of the Red Sea, but in the hands of the Arabs, or at one time of the Philistines, not of the Egyptians. From its being spoken of as a limit, it was probably the last Arabian town before entering Egypt (so Mr. R. S. Poole). Rev. J. Rowlands (in Fbn.) makes the wilderness of Shur = the mountain-district of which Jebel er-Rihah (also called by the Arabs of the interior Jebel es-Sur, the high range about fifteen miles E. of Suez and running nearly N. and S., forms the great backbone or main range. Winer says, the latest authorities seem to make it the wilderness now called el-Nifur, extending between the Mediterranean and Red Sea on the W. and N. W. of et-Tih, from Pelusium to the southwestern border of Palestine; but this desert, seven days' journey in length, and consisting of white sand-drifts with few cultivated spots, hardly extends as far S. as that of Shur in Ex. xv.

Shu'shan (Heb., see below), or Su'sa (L. form), one of the most important cities of the East, said to have received its name from the abundance of the lily (Heb. shūshan) in its neighborhood. 1. History. It was originally the capital of the country called in Scripture ELAM, and by the classical writers sometimes Cis-sia, sometimes Susis or Susiana. The first distinct mention of the town (so Prof. Rawlinson, original author of the first part of this article) is about B. C. 660, in the inscriptions of Ashur-bani-pal, the son and successor of Esarhaddon, who states that he took the place, and exhibits a ground-plan of it upon his sculptures. We next find Susa in the possession of the Babylonians, to whom Elam had probably passed at the division of the Assyrian empire made by Cyaxares and Nabopolassar (Dan. vii. 2). The conquest of Babylon by Cyrus transferred Susa to the Persian dominion; and it was not long before the Achæmenian princes determined to make it the capital of their whole empire, and the chief place of their own residence. According to some writers, the change was made by Cyrus; according to others, it had at any rate taken place before the death of Cambyses; but, according to the evidence of the place itself and of the other Achæmenian monuments, it seems most probable that the transfer was really the work of Darius Hystaspis. (DARIUS 2; PERSIANS.) Susa accordingly became the metropolis of Persia, and is recognized as such by Æschylus, Herodotus, Ctesias, Strabo, and almost all the best writers. The court must have resided there the greater part of the year, only quitting it regularly for ECBATANA or PERSEPOLIS in the height of summer, and perhaps sometimes for Babylon in the depth of winter. Susa retained its preëminence to the period of the Macedonian conquest. After this it declined. The preference of Alexander for Babylon caused the neglect of Susa by his successors, none of whom ever made it their capital city. It fell into the power of Antigonos A. C. 315. The town, but not the citadel, was taken by Molo in his rebellion against Antiochus the Great, B. C. 221. At the Arabian conquest of Persia, A. D. 640, it was bravely defended by Hormuzan. 2. Position, &c. Most historians and comparative geographers have inclined to identify it with the modern Susa or Shush, in latitude  $32^{\circ} 10'$ , longitude  $48^{\circ} 26'$  E. from Greenwich, between the Shapur and the river of Dizful. Some, however, have advocated the claims of Shuster, on the left bank of the Kuran, more than half a degree further E.; others have maintained that Susan, on the right bank, fifty or sixty miles above Shuster, is, if not the classical Susa, the Shushan of Scripture. But most now admit that Susa is the representative of both Susa and Shushan. The Choaspes (Kerkhah) originally bifurcated at Pai Pul, twenty miles above Susa, the right arm keeping its present course, while the left (Eulæus = ULAI) flowed a little to the E. of Susa, and, absorbing the Shapur about twelve miles below the ruins, flowed on somewhat E. of S., and joined the Karam (Pasitigris) at Ahwas. Susa thus lay between the Eulæus and the Shapur, the latter, probably joined by canals, being reckoned a part of the Eulæus. (See map under EUPHRATES.) A few miles E. and W. of the city were two other streams—the Coprates or river of Dizful, and the right arm of the Choaspes

(the modern Kerkah). Thus the country about Susa was most abundantly watered and fertile. 3. General Description of the Ruins. The ruins of Susa cover a space about 6,000 feet long from E. to W., by 4,500 feet broad from N. to S. The circumference of the whole, exclusive of outlying and comparatively insignificant mounds, is about three miles. According to Mr. Loftus, "the principal existing remains consist of four spacious artificial platforms, distinctly separate from each other. Of these the western mound (No. 1 on the plan) is the smallest in superficial extent, but considerably the most lofty and important. . . . Its highest point is 119 feet above the level of the Shaour (Shapur). In form it is an irregular, obtuse-angled triangle, with its corners rounded off, and its base facing nearly due E. It is apparently constructed of earth, gravel, and sun-dried brick, sections being exposed in numerous ravines produced by the rains of winter. The sides are so perpendicular as to be inaccessible to a horseman, except at three places. . . . In the centre is a deep circular depression, probably a large court, surrounded by elevated piles of buildings, the fall of which has given the present configuration to the surface." Mr. Loftus regards this mound as indubitably the remains of the famous citadel of Susa. "Separated from the citadel on the W. by a channel or ravine, the bottom of which is on a level with the external desert, is the great central platform, covering upward of sixty acres (No. 3 on the plan). The highest point is on the S., where it presents generally a perpendicular escarpment to the plain, and rises to an elevation of about seventy feet; on the E. and N. it does not exceed forty or fifty feet. . . . Enormous ravines penetrate to the very heart of the mound." The third platform (No. 2 on the plan) lies toward the N., and is a square mass, about 1,000 feet each way. It abuts on the central platform at its northwestern extremity, but is separated by a slight hollow, perhaps an ancient roadway. These three mounds form together a lozenge-shaped mass, 4,500 feet long, and nearly 3,000 broad. E. of them is the

are no remains of walls in any direction, and no marks of any buildings W. of the Shapur. All the ruins are contained in a circumference of about seven miles.—Architecture (originally by Mr. Ferguson). The explorations of General (afterward Sir Fenwick) Williams, in 1851, resulted in the discovery of the bases of three columns, marked 5, 6, and 7, on the plan of the Great Palace. In 1852, Mr. Loftus ascertained the position of all the seventy-two columns of the original building. On the bases of four of these columns (marked 1, 2, 3, 4) were found trilingual inscriptions like those at Behistun (Persians), according to which, as read by Mr. Edwin Norris, the palace was built by Darius Hystaspis and repaired by Artaxerxes Longimanus. It consisted, like that at Persepolis, of a central hall, about 200 feet square, and three great porches on the exterior of this and separated from it by walls 18 feet thick, these porches (each 200 feet wide by 65 deep, and supported by 12 columns) being beyond doubt the great audience-halls of the palace. The central hall was probably used for all great semi-religious ceremonies, such as the coronation or enthronization of the king, returning thanks or making offerings to the gods for victories, &c. The "King's Gate," where Mordecai sat (Esth. ii. 21), was probably a hall, measuring about 100 feet square, with its roof supported by four pillars in the centre, and standing about 150 or 200 feet from the front of the northern portico. The inner court, where Esther appeared to implore the king's favor (v. 1), was probably the space between this northern portico and this square building, the outer court being the space between the "King's Gate" and the northern terrace wall. The "Royal House" (i. 9) and the "House of the Women" (ii. 9, 11) were probably situated behind this great hall to the S., or between it and the citadel, and communicating directly with it either by a bridge over the ravine, or (less probably) by a covered way under ground. Probably also in front of one of the lateral porticoes of this building, King Ahasuerus made his great seven days' feast, in tents erected "in the court of the garden of the king's palace" (i. 5, 6). The whole of this great group of buildings was raised on an artificial mound (No. 2 on the plan above), about 1,000 feet square, and apparently 50 or 60 feet above the plain. As the principal building must have had a raised platform above its roof, its height could not have been less than 100 or 120 feet, and its elevation above the plain 170 or 200 feet. It would be difficult to conceive of any thing much grander in an architectural point of fourth platform (No. 4 on the plan), very extensive, but irregular, and much lower than the rest. Beyond this, a number of low mounds are traceable, extending nearly to the Dizful River; but there its height could not have been less than 100 or 120 feet, and its elevation above the plain 170 or 200 feet. It would be difficult to conceive of any thing much grander in an architectural point of view than such a building, rising to such a height out of a group of subordinate palace-buildings, interspersed with trees and shrubs, and the whole based on such a terrace, rising from the flat but fertile plains watered by the Euphrates at its base.

Shu'shan-e'duth (Heb., see below). "To the chief musician upon Shushan-eduth" (Ps. lx.) is plainly a musical direction (so Mr. Wright). In Ps. lxxx. we have "SHOSHANNIM-EDUTH," of which Roediger regards Shushan-eduth as an abbreviation. As it now stands it devotes "the lily of testimony," and possibly contains the first words of some Psalm to the melody of which Ps. lx. was sung. Some regard Shushan-eduth as a musical instrument, lily-shaped, or having lily-shaped ornaments, or six-stringed. According to Simonis, Shushan-eduth indicates that the lily-shaped cymbals were to be accompanied with playing on the lute. Prof. J. A. Alexander makes it an enigmatical inscription—"on the lily of testimony" representing the theme of the psalm to be the beauty of the Law, or something lovely in it, with reference most probably to the gracious promise cited from it and to Deut. xxxi. 19. Mr. Wright regards it as a fragment of an old psalm or melody, like AIJELETH SHAIAR and others, which contained a direction to the leader of the choir.

Shu'thal-hites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of SHUTHELAH the son of Ephraim (Num. xxvi. 35).

Shu'the-lah (Heb. noise of breaking? Ges.), head of an Ephraimite family, called after him Shuthal-hites (Num. xxvi. 35), and lineal ancestor of Joshua the son of Nun (1 Chr. vii. 20-27). Shuthelah appears from the former passage to be a son of Ephraim, and the father of Eran, from whom sprung a family of Eranites (ver. 36). He also had two brothers, BECHER (BERIAH 2), father of the Bachrites, and Tahan, father of the Tahanites. But in 1 Chr. vii. Shuthelah appears in ver. 20 (as in Num.) as the son of Ephraim; while in ver. 21 he is placed six generations later. From the recurrence of other names, too, Lord A. C. Hervey concludes that the text in 1 Chr. vii. is corrupt, and makes the following observations: a. The names that are repeated over and over again, either in identical or in slightly varied forms, represent probably only one person. Hence Eladah (ver. 20) = Elead (ver. 21) = Laadan (ver. 26) = Eran (Num. xxvi. 36); the two Tahaths (1 Chr. vii. 20) and Tahan (ver. 25) = Tahan in Num. xxvi. 35; Bered (1 Chr. vii. 20) = Zabadi (ver. 21) = Becher (Num. xxvi. 35); Shuthelah in 1 Chr. vii. 20 and 21, and Telah in ver. 25, are the Shuthelah of Num. xxvi. 35, 36. b. The words "his son" are improperly added after Bered and Tahath in 1 Chr. vii. 20. c. Tahan is improperly inserted in 1 Chr. vii. 25 as a son of Shuthelah, as appears from Num. xxvi. 35, 36. According to Lord A. C. Hervey, therefore, Shuthelah's line may be thus restored: (1.) Joseph. (2.) Ephraim. (3.) Shuthelah. (4.) Eran, or Leadan. (5.) Ammilud. (6.) Elishama, captain of the host of Ephraim (Num. i. 10, ii. 18, vii. 48). (7.) Nun. (8.) Joshua.—As regards the destruction of Ephraim's sons by the men of Gath, which Ewald and Bunsen refer to the time of the sojourn of the Israelites in Goshen, it is impossible to speak positively as to the part borne in it by the house of Shuthelah. Still, putting together the difficulties in understanding the passage of the literal Ephraim, and his literal sons and daughter, with the facts that the settlements of the Ephraimites in the mountainous district where Beth-horon, Gezer, Timnath-serah, &c., lay, were exactly suited for a descent upon the plains of the Philistine country where the men of Gath fed their cattle, and that the Ephraimites encountered a successful opposition from the Canaanites in Gezer (Josh. xvi. 10; Judg. i. 29), and apparently called in later the Benjamites to help them in driving away the men of Gath (1 Chr. viii. 13), it seems best (so Lord A. C. Hervey) to understand the narrative as of the times after the entrance into Canaan. BECHER 1; BERIAH 2; EPHRAIM.

* Shu'tle. HANDICRAFT; WEAVING.

Sh'a (Heb. congregation, Ges.), ancestor of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 47); = SHAHIA in Ezr. ii. 44, and SUD in 1 Esd. v. 29.

Sh'a-ha (Heb.) = SIA (Ezr. ii. 44).

Sh'be-chai (fr. Heb.) = SIBBECHAI the Hushathite (2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chr. xxvii. 11).

Sh'be-chai (Heb. thicket of Jehorah, i. e. crowd of God's people, Ges.), one of David's "valiant men," and captain for the eighth month of 24,000 men of the king's army (1 Chr. xi. 29, xxvii. 11). He belonged to one of the principal families of Judah, the Zathites, or descendants of Zerah, and is called "the HUSHATHITE," probably from the place of his birth. Sibbechai's great exploit, which gave him a place among the mighty men of David's army, was his single combat with Saph, or Sippai, the Philistine giant, in the battle of Gezer, or Gob (2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chr. xx. 4). MEBENNAI.

Sh'mah (Heb. colours or fragrance, Ges.), one of the towns E. of Jordan, taken and occupied by the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 19); = SHIEMAH, and probably SHIEMAM. Like most of the Transjordanic places, Sibmah disappears from view during the main part of the Jewish history. In the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah it was a Moabite place, famed for the abundance and excellence of its grapes (Is. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlviii. 32). Its vineyards were devastated, and the town doubtless destroyed by the "lords of the heathen." Jerome speaks of it as one of the very strong cities, and states that it was hardly 500 paces distant from Heshbon. Its site is unknown.

Sh'ra'im, or Sh'ra-lm (fr. Heb. = twofold hope, Ges.), a place on the northern boundary of the Holy Land, between the boundary of Damascus and that of Hamath (Ez. xlvii. 16); not identified.

* Sic'uth (Heb. a tent, tabernacle, Ges.). In Am. v. 26, where the A. V. text has "the tabernacle of your Moloch," the A. V. margin, Rashi, Calvin, Rosenmüller, &c., read "Sic'uth your king," and suppose Sic'uth to be an image or idol. But the LXX. and most interpreters, with the A. V. text, make Sic'uth = a tent or shrine.

Si'chem [-kem] (L. fr. Heb.) = SHECHEM (Gen. xii. 6; Eccles. i. 26).

* Sick'le (Heb. hermék or chermék, naggal; Gr. drepanon) = a curved knife or toothed instrument for reaping; a reaping-hook (Deut. xvi. 9, xxiii. 23 [Heb. 26]; Jer. i. 16, margin "scythe"; Joel iii. 13 [iv. 13 Heb.]; Mk. iv. 29; Rev. xiv. 14-19).

Sic'y-on [sish'e-on] (L. fr. Gr. Sikyon, from a Phœnician root sak, sik, or sok, which implies a periodical market [so Mr. Blakesley]), a very ancient city of the Peloponnesus (GREECE), W. of CORINTH; mentioned with PHASELIS, SIDE, &c., in 1 Mc. xv. 23; originally situated on the shore of the Corinthian Gulf, and said to have been first called Agiale or Agialoi; perhaps named Sicyon by the Phœnician traders.

But the Sicyon of 1 Mc. was built on the site which had served as an acropolis, and was from twelve to twenty stades (=  $1\frac{1}{2}$  to  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles) distant from the shore. Demetrius Polioeretes, B. C. 303, having made himself master of the harbor and the lower town, and finally of the acropolis, persuaded the population, whom he restored to independence, to destroy the buildings adjacent to the harbor, and remove to the acropolis, this site being much more easily defensible, especially against any enemy from the sea. Diodorus describes the new town as including a large space so surrounded on every side by precipices as to be unapproachable by the machines then employed in sieges, and as possessing a plentiful supply of water within its circuit. It was long an important city, capital of the small state or district of Sicyonia, and, especially for a century after the destruction of Corinth (B. C. 146), enjoyed great commercial advantages, but is now an utter ruin.

Siddim (Heb., see below), the Vale of (Heb. 'emek; see VALLEY 1), a place named only in Gen. xiv. 3, 8, 10. The meaning of the name is very doubtful. Gesenius thinks (and so Kalisch) that the Hebrew 'Emek has-Siddim = "a plain cut up by stony channels which render it difficult of transit;" Stanley makes the signification the "valley of well-cultivated fields;" Fürst, &c., "valley of the open fields." (FIELD.) As to the spot itself:—1. It was one of that class of valleys designated by Heb. 'emek. (PLAIN 8; VALLEY 1.) Mr. Grove regards this term as denoting a broad flatish tract, sometimes of considerable width, enclosed on each side by a definite range of hills. Gesenius makes it properly a long low plain. 2. It was so far a suitable spot for the combat between the four and five kings (verse 8). 3. It contained a multitude of bitumen-pits (SINNE) sufficient materially to affect the issue of the battle. 4. In this valley the kings of the five allied cities of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Bela seem to have awaited the approach of the invaders. Mr. Grove supposes that it was in the neighborhood of "the plain of Jordan," in which those cities stood, and probably somewhere to the N. of the lake, perhaps on the plain at the S. W. corner (see below). 5. According to verse 3, the Salt Sea covers the actual space formerly occupied by the Vale of Siddim. Robinson (Phys. Geog. 234-5) thinks the Vale of Siddim was "probably a depression in the plain; but it was adjacent to the Salt Sea, and was at least near to Sodom and Gomorrah;" and "that the southern bay of the sea now occupies the place of the Vale of Siddim, and the fertile plain." (SEA, THE SALT, II., §§ 47, 49.) Porter (in Kitto) and others think it probable that Sodom and Gomorrah were in the Vale of Siddim; Reland, Wolcott (in B. S. xxv. 127), and others, that the Vale of Siddim was quite distinct from the country in which the five cities were situated. How the Vale of Siddim became a part of the Salt Sea, whether by the fire burning out the bitumen and thus forming a chasm, into which the adjacent waters rushed, or by an earthquake sinking some portion of the soil, or burying some part of the sea, or in some other way, is still a matter of conjecture.

Side (Gr., possibly from the same root as SIDON or ZIDON [so Mr. Blakesley]), a city on the coast of PAMPHYLIA in latitude  $36^{\circ} 46'$ , longitude  $31^{\circ} 27'$ , ten or twelve miles E. of the river Eurymedon; mentioned in 1 Mc. xv. 23, among the places to which the Roman Senate sent letters in favor of the Jews. It was a colony for Cumæ in Æolis. (ASIA.) It was closely connected with Aradus in Phenicia by commerce. Possibly it was originally a Phœnician settlement, and the Cumæan colony something subsequent. It appears in history as a place of considerable importance. It was the station of Antiochus's navy on the eve of a battle with the Rhodian fleet. At the close of the war with Antiochus, it passed into the hands of the Romans. The remains which still exist evidence its former wealth. They stand on a low peninsula running from N. E. to S. W., and the maritime character of the former inhabitants appears from its slightly-built walls toward the sea, the wall which faces the land being of excellent workmanship, and remaining, in a considerable portion, perfect even to this time. A theatre (belonging apparently to the Roman times) is one of the largest and best preserved in Asia Minor, capable of containing more than 15,000 spectators, the lower half of it being excavated from the solid rock, and the seats for the spectators, most of which remain, being of white marble beautifully wrought. Three gates led into the town from the sea, and one, on the north-eastern side, into the country. The two principal harbors, which at first seem to have been united in one, were at the extremity of the peninsula: they were closed, and together contained a surface of nearly 500 yards by 200. Besides these, the principal water-gate on the N. W. was connected with two small piers of 150 feet long.

Sidon, the Greek form of the Phœnician name ZIDON in the N. T. and Apocrypha of the A. V. (2 Esd. i. 11; Jd. ii. 28; 1 Mc. v. 15; Mat. xi. 21, 22, xv. 21; Mk. iii. 8, &c.) and in the O. T. both as the first-born of CANAAN (Gen. x. 15), and as the name of the city (x. 19).

Si-do'ni-ans (fr. the L. form Sidonius, pl. Sidonii) = ZIDONIANS (Deut. iii. 9; Josh. xiii. 4, 6; Judg. iii. 3; 1 K. v. 6).

* Siege [see]. WAR.

* Sieve [siv] (Is. xxx. 28; Am. ix. 9). (AGRICULTURE.) "To sift as wheat" (Lk. xxii. 31), figuratively = to agitate and prove by trials and afflictions (Rbn. N. T. Lex.).

* Sift, to. SIEVE.

* Signet. NINEVEH; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL; RING; SEAL.

Sh'hor (Heb. sweeping away, i. e. a warrior sweeping all before him, Ges.), king of the AXORITES when Israel arrived on the borders of the Promised Land (Num. xxi. 21). He was evidently a man of great courage and audacity. Before Israel's arrival he had dispossessed the Moabites (MOAB) of a splendid territory, driving them S. of the ARNON (xxi. 26-29). When the Israelite host appeared, he at once gathered his people together and attacked them. But he and all his host were destroyed, and their district from Arnon to Jabbok became at once the possession of the conqueror (Deut. i. 4, ii. 24 ff., &c.).

Sh'hor (L. fr. Heb.), accurately Shi'hor (Heb. the black or turbid), "which is before Egypt," is spoken of as one of the limits of territory still unconquered when Joshua was old (Josh. xiii. 2, 3). David "gathered all Israel together from Shi'hor of Egypt even unto the entering of Hamath" (1 Chr. xiii. 5). There is no other evidence that the Israelites ever spread westward beyond Gaza. The stream indicated in these passages is generally held to be the Wady el-Arish = RIVER OF EGYPT 2; but according to some it is always the Nile. That the stream intended by Shi'hor or "Shi'hor" unqualified was a navigable river is evident from Is. xliii. 3, where it is said of Tyre, "And by great waters, the sowing of Shihor (A. V. 'Sihor'), the harvest of the river is her revenue." Here Shihor is either the same as, or compared with, Yéor, generally thought to be the Nile, but supposed by some to be the extension of the Red Sea. (RIVER 3.) In Jer. ii. 18 the identity of "Sihor" with the Nile seems distinctly stated (so Mr. R. S. Poole, Gesenius, &c.).

Sil'as (Gr., contracted fr. SILVANUS, see below), an eminent member of the early Christian Church; = SILVANUS in St. Paul's Epistles. He first appears as one of the leaders of the Church at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 22), an inspired teacher or "PROPHET" (xv. 32). His name, derived from Latin silva = wood, betokens him a Hellenistic Jew, and he appears to have been a Roman citizen (xvi. 37). He was appointed as a delegate to accompany PAUL and Barnabas on their return to Antioch with the decree of the Council of Jerusalem (xv. 22, 32). Having accomplished this mission he returned to Jerusalem (so Mr. Bevan, who, with most modern critics, considers ver. 34 as an interpolation). He must, however, have immediately revisited Antioch, for we find him selected by St. Paul as the companion of his second missionary journey (xv. 40-xvii. 40). At Berea he was left behind with Timothy while St. PAUL proceeded to Athens (xvii. 14), and we hear nothing more of his movements until he rejoined the apostle at Corinth (xviii. 5). His presence at Corinth is several times noticed (2 Cor. i. 19; 1 Th. i. 1; 2 Th. i. 1). Probably he returned to Jerusalem with St. Paul, and from that time the connection between them seems to have terminated. Probabilities favor his being the Silvanus who conveyed St. Peter's first Epistle to Asia Minor (1 Pet. v. 12; PETER). A tradition of very slight authority represents Silas to have become bishop of Corinth.

Silk, the well-known product of the silkworm, which is the larva or caterpillar of a sluggish moth, Bombyx Mori. The silkworm feeds voraciously on the leaves of the mulberry (Morus; MULBERRY-TREES; SYCAMORE-TREE), and forms an oval yellow cocoon of silk around its body. After the silkworms are killed by heating the cocoons, the silk is unwound, the gum is removed from it, and the filaments are united into threads of the required size for use, dyed, &c. The silk manufacture has been of importance in China for 4,000 years. Aristotle says it was first woven in the island of Cos, but that the material was brought from the East. Probably silk came from China to Egypt, Greece, Rome, as well as to Assyria, Media, Persia, &c. Silk bore an astonishingly high price till a comparatively late period. The Roman Emperor Heliogabalus (A. D. 218-222) is said to have been the first man who wore a robe entirely of silk.—The only undoubted notice of silk in the Bible occurs in Rev. xviii. 12 (Gr. serikon), where it is mentioned among the treasures of the typical Babylon. It is, however, in the highest degree probable that the texture was known to the Hebrews from the time that their commercial relations were extended by Solomon (so Mr. Bevan). The Heb. meshi occurs only in Ez. xvi. 10, 13 (A. V. "silk"), and is rendered by the Hebrew interpreters, Fairbairn, Fürst, &c., silk, a garment of silk; but Gesenius regards it as etymologically meaning only something finely drawn, e. g. a fine thread, stuff composed of fine threads. The Heb. dēmehék in Am. iii. 12 (A. V. "Damascus") has been supposed by Gesenius, Fürst, &c., to refer to silk from the resemblance of the word to our "damask." But Mr. Bevan, with Pusey, W. L. Alexander (in Kitto), &c., regards this supposed reference to silk as very doubtful, for "damask" is a corruption of dīnakso, a term applied by the Arabs to the raw material alone, not to the manufactured article. Henderson, &c., sustain the A. V. in rendering "Damascus." The Heb. shēsh is inconsistently translated "silk" in Prov. xxxi. 22, also in the margin of Gen. xii. 42 and Ex. xxv. 4. LINEN; COTTON; CROWN, &c.

Sil'la (Heb. twig, basket, Ges.). "The house of Millo (MILLO; MILLO, House of) which goeth down to Silla," was the scene of the murder of king Joash (2 K. xii. 20). What or where Silla was is entirely matter of conjecture. It must have been in the valley below Millo (so Mr. Grove). Gesenius makes Silla the name of a town near Jerusalem. Some have suggested the Pool of Siloam. Others refer it to a place on or connected with the causeway or flight of steps (Heb. mēsilāh) which led from the central valley of the city up to the court of the Temple. Fürst makes it a highway, viz. the way going down from the Joppa-gate crosswise through JERUSALEM and then ascending to a bank at the Haram area, the present David Street.

Sil'lo'ah, or Sil'o'ah (Heb. hash-shelah or shelah = the dart, Ges., &c.; see ANAS, 1, 2, 3; possibly [so Mr. Grove, &c.] a corrupt form of Heb. Shilach or Shilbach; see SHILOAH), the Pool of (Neb. iii. 15). SILOAM.

Sil'o'am, or Sil'o-sm (Gr. fr. Heb. = SHILOAH; see also SHILOAH), the pool to which our Lord sent the blind man to wash the clay from his eyes (Jo. ix. 7, 11). Siloam is one of the few undisputed localities in the topography of JERUSALEM; still retaining its old name (with Arabic modification, Silwadn), while every other pool has lost its Bible-designation. This is the more remarkable as it is a mere suburban tank of no great size, and for many an age not particularly good or plentiful in its waters, though Josephus tells us that in his day they were both "sweet and abundant." Apart from the identity of name, there is an unbroken chain of exterior testimony, during eighteen centuries, connecting the present Birket Silwadn with the SHILOAH of Isaiah and the Siloam of St. John (so Dr. H. Bonar, original author of this article). From Josephus we learn that it was without the city; that at this pool the "old wall" took a bend and shot out eastward; that there was a valley under it, and one beside it; a hill right opposite, apparently on the other side of the Kidron, hard by a cliff or rock called Peristereon; that it was at the termination or mouth of the Tyropæon; that close beside it, apparently eastward, was another pool, called Solomon's pool, to which the "old wall" came after leaving Siloam, and past which it went on to Ophlas, where, bending northward, it was united to the eastern arcade of the Temple. In the Antonine Itinerary (A. D. 333) it is set down in the same locality, but it is said to be "near the wall," as Josephus implies; whereas now it is upward of 1,200 feet from the nearest angle of the present wall, and nearly 1,900 feet from the southern wall of the Haram. Jerome speaks of it as at the bottom of Mount Moriah, in the Valley of the Son of Hinnom, as dependent on the rains, and as the only fountain used in his day. But other authorities, and the modern water provision of the city, show us that it never could have been wholly dependent on its pools. Its innumerable bottle-necked private cisterns kept up a supply at all times. In the seventh century Antoninus Martyr mentions Siloam, as both fountain and pool.

Bernhard the monk speaks of it in the ninth century, and the annalists of the Crusades mention its site, in the fork of two valleys, as we find it. Benjamin of Tudela (A. D. 1173) speaks of it as the great spring which runs into the brook Kidron.

Many subsequent writers describe Siloam; nor do they, with one or two exceptions, vary in their location of it.—A little way below the Jewish burying-ground (JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF), but on the opposite side of the valley, where the Kidron turns slightly westward, and widens itself considerably, is the fountain of the Virgin or Um ed-Deraj (EX-ROGEL?), near the beginning of that saddle-shaped projection of the Temple-hill supposed to be the OPHEL of the Bible, and the Ophlas of Josephus. At the back part of this fountain a subterranean passage begins, through which the water flows, and through which a man may make his way, as did Robinson and Barclay, sometimes walking erect, and sometimes stooping, sometimes kneeling, and sometimes crawling, to Siloam. This rocky conduit, which twists considerably, but keeps, in general, a southwesterly direction, is, according to Robinson, 1,750 feet long, while the direct distance between the pool of Siloam (Ar. Birket es-Silwân) and Um ed-Deraj is only a little above 1,200 feet. In former days this passage was evidently deeper, as its bed is sand of some depth, which has been accumulating for ages. This conduit has had tributaries which formerly sent their waters down from the city-pools or Temple-wells to swell Siloam. It enters Siloam at the northwest angle; or rather enters a small rock-cut chamber which forms the vestibule of Siloam, about five or six feet broad. To this you descend by a few rude steps, under which the water pours itself into the main pool. This pool is oblong, fifty feet in length according to Barclay, and fifty-three according to Robinson. It is eighteen feet broad, and nineteen feet deep, according to Robinson; but Barclay gives its breadth more minutely, "fourteen and a half at the lower (eastern) end, and seventeen at the upper; its western end being somewhat bent: it is eighteen and a half in depth, but never filled; the water either passing directly through, or being maintained at a depth of three or four feet." The present pool is a ruin, with no moss or ivy to make it romantic; its sides falling in; its pillars broken; its stair a fragment; its walls giving way; the edge of every stone worn round or sharp by time; in some parts mere debris; once Siloam, now, like the city which overhung it, a heap; though around its edges, wild flowers, and, among other plants, the caper-tree, grow luxuriantly. The gray crumbling limestone of the stone (as well as of the surrounding rocks, which are almost verdureless) gives a poor and worn-out aspect to this venerable relic. The present pool is not the original building; the work of crusaders it may be; perhaps even improved by Saladin; perhaps the work of later days. Yet the spot is the same. This pool, which we may call the second, seems anciently to have poured its waters into a third, before it proceeded to water the royal gardens. This third, perhaps five times the size of that of Siloam, and now known as the Birket el-Hamra, is perhaps that which Josephus calls "Solomon's pool," and which Nehemiah (ii. 14) calls "the King's pool." Siloam is in Scripture always called a "pool." It is the least of all the Jerusalem pools; hardly the sixth part of the Birket el-Mamilla; hardly the tenth of the Birket es-Sultân, or of the lowest of the three pools of Solomon at El-Burak. Yet it is a sacred spot, even to the Moslem; much more to the Jew; for not only from it was the water taken at the Feast of Tabernacles, but the water for the ashes of the red heifer. Jewish tradition makes GINON and Siloam one. The intermittent character or irregular flow of Siloam, noticed by Jerome, is easily accounted for both by the direct and siphonic action of the water in a locality perforated by so many aqueducts, and supplied by so many large wells and secret springs, not to speak of the discharge of the great city baths. The expression in Isaiah, "waters of Shiloah that go softly," seems to point to the slender rivulet, flowing gently, though once very profusely, out of Siloam into the lower breadth of level, where the king's gardens, or royal paradise, stood, and which is still the greenest spot about the gardens watered by Siloam which supply Jerusalem with vegetables, is the village which takes its name from the pool, Keft Siloam. This village is unmentioned in ancient times, perhaps did not then exist. It is a wretched place for filth and irregularity.

Holy City. E. of the Kidron, right opposite the rough gray slope extending between the fountain of the Virgin and the pool of Siloam, above the kitchen-

The Village of Siloam (Siloam), and the lower part of the Valley of the Kidron, showing the "King's gardens," which are watered by the Pool. The background is the highlands of Judah. The view is from a photograph by James Graham, Esq., taken from beneath the south wall of the Herod.

SIL-AM (see above), TOW-ER IN. Of this tower or its fall by which eighteen persons were killed, we know nothing definitely beyond the words of the Lord (Lk. xiii. 4). Whether it was a tower connected with the pool or in the valley near it, we cannot say. In connection with Ophel, "a tower that lieth out" is mentioned (Neh. iii. 26); and Dr. Bonar suggests that this projecting tower may be connected with the tower in Siloam, and that its projection was the cause of its ultimate fall.

SIL-VER (Heb. ceceph; Chal. cesaph; Gr. argurion). In very early times, according to the Bible, silver was used for ornaments (Gen. xxiv. 53; Prov. xxv. 11; Cant. i. 11, &c.), vessels (Gen. xlv. 2; Num. vii. 13, &c.), articles for the Tabernacle and Temple (Ex. xxvi. 19 ff., xxvii. 10 ff., xxxviii. 10 ff.; 1 Chr. xxviii. 15 ff., &c.), trumpets (Num. x. 2), chains (Is. xl. 19), crowns (Zech. vi. 11), &c. (BASIN; CORNET; CUP; HANDICRAFT; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL, &c.) Images for idolatrous worship were made of silver or overlaid with it (Ex. xx. 23; Hos. xiii. 2; Hab. ii. 19; Bar. vi. 39), and the manufacture of silver shrines for Diana was a trade in EPHESUS (Acts xix. 24). But its chief use was as a medium of exchange, and throughout the O. T. we find the Heb. ceceph (= "silver") used for "MONEY" (Gen. xvii. 12 ff., xxiii. 9, 13, xlii. 25 ff., &c.; METALS; PIECE OF SILVER; SHEKEL; SILVERLING, &c.). Ves- sels and ornaments of gold and silver were common in Egypt in the times of Osirtasen I., and Thothmes III., the contemporaries of Joseph and Moses. In the Homeric poems we find indications of the constant application of silver to purposes of ornament and luxury. The practice of overlaying silver with gold, referred to in Homer (Odyssey, vi. 232, xxiii. 159), is nowhere mentioned in the Bible, though inferior materials were covered with silver (Prov. xxvi. 23). Silver was brought to Solomon from ARABIA (2 Chr. ix. 14) and from TARSHISH (2 Chr. ix. 21), which supplied the markets of Tyre (Ez. xxvii. 12). (METALS.) Spain appears to have been the chief source whence silver was obtained by the ancients. Possibly the hills of Palestine may have afforded some supply of this metal. For an account of the knowledge of obtaining and refining silver possessed by the ancient Hebrews, see the articles LEAD and MINES. Silver mixed with alloy is referred to in Jer. vi. 30, and a finer kind, either purer in itself, or more thoroughly purified, is mentioned in Prov. viii. 19.—SILVER CORD; see CORD; MEDICINE.

SIL-VER-LINGS (= little silvers, i. e. pieces of silver, or silver coins), the A. V. translation (Is. vii. 23 only) of the Heb. ceceph, elsewhere rendered "SILVER" or "MONEY." PIECE OF SILVER.

SIL-MAL-CA'E (fr. Gr. form, probably of Heb. or Ar. = Heb. melech, king), an Arabian chief who had charge of ANTIOCHUS VI., the young son of ALEXANDER BALAS, before he was put forward by TRYPHON as a claimant to the Syrian throne (1 Mc. xi. 39).

SIM'E-ON (L. fr. Heb. = SHIMEON = a hearing, Gen. xxix. 33, Ges.). 1. The second son of JACOB

by LEAH. His birth is recorded in Gen. xxix. 32. The first group of Jacob's children consists, besides Simeon, of the three other sons of Leah—Reuben, Levi, Judah. With each of these Simeon is mentioned in some connection. "As Reuben and Simeon are mine," says Jacob, "so shall Joseph's sons Ephraim and Manasseh be mine" (Gen. xlviii. 5). With Levi, Simeon was associated in the massacre of the Shechemites (xxxiv. 25)—a deed which drew on them the remonstrance of their father (80), and perhaps also his dying curse (xlix. 5-7), though the latter may refer to some unrecorded act (so Mr. Grove). Judah and Simeon not only "went up" together, side by side, in the forefront of the nation, to the conquest of the south of the Holy Land (Judg. i. 3, 17), but their allotments lay together in a more special manner than those of the other tribes. Besides the massacre of Shechem, the only personal incident related of Simeon is the fact of his being selected by Joseph as the hostage for the appearance of Benjamin (Gen. xlii. 19, 24, 36, xliii. 23). The chief families of the tribe are mentioned in Gen. xvi. 10, in which SHAIL 1 (Sail) is specified as "the son of the Canaanitess,"—and in Num. xxvi. 12-14, and in 1 Chr. iv. 24-43. At the census of Sinai Simeon numbered 59,300 fighting men (Num. i. 23). Then only Judah and Dan exceeded it in number. When the second census was taken, at Shittim, the number had fallen to 22,200, and it was the weakest of all the tribes. This was no doubt partly due to the recent mortality following the idolatry of Peor (xxv.), but there must have been other causes which have escaped mention. Simeon and Levi, according to Jacob's prediction (Gen. xlix. 5-7), were both "divided" and "scattered." In the case of Simeon, some corrupting element in the tribe itself seems first to have reduced its numbers, and at last to have driven it from its allotted seat in the country, and caused it to dwindle and disappear. The non-appearance of Simeon's name in the Blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 6) may be due to his displeasure at the misbehavior of the tribe at Shittim. Those who assume that the blessing, or this portion of it, is a composition of later date (PERTATEUCH), ascribe the omission to the fact of the tribe having by that time vanished from the Holy Land. During the journey through the wilderness Simeon was a member of the camp which marched on the S. side of the Sacred Tent. His associates were Reuben and Gad. The connection between Judah and Simeon already mentioned seems to have begun with the Conquest. Judah and the two Joseph-brethren (Ephraim and Manasseh) were first served with the lion's share of the land; and then, the Canaanites having been sufficiently subdued to allow the Sacred Tent to be established without risk in the heart of the country, the work of dividing the remainder amongst the seven inferior tribes was proceeded with (Josh. viii. 1-6). Benjamin had the first turn, then Simeon (xix. 1). By this time Judah had discovered that the tract allotted to him was too large (xix. 9), and also too much exposed on the W. and S. for even his great powers. To Simeon accordingly was allotted a district out of the territory of his kinsman, on its southern frontier, which contained eighteen or nineteen cities, with their villages, spread round the venerable well of Boer-sheba (Josh. xix. 1-8; 1 Chr. iv. 28-33). Of these places, with the help of Judah, the Simeonites possessed themselves (Judg. i. 3, 17); and here they were found, doubtless by Joab, residing in the reign of David (1 Chr. iv. 31). During his wandering life

David must have been much among the Simeonites (1 Sam. xxx. 26 ff.; ZIKLAG). The comparatively small number of Simeon (7,100 warriors) and Judah (6,800) who attended David's installation as king (1 Chr. xii. 23 ff.) may be due to the fact that it took place in the heart of their own territory, at Hebron. After David's removal to Jerusalem the head of the tribe was Shephatiah, son of Maachah (xxvii. 16). What part Simeon took at the time of the division of the kingdom we are not told. The only thing (so Mr. Grove) which can be interpreted into a trace of its having taken any part with the northern kingdom are the two casual notices of 2 Chr. xv. 9 and xxxiv. 6, which appear to imply the presence of Simeonites there in the reigns of Asa and Josiah. But the definite statement in 1 Chr. iv. 41-43, of two expeditions in search of more eligible territory, proves that at that time there were still some of them remaining in the original seat of the tribe, and actuated by all the warlike, lawless spirit of their progenitor. The audacity and intrepidity which seem to have characterized the founder of the tribe of Simeon are seen in their fullest force in his descendant JUDITH 2. Whether the book which bears her name be a history or a historic romance (JUDITH, BOOK OF), Judith herself will always remain one of the most prominent figures among the deliverers of her nation. BETHULIA would almost seem to have been a Simeonite colony. Simeon is named by Ezekiel (xlviii. 25), and John (Rev. vii. 7), in their catalogues of the restoration of Israel.—2. A priest of the family of JOARIB or JEHOIARIB; one of the ancestors of the Maccabees (1 Mc. ii. 1).—3. Son of Juda and father of Levi in the genealogy of our Lord (Lk. iii. 30).—4. SIMON PETER (Acts xv. 14; PETER).—5. A devout Jew, inspired by the Holy Ghost, who met the parents of our Lord in the Temple, took Him in his arms, and gave thanks for what he saw, and knew of Jesus (Lk. ii. 25-35). In the apocryphal gospel of Nicodemus, Simeon is called a high-priest. Rabban Simeon, whose grandmother was of the family of David, succeeded his father Hillel as president of the Sanhedrin about A. D. 13 (SCRIBES), and his son Gamaliel was the Pharisee at whose feet St. Paul was brought up (Acts xxii. 3). A Jewish writer specially notes that no record of this Simeon is preserved in the Mishna. It has been conjectured that he, or his grandson of the same name, may be the Simeon of St. Luke; but the commonness of the name Simeon, the description merely as "a man in Jerusalem," and the education of Gamaliel as a Pharisee, are arguments against the validity of this conjecture.—6. "Simeon that was called NIGER," one of certain prophets and "teachers" in the church at Antioch (Acts xiii. 1 only).

* Simeonites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants, or tribe, of SIMEON 1 (Num. xxv. 14, xxvi. 14; 1 Chr. xxvii. 16).

Simeon (Gr. fr. Heb. = SIMEON, or of Greek origin?). 1. Son of MATTATHIAS 2, and one of the famous MACCABEES (1 Mc. ii. 8, 65, &c.).—2. Son of Onias the high-priest, whose eulogy closes the "praise of famous men" in Eccles. i. (ECCLESIASTICUS). The common view refers this to Simon II. (HIGH-PRIEST, p. 334); but Josephus (xii. 2, § 4, &c.) identifies Simon I. with "Simon the Just." It is evident (so Mr. Westcott) that Simon the Just was popularly regarded as closing a period in Jewish history, as the last teacher of the Great Synagogue. (JERUSALEM; SCRIBES; SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT).—3. "A governor of the Temple" in the time of SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR, whose information as to the treasures of the Temple led to the sacrilegious attack of HELIODORUS (2 Mc. iii. 4, &c.). Considerable doubt exists as to the exact nature of his office. The chief difficulty lies in the fact that Simon is said to have been of "the tribe of Benjamin" (iii. 3), while the earlier "ruler of the house of God" (1 Chr. ix. 11; 2 Chr. xxxi. 13; Jer. xx. 1) seems to have been always a priest, and the "captain of the Temple" (Lk. xxii. 4; Acts iv. 1, v. 24, 26) and the keeper of the treasures (1 Chr. xxvi. 24; 2 Chr. xxxi. 12) must have been at least Levites. Herzfeld conjectures that Benjamin is an error for Minjamen (= MIAMIN 2, or MINIAMIN 2), the head of a priestly house (Neh. xii. 5, 17; comp. 2 Mc. iv. 23, "brother of Menelaus").—4. Si'mon the Brother of Je'sus. The only undoubted notice of this Simon occurs in Mat. xiii. 55 and Mk. vi. 3. He has been identified by some writers with Simon the Canaanite (No. 5, below) and still more generally with Symeon who became bishop of Jerusalem after the death of James, A. D. 62. The former of these opinions rests on no evidence whatever, nor is the latter without its difficulties. (JAMES).—5. Si'mon the Canaan-ite, one of the Twelve Apostles (Mat. x. 4; Mk. iii. 18), otherwise described as Si'mon Ze-lo'tes (Lk. vi. 15; Acts i. 13). The latter term, which is peculiar to Luke, is the Greek equivalent for the Chaldee term preserved by Matthew and Mark. (CANAANITE, THE; ZELOTES.) Each points out Simon as belonging to the faction of the Zealots, who were conspicuous for their fierce advocacy of the Mosaic ritual. Different traditions (both doubtful) make him to have preached in Egypt, Cyrene, and Mauritania, and to have been crucified in Judea in Domitian's reign (comp. No. 4, above).—6. Si'mon of Cy-re'ne. A Hellenistic Jew, born at CYRENE in Africa, who was present in Jerusalem at the crucifixion of Jesus, either as an attendant at the feast (Acts ii. 10), or as one of the numerous settlers at Jerusalem from that place (vi. 9). Meeting the procession that conducted Jesus to Golgotha, as he was returning from the country, he was pressed into the service to bear the cross (Mat. xxvii. 32; Mk. xv. 21; Lk. xxiii. 26), when Jesus Himself was unable to bear it any longer (comp. Jn. xix. 17). Mark describes him as the father of ALEXANDER 1 and RUTUS.—7. Si'mon the Lep'er. A resident at Bethany; not improbably (so Mr. Bevan) one who had been miraculously cured of leprosy by Jesus. (LAZARUS; MARTHA; MARY THE SISTER OF LAZARUS.) In his house Mary anointed Jesus preparatory to His death and burial (Mat. xxvi. 6, &c.; Mk. xiv. 3, &c.; Jn. xii. 1, &c.).—8. Si'mon Mag'us. A Samaritan living in the apostolic age, distinguished as a "sorcerer" or magician, from his practice of magical arts (Acts viii. 9; MAGI; MAGIC). He was born (so Mr. Bevan, after Justin Martyr, &c.) at Gitton, a village of Samaria, identified with the modern Kuryet Jil, near Nabulus (Shechem). He was probably educated at ALEXANDRIA, and there became acquainted with the eclectic tenets of the Gnostic school. (PHILOSOPHY.) Either then or subsequently he was a pupil of Dosith-eus, who preceded him as a teacher of Gnosticism in Samaria, and whom he supplanted with the aid of Cleobius. He is first introduced to us in the Bible as practising magical arts in a city of Samaria, perhaps Sychar (Acts viii. 5; comp. Jn. iv. 5), and with such success, that he was pronounced to be "the power of God which is called great" (Acts viii. 10). The preaching and miracles of PHILIP THE EVANGELIST having excited his observation, he became one of his disciples, and received baptism at his hands. Subsequently he witnessed the effect produced by the imposition of hands, as practised by the Apostles Peter and John, and, being desirous of acquiring a similar power for himself, he offered a sum of money for it. His object evidently was to apply the power to the prosecution of magical arts. His proposition met with a severe denunciation from Peter, followed by a petition on the part of Simon, the tenor of which bespeaks terror but not penitence (viii. 9-24). From him comes the word simony, as applied to all traffic in spiritual offices. Simon's history, subsequently to his meeting with Peter, is involved in difficulties. Early Church historians depict him as the pertinacious foe of the Apostle PETER, whose movements he followed for the purpose of seeking encounters, in which he was signally defeated. Justin Martyr represents Simon as successful at Rome; that he was defied, and a statue was erected in his honor, "Simoni Deo Sancto" (L. = to Simon the holy god). The various accounts can be reconciled only by assuming that Simon made two expeditions to Rome, the first in the reign of Claudius, the second (in which he encountered Peter) in the reign of Nero, about A. D. 68; and even this takes for granted the disputed fact of St. PETER's visit to Rome. His death is associated with the encounter in question: according to Hippolytus, the earliest authority on the subject, Simon was buried alive at his own request, in the confident assurance that he would rise again on the third day. According to another account, he attempted to fly, in proof of his supernatural power; in answer to the prayers of Peter, he fell and broke his thigh and ankle; overcome with vexation, he committed suicide. Simon is generally pronounced by early writers the founder of heresy; perhaps this refers to his attempt to combine Christianity with Gnosticism.—9. Si'mon Pe'ter. (PETER).—10. A Pharisee, in whose house a penitent woman anointed the head and feet of Jesus (Lk. vii. 40). (Harmony under GOSPELS; MARY MAGDALENE).—11. Si'mon the Tan'ner. A Christian convert living at Joppa, at whose house Peter lodged (Acts ix. 43). The house was near the sea-side (x. 6. 32) for the convenience of the water. (HANDICRAFT; LEATHER).—12. Father of JUDAS ISCARIOT (Jn. vi. 71, xiii. 2, 26).

Si'mon (see above) Chos-a-me's (fr. Gr., apparently formed by combining the last letter of Malluch [ch] with the first part of Shemariah). SHIMROX, and the three following names in Ezr. x. 31, 32, are thus written in 1 Esd. ix. 32.

Si'm'ri (fr. Heb., properly SHIMRI), son of Hosah; a Merarite Levite in David's reign (1 Chr. xxvi. 10).

Sin (Heb., see below). 1. A city of EGYPT, mentioned only in Ezr. xxx. 15, 16. The name is Hebrew, or, at least, Shemitic. Gesenius supposes it = ciay, mire. It is identified in the Vulgate with Pelusium (Gr. Pélousion = the clayey or muddy town). Champollion identifies Pelusium with the Peremoun, Peremón, and Baremoun of the Copts, El-Farmá of the Arabs, which was in the time of the former a boundary-city. The site of Pelusium is as yet undetermined. It has been thought to be marked by mounds near Burg el-Teneh, now called El-Farad and not el-Teneh. This is disputed by Captain Spratt, who supposes that the mound of Abou-Kheeyár indicates where it stood. This is further inland, and apparently on the W. of the old Pelusiac branch of the Nile, as was Pelusium. It is situated between Farmā and Tel-Defennch. Pelusium is mentioned by Ezekiel, in one of the prophecies relating to the invasion of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, as one of the cities which should then suffer calamities, with, probably, reference to the later history. In the most ancient times Tanis (Zoan), as afterward Pelusium, seems to have been the key of Egypt on the E. The prophet speaks of Sin as "Sin the stronghold of Egypt" (Ez. xxx. 15). This place it held from that time until the period of the Romans. Herodotus relates that Sennacherib advanced against Pelusium, and that near Pelusium Cambyses defeated Psammenitus. In like manner the decisive battle in which Oehus defeated the last native king, Nectanebos, Nekht-Nebf, was fought near this city. Mr. R. S. Poole, original author of this article, conjectures that this city may have been connected with the Sinites (SINITE) and the wilderness of Sin, perhaps also with SINIM.—2. Wilderness of Sin, a tract of the wilderness which the Israelites reached after leaving the encampment by the Red Sea (Num. xxxiii. 11, 12). Their next halting-place (Ex. xvi. 1, xvii. 1) was REPHIDIM; hence the wilderness of Sin must lie between that wady and the coast of the Gulf of Suez, and of course W. of Sinai. In the wilderness of Sin the MANNA was first gathered. Dr. Robinson (i. 73) identifies the wilderness of Sin with the great plain—called el-Kā'a in its broadest part—which, beginning near el-Murkhāh (about lat. 29°), extends with a greater or less breadth almost to the extremity of the peninsula of Sinai. Mr. Rowlands (in Fairbairn) identifies the wilderness of Sin with the district of hills or group of mountains round Sarbūt el-Khadem, directly E. of the plain of Murkhāh. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

* Sin, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. dshām (Prov. xiv. 9; Jer. li. 5), usually translated "trespass-offering" (Lev. v. 6, 15, 16, 18, 19, &c.), sometimes "trespass" (v. 7, 15 b, &c.), once "guiltiness" (Gen. xxvi. 10), once "offering for sin" (Is. liii. 10). The kindred verb dshām is usually translated "to be guilty" (Lev. iv. 13, 22, 27, &c.), sometimes "to trespass" (v. 19, &c.), &c. The kindred noun ash-māh is also rendered "sin" (Lev. iv. 3; 2 Chr. xxviii. 10; Ps. lxxix. 5 [Heb. 6]; Am. viii. 14), often "trespass" (Lev. vi. 5 margin [v. 24 Heb., text "trespass-offering"], xxii. 16, &c.). (SIN-OFFERING.)—2. Heb. hēt or chéf (xix. 17, xx. 20; Num. xxvii. 3, and often), once translated "fault" (Gen. xli. 9, once "punishment of sin" (Lam. iii. 39), &c. The kindred hāt or chātā is the common verb rendered "to sin" (Gen. xxxix. 9; Ex. ix. 27, &c., &c.), in the participle "sinner" (Prov. xi. 31, xiii. 22, &c.), rarely translated "to offend" (Gen. xx. 9, xl. 1, &c.), "to bear the blame" (xliii. 9, xlv. 32), &c. The kindred noun hātāh or chātāh is often rendered "sin" (iv. 7, xviii. 20, xxxi. 36; Ps. xxv. 7, 18, &c.), but oftener "SIN-OFFERING" in Lev., Num., Ez. xl–xlvi., &c.; another, hātāh or chātāh, is translated "sin" (Gen. xx. 9; Ex. xxxii. 21, 30, 31; 2 K. xvii. 21; Ps. xxxii. 1, cix. 7), once "sin-offering" (xl. 6, Heb. 7); another, hātāh or chātāh, is translated "sin" (Ex. xxxiv. 7; Is. v. 18), once "sinful" (Am. ix. 8), once "sin-offering" (Ez. vi. 17); hātā or chātā is rendered "sinner" (Gen. xlii. 13; Ps. i. 1, 5, &c.), once "offender" (1 K. i. 21).—3. Heb. āvōn (1 K. xvii. 18), translated "iniquity" more than 200 times (Gen. xv. 16, xix. 15, &c., &c.), sometimes translated "punishment of iniquity" (Lev. xxvi. 41, 43; Ez. xiv. 10 a, &c.), or simply "punishment" (Gen. iv. 13; Ez. xiv. 10 b, c, &c.), "mischief" (2 K. vii. 9),

&c.—4. Heb. pēshā' (Prov. x. 12, 19, xxviii. 18), translated "transgression" (Ex. xxiii. 21, xxiv. 7, and more than eighty other places), sometimes "trespass" (Gen. xxxi. 36, l. 17 twice; Ex. xxii. 9 [Heb. 8]; 1 Sam. xxv. 28), once "rebellion" (Job xxxiv. 37). The kindred verb pāshā' is usually rendered "to transgress" (1 K. viii. 50; Ezr. x. 13, &c.), also "to rebel" (2 K. iii. 5, 7; Is. i. 2, &c.) or "revolt" (2 K. viii. 20, 22 twice; 2 Chr. xxi. 8, 10 twice), in passive "offended" (Prov. xviii. 19; Orphend), in participle "transgressor" (Ps. xxxvii. 38, &c.).—5. Gr. hamartia almost uniformly (Mat. i. 21, iii. 6, and about 170 other places) once "sinful" (Rom. viii. 3 a), once "OFFENCE" (2 Cor. xi. 7). The kindred hamartēma is also translated "sin" (Mk. iii. 28, iv. 12; Rom. iii. 25; 1 Cor. vi. 18); the verb hamartanō is usually translated "to sin" (Mat. xviii. 21, xxvii. 4, &c.), sometimes "to trespass" (xviii. 15; Lk. xvii. 3, 4), once "to OFFEND" (Acts xxv. 8); its compound proamartanō is translated "to sin already" (2 Cor. xii. 21), or "sin heretofore" (xiii. 2); hamartōlos is usually translated "sinner" (Mat. ix. 10, 11, 13, and about forty other places), sometimes "sinful" (Mk. viii. 38; Lk. v. 8, xxiv. 7; Rom. vii. 1, 31); the compound anamartēlos (Jn. viii. 7 only) is translated "that is without sin."—6. Gr. paraptōma (Eph. i. 7, ii. 5; Col. ii. 13 a), oftener translated "trespass" (Mat. vi. 14, 15 twice, &c.), "OFFENCE" (Rom. v. 15–20), &c. The kindred verb parapiptō (Heb. vi. 6 only) is translated "to fall away."—Among other Greek words of related significations used in the N. T. are—anomia, twelve times translated "iniquity" (Mat. vi. 23; Rom. iv. 7, &c.), once "unrighteousness" (2 Cor. vi. 14), found twice in 1 Jn. ii. 4, the first time with its verb (poiei = does or commits) translated "transgresseth the law" (more literally, does lawlessness), the second time (following "is") translated "transgression of the law"; the kindred adjective anomos rendered "lawless" (1 Tim. i. 9), "without law" (1 Cor. ix. 21 four times), "unlawful" (2 Pet. ii. 8), "wicked" (Acts ii. 23; 2 Th. ii. 8), "transgressors" (as a plural noun, Mk. xv. 28; Lk. xxii. 37); the kindred adverb anōnās (twice in Rom. ii. 12 only), translated "without law"; the verb parabainō translated "to transgress" (Mat. xv. 2, 3; 2 Jn. 9), also "by transgression fell" (Acts i. 25); its kindred noun parabasis, rendered "transgression" (Rom. iv. 15, v. 14; Gal. iii. 19; 1 Tim. ii. 14; Heb. ii. 2, ix. 15), once "breaking" (Rom. ii. 23); and the kindred parabolas, rendered "transgressor" (Gal. ii. 18; Jas. ii. 9, 11), translated in Rom. ii. 25 "breaker," and in ver. 27 "who dost transgress."—The two great subjects of the BIBLE are the sin of MAN and the SALVATION provided by God. Sin is thus defined: "Whosoever committeth sin, transgresseth also the LAW; for sin is the transgression of the law" (1 Jn. iii. 14). And again: "All unrighteousness is sin" (v. 17). The origin and universality of sin are thus stated: "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that [margin 'in whom'] all have sinned" (Rom. v. 12). The punishment of sin and the salvation of the Gospel are contrasted in Rom. vi. 23: "The wages of sin is DEATH; but the gift of God is ETERNAL LIFE, through JESUS CHRIST our Lord."—The various possible theories as to the origin of human sinfulness are thus given by Prof. J. Haven (in B. S. xx. 445 ff.): I. "It is supposable that this nature was originally implanted by the Creator." This theory makes Him really the author of sin.—II. "It is supposable that it was acquired in some previous state of being, as consequence of some sinful act on the part of each individual." This seems to have been Origen's view, and has been advocated by Dr. Julius Müller of Germany, and Edward Beecher, D. D., of this country.—III. "It is supposable that it is derived from a sinful ancestry, in whose loss of innocence their whole posterity is involved." In this view the great body of those who adopt the Christian system agree, all admitting the fact of a connection between ADAM and his posterity in respect to sin, but differing as to the nature of this connection. Prof. Haven thus states the subordinate theories:—"a. That of the generic unity of the race, as virtually one with Adam, existing in him, sinning in him—his sin their sin." This theory is closely related to the realism of Plato and the Platonian Philosophy. It was held by Augustine and other Latin Fathers, in a modified form by President Edwards, and has some prominent advocates at the present day. "b. The theory of the constructive unity of the race with Adam, as its federal head and representative, by virtue of a special covenant made with him to that effect." This is supposed to be the prevalent view among the "Old School" Presbyterians in this country. "c. The view which represents that depravity as resulting simply from the laws of natural descent, the child inheriting from the parent a vitiated and corrupt nature, prone to evil, in consequence of which he comes to sin as soon as he comes to moral agency. This nature, derived from Adam through successive generations, is the consequence of his original apostasy." This is probably the view most prevalent now among "New England theologians," who likewise hold that this depravity of nature is not in itself culpable. Those who advocate the theories a and b hold that this depravity of nature (commonly called original sin) is in itself culpable or blameworthy.—The theories in respect to the relation of sin to the will and purpose of God, Prof. Haven thus classifies:—I. The theory that God cannot entirely prevent sin has two possible forms: a. That He cannot entirely prevent it in any system. This virtually denies God's omnipotence. b. That He cannot entirely prevent it in a moral system, i. e. in a system which embraces free moral agents. II. The theory that for some reason God does not choose to prevent the sin which actually exists. This may be—a. Because the existence of sin is in itself desirable. b. Because it is the necessary means of the greatest good. c. Because it can be overruled to good. d. Because this permission of sin, under the present checks and counteractions, will invoke less evil than His absolute prevention of it; in other words, because He saw that, all things considered, it was better to permit sin, under its present restrictions, than to do more than He is doing to prevent it. This last theory is the one advocated by Prof. Haven in the article above mentioned. It does not fall within the plan of the present work to discuss these important subjects at length; for the details and the advocacy of particular theories the reader must be referred to the essays, sermons, and systematic treatises of theologians. Sin-offering (Heb. hattāth or chattāth). The sin-offering among the Jews was the sacrifice, in which the ideas of PROPITIATION and of ATONEMENT for sin were most distinctly marked. It is first directly enjoined in Lev. iv., whereas in chs. i.–iii. the burnt-offering, meat-offering, and peace-offering are taken for granted, and the object of the Law is to regulate, not to enjoin, the presentation of them to the Lord. Nor is the word applied to any sacrifice in ante-Mosaic times. It is, therefore, peculiarly a sacrifice of the Law. The idea of propitiation was no doubt latent in earlier sacrifices, but it was taught clearly and distinctly in the Levitical sin-offering. The ceremonial is described in Lev. iv. and vi. The animal, a young bullock for the priest or congregation, a male kid or lamb for a ruler, a female kid or lamb for a private person, in all cases without blemish, was brought by the sacrificer to the altar of sacrifice; his hand was laid on its head; of the blood of the slain victim, some was then sprinkled seven times before the veil of the sanctuary, some put on the horns of the altar of incense, and the rest poured at the foot of the altar of sacrifice; the fat was then burnt on the altar; the remainder of the body, if the offering were of the priest, or of the whole congregation, was carried out of the camp to a "clean place," and there burnt; but if the offering were of an individual, the flesh might be eaten by the priests alone in the holy place as "most holy."—The Trespass-offering (Heb. ḥasham) is closely connected with the sin-offering in Leviticus, but clearly distinguished from it, being in some cases offered with it as a distinct part of the same sacrifice, e. g. in the cleansing of the leper (Lev. xiv.). The victim was in each case to be a ram (v. 14–vi. 7, vii. 1–7). At the time of offering, in all cases of damage to any holy thing or to any man, restitution was made with the addition of one-fifth to the principal; the blood was sprinkled round about on the altar, as in the burnt-offering; the fat burnt, and flesh disposed of as in the sin-offering. The distinction of ceremonial clearly indicates a difference in the idea of the two sacrifices. The nature of that difference is still a subject of great controversy. So far as the derivation of the two Hebrew words goes, there appears to be more of reference to general and actual sin in the former, to special cases of negligence in the latter. In one important passage (v. 1–13) the sacrifice is called first a "trespass-offering" (ver. 6), and then a "sin-offering" (ver. 7, 9, 11, 12); but from the nature of the victims in ver. 6 and the formal introduction in ver. 14 we may conclude that "trespass-offering" is not here used in its technical sense, and that the passage is to be referred to the sin-offering only. The sin-offerings were—(A.) Regular. (1.) For the whole people, at the New Moon, Passover, Pentecost, Feast of Trumpets, and Feast of Tabernacles (Num. xxviii. 15–xxix. 38); besides the solemn offering of the two goats on the Great Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi.). (2.) For the priests and Levites at their consecration (Ex. xxix. 10–14, 36); besides the yearly sin-offering (a bullock) for the high-priest on the Great Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi.). (B.) Special. (1.) For any sin of "ignorance" (iv.). (2.) For refusal to bear witness (v. 1). (3.) For ceremonial defilement not wilfully contracted (v. 2, 3, xii. 6–8, xiv. 14, 31, xv. 15, 30; Num. vi. 6–11, 16). (4.) For the breach of a rash oath (Lev. v. 4).—The trespass-offerings were always special, as—(1.) For sacrilege "in ignorance" (v. 15, 16). (2.) For ignorant transgression (v. 17–19). (3.) For fraud, suppression of the truth, or perjury (vi. 1–6). (4.) For rape of a betrothed slave (xix. 20, 21). (5.) At the purification of the leper (xiv. 12), and the polluted Nazarite (Num. vi. 12), offered with the sin-offering.—From this enumeration it will be clear that the two classes of sacrifices, although distinct, touch closely upon each other, as especially the special sin-offerings, and the trespass-offerings.

It is also evident that the sin-offering was the only regular and general recognition of sin in the abstract, and accordingly was far more solemn and symbolical in its ceremonial; the trespass-offering was confined to special cases, most of which related to the doing of some material damage, either to the holy things or to man, except in (5.), where the trespass-offering is united with the sin-offering. Josephus declares that the sin-offering is presented by those "who fall into sin in ignorance," and the trespass-offering by "one who has sinned and is conscious of his sin, but has no one to convict him thereof." Mr. Barry, original author of this article, draws the following conclusions:—(a.) That the sin-offering was far the more solemn and comprehensive of the two sacrifices. (b.) That the sin-offering looked more to the guilt of the sin done, irrespective of its consequences, while the trespass-offering looked to the evil consequences of sin, either against the service of God, or against man, and to the duty of atonement as far as atonement was possible. (c.) That in the sin-offering especially we find symbolized the acknowledgment of sinfulness as inherent in man, and of the need of expiation by sacrifice to renew the broken covenant between man and God. Rev. I. Jennings (in Kitto) says: "The sin-offering holds up sin as guilt needing expiation; the trespass-offering as robbery demanding compensation."—There is one other question of some interest, as to the nature of the sins for which either sacrifice could be offered. It is seen at once that in the Law of Leviticus, most of them, which are not purely ceremonial, are called sins of "ignorance" (see Heb. ix. 7); and in Num. xv. 30, it is expressly said that while such sins can be atoned for by offerings, "the soul that doeth aught presumptuously" (Heb. with a high hand) "shall be cut off from among his people." . . . "His iniquity shall be upon him" (compare Heb. x. 26). But there are sufficient indications that the sins here called "of ignorance" are more strictly those of negligence or frailty, repented of by the unpunished offender, as opposed to those of deliberate and unrepentant sin. Some of the sins actually referred to in Lev. iv., v., certainly are not sins of pure ignorance; they are indeed few out of the whole range of sinfulness, but they are real sins.—In considering this subject, it must be remembered that the sacrifices of the Law had a temporal, as well as a spiritual significance and effect. They restored an offender to his place in the commonwealth of Israel; they were therefore an atonement to the King of Israel for the infringement of His Law. ATONEMENT, DAY OF; LEPROSY, &c.

Sin'al (Heb. any thing full of rock-fissures or cliffs, jagged, or perhaps dedicated to the moon, Fii.; probably fr. Heb. seneh = thornbush, i. e. mountain of the thorn, Stl.; see Btsh 1). Nearly in the centre of the peninsula which stretches between the horns of the Red Sea lies a wedge of granite, greenstone, and porphyry rocks rising to between 8,000 and 9,000 feet above the sea. Its shape resembles a scalene triangle, with a crescent cut from its northern or longer side, on which border Russegger's map gives a broad skirting tract of old red sandstone, reaching nearly from gulf to gulf, and traversed by a few ridges, chiefly of tertiary formation, running nearly N.W. and S.E. On the southwestern side of this triangle, a wide alluvial plain—narrowing, however, toward the N.—lines the coast of the Gulf of Suez, whilst that on the eastern or

'Akabah coast is so narrow as almost to disappear. Between these alluvial edges and the granitic mass a strip of the same sandstone is interposed, the two strips converging at Ras Mohammed, the southern promontory of the whole. This nucleus of plutonic rocks is said to bear no trace of volcanic action since the original upheaval of its masses. It has been arranged in three chief masses as follows:—1. The northwestern cluster above Wady Feiran; its greatest relief found in the five-peaked ridge of Serbâl—the most magnificent mountain of the peninsula—at a height of 6,842 feet above the sea. 2. The eastern and central one; its highest point the Jebel Kâtherin, at a height of 8,063 (Rüppell) to 8,168 (Russegger) feet, and including the Jebel Mûsa, the height of which is variously set at 6,796, 7,033, and 7,097 feet. 3. The southeastern one, closely connected, however, with 2: its highest point, Um Shaumer, being that also of the whole. (See map, under WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING).—A question arises as to the relation of the names Horeb and Sinai. The latter name first occurs as that of the limit on the further side from Egypt of the wilderness of SIN (Ex. xvi. 1), and again (xix. 1, 2) as the "wilderness" or "desert of Sinai," before Mount Sinai is actually spoken of in ver. 11. But the name "Horeb" is, on the rebuke of the people by God for their sin in making the golden calf, reintroduced into the Sinaitic narrative (xxxiii. 6), having been previously most recently used in the story of the murmuring at Rephidim (xvii. 6), and earlier to denote the place of the appearance of God in the "burning bush" (iii. 1). "Horeb" properly signifies ground left dry by water draining off, and, strictly taken, may probably be (so Mr. Hayman, original author of this article) a dry plain, valley, or bed of a wady near the mountain; yet Mount Horeb, on the "vast green plain" of which was doubtless excellent pasture, may mean the mountain viewed in reference thereto, or its side abutting thereon. The mention of Horeb in later books (e. g. 1 K. viii. 9, xix. 8) seems to show that it had then become the designation of the mountain and region generally.<sup>1</sup>—But Sinai is clearly a summit distinctly marked. There are three principal views in regard to its position:—I. That of Lepsius, favored also by Burckhardt, that Serbâl is Sinai, some thirty miles distant westward from the Jebel Mûsa, but close to the Wady Feiran (PARAN) and El-Hesue, which he identifies, as do most authorities, with REPHIDIM, just a mile from the old convent of Fardn. The earliest traditions are in its favor. But there are two main objections to this:—(1.) It is clear, from Ex. xix. 2 (compare xvii. 1), that the interval between Rephidim and Sinai was that of a regular stage of the march. A Sinai within a mile of Rephidim is unsuitable. (2.) There is no plain or wady of any sufficient size near Serbâl to offer camping-ground to so large a host, or perhaps the tenth part of them.—II. The second is that of Ritter, that, allowing Serbâl the reverence of an early sanctuary, the Jebel Mûsa is Sinai, and that the Wady es-Seddyeh

<sup>1</sup> "The most obvious and common explanation is to regard one (Sinai) as the general name for the whole cluster, and the other (Horeb) as designating a particular mountain; much as the same names are employed by the Christians at the present day. So, too, the Arabs now apply the name Jebel el-Tûr to the whole central granitic region; while the different mountains of which it is composed are called Jebel Kâtherin, Jebel Mûsa, &c. On looking at the subject during our sojourn at the convent, I was led to a similar conclusion: applying the names, however, differently, and regarding Horeb as the general name, and Sinai as the particular one" (Rbn. i. 190).

(Sebâ'tiyeh, Rbn.), which its southeastern or highest summit overhangs, is the spot where the people camped before the mount; but the second objection to Serbâl applies (so Mr. Hayman, with Robinson, Porter [in Kitto], &c.) almost in equal force to this —the want of space below.*—III. The third is that of Robinson, that the modern Horeb of the monks—viz. the northwestern and lower face of the Jebel Mûsa, crowned with a range of magnificent cliffs, the highest point called Ras Sasâfeh, or Sufâsfeh, as spelt by Robinson—overlooking the plain er-Râhah, is the scene of the giving of the Law, and that peak the mountain into which Moses ascended. Lepsius objects, but without much force (since he himself climbed it), that the peak Sasâfeh is nearly inaccessible. It is more to the purpose to observe that the whole Jebel Mûsa is, comparatively with adjacent mountains, insignificant. The conjunction of mountain with plain is the greatest feature of this site; in choosing it, we lose in the mountain, as compared with Serbâl, but we gain in the plain, of which Serbâl has nothing. Yet the view from the plain appears by no means wanting in features of majesty and awe. In this long retiring sweep of er-Râhah the people could "remove and stand afar off;" for it extends into the lateral valleys, and so joins the Wady es-Sheikh.<sup>2</sup>—It may be added that, supposing Wady Taiyibeh to have been the encampment "by the sea," as stated in Num. xxxiii. 10, three routes opened there before the Israelites (Six 2); the most southerly one down the plain el-Ak'a to Tûr; the most northerly by the Serbâl el-Khadem; and the middle one by Wady Feirân, by which they would pass the foot of Serbâl, which, therefore, in this case alone could possibly be Sinai. The middle route aforesaid from Wady Taiyibeh reaches the Wady Feirân through what is called the Wady Mokatteb, or "written valley," from the inscriptions on the rocks which line it, generally considered to have been the work of Christian hands.

* Sin-cere [-seer] (fr. L.), the A.V. translation of —1. Gr. adolos, literally guileless, hence unadulterated, pure, used in N. T. tropically only in the phrase "sincere milk," i. e. pure doctrine or spiritual nourishment (1 Pet. ii. 2).—2. Gr. eiktrineia, literally judged of in sunlight, hence pure, sincere, Rbn., N. T. Lex. (Phil. i. 10), also translated "pure" (2 Pet. iii. 1). The kindred noun eiktrineia is uniformly translated "sincerity" (1 Cor. v. 8; 2 Cor. i. 12, ii. 17).

* Sing'ing. HYMN; MUSIC; POETRY, HEBREW.

Sin'm (Heb., see below), a people noticed in Is. xlix. 12, as living at the extremity of the known world, either in the South or East. The majority of the early interpreters adopted the former view, but the LXX., in giving Persai (= Persians), favors the latter, and the weight of modern authority is thrown into the same scale, the name being identified by Gesenius, Hitzig, Knobel, Fürst, J. A. Alex-

<sup>2</sup> But Rev. W. Arthur (in Fbn.) says, "It takes forty-five minutes' walking down-hill to pace the length of Sebâ'tiyeh (three miles, so Rev. G. S. Drew). The breadth we made to be about a mile and three-quarters." He makes the capacity of this valley greater than that of er-Râhah. From it "every eye would look on one object, and Jebel Mûsa, covered with cloud and fire, would impress the whole concourse. . . . The eastern boundary of Sebâ'tiyeh is not, as with the sides of er-Râhah, rock-wall, but a range of hills, with practicable ascent, and several lateral valleys, up which the people could retire and 'stand afar off,' and yet see the mount." The great Wady es-Sheikh is "a continuation of the line of the valley."

<sup>3</sup> The convent, represented in the cut, and generally called the Convent of St. Catharine, stands in the valley of Shu'eib, a wild ravine which runs up S. E. by S. from the plain er-Râhah. It is 245 French feet long by 204 broad, enclosed by high walls of granite blocks, and strengthened with small towers in various parts. The main body of the building stands on the slope of the western mountain, which is the northern part of Jebel Mûsa. It is said to have been established by the Emperor Justinian, A. D. 527. The mountains on each side tower to the height of 1,000 feet above the valley. The number of resident monks, once more than 400, is now from 20 to 30 (Rbn. i. 92, 93, 134, 130). In the library of this convent, Tischendorf found in 1859 the celebrated Codex Sinaiticus. NEW TESTAMENT, I. § 28.

ander, &c., with the classical Sina, the inhabitants of the southern part of China. No locality in the South equally commends itself to the judgment (so Mr. Bevan); SIN or Pelusium (which Bochart suggests) being too near, and SYENE having a well-known Hebrew name. There is no obvious improbability in the name of the Sinæ being known to the inhabitants of Western Asia in the age of Isaiah; for though it is not mentioned by the Greek geographer until the age of Ptolemy, it is certain that an inland commercial route connected the extreme E. with the W. at a very early period. (SILK.) The Sinæ attained an independent position in Western China as early as the eighth century B. C., and in the third century B. C. established their sway under the dynasty of Tsin over the whole of the empire. The Rabbinical name of China, Tsin, as well as "China" itself, was derived from this dynasty.

Sin'ite (fr. Heb., see below and SIN 1), the, the collective name of a tribe of Canaanites (Gen. x. 17; 1 Chr. i. 15), whose position is to be sought for in the northern part of the LEBANON district. Various localities in that district bear some resemblance to the name, particularly Sinna, a mountain fortress mentioned by Strabo; Sinum or Sini, the ruins of which existed in the time of Jerome; Syn, a village mentioned in the fifteenth century as near the River Arca; and Dunniyeh, a district near Tripolis. The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan give Orthosia (ORTHOSIAS), a town on the coast N. E. of Tripolis.

Sin'on (Heb. elevated, lofty, Ges.; see No. 2), Mount. 1. One of the various ancient names of Mount HERMON (Deut. iv. 48 only).—2. The Greek form of ZION (1 Mc. iv. 37, 60, v. 54, vi. 48, 62, vii. 33, x. 11, xiv. 27; Heb. xii. 22; Rev. xiv. 1).

Sip'pal (Heb.) = SAPH, one of the sons of RAPHA, or "the giant;" slain by Sibbechai at Gezer (1 Chr. xx. 4). GIANTS.

Sir'ach [-rak] (L. fr. Heb.), the father of the "JESUS THE SON OF SIRACH" who wrote the Hebrew original of ECCLÉSIASTICUS.

Sir'rah (Heb. a going off or back, Ges.), the Well off; the spot from which Abner was recalled by JOAB to his death at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 26 only). A spring and reservoir on the western side of the ancient northern road, about one mile out of Hebron, called Ain Sara, may be a relic of the well of Sirah.

Sir'i-on (fr. Heb. = breastplate, Ges.), one of the various names of Mount HERMON, that by which it was known to the Zidonians (Deut. iii. 9; Ps. xxix. 6).

Sis'a-mal, or Sis'am'a-l (Heb. a distinguished one, sc. is Jah, Fii.), a descendant of Sheshan in the line of Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 40).

Sis'e-ra (Heb. battle-array, Ges.), captain of the army of JABIN 2, king of Canaan, who reigned in HAZOR 1. He himself resided in HAROSHETH of the Gentiles. He was defeated by DEBORAH 2 and BARAK at the waters of MEGIDDO or the River KISHON, and killed by JAEI the wife of HEBER 6 the KENITE in her TENT (Judg. iv., v.; 1 Sam. xii. 9; Ps. lxxxiii. 9; CHARIOT; MANTLE; NAIL, II. 1). The great Rabbi Akiba († A. D. 135), whose father was a Syrian proselyte of justice, is said to have been descended from Sisera.—2. Ancestor of certain NETHINIM who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 53; Neh. vii. 55). The name doubtless tells of

* Sis'ter (Heb. áhóth or áchóth; Gr. adelphè) is used to denote not only one who is a daughter of the same parents (Gen. iv. 22; Lk. x. 39, 40, &c.) or of the same parent (Lev. xviii. 9, 11, &c.) with another, but more loosely a kinswoman or female relative (Gen. xxiv. 59, 60, &c.), one who is intimately connected or endeared (Prov. vii. 4; Mat. xii. 50, &c.), one of the same faith (Rom. xvi. 1, &c.). Compare BROTHER.

Sit'mah (Heb. "hated," A. V. margin; accusation, Ges.), the second of the two wells dug by ISAAC in the valley of GERAR, the possession of which the herdmen of the valley disputed with him (Gen. xxvi. 21). Rowlands (in Fairbairn) suppose it may have been at es-Sinnah, a spot about twelve or fifteen miles S. E. from Khirbel el-Jerár (GERAR ?).

Sí'van. MONTH.

* Skin. BADGER-SKINS; LEATHER, &c.

* Sky. AIR; FIRMAMENT; HEAVEN, &c.

Slave (fr. L.). The word "slave" is found only twice in the A. V., once (Jer. ii. 14) in the phrase "home-born slave," the word being supplied by the translators in parallelism to "SERVANT" (Heb. 'ebed) in the preceding clause; and in Rev. xviii. 13, where it is the representative of the Gr. pl. sómata (literally, as in margin, "bodies"), mentioned among the articles of merchandise of the mystical Babylon. Indeed the term "slave," however appropriate to one held in servitude under the Greek and Roman law, is too strong to be applied to the "SERVANT" or "bondman" of the Hebrews. The Mosaic Law, says Saalschütz (translated by Prof. E. P. Barrows, in B. S. xix. 33), "knows nothing of slavery in the sense of considering freeman and slave as beings holding an opposite relation to each other in respect to their dignity as men, or on a scale of civil and social rights. The Hebrew language has no word for stigmatizing by a degrading appellation one part of those who owe service, and distinguishing them from the rest as 'slaves,' but only one term for all who are under obligation to render service to others. For males this is 'ebed (SERVANT 4) = servant or man-servant, properly laborer; for females shiph'dah or shipch'dah and ánah = maid-servant, maid." These two terms for maid-servant or maid are both applied to HAGAR (Gen. xvi. 1 ff., xxi. 10, 12, 13, &c.), BILHAN and ZILPAH (xxix. 24, 29, xxx. 3, xxxi. 33, &c.), &c., and each is translated in the A. V. "maid-servant," "bondswoman," "maid," "handmaid," and "bondmaid," the former being also translated "woman-servant," "maiden," "servant," and "wench." "Among a people who occupied themselves with agriculture," continues Saalschütz, "whose lawgiver, Moses, and whose kings, Saul and David, went immediately from the herd and from the plough to their high vocation, there could be nothing degrading in an appellation taken from 'labor.' 'Servant of God' is also applied to Moses and the pious as a title of honor. The laws, moreover, respecting servants protect in every regard their dignity as men and their feelings. They by no means surrender these to the arbitrary will of the masters, as in other ancient and modern states in which slavery and thralldom have prevailed." "There was an enactment," says W. Lindsay, D. D. (in Fairbairn), "which shows that the spirit of the whole system was of a benignant character, and which must of itself have tended to prevent harshness even in the case of a cruel master. . . . When a servant escaped from his master, the law presumed that he had good reason for fleeing, and therefore forbade any one on whose protection he might throw himself to deliver him up to his master. He was to remain with the person in whose house he had taken refuge (Deut. xxiii. 15, 16).”—The following parts I. and II. are abridged from the original article by Mr. Bevan.—I. Hebrew slaves. 1. The circumstances under which a Hebrew might be reduced to servitude were—(1.) poverty; (2.) the commission of theft; and (3.) the exercise of paternal authority. In the first case, a man who had mortgaged his property, and was unable to support his family, might sell himself to another Hebrew, with a view both to obtain maintenance, and perchance a surplus sufficient to redeem his property (Lev. xxv. 25, 39). It has been debated whether under this law a creditor could seize his debtor and sell him as a slave: the words do not warrant such an inference. (2.) The commission of theft rendered a person liable to servitude, whenever restitution could not be made on the scale prescribed by the Law (Ex. xxii. 1, 3). The thief was bound to work out the value of his restitution money in the service of him on whom the theft had been committed. (PUNISHMENTS.) (3.) The exercise of paternal authority was limited to the sale of a daughter of tender age to be a maid-servant, with the ulterior view of her becoming the concubine of the purchaser (xii. 7; MARRIAGE). 2. The servitude of a Hebrew might be terminated in three ways:—(1.) by the satisfaction or the remission of all claims against him; (2.) by the recurrence of the year of JUBILEE (Lev. xxv. 40); and (3.) the expiration of six years from the time that his servitude commenced (Ex. xxi. 2; Deut. xv. 12; SABBATICAL YEAR). (4.) The Rabbinitists added, by the death of the master without leaving a son, there being no power of claiming the slave on the part of any heir except a son.—If a servant did not desire to avail himself of the opportunity of leaving his service, he was to signify his intention in a formal manner before the judges (or more exactly, at the place of judgment), and then the master was to take him to the door-post, and to bore his ear through with an awl (Ex. xxi. 6), driving the awl into or “unto the door” (Deut. xv. 17), and thus fixing the servant to it. A servant who had submitted to this operation remained, according to the words of the Law, a servant “for ever” (Ex. xxi. 6). These words are, however, interpreted by Josephus and by the Rabbinitists as meaning until the year of Jubilee. 3. The condition of a Hebrew servant was by no means intolerable. His master was admonished to treat him, not “as a bondservant, but as an hired servant and as a sojourner,” and “not to rule over him with rigor” (Lev. xxv. 39, 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to “let him go away empty,” but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his winepress (Deut. xv. 13, 14).—In the event of a Hebrew becoming the servant of a “STRANGER,” meaning a non-Hebrew, the servitude could be terminated only in two ways, viz. by the arrival of the year of Jubilee, or by the repayment to the master of the purchase-money paid for the servant, after deducting a sum for the value of his services proportioned to the length of his servitude (Lev. xxv. 47–55).—A Hebrew woman might enter into voluntary servitude on the score of poverty, and in this case she was entitled to her freedom after six years' service, together with her usual gratuity at leaving, just as in the case of a man (Deut. xv. 12, 13).—Thus far we have seen little that is objectionable in the condition of Hebrew servants. In respect to MARRIAGE there were some peculiarities which, to our ideas, would be regarded as hardships. A master might, e. g., give a wife to a Hebrew servant for the time of his servitude, the wife being in this case not only a slave but a non-Hebrew. Should he leave when his term has expired, his wife and children would remain the absolute property of the master (Ex. xxi. 4, 5). Again, a father might sell his young daughter to a Hebrew, with a view of his either marrying her himself, or giving her to his son (7–9). It diminishes the apparent harshness of this proceeding if we look on the purchase-money as in the light of a dowry given, as was not unusual, to the parents of the bride; still more, if we accept the Rabbinical view that the consent of the maid was required before the marriage could take place. The position of a maiden thus sold by her father was subject to the following regulations:—(1.) She could not “go out as the men-servants do,” i. e. she could not leave at the termination of six years, or in the year of Jubilee, if her master was willing to fulfil the object for which he had purchased her. (2.) Should he not wish to marry her, he should call upon her friends to procure her release by the repayment of the purchase-money. (3.) If he betrothed her to his son, he was bound to make such provision for her as he would for one of his own daughters. (4.) If either he or his son, having married her, took a second wife, it should not be to the prejudice of the first. (5.) If neither of the three first specified alternatives took place, the maid was entitled to immediate and gratuitous liberty (xvi. 7–11).—The custom of reducing Hebrews to servitude appears to have fallen into disuse subsequently to the Babylonish Captivity (Neh. v. 5). Vast numbers of Hebrews were reduced to slavery as war-captives at different periods by the Phenicians (Joel iii. 6), the Philistines (ib.; Am. i. 6), the Syrians (1 Mc. iii. 41; 2 Mc. viii. 11), the Egyptians (Jos. xii. 2, § 3), and, above all, by the Romans (Jos. B. J. vi. 9, § 3).—II. Non-Hebrew Slaves. 1. The majority of Non-Hebrew slaves were war-captives, either of the Canaanites who had survived the general extermination of their race under Joshua, or such as were conquered from the other surrounding nations (Num. xxxi. 26 ff.). Besides these, many were obtained by purchase from foreign slave-dealers (Lev. xxv. 44, 45); and others may have been resident foreigners who were reduced to this state either by poverty or crime. The children of slaves remained slaves, being the class described as “born in the house” (Gen. xiv. 14, xvii. 12; Eccl. ii. 7), and hence the number was likely to increase as time went on. The average value of a slave appears to have been thirty shekels (Ex. xxi. 32). 2. That the slave might be manumitted, appears from Ex. xxi. 26, 27, and Lev. xix. 20. As to the methods by which this might be effected, we are told nothing in the Bible; but the Rabbinitists specify the following four methods:—(1.) redemption by a money payment, (2.) a bill or ticket of freedom, (3.) testamentary disposition, or, (4.) any act that implied manumission, such as making a slave one's heir. 3. The slave is described as the “possession” of his master, apparently with a special reference to the power which the latter had of disposing of him to his heirs as he would any other article of personal property (Lev. xxv. 45, 46); also as his master's "money" (Ex. xxi. 21), i. e. as representing a certain money value. But provision was made for the protection of his person (Lev. xxiv. 17, 22; Ex. xxi. 20). A minor personal injury, such as the loss of an eye or a tooth, was to be recompensed by giving the servant his liberty (ver. 26, 27). The position of the slave in regard to religious privileges was favorable. He was to be circumcised (Gen. xvii. 12), and hence was entitled to partake of the Paschal sacrifice (Ex. xii. 44), as well as of the other religious festivals (Deut. xii. 12, 18, xvi. 11, 14). The occupations of slaves were of a menial character, as implied in Lev. xxv. 39, consisting partly in the work of the house, and partly in personal attendance on the master. (CANAAN; ELIEZER 1; LAW OF MOSES; MEN-STEALERS; MILL; NETHINIM; NOAH; NURSE; WAGES.)—III. Egyptian bondage. The Israelites were grievously oppressed by PHARAOH 3, 4, and the Egyptians, but were delivered from "the house of bondage" by the direct interposition of JEHOVAH. The Egyptians had domestic servants who may have been slaves (Ex. ix. 14, 20, 21, xi. 5). (JOSEPH 1.) But the Israelites were not dispersed among the families of Egypt: they formed a special community in the land of GOSHEN (Gen. xli. 34; Ex. viii. 22, &c.); had "flocks and herds and very much cattle" (xii. 32, 38); preserved their divisions of tribes, and families, and their internal organization (v. 19, vi. 14 ff., xii. 19, 21, &c.); had to a considerable degree the disposal of their time (ii. 7-9, iv. 27-31, xii. 6, &c.); were all armed (xxxii. 27), &c. The service required seems to have been exacted from males only, and probably from only a portion of the people at once. As tributaries they probably supplied levies of men, from which the wealth seem to have been exempted (iii. 16, iv. 29, v. 20). The poor were the oppressed; and all the service wherewith they made them serve "was with rigor" (i. 11-14, compare v. 6 ff.).—IV. Grecian slavery in the Homeric or ante-historic age appears to have been comparatively mild, though the condition of women was worse than that of men. Every Greek state, with a few exceptions, had slavery among its institutions; but the condition and treatment of slaves varied greatly in different Greek communities. Athenian legislation protected the personal rights of the slave, gave him, if ill-treated, the privilege of an asylum in certain temples, and promoted his efforts to obtain freedom. The helots or slaves of Sparta, on the other hand, furnish the type of all that is calamitous among the oppressed. They were slaves of the state, apportioned by the state to individuals, but not in full possession, and could not be sold out of Laconia, nor liberated except by the state. They more than once rose in revolt against their masters, at important crises in the history of Sparta, and with much effect thereon. The number of slaves in GREECE is estimated to have been three or four times that of the free population.—V. Roman slavery was perpetual and hereditary. The master possessed the uncontrolled power of life and death over his slave—a power which continued at least till Hadrian's time (A. D. 117). He might, and frequently did, kill, mutilate, and torture his slaves, for any or for no offence, so that slaves were sometimes crucified from mere caprice. He might force them to become prostitutes or gladiators; and instead of the perpetual obligation of the marriage-tie, their temporary unions were formed and dissolved at his command, families and friends were separated, and no obligation existed to provide for their wants in sickness or in health. Yet both law and custom were decidedly favorable to giving freedom to the slave. (ROMAN EMPIRE; ROME.)—VI. Christianity in relation to slavery. The laws which the Lord JESUS CHRIST gave for the government of His KINGDOM were those of universal justice and benevolence, and as such were subversive of every system of oppression and tyranny. The reciprocal duties of masters and servants were, indeed, inculcated, and servants "under the yoke," or slaves of heathens are exhorted to obey their masters (Eph. vi. 5-9; Col. iii. 22, iv. 1; 1 Tim. vi. 1; Tit. ii. 9; 1 Pet. ii. 18). But this argues no approval of the relation; for—(1.) Jesus, in an analogous case (DIVORCE), appeals to the paramount law of nature as superseding such temporary regulations as the hardness of men's hearts had rendered necessary; (2.) St. Paul, while counselling the duties of contentment and submission under the inevitable bondage, inculcates on the slave the duty of adopting all legitimate means of obtaining his freedom (1 Cor. vii. 20, 21). ONESIMUS, according to the concurrent testimony of antiquity, was liberated by PHILEMON. Although the condition of the Roman slaves was no doubt improved under the emperors, the early effects of Christian principles were manifest in mitigating the horrors and bringing about the gradual abolition of slavery. Of the preceding parts, III., V., VI. are abridged from the article in Kitto, by Wm. Wright, LL. D.; IV. is abridged from the article on slavery in the New American Cyclopædia.

**Sleep.* The noun and the verb are not only used literally to denote the slumber or repose of the body (Gen. xxviii. 11; Ps. iv. 8; Mat. i. 24, &c.); but tropically to denote DEATH (Jer. li. 39; Dan. xii. 2; Jn. xi. 11; 1 Cor. xi. 30, xv. 51, &c.), or spiritual torpor, inactivity, &c. (Rom. xiii. 11; Eph. v. 14, &c.).

Slime, the A. V. rendering of the Heb. hêmâr or chêmâr, the hommâr of the Arabs, translated asphaltos by the LXX., and bitumen in the Vulgate. "The varieties of bitumen commonly described are—the liquid oil, naphtha, or in its more impure form, petroleum; the viscid, pitchy bitumen, which passes into the black resinous asphaltum; and the elastic bitumen, or elaterite of the mineralogists, also called mineral caoutchouc." "The liquid varieties become inspissated by exposure, and eventually harden into the solid form, which is asphaltum. The bitumens burn with a flame and thick black smoke, giving out the peculiar odor called bituminous. Some of the impure fluid bitumens, and the solid variety when melted, closely resemble coal-tar" (New American Cyclopædia, article Bitumen). It is first spoken of as used for cement (MORTAR 2) by the builders in the plain of Shinar, or Babylonia (Gen. xi. 3). The bitumen-pits in the vale of Siddim are mentioned in Gen. xiv. 10; and the ark of papyrus in which MOSES was placed was made impervious to water by a coating of bitumen and pitch (Ex. ii. 3). Herodotus tells us of the bitumen found at Is, a town of Babylonia, eight days' journey from Babylon. The captive Eretrians were sent by Darius to collect asphaltum, salt, and oil at Ardericca, a place 210 stadia from Susa, in the district of Cissia. The town of Is (the modern Hîr or Heet = IVAN?) was situated on a stream of the same name, which flowed into the EUPHRATES, and carried down with it the lumps of bitumen, which was used in the building of Babylon. Ammianus Marcellinus tells us that Babylon was built with bitumen by Semiramis. The principal bitumen-pit at Heet, says Mr. Rich, has two sources, and is divided by a wall in the centre, on one side of which bitumen bubbles up, and on the other the oil of naphtha. Sir R. K. Porter observed that "bitumen was chiefly confined by the Chaldean builders to the foundations and lower parts of the edifices, for the purpose of preventing the ill effects of water." The use of bitumen appears to have been confined to the Babylonians, for at Nineveh, Mr. Layard observes, "bitumen and reeds were not employed to cement the layers of bricks, as at Babylon; although both materials are to be found in abundance in the immediate vicinity of the city." The bitumen of the Dead Sea is described by Strabo, Josephus, and Pliny. Strabo gives an account of the volcanic action by which the bottom of the sea was disturbed, and the bitumen thrown to the surface. It was at first liquefied by the heat, and then changed into a thick, viscous substance by the cold water of the sea, on the surface of which it floated in lumps. The Arabs of the neighborhood have perpetuated the story of its formation as given by Strabo. Dr. Thomson tells us that they still call the bitumen-pits by the name bidret hūmmar, which strikingly resembles the Heb. bētrōth hēmār or chēmār (A. V. "slime-pits") of Gen. xiv. 10. The mineral, found now in the "bitumen wells," about three miles W. of Hāsbeiyā, in a stratum varying in thickness from less than five to fifteen feet, "melts readily enough by itself; but then, when cold, it is as brittle as glass. It must be mixed with tar while melting, and in that way it forms a hard, glossy wax, perfectly impervious to water" (Thn. i. 336). (PITCH.) Strabo says that in Babylonia boats were made of wicker-work, and then covered with bitumen to keep out the water. EUPHRATES; NOAH.

Smyrna (L. fr. Gr. = myrrh; said to have been named from the wife of its founder), an important commercial city, situated on a gulf of the Aegean Sea. The Smyrna mentioned in Rev. i. 11 and ii. 8-11, as the seat of one of the seven churches in ASIA, was founded, or at least the design of founding it was entertained, by ALEXANDER THE GREAT soon after the battle of the Granicus. It was situated twenty stades ( $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles) from the ancient Greek city of the same name, which, after a long series of wars, had been taken and sacked by the Lydians under King Alyattes, the rich lands in the neighborhood being for centuries afterward cultivated by the inhabitants, scattered in villages about the country. The date of this destruction of old Smyrna is given by Prof. G. M. Lane (in B. S. xv. 228) as probably between B. C. 580 and 560, by Mr. L. Schmitz (in Smith's Dictionary of Geography) as B. C. 627. The descendants of this population were reunited in the new Smyrna which was built under Antigonus and Lysimachus, after Alexander's death, and soon became a wealthy and important city. In the time of Strabo, the ruins of the Old Smyrna still existed, and were partially inhabited, but the new city was one of the most beautiful in all Asia. The streets were laid out as near as might be at right angles; but an unfortunate oversight of the architect, who forgot to make underground drains to carry off the storm rains, occasioned the flooding of the town with the filth and refuse of the streets. The city had a large public library; a handsome building surrounded with porticoes which served as a museum, and consecrated to Homer, whom the Smyrneans claimed as a countryman; an Odeum; and a temple of the Olympian Jupiter, with whose worship that of the Roman emperors was associated. Olympian games were celebrated here, and excited great interest. Orgiastic rites, both of the mother of the gods and of Bacchus, were also celebrated at Smyrna, and it was usual, at the end of his official year, to present a crown to the priest who superintended the religious ceremonial in honor of Bacchus (compare Rev. ii. 11). Smyrna, under the Romans, was an assize town. The aged Polycarp, a disciple of the Apostle JOHN, and bishop of the Christian Church, suffered martyrdom here, A. D. 166. The city has suffered greatly at various times from earthquakes (A. D. 177, 1846, &c.), fires (one in 1841 destroying 12,000 houses), sieges and captures, the plague, &c. Smyrna, now called Jenir, has long been one of the most flourishing cities of the Turkish empire. It is the seat of a pashalic, and has an extensive trade both by land and sea, with a population estimated at 150,000, viz. 80,000 Turks, 40,000 Greeks, 15,000 Jews, 10,000 Armenians.

ans, and 5,000 Franks (New American Cyclopædia). American Protestant missionaries have labored here with great success for a number of years.

Snail, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. shablul, found only in Ps. lviii. 8, Heb. 9. The rendering "snail" is supported by many of the Jewish Doctors, and is probably correct. The snail or slug was supposed to consume away and die by constantly emitting slime as it crawls along. The Hebrew term would denote either a Limuz, or a Helix, which are particularly noticeable for the slimy track they leave behind them.—2. Heb. hōmet or chōmel, which occurs only as the name of some unclean animal in Lev. xi. 30. The Veneto-Greek and the Rabbinic translate "snail" with the A. V.; the LXX., Vulgate, Gesenius, Fürst, &c., understand some kind of LIZARD; the Arabic versions of Erpenius and Saadias give CHAMELEON. Perhaps some kind of lizard may be intended (so Mr. Houghton).

* Snare (Heb. mōkesh, pah or pach, &c.; Gr. brochos, pagis) = a noose or other contrivance for catching birds, &c. (Job xl. 24; Ps. cxxiv. 7; Prov. vii. 23, &c.), mostly used figuratively to denote a device or stratagem to catch men, something attractive and dangerous, a cause or occasion of destruction, &c. (Ex. x. 7; Judg. viii. 27; Ps. cxix. 110; Lk. xxi. 35; 1 Cor. vii. 35; 1 Tim. iii. 7, &c.). GIN; HUNTING; NET.

Snow. (Heb. sheleg; Chal. ūlag; Gr. chōn). Snow is rarely mentioned as actually falling (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Chr. xi. 22; 1 Mc. xii. 22), but the allusions are so numerous that there can be no doubt as to its being an ordinary occurrence in the winter months (Job vi. 16, ix. 30, xxiv. 19, xxxvii. 6; Ps. lxxviii. 14, cxlvii. 16, cxlviii. 8, &c.). Its color is an image of brilliancy (Dan. vii. 9; Mat. xxviii. 3; Rev. i. 14), of purity (Is. i. 18; Lam. iv. 7), of the blanching effects of leprosy (Ex. iv. 6; Num. xii. 10; 2 K. v. 27). The snow lies deep in the ravines of the highest ridge of LEBANON until the summer is far advanced, and, indeed, never wholly disappears; the summit of Hermon also perpetually glistens with frozen snow. From these sources probably the Jews obtained ice for cooling their beverages in summer (Prov. xxv. 13). The liability to snow must of course vary considerably in a country of such varying altitude as Palestine. At Jerusalem snow often falls to the depth of a foot or more in January and February, but it seldom lies. At Nazareth it falls more frequently and deeply, and it has been observed to fall even in the maritime plain of Joppa and about Carmel. FROST; PALESTINE, Climate; RAIN.

* Snuffers, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. pl. mēzāmnerōth = forceps, snuffers, for lamps, Ges., Fū. (1 K. vii. 50; 2 K. xii. 13 [Heb. 14], xxv. 14; 2 Chr. iv. 22; Jer. lii. 18).—2. Heb. melkēhayim or melkēchayim (Ex. xxxvii. 23), elsewhere translated "tongs" (xxv. 38; Num. iv. 9; 1 K. vii. 49; 2 Chr. iv. 21; Is. vi. 6). Fürst (and so Gesenius substantially) defines the Hebrew thus: "tongs, with which burning coals and stones were caught (Is. vi. 6); especially snuffers, for trimming lamps (Ex. xxxv. 38, xxxvii. 23; Num. iv. 9; 1 K. vii. 49)." CANDLE-STICK; LAMP; SNUFF-DISH.

So (Heb. fr. Egyptian Suech or Seve, a deity represented in the form of a crocodile, Champollion, Ges.). So, king of Egypt, is once mentioned in the Bible. HOSHEA, the last king of Israel, evidently intending to become the vassal of Egypt, sent messengers to him and made no present, as had been the yearly custom, to the king of Assyria (2 K. xvii. 4). The consequence of this step was the imprisonment of Hoshea, the taking of Samaria, and the captivity of the ten tribes. So has been identified by different writers with the first and second kings of the Ethiopian twenty-fifth dynasty, called by Manetho, Sabakōn (Shebek), and Sebichōs (Shebetek). Teharka, or TIRHAKAH, was the third and last king of this dynasty. To these three kings Africanus assigns reigns of 8, 14, 18 years respectively; Eusebius, of 12, 12, and 20 years. Mr. R. S. Poole is disposed to identify him with the first, Shebek, and assign him a reign of twelve years; Gesenius and Fürst make him the second of these kings, and assign him a reign of fourteen years. From Egyptian sources we know nothing more of Shebek (so Mr. Poole) than that he conquered and put to death Bocchoris, the sole king of the twenty-fourth dynasty, and that he continued the monumental works of the Egyptian kings. The standard inscription of Sargon in his palace at Khorsabad states, according to M. Oppert, that after the capture of Samaria, Hanon, king of Gaza, and Sebech (Shebek or Shebetek?), sultan of Egypt, met the king of Assyria in battle at Rapih (Raphia), and were defeated. Sebech disappeared, but Hanon was captured.

Soap, the A. V. translation of Heb. bōrith (Jer. ii. 22; Mal. iii. 2), which is a general term for any substance of cleansing qualities. As, however, it appears in Jer. ii. 22, in contradistinction to neither (A. V. "NITRE"), i. e. natron, or mineral alkali, it is fair to infer that bōrith refers to vegetable alkali, or some kind of potash, which forms one of the usual ingredients in our soap. The ancients used this alkali with oil for washing and scouring garments instead of soap, also in refining metals (Gesenius). The soap familiar to us was unknown to the Egyptians and probably to the ancients generally. Pliny ascribes the invention of it to the Gauls, from whom and from the Germans the Romans learned how to make it. Numerous plants, capable of yielding alkalies, exist in Palestine and the surrounding countries; one named Hubeibeh (the Sal-sola Kali of botanists) found near the Dead Sea, the ashes of which are called el-Kuli from their strong alkaline properties; the Ajram, found near Sinai, which, when pounded, serves as a substitute for soap; the giloo, or "soap-plant" of Egypt; the heath, the ashes of which are used in the manufacture of soap at Joppa; the Saponaria officinalis (common soap-wort), and the Mesembryanthemum nodiflorum (allied to the common ice-plant), both possessing alkaline properties, and growing in Palestine, &c.

So'choh (Heb. branches, Ges.) = SOCHOH; probably, though not certainly, SOCOH 1 (1 K. iv. 10).

Socoh (fr. Heb. = SOCHOH), the name of two towns in the tribe of Judah. 1. In the lowland district or Shepheldah, a member of the same group with JARMUTH, AZEKAH, SHAAARAIM, &c. (Josh. xv. 35); the place at which the Philistines were gathered before the combat of David and Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 1); fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 7); taken by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz (xxviii. 18); = SHOCO, SHOCHO, SHOCHOR; probably = SOCHOH; perhaps = SOCHO. (ELAH, VALLEY OF; EPHES-DAMMIM.) In the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. "Soccho") it bore the name of Socchoth, and lay between eight and nine Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, on the road to Jerusalem. Dr.

Robinson identified Socoh with the ruins of esh-Shuweikeh, in the western part of the mountains of Judah, about one mile N. of the track from Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis) to Jerusalem, between seven and eight English miles from the former, and about fifteen S. W. from the latter. From this village probably came "Antigonus of Soco," who lived about the commencement of the third century B. C. (SADDUCEES; SCRIBES).—2. In the mountain district; named with ANAB, JATTIR, &c. (Josh. xv. 48); identified by Dr. Robinson with the ruin esh-Shuweikeh in the Wady el-Khatil, about ten miles S. W. of Hebron.

* Sod' er, or Sol'der. LEAD.

Sod'i (Heb. confidant of Jehovah, Ges.), father of Gaddiel, who was the spy from Zebulun (Num. xiii. 10).

Sod'om (Heb. sēdōm = burning, conflagration, or field, vineyard? Ges.; lime-place or enclosed place, fort, Fū.; Gr. and L. Sodoma), one of the five ancient "cities of the plain" (PLAIN 3); commonly mentioned with GOMORRAH, but also with ADMAH and ZEBOIM, and in Gen. xiv. with Bela or ZOAR. Sodom was evidently the chief town in the settlement. The four are first named in the ethnological records of Gen. x. 19, as belonging to the Canaanites. The next mention of Sodom is in Gen. xiii. 10-13. Abram and Lot are standing together, apparently between Bethel and Ai (ver. 8), taking a survey of the land around and below them. "And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain (PLAIN 3; ZOAR) of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest unto Zoar. Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east; and they separated themselves the one from the other. Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain and pitched his tent toward Sodom" (ver. 10-12). In this fertile plain—or "circle"—of Jordan the four cities of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim appear to have been situated. In the subsequent account of their destruction (Gen. xix.), the same topographical term "plain" (Heb. cicdōr = circle or circuit) is employed. Mr. Grove thinks that the mention of the Jordan is conclusive as to the situation of the district, for the Jordan ceases where it enters the Dead Sea, and can have no existence S. of that point. (But on this whole argument see ZOAR.) The catastrophe by which Sodom and the other cities of "the plain" were destroyed is described in Gen. xix. as a shower of brimstone and fire from Jehovah, from the skies. Mr. Grove (and so Tristram, &c.) regards it as certain that the lake was not one of the agents in the catastrophe, and claims that the later passages in which the destruction of the cities is referred to throughout the Scriptures always speak of the district on which the cities once stood, not as submerged, but, as still visible, though desolate and uninhabitable (Deut. xxix. 22; Ps. cvii. 34; Is. xlii. 19; Jer. xlix. 18, l. 40; Am. iv. 11; Zeph. ii. 9; 2 Pet. ii. 6), and in the Apocrypha (Wis. ix. 7; 2 Esd. ii. 9); also that Josephus and heathen writers, as Strabo and Tacitus, are evidently under the belief that the district was not under water, and that the remains of the towns were still to be seen. From all these passages Mr. Grove draws the conclusions—1. That Sodom and the rest of the cities of "the plain of Jordan" stood on the N. of the Dead Sea. 2. That neither the cities nor the district were submerged by the lake, but that the cities were overthrown and the land spoiled, and that it may still be seen in its desolate condition. These conclusions of Mr. Grove, adopted by Rev. H. B. Tristram (Land of Israel, 360 f.), and favored by Rev. G. S. Drew (in Fbn.) and by Rev. J. Ayre (Treasury of Bible Knowledge), are, however, at variance with—I. The opinion, long current, that the five cities were submerged in the lake, and that their remains—walls, columns, and capitals—might be still discerned below the water. This opinion has been vigorously assailed by Reland, De Sauley, Stanley, &c., and is regarded by Mr. Grove as now hardly needing refutation. II. The prevalent opinion that the cities stood at the S. end of the lake. This appears to have been the belief of Josephus and Jerome, and of the mediæval historians and pilgrims universally, and it is adopted by modern topographers almost without exception. There are several grounds for this belief: (a.) "Lot fled to ZOAR, which was near to Sodom; and Zoar lay almost at the southern end of the present sea, probably in the mouth of the Wady Kerak" (Rbn. ii. 188). (b.) The existence of similar names in that direction. Thus the name Udum, attached to the remarkable ridge of salt at the southwestern corner of the lake (SEA, THE SALT, II., § 18), is usually accepted as the representative of Sodom (Robinson, Van de Velde, De Sauley, &c., &c.). The name 'Amrah, attached to a valley among the mountains S. of Masada or Sebbek (Van de Velde, ii. 99), almost exactly = the Hebrew of GOMORRAH. The name Dra'a, and much more strongly that of Zighal, recall ZOAR. (c.) The existence of the salt mountain at the S. of the lake, and its tendency to split off in columnar masses, presenting a rude resemblance to the human form. (Lor.) (d.) "The well-watered plain toward the S." (compare Gen. xiii. 10, 11; Rbn. ii. 189). "Even to the present day, more living streams flow into the Ghór, at the south end of the sea, from wadys of the eastern mountains than are found so near together in all Palestine besides" (Robinson, Physical Geography, 234). The plain is furrowed by eight small water-courses, one, at least, of which (Wady Tufileh) is a permanent stream (Tristram, 333, 335). The Ghór es-Sāfēh "teemed with a prodigality of life. It was, in fact, a reproduction of the oasis of Jericho, in a far more tropical climate, and with yet more lavish supply of water" (Tristram, 336). Even in the now desolate plain of Sabbah, "at the depth of eighteen inches, the soil was a fat, greasy loam" (Tristram, 335). (SEA, THE SALT, II., §§ 25, 26). (e.) "The peculiar character of this part of the Dead Sea, where alone at the present day asphaltum (SLIME) makes its appearance" (Rbn. ii. 189). (f.) "The testimony of unbroken tradition, ancient and modern" (S. Wolcott, D. D., in B. S. xxv. 144). (g.) "The south end of the sea and its surroundings present at this day such an appearance as the scriptural statements above cited would lead us to expect. The entire southwest coast and adjacent territory from above Sebbek round to the fertile border of the Ghór es-Sāfēh on the extreme S. E., relieved at a single point by the verdure of the small oasis of Zuweirah, is, and has been, from the time of Sodom's destruction, the image of enthroned desolation" (xxv. 148).—It was formerly supposed that the overthrow of Sodom was caused by the convulsion which formed the Dead Sea. This theory is stated by Dean Milman in his History of the Jews (i. 18, 16) with great spirit and clearness. But the changes which occurred when the limestone strata of Syria were split by that vast fissure which forms the Jordan Valley and the basin of the Salt Sea (ARABAH), must not only have taken place at a time long anterior to the period of Abraham, but must have been of such a nature and on such a scale as to destroy all animal life far and near. Dr. Robinson's theory is—"that the fertile plain is now in part occupied by the southern bay lying S. of the peninsula; and that, by some convulsion or catastrophe of nature connected with the miraculous destruction of the cities, either the surface of this plain was scooped out, or the bottom of the lake heaved up so as to cause the waters to overflow and cover permanently a larger tract than formerly." (SEA, THE SALT, II., §§ 47, 48; ZOAR.) Mr. Grove suggests that the actual agent in the ignition and destruction of the cities may have been of the nature of a tremendous thunderstorm accompanied by a discharge of meteoric stones. The miserable fate of Sodom and Gomorrah is held up as a warning (2 Pet. ii. 6; Jude 4-7; Mk. vi. 11). VINE OF SODOM.

Sod'-e-ma (Gr. and L. fr. Heb) = SODOM (Rom. ix. 29).

Sod'-em-ite (literally = one from Sodom; hence one who has the character or habits of the people of Sodom), the A. V. translation of Heb. kādēsh (see below). This word does not denote one of the inhabitants of Sodom (except only in 2 Esd. vii. 36) or their descendants; but in the A. V. of the O. T. = one of those who practised as a religious rite the abominable and unnatural vice from which the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah have derived their lasting infamy (Deut. xxiii. 17; 1 K. xiv. 24, xv. 12, xxii. 46; 2 K. xxiii. 7; Job xxxvi. 14 marg.). The Heb. kādēsh is said to be derived from a root kādash = to be pure, and thence to be holy or consecrated. "This dreadful 'consecration,' or rather desecration, was spread in different forms over Phenicia, Syria, Phrygia, Assyria, Babylonia. Ashtaroth, the Greek Astarte, was its chief object." The Heb. fem. of kādēsh, viz. kādēshah, is translated "HARLOT" in Gen. xxxviii. 21, 22; Hos. iv. 14; and "whore" (margin "Sodomitess") in Deut. xxiii. 17, IIeb. 18. It denotes one consecrated, like the kādēsh, to the worship of ASHTAROTH, and the gains of her prostitution went into the treasury of this goddess, Ges.

I. Name. The changes of pronunciation are worth noticing. We lose something of the dignity of the name when it passes from the measured stateliness of the Hebrew to the Greek Solomōn of the N. T., and the English Solomon. It appears, though with an altered sound, in the Arabic Sulcimawn.—II. Materials. (1.) The comparative scantiness of historical data for a life of Solomon is itself significant. While that of David occupies more than sixty chapters (1 Sam. xvi.-xxxi.; 2 Sam. i.-xxiv.; 1 K. i.-ii.; 1 Chr. x.-xxix.), that of Solomon fills only the eleven chapters 1 K. i.-xi., and the nine 2 Chr. i.-ix. The writers give extracts only from larger works which were before them, "The book of the Acts of Solomon" (1 K. xi. 41); "the book of Nathan the prophet, the book of Ahijah the Shilonite, the visions of Iddo the seer" (2 Chr. ix. 29). (2.) Prof. Plumptre thinks that NATHAN I probably wrote the account of the accession of Solomon and the dedication of the Temple (1 K. i.-viii. 66; 2 Chr. i.-viii. 15). He ascribes to AHIJAH I the Shilonite the short record of the sin of Solomon, and of the revolution to which he himself had so largely contributed (1 K. xi.). From the Book of the Acts of Solomon came, he supposes, the miscellaneous facts as to the commerce and splendor of his reign (ix. 10-x. 29). (3.) Some materials for the life of Solomon exist in the books that bear his name (CANTICLES; ECCLESIASTES; PROVERBS), and in the Psalms which are referred, on good grounds, to his time (Ps. ii., xlv., lxxii., cxxvii.). (4.) Other materials are very scanty. The history of Josephus is, for the most part, only a loose and inaccurate paraphrase of the O. T. narrative. In him, and in the more erudite among early Christian writers, we find some fragments of older history not without their value, extracts from archives alleged to exist at Tyre in the first century of the Christian era, and from the Phenician histories of Menander and Dios, from Eupolemos, from Alexander Polyhistor, Menander, and Laitus. (5.) For the legends of later Oriental literature see VII. below. (CHRONOLOGY; KINGS, FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF).—III. Education. (1.) The student of Solomon's life must take as his starting-point the circumstances of his birth. He was one of the sons of DAVID by BATH-SHEBA, apparently the second (2 Sam. xii.), but named last in 1 Chr. iii. 5, and called by Josephus his youngest son (Jos. vii. 14, § 2). The feelings of the king and of his prophet-guide expressed themselves in the names with which they welcomed his birth (Solomon = the peaceful one; JEDIDIAH = Jehovah's darling, Jehovah's beloved one). (2.) The three influences which must have entered most largely into the education of Solomon were those of his father, his mother, and his teacher (NATHAN I), under whose charge (so Prof. Plumptre, with Winer, Stanley, &c.) he was placed from his earliest infancy (2 Sam. xii. 25'). (3.) The fact just stated, that a prophet-priest was made the special instructor, indicates (so Prof. Plumptre; see note 1) the king's earnest wish that this child at least should be protected against the evils which, then and afterward, showed themselves in his elder sons, and be worthy of the name he bore. Prof. Plumptre thinks that David at first had no distinct purpose to make Solomon his heir, but that ABSALOM, the king's favorite, was looked upon by the people as his destined successor, and that after Absalom's death, David pledged his word in secret to Bath-sheba that he, and no other, should be the heir (1 K. i. 13). How far the divine designation of Solomon or the oath of David to Bath-sheba was known, we are not informed; but the designation seems to have been made before Solomon's birth (1 Chr. xxii. 9; compare xxviii. 5, 6; 2 Sam. vii. 12 ff.). Prof. Plumptre regards the words of 1 Chr. xxviii. 9, 20, as expressing, doubtless, the purpose which guided David throughout. His son's life should not be as his own had been, one of hardships and wars, dark

1 "The prophet who had named him 'darling of Jehovah,' is said by many (Stanley, Lectures, II. 169) to have superintended his early education, or to have shared the duty with JEHIEL (1 Chr. xxvii. 39). But the narrative does not warrant so broad a statement. The natural sense of the words in 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25 is, 'The Lord loved him, and in token of that love, He (the Lord) sent by the hand of Nathan the prophet, and he (i. e. Nathan, by divine commission) called his name Jedidiah, because of the Lord.' ... Still the tradition is a probable one, that Nathan had a special charge in the early training of the prince" (J. Eadie, D. D., in Fairbairn). The phrase here rendered by Gesenius, A. V., &c., "sent by the hand of," is literally in the Hebrew, LXX., and Vulgate sent in (not into, or to, as the inference of Prof. Plumptre, &c., seems to require) the hand of, and occurs in 1 Sam. xvi. 20, in 2 Sam. xi. 14, and in 1 K. ii. 25, in all which the meaning is undisputedly, as given in the A. V., "sent by the hand of" or "sent by."

crimes and passionate repentance, but, from first to last, be pure, blameless, peaceful, fulfilling the ideal of glory and of righteousness, after which he himself had vainly striven. The glorious visions of Ps. lxxii. may be looked on as the prophetic expansion of those hopes. So far, all was well. But we may not ignore the fact, that the later years of David's life presented a change for the worse, as well as for the better. The liturgical element of religion becomes, after the first passionate out-pouring of Ps. li., unduly predominant. We cannot rest in the belief that his influence over his son's character was one exclusively for good. (4.) In Eastern countries, and under a system of polygamy, the son is more dependent, even than elsewhere, on the character of the mother. Nothing that we know of Bath-sheba leads us to think of her as likely to mould her son's mind and heart to the higher forms of goodness. (5.) The prophet Nathan, to whose care the education of Solomon is supposed to have been confided, beyond all doubt, could speak bold and faithful words when they were needed (2 Sam. vii. 1-17, xii. 1-14); but we know positively little or nothing of his general wisdom or activity for good. (6.) Under these influences the boy grew up. At the age of ten or eleven he must have passed through the revolt of ABSALOM, and shared his father's exile (xv. 16). He would be taught all that priests, or LEVITES, or prophets had to teach. (EDUCATION; PRIEST; PROPHET.) The growing intercourse of Israel with the Phenicians would lead naturally to a wider knowledge of the outlying world and its wonders than had fallen to his father's lot. Admirable, however, as all this was, a shepherd-life, like his father's, furnished, we may believe, a better education for the kingly calling (Ps. lxxviii. 70, 71).—IV. Accession. (1.) The feebleness of David's old age led to an attempt which might have deprived Solomon of the throne his father destined for him. ADONIJAH, next in order of birth to Absalom, like Absalom, "was a goodly man" (1 K. i. 6), in full maturity of years. Following in the steps of Absalom, he assumed the kingly state of a chariot and a body-guard; and David looked on in silence. At last a time was chosen for openly proclaiming him as king. A solemn feast at EN-ROGEZ was to inaugurate the new reign. All were invited to it (ABIATHAR; JOAB, &c.), but those whom it was intended to displace. (2.) It was necessary for those whose interests were endangered to take prompt measures. Bath-sheba and Nathan took counsel together. The king was reminded of his oath. Solomon went down to GIHON, and was proclaimed and anointed king. The shouts of his followers fell on the startled ears of the guests at Adonijah's banquet. One by one they rose and departed. The plot had failed (1 K. i.). What had been done hurriedly was done afterward in a more solemn form. Solomon was presented to a great gathering of all the notables of Israel, with a set speech, in which the old king announced what was, to his mind, the programme of the new reign, a time of peace and plenty, of a stately worship, of devotion to Jehovah (1 Chr. xxviii., xxix.). A few months more, and Solomon found himself, by his father's death, the sole occupant of the throne. (2.) The position to which he succeeded was unique. Never before, and never after, did the kingdom of Israel take its place among the great monarchies of the East. Large treasures accumulated through many years were at his disposal. The people, with the exception of the tolerated worship in HIGH PLACES, were true servants of

Jehovah. Knowledge, art, music, poetry (AARTS; POETRY, HEBREW), had received a new impulse, and were moving on, with rapid steps, to such perfection as the age and the race were capable of attaining. Of the personal appearance of Solomon, who, at the age of nineteen or twenty, was called to this glorious sovereignty, we have no direct description, as we have of the earlier kings. But whatever higher mystic meaning may be latent in Ps. xlv., or the Song of Songs, we are all but compelled (so Prof. Plumptre) to think of them as having had, at least, an historical starting-point. (CANTICLES.) They tell us of one who was, in the eyes of the men of his own time, "fairer than the children of men," the face "bright and ruddy" as his father's (Cant. v. 10; 1 Sam. xvii. 42), bushy locks, dark as the raven's wing, yet not without a golden glow, the eyes soft as "the eyes of doves," the "countenance as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars," "the chiefest among ten thousand, the altogether lovely" (Cant. v. 9-16). Add to this all gifts of a noble, far-reaching intellect, large and ready sympathies, a playful and genial humor, the lips "full of grace," the soul "anointed" as "with the oil of gladness" (Ps. xlv.), and we may form some notion of what the king was like in that dawn of his golden prime. (3.) The historical starting-point of the Song of Songs Prof. Plumptre would connect (CANTICLES; SHULAMITE) with the earliest facts in the history of the new reign. Bath-sheba, who had before stirred up David against Adonijah, appears in 1 K. ii. as interceding for him, begging that ABISHAG the Shunammite, the virgin concubine of David, might be given him as a wife. Solomon, who till then had professed the profoundest reverence for his mother, his willingness to grant her any thing, suddenly flashes into fiercest wrath at this. The petition is treated as part of a conspiracy in which Joab and Abiathar are sharers. Benaiah is once more called in. Adonijah is put to death at once. Joab is slain even within the precincts of the Tabernacle, to which he had fled as an asylum. Abiathar is deposed, and exiled, sent to a life of poverty and shame, and the high-priesthood transferred to ZADOK 1. Soon afterward SHIMEI 2, who by his insatuated disregard of a compact seemed given over to destruction, is slain (1 K. ii. 81-46). There is, however, no needless slaughter. The other "sons of David" are spared, and one of them (NATHAN 2) becomes the head of a distinct family. (GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.) As he punishes his father's enemies, he also shows kindness to the friends who had been faithful to him. CHIMHAM, the son of Barzillai, apparently receives an inheritance near the city of David (2 Sam. xix. 31-40; 1 K. ii. 7).—V. Foreign Policy. (1.) All the data for a continuous history that we have are—(a.) The duration of the reign, forty (Josephus erroneously makes it eighty) years (1 K. xi. 42). (b.) The commencement of the TEMPLE in the fourth, its completion in the eleventh year of his reign (vi. 1, 37, 38). (c.) The commencement of his own PALACE in the seventh, its completion in the twentieth year (vii. 1; 2 Chr. viii. 1). (d.) The conquest of Hamath-zobah, and the consequent foundation of cities in the region N. of Palestine after the twentieth year (viii. 1-6). With materials so scanty as these, it will be better to group the chief facts in an order which will best enable us to appreciate their significance.—(2.) Egypt. The first act of the foreign policy of the new reign must have been to most Israelites a very startling one. He made affinity with PHARAOH 7, king of Egypt, by marrying his daughter (1 K. iii. 1). The immediate results were probably favorable enough. The new queen brought with her as a dowry the frontier-city of GEZER, against which, as threatening the tranquillity of Israel, and as still possessed by a remnant of the old Canaanites, Pharaoh had led his armies. She was received with all honor. A separate and stately palace was built for her, before long, outside the city of David (2 Chr. viii. 11). (3.) The ultimate issue of the alliance showed that it was hollow and impolitic. There may have been a revolution in Egypt. There was at any rate a change of policy. (JEROBOAM 1.) There, we may believe, by some kind of compact, expressed or understood, was planned the scheme which led first to the rebellion of the Ten Tribes (REHOBOAM), and then to the attack of SHISHAK on the weakened and dismantled kingdom of the son of Solomon. (COMMERCE; CHARLOT; HORSE.) (4.) Tyre. The alliance with the Phœnician king rested on a somewhat different footing. It had been part of David's policy from the beginning of his reign. HIRAM 1 had been "ever a lover of David." He, or his grandfather, had helped him by supplying materials and workmen for his palace. As soon as he heard of Solomon's accession he sent ambassadors to salute him. A correspondence passed between the two kings, which ended in a treaty of COMMERCE. The opening of Joppa as a port created a new coasting-trade, and the materials from Tyre (CEDAR, &c.) were conveyed to it on floats, and thence to Jerusalem (2 Chr. ii. 16). In return for these exports, the Phœnicians were only too glad to receive the CORN and OIL of Solomon's territory. (5.) The results of the alliance did not end here. Now, for the first time, Israel entered on a career as a commercial people. They joined the Phœnicians in their Mediterranean voyages to the coasts of Spain. (TARSHISH.) Solomon's possession of the Edomite coast enabled him to open to his ally a new world of commerce. The ports of ELATH and EZION-GEBER were filled with ships of Tarshish, merchant-ships, manned chiefly by Phœnicians, but built at Solomon's expense, which sailed down the Ælantic Gulf of the Red Sea, on to the Indian Ocean, to lands before hardly known even by name. (ALGUM-TREES; ALOES; APES; ARABIA; GOLD; IVORY; LINEN; OPHIR; PEACOCKS; SHEBA; SHIP; SILVER; SPICES; STONES, PRECIOUS; TADMOR, &c.) (6.) According to the statement of Phœnician writers quoted by Josephus (Ant. viii. 5, §3), the intercourse of the two kings had in it also something of the sportiveness and freedom of friends. They delighted to perplex each other with hard questions, and laid wagers as to their power of answering them. The singular history in 1 K. ix. 11-14, recording the cession by Solomon of sixteen cities, and Hiram's dissatisfaction with them (CABUL), is perhaps connected with these imperial wagers. (7.) These were the two most important ALLIANCES. The absence of any reference to Babylon and Assyria, and the fact that the Euphrates was recognized as the boundary of Solomon's kingdom (2 Chr. ix. 26), suggest the inference that the Mesopotamian monarchs were, at this time, comparatively feeble. Other neighboring nations paid annual tribute in the form of gifts (ix. 24). The kings of the Hittites and of Syria obtained through Jerusalem the chariots and horses of Egypt (1 K. x. 29). (8.) The survey of the influence exercised by Solomon on surrounding nations would be incomplete if we were to pass over the fame of his glory and his wisdom. Wherever the ships of Tarshish went, they carried with them the report, losing nothing in its passage, of what their crews had seen and heard. The journey of the queen of Sheba, though from its circumstances the most conspicuous, did not stand alone. She had heard of the wisdom of Solomon, and connected with it "the name of Jehovah" (1 K. x. 1). She came with hard questions to test that wisdom, and the words just quoted may throw light upon their nature. She represents a body whom the dedication-prayer shows to have been numerous, the strangers coming "from a far country" because of the "great name" of Jehovah (1 K. viii. 41), many of them princes themselves or the messengers of kings (2 Chr. ix. 23). The historians of Israel delighted to dwell on her confession that the reality surpassed the fame, "the one-half of the greatness of thy wisdom was not told me" (ix. 6).—VI. Internal History. (1.) The first prominent scene in Solomon's reign, as it bears on the history of Israel, is one which presents his character in its noblest aspect. There were two holy places which divided the reverence of the people, the ARK and its provisional tabernacle at JERUSALEM, and the original TABERNACLE of the congregation, which, after many wanderings, was now pitched at GIBEON. It was thought right that the new king should offer solemn sacrifices at both. After those at Gibeon there came that vision of the night which has in all ages borne its noble witness to the hearts of rulers. Not for riches, or long life, or victory over enemies, would the son of David, then at least true to his high calling, feeling himself as "a little child" in comparison with the vastness of his work, offer his supplications, but for a "wise and understanding heart," that he might judge the people. The "speech pleased the Lord." There came in answer the promise of a wisdom, like which there had been none before, like which there should be none after (1 K. iii. 5-15). (2.) The wisdom asked for was given in large measure, and took a varied range. The wide world of nature, animate and inanimate, the lives and characters of men, lay before him, and he took cognizance of all. But the highest wisdom was that wanted for the highest work, for governing and guiding, and the pattern-instance—his judgment between the two harlots (HARLOT)—is, in all its circumstances, thoroughly Oriental (1 K. iii. 16-28). (3.) But the power to rule showed itself not in judging only, but in organizing. Prominent among the "princes" of his kingdom, i. e. officers of his own appointment, were members of the priestly order: AZARIAH 1 the son of Zadok, ZADOK 1 himself the high-priest, BENAIAH 1 the son of Jehoiada as captain of the host, AZARIAH 2 and ZABUD, the sons of Nathan, one over the officers who acted as purveyors to the king's household (1 K. iv. 2-5), the other in the more confidential character of "king's friend." In addition to these were the two SCRIBES (ELIHOREPH and AHIAM 2), the recorder or annalist of the king's reign (JEHOSHAPHAT 2), the superintendent of the king's house, and household expenses (Is. xxii. 15), including probably the harem (AHSIAR), and ADO-NIRAM, who presided "over the tribute." (KING.) (4.) The last name leads us to the king's finances. The first impression of the facts given us is that of abounding plenty. The large quantities of the precious metals accumulated by David, and imported from Ophir and Tarshish would speak, to a people who had not learned the lessons of a long experience, of a boundless source of wealth (1 K. ix. 21-28; 1 Chr. xxix. 1-7; GOLD; SILVER). All the kings and princes of the subject provinces paid tribute in the form of gifts, in money and in kind, "at a fixed rate year by year" (1 K. x. 25). Monopolies of trade contributed to the king's treasury (x. 28, 29). The king's domain-lands were apparently let out, at a fixed annual rental (Cant. viii. 11). All the provinces of his own kingdom were bound each in turn to supply the king's enormous household with provisions (1 K. iv. 21-23). The total amount thus brought into the treasury in gold, exclusive of all payments in kind, amounted to 666 talents (x. 14; TAXES). (5.) Hardly any financial system, however, could bear the strain of the king's passion for magnificence. The cost of the Temple was, it is true, provided for by David's savings and the offerings of the people; but even while that was building, yet more when it was finished, one structure followed on another with ruinous rapidity (vii. 1-12, ix. 15-19, x. 5, 16 ff., &c.; BAALATH; BETH-HORON; GARDEN; GEZER; HAZOR; MEGIDDO; MILLO; PALACE; POOL; TADMOR; THRONE). All the equipment of his court, the "apparel" of his servants, was on the same scale. If he went from his hall of judgment to the Temple, he marched between two lines of soldiers, each with a burnished shield of gold (x. 16, 17). A body-guard attended him, "threescore valiant men," tallest and handsomest of the sons of Israel (Cant. iii. 7, 8). Forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen, made up the measure of his magnificence (1 K. iv. 26). As the treasury became empty, taxes multiplied and monopolies became more irksome. The people complained, not of the king's idolatry, but of their burdens, of his "grievous yoke" (xii. 4). Their hatred fell heaviest on Adoniram, who was over the tribute. (6.) It remains for us to trace that other downfall, belonging more visibly, though not more really, to his religious life, from the loftiest height even to the lowest depth. The building and dedication of the TEMPLE are obviously the representatives of the first. We may picture to ourselves the feelings of the men of Judah as they watched, during seven long years, the massive foundations of vast stones gradually rising up and covering the area of the threshing-floor of Araunah. Far from colossal in its size, it was conspicuous chiefly by the lavish use, within and without, of the gold of Ophir and Parvaim. Throughout the whole work the tranquillity of the kingly city was unbroken by the sound of the workman's hammer. (7.) Even now there were some darker shades in the picture. He reduced to bondage the "strangers" in the land, the remnant of the Canaanite races. One hundred and fifty-three thousand were sent off to the quarries and the forests of Lebanon (1 K. v. 16; 2 Chr. ii. 17, 18; PROSELYTE; SLAVE; STRANGER). Even the Israelites, though not reduced to permanent bondage, were summoned to take their place by rotation in the same labor (1 K. v. 13, 14). One trace of the special servitude of "these hewers of stone" existed long afterward in the existence of a body of men attached to the Temple, and known as "children of SOLOMON'S SERVANTS." (8.) After seven years and a half the work was completed, and the day came to which all Israelites looked back as the culminating glory of their nation. Their worship was now established on a scale as stately as that of other nations. The Ark from Zion, the Tabernacle from Gibeon, were both removed (2 Chr. v. 5), and brought to the new Temple. The choirs of the priests and the Levites met in their fullest force, arrayed in white linen. (LEVITES; PRIEST.) Then was heard the noble hymn, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors, and the king of glory shall come in" (Ps. xxiv. 7). The trumpeters and singers were "as one" in their mighty Hallelujah—"O, praise the Lord, for He is good, for His mercy endureth for ever" (2 Chr. v.

18). The ARK OF THE COVENANT was solemnly placed in its golden sanctuary, and then "the cloud," the "glory of the Lord," filled the house of the Lord (v. 7-14). Throughout the whole scene, the person of the king is the one central object, compared with whom even priests and prophets are for the time subordinate. Abstaining, doubtless, from distinctively priestly acts, such as slaying the victims and offering incense, he yet appears, even more than David did in the bringing up the ark, in a liturgical character. He blesses the congregation. From him came the lofty prayer, the noblest utterance of the creed of Israel, setting forth the distance and the nearness of the Eternal God, One, Incomprehensible, dwelling not in temples made with hands, yet ruling men, hearing their prayers, giving them all good things, wisdom, peace, righteousness (1 K. viii.; 2 Chr. vi.). (9.) The solemn day was followed by a week of festival, synchronizing with the Feast of Tabernacles, the time of the completed vintage. Representatives of all the tribes, elders, fathers, captains, proselytes, it may be, from the newly-acquired territories in Northern Syria (2 Chr. vi. 32, vii. 8)—all were assembled, rejoicing in the actual glory and the bright hopes of Israel. For the king himself then, or at a later period (the narrative of 1 K. ix. and 2 Chr. vii. leaves it doubtful), there was a strange contrast to the glory of that day. He must be taught that what he had done was indeed right and good, but that it was not all, and might not be permanent. Obedience was better than sacrifice. There was a danger near at hand. (10.) The danger came, and in spite of the warning the king fell. Before long the priests and prophets had to grieve over the rival temples to MOLOCH, CHEMOSH, ASHTAROTH, forms of ritual not idolatrous only, but cruel, dark, impure. This evil came (1 K. xi. 1-8) as the consequence of another. He gave himself to "strange women." He found himself involved in a fascination which led to the worship of strange gods. The starting-point and the goal are given us. We are left, from what we know otherwise, to trace the process. Something perhaps in his very "largeness of heart," so far in advance of the traditional knowledge of his age, rising to higher and wider thoughts of God, predisposed him to it. In recognizing what was true in other forms of faith, he might lose his horror at what was false, his sense of the preëminence of the truth revealed to him, of the historical continuity of the nation's religious life. He may have hoped, by a policy of toleration, to conciliate neighboring princes, to attract a larger traffic. Prof. Plumptre thinks also that the wide-spread belief of the East in the magic arts of Solomon is not without its foundation of truth. (DIVINATION; MAGIC.) (11.) Disasters followed before long as the natural consequence of what was politically a blunder as well as religiously a sin. The strength of the nation rested on its unity, and its unity depended on its faith. Whatever attractions the sensuous ritual which he introduced may have had for the great body of the people, the priests and Levites must have looked on the rival worship with entire disfavor. ARIJAH 1 was sent to utter one of those predictions which work out their own fulfilment, pointing out Jeroboam to himself and to the people as the destined heir to the larger half of the kingdom (1 K. xi. 28-39). The king in vain tried to check the current that was setting strong against him from within and from without. (HADAD 4; JEROBOAM 1; REZON.) The king, prematurely old (he died at not much above fifty-nine or sixty), must have foreseen the rapid breaking up of the great monarchy to which he had succeeded. (12.) As to the inner changes of mind and heart which ran parallel with this history, Scripture is comparatively silent. Something may be learned from the books that bear his name (CANTICLES; ECCLESIASTES; PROVERBS, BOOK OF), which stand in the Canon of the O. T. as representing, with profound, inspired insight, the successive phases of his life; something also from the fact that so little remains out of so much, out of the songs, proverbs, treatises of which the historian speaks (1 K. iv. 32, 33). Extracts only are given from the 3,000 proverbs. Of the thousand and five songs we know absolutely nothing. (13.) The books that remain, as has been said, represent the three stages of his life. The Song of Songs brings before us the brightness of his youth. Then comes in the Book of Proverbs, the stage of practical, prudential thought. The poet has become the philosopher, the mystic has passed into the moralist. But the man passed through both stages without being permanently the better for either. They were to him but phases of his life which he had known and exhausted (Eccl. i. ii.). And therefore there came, as in the Confessions of the Preacher, the weariness which sees written on all things, "Vanity of vanities." Slowly only could he recover from that "vexation of spirit," and lay again, with painful relapses, the foundations of a true morality. (14.) Prof. Plumptre declines to enter into the things within the veil, or answer either way the doubting question, Is there any hope? He remarks that Chrysostom and the theologians of the Greek Church are, for the most part, favorable, Augustine and those of the Latin, for the most part, adverse to his chances of salvation.—VII. Legends. (1.) The impression made by Solomon on later generations is shown in its best form by the desire to claim the sanction of his name for even the noblest thoughts of other writers. (ECCLESIASTES? WISDOM, BOOK OF.) But round the facts of the history, as a nucleus, there gathers a whole world of fantastic fables, Jewish, Christian, Mohammedan, refractions, colored, and distorted, according to the media through which they pass, of a colossal form. Even in the Targum of Ecclesiastes we find strange stories of his character. He and the Rabbis of the Sanhedrim sat and drank wine together in Jabneh. His paradise was filled with costly trees which the evil spirits brought him from India. Ashmedai (ASMODEUS), the king of the demons, deprived him of his magic ring, and he wandered through the cities of Israel, weeping and saying, I, the preacher, was king over Israel in Jerusalem. He left behind him spells and charms to cure diseases and cast out evil spirits. His wisdom enabled him to interpret the speech of beasts and birds. He knew the secret virtues of gems and herbs. He was the inventor of Syriac and Arabian alphabets. (2.) Arabic imagination took a yet wilder flight. After a long struggle with the rebellious Afreetes and Jinns, Solomon conquered them and cast them into the sea. To him belonged the magic ring which revealed to him the past, the present, and the future. Because he stayed his march at the hour of prayer instead of riding on with his horsemen, God gave him the winds as a chariot, and the birds flew over him, making a perpetual canopy. The demons in their spite wrote books of magic in his name. The Koran narrates the visit of the Queen of Sheba, her wonder, her conversion to the Islam or true religion, which Solomon professed. The Arabs claim her as belonging to Yemen, the Ethiopians as coming from Meroë. In each form of the story a son by Solomon is born to her, called in the Arab version Meilekh, in the Ethiopian David, the ancestor of a long line of Ethiopian kings. Twelve thousand Hebrews accompanied her home, and from them were descended the Jews of Ethiopia and the great Prester (i. e. Presbyter) John of mediæval travellers. She brought to Solomon the same gifts which the MAGI brought to Christ. One of her hard questions was, to distinguish fair boys and sturdy girls dressed alike, which the king answered by placing water before them to wash, and observing that the boys scrubbed their faces and the girls stroked them softly. (3.) The fame of Solomon spread to Persia. At Shiraz they showed the Meder-Suleiman, or tomb of Bath-sheba, said that Persepolis had been built by the Jinns at his command, and pointed to the Takht-i-Suleimann (Solomon's throne) in proof. Through their spells too he made his wonderful journey, breakfasting at Persepolis, dining at Ba'albek, and supping at Jerusalem. Persian literature had countless lives of Solomon, who in popular belief was confounded with the great Persian hero Djemschid. (4.) The legends appeared in their coarsest and basest form in Europe, losing all their poetry, the mere appendages of the most detestable of Apocrypha, Books of Magic, a Hygro-nanteia, a Contradictio Salomonis condemned by Gelasius, Incantationes, Clavicula, &c. One pseudonymous work has a somewhat higher character, the Psalter of Solomon, altogether without merit, a medley from the Psalms of David, but not otherwise offensive, and sometimes attached, as in the Alexandrine LXX., to the sacred volume.—VIII. New Testament. The teaching of the N. T. adds nothing to the materials for a life of Solomon, but it enables us to take the truest measure of it. The teaching of the Son of Man passes sentence on all that kingly pomp: Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of the lilies of the field (Mat. vi. 29). Jesus of Nazareth was one "greater than Solomon" (xii. 42). It was reserved for the true, the later Son of David, to fulfil the prophetic yearnings which had gathered round the birth of the earlier. He was the true Solomon = the Prince of Peace, the true Jeddiah = the well-beloved of the Father.

Solomon's Porch. PORCH; TEMPLE.

Solomon's Ser'vants, Chil'dren of (Ezr. ii. 56, 58; Neh. vii. 57, 60). These appear in the lists of the exiles who returned from the Captivity. They occupy almost the lowest places in those lists, and their position indicates some connection with the services of the Temple. (1.) The name, as well as the order, implies inferiority even to the NETHINIM. (2.) The starting-point of their history is probably in 1 K. v. 13, 14, ix. 20, 21, and 2 Chr. viii. 7, 8. Canaanites, living till then with a certain measure of freedom, were reduced by Solomon to bondage, and compelled to labor in the king's stone-quarries, and in building his palaces and cities. To some extent, indeed, the change had been effected under David, but it appears then to have been connected with the Temple, and the servitude under Solomon was harder and more extended (1 Chr. xxii. 2). (3.) 1 Chr. xxii. 2 throws some light on their special office. The Nethinim were hewers of wood and drawers of water (Josh. ix. 23), and this was enough for the services of the Tabernacle. For the construction and repairs of the Temple another kind of labor was required, and the new bondmen were set to hewing and squaring stones (1 K. v. 17, 18). Their descendants appear to have formed a distinct order, inheriting probably the same functions and the same skill. PROSELYTE; SERVANT; SLAVE.

Sol'o-mon's Song. CANTICLES.

Sol'o-mon, Wis'dom of. WISDOM, BOOK OF.

Son (Heb. usually bén; Gr. huios, &c.) denotes literally one's male child (Gen. xvii. 16, 19; Mat. i. 21, 23, 25, &c.), or more loosely, a grandson (Gen. xxix. 5; Ezr. v. 1, &c.) or more remote descendant (viii. 15; Mat. i. 1, 20; Lk. xix. 9, &c.), also a foster-child (Ex. ii. 10; Heb. xi. 24, &c.); hence figuratively a vassal or subject (2 K. xvi. 7, &c.), a pupil or disciple (1 K. xx. 35; IIeb. ii. 10, &c.), one closely connected in origin, destiny, &c., with a particular time or place or thing, as the "son of a year," i. e. a year old (Lev. xii. 6 margin, &c.), "son of death," i. e. one devoted to death (1 Sam. xx. 31 margin, &c.), &c. The word bar (Chal. and poetic Heb. = son) is often found in N. T. in composition, as BAR-TIMEUS. CHILD; PROPHET; SON OF GOD; SON OF MAN, &c.

Son of God (SON; GOD). This title is applied in the Scriptures—I. To created beings who derive their origin directly from God, or stand as His representatives in rank and authority, or occupy a peculiarly intimate relation to Him. It is thus applied sometimes in the singular, but mostly in the plural—a. To ANGELS (Job i. 6, ii. 1, xxxviii. 7; probably Dan. iii. 25, compare 28 and see below). b. To ADAM in a genealogy (Lk. iii. 38; compare Acts xvii. 28). c. To kings and rulers (2 Sam. vii. 14; 1 Chr. xxviii. 6; compare Ps. lxxxii. 6). d. To the worshippers or chosen people of God (Gen. vi. 2, 4 [probably; see GIANTS]; Ex. iv. 22, 23; Deut. xiv. 1 [A. V. "children," literally sons]; Is. xlv. 11; Jer. xxxi. 20; Hos. i. 10, xi. 1, &c.), reproved as "back-sliding children" (Jer. iii. 14, 22 [literally sons]), &c.; especially in the N. T. to believers in the Lord Jesus Christ (Jn. i. 12; Rom. viii. 14, 19; Phil. ii. 15; 1 Jn. iii. 1, 2; compare 2 Cor. vi. 18, &c.). In Dan. iii. 25 Nebuchadnezzar uses the phrase a son of God or a son of the gods (A. V. "the son of God"), supposed by some (Rashi, Saadiah, Fairbairn, Barnes, &c.) to mean one of the ANGELS, by others (Gesenius, Stuart, &c.) a descendant of the gods or supernatural being, by others (Tertullian, Augustine, Gill, &c.) the MESSIAH or Lord JESUS CHRIST (see II.).—II. Preëminently to Him who "was in the beginning with God" and "was God"—who "was made flesh and dwelt among us . . . full of grace and truth"—who "hath declared" God—"the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father;" = "the Word" (Jn. i. 1, 2, 14, 18; compare Ps. ii. 7). The title "the Son of God" is applied to the Son JESUS CHRIST in the N. T. more than forty times (Mat. iv. 3, 6, viii. 29, xiv. 33, &c.), once to Adam in an abbreviated form in the Greek, "son of" being supplied by the translators (Lk. iii. 38; I. b, above). The title "the Son of God" is applied to Christ in the first three Gospels, says Dörner, "in three senses: in a physical sense, to designate His nature; in a moral sense, to declare His perfection; and in an official sense (in which both the others are comprised), to show His work, as MESSIAH. He calls Himself also the SON OF MAN; and this expression is without force, unless we consider Him as employing it in contrast with the consciousness He had of a higher nature; while it also refers to His peculiar and special relation to the race—He is the Son of Man, not of a man. As both Son of God and of Man, He is called 'Son' in an eminent sense; the only Son of God, so that even when His disciples were present, He could say

My Father, and not our Father. He forgives sins: in the form of baptism He puts His name with that of the Father; He has power to send the Holy Spirit; He alone knows the Father, all other men know the Father through Him; all power is given to Him; in all space and time He is present; His coming is to be the end of the world; He is the Judge of the world; for all eternity the Son of God and Man is to be the centre of the Christian's blessedness. Such is the Person of Christ in the first three Gospels. The boldest passages of John have their entire parallel in the other evangelists; and some of their strongest passages have no parallel in John (Mat. ix. 2-6, xxviii. 18-20)." Dörner finds in James, Peter, and Jude, the same type of the doctrine respecting the person of Christ as in the first three evangelists. Another type or mode of announcing this doctrine, though embracing the same grand fundamental position, Dörner finds in the writings of Paul and John, who, "both in their earlier and later writings ascribe divinity to the Son not merely in a moral but in an essential sense, and view the relation of the Son to the Father not only as 'economic,' but also as ontological or metaphysical; so that Christ with the Father and the Holy Ghost constitutes a sacred triad (or trinity). The real humanity of Christ is no less clearly presented in their epistles. The new idea of the God-man is thus fully recognized by them, and their writings give it to us in its highest type" (Dörner's Doctrine of the Person of Christ, translated by Prof. H. B. Smith, in B. S. vi. 177-8). "If the only-begotten and well-beloved Son of God, who always was and is to be in the bosom of the Father, in the nearness and dearness of an eternal fellowship and an eternal sonship; who is the manifestation, the expression, the perfect image, of God, such a reflection of the glory and express image of His person, that whoever has seen the Son has seen the Father also; who is the agent and representative of God in the creation and preservation of the material and spiritual universe, in the redemption of the Church and the reconciliation of the world and the government of both, in the general resurrection of the dead and the final judgment of men and angels, in all Divine attributes and acts, so that He is manifestly the acting Deity of the universe—if He is not God, there is no actual or possible evidence that there is any God" (Prof. W. S. Tyler, D. D., in B. S. xxii. 639).—Canon Wordsworth, with Basnage, Fairbairn, Ayre, &c., concludes "that although the Jews of our Lord's age might have inferred, and ought to have inferred from their own Scriptures (Ps. ii. 7, xlv. 6, 7 [compare Heb. i. 5, 8, v. 5]; Is. vii. 14, ix. 6; Mic. v. 2; Zech. xi. 13: MESSIAH; PROPHET), that the Messiah, or Christ, would be a Divine Person, and the Son of God in the highest sense of the term; and although some among them, who were more enlightened than the rest, entertained that opinion, yet it was not the popular and generally received notion among the Jews that the Messiah would be other than a man, born of human parents, and not a Divine being, and Son of God. . . . The reason of His condemnation by the Jewish Sanhedrim, and of His delivery to Pilate for crucifixion, was not that He claimed to be the Messiah or Christ, but that He asserted Himself to be much more than that: in a word, because He claimed to be the Son of God, and to be God" (Jn. v. 17, 18, viii. 58, 59, x. 30-33, xix. 7; Mat. xxvi. 63 ff.; Lk. xxii. 70, 71, xxiii. 1; compare Mat. xvi. 16, 17, &c.). SAVIOUR.

Son of Man (SON; MAN) = child of humanity, i. e. one of the human race, a human being in origin and characteristics (Num. xxiii. 19; Job xxv. 6; Ps. viii. 4, cxliv. 3, cxlvi. 3, &c.). God addresses the prophet Ezekiel by this title to remind him, so highly honored with visions and revelations of God, of his weakness and mortality, and lead him to give glory to God and execute with meekness and alacrity the duties of his prophetic office and mission from God to his fellow-men. Dan. vii. 13 (compare x. 10) designates the Messiah as like a son of man, i. e. like a human being (Chal. bar 'endash [MAN 2], A. V. "like the Son of Man"). So in Rev. i. 13, xiv. 14, the Greek is like a son of man (Gr. huios anthropou, A. V. "like the Son of Man"). But in the Gospels the phrase "the Son of Man" is found more than eighty times as used by our Lord JESUS CHRIST to designate Himself (Mat. viii. 20, ix. 6, x. 23, &c.), once in Jn. xii. 34 as an inquiry of the people concerning Him who applied this title to Himself. It is once also used of Him (apparently as seen standing in human form and with human sympathies at the right hand of God) by Stephen in his dying speech (Acts vii. 56). Prof. W. S. Tyler, D. D. (in B. S. xxii. 51 ff.), thus explains the meaning of "the Son of Man," which may be called the favorite name of the REDEEMER of mankind: 1. It implies that Jesus was a man, a real and proper man, possessed of all the attributes and characteristics of our common humanity—a man by birth and a man by nature. 2. He was not merely a man, but the Man—the only Man in the fullest and highest sense, as He was in the fullest and highest sense the only Son of Man, that has ever lived in our world. He had no individual idiosyncrasies—none of the prejudices of His class or region. 3. He was the model man—morally perfect, sinless—exhibiting the human virtues without imperfection or alloy—a perfect pattern of what man should be in his relations to his fellow-man and to God. 4. He was the representative man—officially, as well as personally, the representative of the race. He was born—lived—suffered—died—for the race. In Christ, human history begins a new epoch, the human race a new life. He is the second ADAM, in whom humanity is again embodied, represented, and, as it were, created anew. 5. He was the friend of man. He was not only a philanthropist; He was the philanthropist—the man of love to all mankind, the pattern and embodiment of philanthropy. "Philanthropy" has had another meaning since He came into the world to teach and to exemplify it. His mission embraced the world. His religion, for the first time in the world's history, was a religion for all mankind, and a religion of love to all. He was emphatically the friend and companion of sinners. "He went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with Him." His was philanthropy that deserved the name—wide as the world, universal as the race, diversified as its wants and woes, enduring as its existence. Yet "Son of Man" was not His original title. "Son of God" was His rank and title in heaven, where all the angels of God worshipped Him as very God; and it was love for mankind that brought Him into our world in human nature—born of a woman, a babe in Bethlehem, a member of the great human family, the Son of Man among the children of men—"that He by the grace of God should taste death for every man." As Son of Man, too, He shall judge the world (Mat. xxv. 31). SAVIOUR; Son, &c.

Soph-o-ni'as (L. fr. Heb.) = ZEPHANIAH (2 Esd. i. 40).

Sor'-cer-er. DIVINATION; MAGIC.

Sor'ek (Heb. a vine, Ges.), the Val'ley of (VALLEY 3); a wady in which lay the residence of DELILAH (Judg. xvi. 4 only); apparently a Philistine place, and possibly nearer to Gaza than to any other of the chief Philistine cities, since thither Samson was taken after his capture at Delilah's house. Eusebius and Jerome state that a village named Capharsorech was shown in their day "on the north of Eleutheropolis, near the town of Saar (or Saraa), i. e. ZORAH, the native place of SAMSON." Van de Velde identifies the Valley of Sorek with Wady Simsin, which runs from the neighborhood of Eleutheropolis into the sea at Ascalon; Porter (in Kitto) suggests that it may be Wady es-Surâr, which runs from the neighborhood of Zorah and Bethshemesh past Jabneel or Jamnia to the sea.

So-sip'a-ter (L. fr. Gr. = saving [or preserving] a father). 1. A general of Judas Maccabeus, who with Dositheus defeated Timotheus and took him prisoner, about b. c. 164 (2 M. xii. 19-24).—, Kinsman or fellow-tribesman of St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 21); probably = SOPATER.

Sos'the-n'es [-ncez] (Gr. saving [or preserving] strength), a Jew at Corinth, who was seized and beaten in the presence of GALLIO (Acts xviii. 12-17). Some have thought that he was a Christian, maltreated thus by his own countrymen, because he was known as a special friend of Paul. A better view is (so Prof. Hackett, the original author of this article, with most critics) that Sosthenes was one of the bigoted Jews; and that "the crowd" were Greeks who, taking advantage of the indifference of Gallio, and ever ready to show their contempt of the Jews, turned their indignation against Sosthenes. In this case he must have been the successor of CRISPUS, or (as Biscoe conjectures) may have belonged to some other synagogue at Corinth (xviii. 8). Chrysostom's notion, that Crispus = Sosthenes, is arbitrary and unsupported.—Paul wrote the First Epistle to the Corinthians jointly in his own name and that of a Sosthenes whom he terms "the brother" (1 Cor. i. 1). Some have held that he = the Sosthenes of Acts xviii. If so, he must have been converted at a later period, and have been at Ephesus and not at Corinth, when Paul wrote to the Corinthians. The name was common, and but little stress can be laid on that coincidence. Eusebius says that this Sosthenes was one of the seventy disciples, and a later tradition adds that he became bishop of the Church at Colophon in Ionia.

SALEM in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (about B. C. 172: 2 Mc. iv. 27, 29).

So'tal, or So'ta-l (Heb. one who turns aside, Ges.), ancestor of a family of the descendants of Solomon's servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 55; Neh. vii. 57).

* Soul [sole], the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. nēšām (Job xxx. 15 only, marg. "principal one"); = nobility, figuratively elevated and happy state, excellency, Ges.: honor, reputation, Fū.—2. Heb. nephesh more than 500 times (Gen. ii. 7, xii. 5, 13, &c., &c.). The meanings of nephesh are thus classified by Gesenius:—(1.) breath (so A. V., Job xli. 13); (2.) the vital spirit, through which the body lives, i. e. the principle of life manifested in the breath, hence LIFE, vital principle, animal spirit (translated "soul" in Gen. xxxv. 18 and 1 K. xvii. 21, 22, &c.; "life" in Ex. iv. 19, xxi. 23, &c.; "ghost" in Job xi. 20 and Jer. xv. 9); to which is ascribed whatever has respect to the sustenance of life by food and drink, and the contrary (A. V. usually "soul," e. g. Num. xxi. 5; Prov. vi. 30; Is. lv. 2, 3, &c.); (3.) the rational soul, mind, as the seat of the feelings, affections, emotions of various kinds (Deut. iv. 29, xxx. 2, 6, 10, &c.; "will" in Ps. xxvii. 12, &c.; "pleasure" in Ps. cv. 22; "lust" in Ex. xv. 9; "mind" in Ez. xxxvi. 5, &c.; "heart" in Ex. xxxiii. 9 and Prov. xxviii. 25, &c.); (4.) concretely living thing, animal (translated "soul" in Gen. ii. 7 and Josh. x. 28 ff., xi. 11, &c.; "creature" in Gen. i. 21, 24, ii. 19, &c.; "person" in Ex. xvi. 16 and Deut. x. 22, &c.), used for a corpse or body from which life has departed ("body" in Num. vi. 6, &c.; "dead body" in ix. 6, 7, 10; "dead" in v. 2, vi. 11, &c.); (5.) with my, thy, &c., for self (Ps. cxxxi. 2; Esth. iv. 13; Jer. li. 14, &c.; often translated "soul" in this sense).—3. Heb. neshāmāh once (Is. lvii. 16), usually and literally translated "breath," also "blast" (2 Sam. ii. 16; Job iv. 9, &c.), "SPIRIT," "INSPIRATION," &c.—4. Gr. psychē (Mat. x. 28 twice, xi. 29, &c.). The meanings of psychē are classified by Dr. Robinson (N. T. Lex.) in close correspondence to those of No. 2, above, for which it is used in the LXX.: Primarily the breath (in LXX.); usually and in N. T. the vital breath, life: (1.) properly the soul as the vital principle, i. e. the animal soul, the vital principle, life (translated "soul" in Lk. xii. 20 and 1 Th. ii. 8, &c.; but usually in this sense "life," as in Mat. ii. 20, vi. 25 twice, x. 39 twice, &c.); (2.) specially the soul as the sentient principle; (a.) as the seat of the senses, desires, affections, appetites, passions, i. e. the lower and animal nature common to man with the beasts (translated "soul" in 1 Th. v. 23 and Heb. iv. 12, &c.; "mind" in Acts xiv. 2 and Heb. xii. 3, &c.; "heart" in Eph. vi. 6, the same Greek phrase here translated "from the heart" being rendered "heartily" in Col. iii. 23), under which sense is included the use of "my soul" and "thy soul" for the person himself (Mat. xii. 18; Rev. xviii. 14, &c.); and (b.) in a general sense the soul of man, his spiritual and immortal nature, with all its higher and lower powers, its rational and animal faculties (Mat. x. 28 twice; 2 Cor. i. 23; Heb. vi. 19, &c.); (3.) concretely a soul, a living thing, animal, used (a.) in a general sense for any living creature (translated "soul" in 1 Cor. xv. 45 and Rev. xvi. 3), but (b.) oftener of man, a soul, a living person (Acts ii. 43, iii. 23; Rom. ii. 9, xiii. 1, &c.), and (c.) specifically for a servant, a slave in Rev. xviii. 13, A. V. "souls," perhaps more emphatic than the preceding sōmata (= bodies), translated "slaves"

(compare Ez. xxvii. 13; SLAVE). ATONEMENT; DEATH; ETERNAL; ETERNITY; HEAVEN; IMMORTALITY; LIFE; MAN; RESURRECTION; SALVATION; SAVIOUR; SIN; SPIRIT, &c.

* South (Heb. dārôm [= bright, sunny region, Ges.], negeb [= dry, parched quarter, Fū., Ges.], teymân [= what is on the right hand, Ges.], &c.; Gr. notos [= the south wind, strictly the southwest wind, Rbn. N. T. Lex.], mesēmbria [= mid-day, noon, Rbn. N. T. Lex.] in Acts viii. 26), that quarter of the heavens or earth which was on the right hand of a person facing the EAST (Gen. xii. 9; 1 Sam. xxiii. 19; Job ix. 9; Eccl. i. 6; Mat. xii. 42; Acts viii. 26, &c.). "The South" or "the South Country" (Heb. negeb) is often used for the southern part of Judah, or the land from southern Canaan to Arabia Petrea and Egypt (Gen. xx. 1, xxiv. 62; Num. xiii. 29; Jer. xxxii. 44, &c.); sometimes for Egypt (Dan. xi. 5-40; Is. xxx. 6 [so Gesenius, &c.]); in one prophecy (uttered in the land of the Chaldeans) for the land of Israel and especially Jerusalem (Ez. xx. 46, 47). "The queen of the south" (Mat. xii. 42; Lk. xi. 31) = the queen of SHEBA IN ARABIA (1 K. x. 2; 2 Chr. ix. 1 (I.); WIND).

Sow, SWINE.

Sower, Sowing. The operation of sowing with the hand needs little description. The Egyptian paintings furnish many illustrations of the mode in which it was conducted. (AGRICULTURE.) The sower held the vessel or basket containing the seed, in his left hand, while with his right he scattered the seed broadcast. The "drawing out" of the seed, i. e. (so Gesenius) the scattering it regularly along the furrows, is noticed in Ps. cxxvi. 6 (A. V. "precious") and Am. ix. 13 margin. The sowing season commenced in October and continued to the end of February, wheat being put in before, and barley after the beginning of January. PALESTINE, Climate.

Spain (fr. Gr. Spania; L. Hispania; derived from Heb. or Phœnician shaphān = land of rabbits, Boch.; see CONY; or from the Basque Ezpaña, descriptive of its position on the edge of the continent of Europe, W. von Humboldt), a well-known country in the southwest of Europe. Its earliest inhabitants known to the Greeks and Romans were the Iberians, the country itself being called Iberia. From the mixture of the Iberians and of the Celts, who had invaded the country, came the Celtiberians. About B. C. 1000 the Phœnicians came to Spain and founded Tartessus (TARSHISH), Gades (now Cadiz), &c. After them came the Greeks, and founded Saguntum, &c. After the first Punic war (ROME) the Carthaginians established themselves in Spain, founding New Carthage (now Carthagenā), &c., but were expelled by the Romans B. C. 206, who, however, did not complete their conquest of the peninsula (including the modern Portugal) till B. C. 19. The country became one of the principal seats of Roman civilization and literature. The Christianization of the country, early begun, was considered complete in Constantine's time. The dissolution of the ROMAN EMPIRE called into Spain several German tribes, the Sævi, the Alans, and the Vandals. The Romans invited to their aid the Visigoths, who in A. D. 471 put an end to the Roman dominion, and in 586, having just subdued the whole country, adopted the ROMAN Catholic faith. In 711-716 the Arabs (ARABIA) or Moors conquered all but some mountain-districts in the northwest where a Gothic kingdom was maintained, called at first the kingdom of Oviedo, afterward (grown more extensive) the kingdom of Asturias, and (still later) of Leon. Other kingdoms, Castile, Navarre, Catalonia, Aragon, Galicia, Portugal, &c., also arose at different times. At the end of the fifteenth century the marriage of Ferdinand of Aragon and Isabella of Castile united the whole of Christian Spain into one kingdom. The Moors were expelled from the kingdom of Granada, their last possession in Spain, in 1491-2. The Jews were also expelled from Spain by Ferdinand about the same time. (THESSALONICA.) In 1492, under Spanish patronage, Christopher Columbus discovered America, after which Spain became one of the leading powers of Europe. (For further details, see New American Cyclopædia, article Spain.)—The Hebrews were acquainted with the position and the mineral wealth of Spain from the time of SOLOMON. (TARSHISH.) The fame of the Roman wars in Spain is mentioned in 1 Mc. viii. 3. The intention of St. PAUL to visit Spain (Rom. xv. 24, 28) implies the establishment of a Christian community in that country, and this by means of Hellenistic Jews resident there.

Sparrow (Heb. tsippôr; Gr. strouthion). This Hebrew word occurs forty times in the O. T. In all passages except two it is rendered by A. V. indifferently "bird" or "fowl." In Ps. lxxiv. 3 (Heb. 4), and Ps. cii. 7 (Heb. 8), also in Lev. xiv. 4 margin, the A. V. renders it "sparrow." The Greek equivalent strouthion (Mat. x. 29, 31; Lk. xii. 6, 7) is rendered uniformly "sparrows" in A. V. and passeres (L. = sparrows) in the Vulgate. The Heb. tsippôr, from a root signifying to chirp or twitter, appears to be a phonetic representation of the call-note of any passerine bird. In few parts of the world are the species of passerine birds more numerous or more abundant than in Palestine. A very cursory survey has supplied a list of above 100 different species of this order. Although the common sparrow of England (Passer domesticus, or Fringilla domestica, Linn.) does not occur in the Holy Land, its place is abundantly supplied by two very closely allied Southern species (Passer salicicola, Vieill., and Passer cinalpina, Tem.). The English tree-sparrow (Passer montanus, Linn.) is also very common, and may be seen in numbers on Mount Olivet, and also about the sacred enclosure of the mosque of Omar. This is perhaps the exact species referred to in Ps. lxxiv. 3 (so Mr. Tristram, original author of this article). Its habits in the East are like those of the common house-sparrow of England. Most of the commoner small birds of England are found in Palestine. The starling, chaffinch, greenfinch, linnet, goldfinch, corn-bunting, pipit, English blackbird, song-thrush, and the various species of wagtail abound. The wood-lark (Alauda arborea, Linn.), crested lark (Galerida cristata, Boie.), Calandra lark (Melanocorypha calandra, Bp.), short-toed lark (Calandrella brachydactyla, Kaup.), Isabel lark (Alauda Deserti, Licht.), and various other desert-species, which are snared in great numbers for the markets, are far more numerous on the southern plains than the sky-lark in England. In the olive-yards, and among the brushwood of the hills are found the Ortolan bunting (Emberiza hortulana, Linn.), and especially Cretschmaer's bunting (Emberiza caesia, Cretz.). As most of the English warblers (Sylvia) are summer migrants, and have a wide eastern range, it was to be expected that they should occur in Syria; and accordingly upward of twenty of those on the British list have been noted there, including the robin, redstart, whitethroat, blackcap, nightingale, willow-wren, Dartford warbler, whinchat, and stonechat. Besides these, the Palestine lists contain fourteen more southern species, including the little fantail (Cisticola schaeincola, Bp.), the orphee (Curruca orphaea, Boie.), and the Sardinian warbler (Sylvia melanocephala, Lath.). The chats (Saxicola), represented in Britain by the wheatear, whinchat, and stonechat, are very numerous in the southern parts of the country. At least nine species have been observed, their favorite resort being the hill-country of Judea. Yet they are not recognized among the Bedouin inhabitants by any name to distinguish them from the larks. The rock-sparrow (Petronia atula, Strickl.) is a common bird in the barer portions of Palestine, eschewing woods, and generally to be seen perched alone on the top of a rock or on any large stone. From this habit it has been conjectured to be the bird alluded to in Ps. cii. 7, as "the sparrow that sitteth alone upon the housetop;" but as the rock-sparrow, though found among ruins, never resorts to inhabited buildings, more probably the bird to which the psalmist alludes is the blue thrush (Petroscopus cyaneus, Boie.), which is often seen perched on houses and especially on out-buildings in the villages of Judea, and is a solitary bird, eschewing the society of its own species, rarely more than a pair being seen together. Among the most conspicuous of the small birds of Palestine are the shrikes, or butcher-birds (Lanius), there represented by at least five species, all abundantly and generally distributed, viz. Enneoclonus rufus, Bp.; the woodchat shrike, Lanius meridionalis, Linn.; Lanius minor, Linn.; Lanius personatus, Tem.; and Telephonus cucullatus, Gr.—There are but two allusions to the singing of birds in the Scripture (Eccl. xii. 4; Ps. civ. 12). As the psalmist is here speaking of the sides of streams and rivers ("By them," &c.), he probably had in his mind the bulbul of the country, or Palestine nightingale (Ixos xanthopygius, Hempr.), which is a bird not very far removed from the thrush tribe, abounds in all the wooded districts of Palestine, and especially by the banks of the Jordan, and is a lovely songster, its notes, for volume and variety, surpassing those of the nightingale of England. With the exception of the RAVEN tribe, which feed on carrion, there is no prohibition in the Levitical law against any passerine birds being used as food. Small birds were therefore probably as ordinary an article of consumption among the Israelites, as they still are in the markets both of the Continent and of the East (Lk. xii. 6; Mat. x. 29).—Four or five simple methods of fowling practised at this day in Palestine are probably identical with those alluded to in the O. T. The simplest, but by no means the least successful, among the dexterous Bedouins, is fowling with the throw-stick. The only weapon used is a short stick, about eighteen inches long and half an inch in diameter. When the game has been discovered, which is generally the red-legged great partridge (Caccabis saxatilis, Mey.), the desert partridge (Anmoperdix Heji, Gr.), or the little bustard (Otias tetraz, Linn.), the stick is hurled with a revolving motion so as to strike the legs of the bird as it runs, or sometimes at a rather higher elevation, so that when the victim, alarmed by the approach of the weapon, begins to rise, its wings are struck, and it is slightly disabled. The fleet pursuers soon come up, and, using their burnouses or cloaks, as a sort of net, catch and at once cut the throat of the game. A more scientific method of fowling is that alluded to in Ecclus. xi. 80, by the use of decoy birds. Whether falconry was ever employed as a mode of fowling or not is by no means so clear. At the present day it is practised with much care and skill by the Arab inhabitants of Syria, though not in Judea proper. CAGE; FOWL; GIN; HUNTING; NEST; NET; PALESTINE; Zoology; SNARE.

Sparta (L. fr. Gr.; said to have been named from the wife of Lacedæmon, its founder and king, the people and country being called after his name), a celebrated city of ancient Greece, and the capital of Laconia. It was long the rival of Athens. It was situated in a fertile valley on the Eurotas about twenty miles from the sea. The laws of Lycurgus (adopted, according to Grote, about B. C. 825) made the Lacedæmonians a nation of professional soldiers. They recognized three classes of persons: (a.) the Spartans, all warriors, and monopolizing all public offices; (b.) the Laconians or freemen of neighboring towns; (c.) the helots or serfs. (SLAVE.) There were two hereditary kings, who reigned jointly, but with gradually decreasing powers, and two legislative assemblies, one of the kings and twenty-eight elders, the other of the citizens. The Ephors, corresponding to the Roman tribunes, were the representatives of the popular assembly, and exercised despotic authority during the Peloponnesian war. The Spartans conquered a large part of Greece. In the war with the Persians B. C. 480 and 479, and for some time previously, they had the leadership of Greece. B. C. 476 the leadership passed to Athens, but the long Peloponnesian war (B. C. 431–404) terminated with the conquest of Athens, and the restoration of the leadership to Sparta. After the battles of Leuctra and Mantinea (B. C. 371 and 362), it ceased to be a leading state. The city was taken by the Achæans and Macedonians B. C. 221, and came under the Roman power B. C. 146. Its site is now occupied by two villages (Magula and Psychiko), by the town of New Sparta (built since the revolution on one of the Spartan hills), and by corn-fields and gardens (see New Amer. Cyr., art. Sparta).—In the history of the MACCABEES, it is said that when Jonathan endeavored to strengthen his government by foreign alliances (about B. C. 144), he sent to Sparta to renew a friendly intercourse which had been begun at an earlier time between AREUS and ONIAS, on the ground of their common descent from Abraham (1 Mc. xii. 5–23); that the embassy was favorably received, and after the death of Jonathan “the friendship and league” was renewed with Simon (xiv. 16–23). In regard to this correspondence, respecting which there has been much discussion, Mr. Westcott observes—1. The whole context of the passage, as well as the independent reference to the connection of the “Lacedæmonians” and Jews in 2 Mc. v. 9, seems to prove clearly that the reference is to the Spartans, properly so called. 2. The actual relationship of the Jews and Spartans (2 Mc. v. 9) is an ethnological error, which it is difficult to trace to its origin. Possibly the Jews regarded the Spartans as the representatives of the Pelasgi, the supposed descendants of Peleg the son of Eber. A Jewish colony existed at Sparta at an early time (1 Mc. xv. 23). 3. The incorrectness of the opinion on which the intercourse was based is obviously no objection to the fact of the intercourse itself. But it is urged that the letters said to have been exchanged are evidently not genuine, since they betray their fictitious origin negatively by the absence of characteristic forms of expression, and positively by actual inaccuracies. To this it may be replied that the Spartan letters (xii. 20–23, xiv. 20–23) are extremely brief, and exist only in a translation of a translation, so that it is unreasonable to expect that any Doric peculiarities should have been preserved. On the other hand the absence of the name of the second king of Sparta in the first letter (xii. 20), and of both kings in the second (xiv. 20), is probably to be explained by the political circumstances under which the letters were written. 4. The difficulty of fixing the date of the first correspondence is increased by the recurrence of the names involved. Two kings bore the name Areus, one of whom reigned A. C. 309–265, and the other, his grandson, died A. C. 257, being only eight years old. The same name was also borne by an adventurer, who occupied a prominent position at Sparta, about A. C. 184. In Judea, again, three high-priests bore the name Onias, the first of whom held office B. C. 330–309 (or 300); the second B. C. 240–226; and the third about A. C. 198–171. Josephus is probably correct in fixing the event in the time of Onias III.

Spear. ARMS, I. 2.

Spear-men, the A. V. translation of the Gr. plural dexiolaboi (literally those taking the right), a rare word, found in the N. T. only in Acts xxiii. 23. Two hundred dexiolaboi formed part of the escort which accompanied St. PAUL in the night march from Jerusalem to Cesarea. They are clearly distinguished both from the heavy-armed legionaries, who only went as far as Antipatris, and from the cavalry, who continued the journey to Cesarea. Probably they were irregular light-armed troops, so lightly armed, indeed, as to be able to keep pace on the march with mounted soldiers (so Mr. Wright). ARMS; ARMY.

* Spelt. RYE.

Splice, Splice-y, Splices. Under this head may be noticed—1. Heb. bisām, bāsem, or bōsem. The first-named form, which occurs only in Cant. v. 1, “I have gathered my myrrh with my spice," points apparently to some definite substance. In the other places where bescm or bâsem occurs (Ex. xxv. 6, xxx. 23 [A. V. once "spices," twice "sweet"], xxxv.

Balm of Gilead (Amyris Gileadensis).

8, 28; 1 K. x. 2, 10 twice, 25; 2 K. xx. 13; 1 Chr. ix. 29, 30; 2 Chr. ix. 1, 9 twice, 24, xvi. 14 [A. V. "sweet odors"], xxxii. 27; Esth. ii. 12 [A. V. "sweet odors"]; Cant. iv. 10, 14, 16, v. 13, vi. 2, viii. 14;

Tragacanth (Astragalus Tragacantha).

Is. lii. 24 [A. V. "smell"], xxxix. 2; Ez. xxvii. 22), except perhaps Cant. v. 13, vi. 2, the word refers more generally to sweet aromatic odors, the principal of which was that of the balsam, or balm of Gilead; the tree which yields this substance is now generally admitted to be the Amyris (Balsamodendron) Opobalsamum, or Amyris (Balsamodendron) Gileadensis,<sup>1</sup> allied to that which yields MYRRH. The balm of Gilead tree grows in some parts of Arabia and Africa, and is seldom more than fifteen feet high, with straggling branches and scanty foliage. The balsam is chiefly obtained from incisions in the bark, but the substance is procured also from the green and ripe berries. (OIL-TREE.)—2. Heb. nichôth (Gen. xxxvii. 25 ["spicery"], xliii. 11 ["spices"]); most probably = the Arabic naka'at, i. e. "the gum obtained from the Tragacanth" (Astragalus), several species of which genus occur in Palestine. The gum is a natural exudation from the trunk and branches of the plant. (PALESTINE, Botany.) It is uncertain whether the Heb. nichôth in 2 K. xx. 13 and Is. xxxix. 2 (A. V. "the house of his precious things," margin "spicery" [after Aquila, Symmachus, and Vulgate]) denotes spice of any kind. Gesenius, Fürst, Keil, with the Chaldee, Syriac, &c., render treasure, or (with "house") storehouse.—3. Heb. plural sammim (margin of Ex. xxx. 7 and 2 Chr. ii. 4 [Heb. 3]; "sweet spices" in Ex. xxx. 34 twice; usually "sweet," sc. incense or spices, as in Ex. xiv. 6, xxxi. 11, xxxv. 8, 15, 28, xxxvii. 29, &c.), a general term to denote those aromatic substances which were used in the preparation of the anointing oil, the incense offerings, &c.—4. Gr. arôma, in N. T. only in plural arômata (Lk. xxiii. 56, xxiv. 1; Jn. xix. 40; A. V. "sweet spices" in Mk. xvi. 1). The spices mentioned as used by Nicodemus for the preparation of our Lord's body (Jn. xix. 39, 40) are "MYRRH and ALOES," the latter = the highly-scented wood of the Aquilaria agallochum. CASSIA; CINNAMON; EMBALMING; FRANKINCENSE; GALBANUM; MASTICH; ONYCHIA; SPIKENARD; STACTE.

Spî'der, the A. V. representative of—1. Heb. acôd-bîsh (Job viii. 14; Is. lix. 5). Both passages allude to the fragile nature of the spider's web, which, though admirably suited to fulfil all the requirements of the animal, is yet most easily torn by any violence offered to it. In Isaiah (l. c.) there is probably allusion also to the spider's habit of lurking for his prey. Spiders (family Araneidae of naturalists) are found in every habitable portion of the globe, but are largest in warm climates. They all devour living prey, sucking the juices and sometimes swallowing the fragments. (SCORPION.)—2. Heb. sêm-mîth, found only in Prov. xxx. 28, probably (so Mr. Houghton, with Bochart, Gesenius, Fürst, and most) = some kind of LIZARD. Mr. Houghton regards it as some species of gecko. Mr. Gosse (in Fairbairn) favors the A. V.

Spîke'nard [usually pronounced spîk'nard] (Heb. nêrd; Gr. nardos), an aromatic substance mentioned in Cant. i. 12, iv. 13, 14. The ointment with which our Lord was anointed as He sat at meat in Simon's house at Bethany consisted of this precious substance (in margin of Mk. xiv. 3, "pure nard, or liquid nard"), the costliness of which may be inferred from the indignant surprise manifested by some of the witnesses of the transaction (Mk. xiv. 3-5; Jn. xii. 3, 5). Dr. Royle having ascertained that the jatamansee, one of the Hindoo synonyms for the sunbul (Ar. = Gr. nardos, Sir William Jones), was annually brought from the mountains overhanging the Ganges and Jumna Rivers down to the plains, purchased some of these fresh roots and planted them in the botanic gardens at Saharunpore, in N. India. This plant, the Nardostachys Jatamansi of De Candolle, is evidently the nardos described by Dioscorides under the name of "the Ganges nard."

Spikenard (Nardostachys jatamansi).

It is allied to valerian, and is highly esteemed throughout the East as a perfume and stimulant medicine. The permanent, hair-like fibres of the leaf and footstalk give it some resemblance to the tail of an ermine, to which the Arabs have likened it. The name "spikenard" has also been given to other aromatic plants, in England to the Andropogon Nardus of India, which is allied to lemon grass (REED 4), and in the United States to the Aralia racemosa, an herb with a thick root allied to ginseng. ALABASTER; OINTMENT; PERFUMES.

Spinning is mentioned in the Bible in Ex. xxxv. 25, 26, and in Mat. vi. 28 and Lk. xii. 27. Prov. xxxi. 19 implies (according to the A. V., Stuart, Fürst, &c.) the use of the same instruments which have been in vogue for hand-spinning down to the present day, viz. the distaff (round which the flax or wool for spinning was wound) and spindle (on which the yarn or thread was wound in spinning). The distaff, however, appears to have been dispensed with, and the term so rendered means the spindle itself (so Mr. Bevan, with Gesenius, &c.), while that rendered "spindle" represents the whirl of the spindle, a button of circular rim which was affixed to it, and gave steadiness to its circular motion. The spindle was held perpendicularly in the one hand, while the other was employed in drawing out the thread. DRESS; HANDICRAFT; WEAVING; WOMEN.

* Spirit (fr. L. spiritus), the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. neshâmâh twice (Job xxvi. 4; Prov. xx. 27), literally, like the L. spiritus, = "breath." (SOUL 3.)—2. Heb. and Chal. ruah or rûach more than 200 times (Gen. i. 2, vi. 3, xli. 8, 38, &c., &c.). Gesenius thus arranges the meanings of the Hebrew word: (1.) breath, a breathing, blowing, i. e. (a.) breath of the nostrils, a snuffing, snorting (A. V. "breath" in Job iv. 9 and Ps. xviii. 15 [Heb. 16]); hence anger ("anger" in Judg. viii. 3; "spirit" in Prov. xvi. 32 and Zech. vi. 8; "blast" in Is. xxv. 4; "breath" in xxx. 28), also pride ("spirit" in Ps. lxxvi. 12 [Heb. 13]); (b.) breath of the mouth, spoken of God's creative "breath" in Ps. xxxiii. 6, of drawing

"breath" in Job ix. 18, of the vital "breath" in Gen. vi. 17, vii. 15, 22, as an emblem of any thing transient in Job vii. 7 (A. V. "wind"); (c.) breath of air, i. e. a slight breeze ("wind" in Job xxviii. 23 and Jer. ii. 24; "AIR" in Job xli. 8 [Heb. 16]; "cool" [margin "wind"] in Gen. iii. 8), oftener a strong wind (A. V. "wind" in Gen. viii. 1 and Is. xvii. 13), also a tempest, hurricane ("wind" in 1 K. xix. 11 thrice and Is. xxvii. 8), wind likewise denoting a side or quarter of the heavens ("quarter" in 1 Chr. ix. 24; "side" in Ez. xlii. 16 [margin "wind"] ff.; "wind" in Zech. ii. 6 [Heb. 10]), and any thing vain or empty ("wind" in Is. xli. 29 and Jer. v. 13; "vain" in Job xvi. 3 [margin "of wind"]<sup>1</sup>), and wind or tempest tropically = an invading army in Jer. iv. 11, 12 (A. V. "wind"); (2.) the vital breath, spirit, life, the principle of life in men and beasts as embodied and manifested in the breath of the mouth and nostrils (A. V. "breath" in Job xii. 10 and Ez. xxxvii. 8; "spirit" in Gen. xlv. 27 and Eccl. iii. 21 twice); (3.) the rational soul, mind, spirit, (a.) as the seat of the affections, emotions, and passions of various kinds ("spirit" in Gen. xli. 8 and Prov. xxv. 28; "mind" in Gen. xxvi. 35 and Prov. xxix. 11); (b.) in reference to the disposition, the mode of feeling and acting ("spirit" in Ez. xi. 11, xviii. 31 and Is. xix. 14); (c.) of will, counsel, purpose ("spirit" in Ezr. i. 1; "mind" in Ez. xx. 32); (d.) more rarely of the understanding, intellect ("spirit" in Ex. xxviii. 3), spirit being used absolutely for courage (A. V. "courage" in Josh. ii. 11; "spirit" in v. 1), or genius ("spirit" in Job xxxii. 8, 18); (4.) the Spirit of God or of Jehovah which pervades the universe, animates and fills it with life, through which God governs and protects the world and also mankind, and invites to a life of virtue and holiness (Gen. i. 2; Job xxxiii. 4; Ps. cxxxix. 7; Is. lxiii. 14), rarely called His Holy Spirit (Ps. li. 11 [Heb. 13]; Is. lxiii. 10, 11), to which the O. T. ascribes all extraordinary gifts and powers of mind (Ex. xxxi. 3; Num. xxiv. 2; Judg. iii. 10; 1 Sam. xvi. 13 f.; Is. lix. 21), spoken also of an evil spirit which passed from God to SATAN (1 Sam. xvi. 14 ff.), and of an unclean spirit which inspired false prophets (1 K. xxii. 21 ff.; Zech. xiii. 2); sometimes contrasted with FLESH (Is. xxxi. 3).—3. Heb. ôb in part, A. V. "familiar spirit." (DIVINATION 5.)—4. Gr. pneuma nearly 800 times in N. T., translated "ghost" nearly 100 times, once "wind" (Jn. iii. 8 a), once "spiritual" (1 Cor. xiv. 12), once "spiritually" (Rom. viii. 6), once "life" (Rev. xiii. 13). Robinson (N. T. Lex.) thus arranges the significations of the Greek word (compare No. 2, for which it is used in the LXX.), and their corresponding passages: (I.) A breathing, breath—(1.) Of the mouth or nostrils, a breathing, blast (2 Th. ii. 8), the vital breath (Rev. xi. 11); (2.) Of air, air in motion, a breeze, blast, the wind (Jn. iii. 8 ["wind"]; Heb. i. 7). (II.) The spirit of man, i. e. (1.) The vital spirit, life, soul, the principle of life residing in the breath, breathed into man from God and again returning to God (Mat. xxvii. 50; Lk. viii. 55, xiii. 46; Jn. xix. 30; Acts vii. 59; Jas. ii. 26; Rev. xiii. 15 [A. V. "life"]), tropically in Jn. vi. 63 twice and 1 Cor. xv. 45; (2.) The rational spirit, mind, soul—(a.) generally as opposed to the body and animal spirit (Lk. i. 47; Jn. iv. 23, 24 b; Rom. i. 9, ii. 29, viii. 10, 16 b; 1 Cor. v. 3-5, vi. 20, vii. 34; 2 Cor. vii. 1; Gal. vi. 18; Phil. iii. 3; Col. ii. 5; 1 Th. v. 23; 2 Tim. iv. 22; Phn. 25; Heb. iv. 12, xii. 9; 1 Pet. iv. 6); (b.) as the seat of the affections, emotions, passions of various kinds (Mat. v. 3; Mk. viii.

12; Lk. i. 17, x. 21; Jn. xi. 33, xiii. 21; Acts xvii. 16, xviii. 25; Rom. xii. 11; 1 Cor. xvi. 18; 2 Cor. 11, 13 [Gr. 12], vii. 13); (c.) as referring to disposition, feeling, temper of mind, "spirit" (Lk. ix. 55; Rom. xvii. 15 a, xi. 8; 1 Cor. iv. 21, xiv. 14, 15 twice, 16; 2 Cor. iv. 13, xi. 4, xii. 18; Gal. vi. 1; Eph. iv. 23; Phil. i. 27, ii. 1; 2 Tim. i. 7; 1 Pet. ii. 4); (d.) as implying will, counsel, purpose (Mat. xxvii. 41; Mk. xiv. 38; Acts xviii. 5, xix. 21, xx. 22); (e.) as including the understanding, intellect (Mk. ii. 8; Lk. i. 80, ii. 40; 1 Cor. ii. 11 a, 12 a). (III.) A spirit, i. e. a simple, incorporeal, immaterial being, possessing higher capacities than man in his present state; spoken (A) Of created spirits, viz. (1.) Of the human spirit, soul, after its departure from the body and as existing in a separate state (Acts xxiii. 8; Heb. xii. 23; 1 Pet. iii. 19); of the soul of a person reappearing after death, a spirit, ghost, (Lk. xxiv. 37, 39; Acts xxiii. 9); (2.) an evil spirit, demon (Mat. viii. 16, x. 1, xii. 43, 45; Mk. i. 23, 26, 27, iii. 11, 80, v. 2, 8, 13, vi. 7, vii. 25, ix. 17, 20, 23 twice; Lk. iv. 33, 36, vi. 18, vii. 21, viii. 2, 29, ix. 39, 42, x. 20, xi. 24, 26, xiii. 11; Acts v. 16, viii. 7, xvi. 16, 18, xix. 12, 13, 15, 16; Eph. ii. 2 [= SATAN]; Rev. xvi. 13, 14, xviii. 2); (3.) less often in pl. of ANGELS, as God's ministering spirits (Heb. i. 14; Rev. i. 4, iii. 1, iv. 5, v. 6). (B) Of God in reference to His immateriality (Jn. iv. 24). (C) Of JESUS CHRIST in His exalted spiritual nature in distinction from His human nature (Rom. i. 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16; 1 Pet. iii. 18). (D) Of "the Spirit of God" or "the Spirit of the Lord," also called "the Holy Ghost," "the Holy Spirit," "the Spirit," and (as sent or communicated by Christ after His resurrection and ascension) "the Spirit of Christ," represented in the N. T. as in intimate union with God the Father and Son, as proceeding from and sent forth by Them, as possessing the same attributes and performing the same acts with God the Father and Son. The N. T. passages under this signification may be divided into two classes: (1.) The Holy Spirit, as existing, as a Divine agent, &c. (a.) joined with God or the Father, and Christ the Lord, the Son, with the same or with different predicates (Mat. xxviii. 19; 1 Cor. xii. 4 [compare 5, 6]; 2 Cor. xiii. 14 [Gr. 13]; 1 Pet. i. 2; Jude 20; 1 Jn. v. 7; JOHN, FIRST EPISTLE OR); (b.) spoken in connection with or in reference to God, or the Father (Jn. iii. 5, 6, 8 b [compare i. 13], xv. 26; Acts i. 16 [compare iv. 24, 25], v. 3, 9 [compare 4], vii. 51 [compare 52], xxviii. 25 [compare Is. vi. 8, 11]; Rom. viii. 9 b, 11 twice; 1 Cor. ii. 10 b, 11 b, iii. 16, vi. 19, xii. 11 [compare 7]; Eph. vi. 17; 2 Tim. i. 14 [compare 2 Cor. vi. 16]; Heb. iii. 7 [compare Ps. xc. 7], ix. 9 [compare i. 1], x. 15 [compare Jer. xxxi. 31]); (c.) spoken in connection with or in reference to Christ (Mat. iii. 16; Mk. i. 10; Lk. xii. 22; Jn. i. 32, 33; Rom. ix. 1, xv. 30; 1 Cor. vi. 11; 2 Cor. iii. 17 twice, 18; Heb. x. 29 [compare the passages in b above with Jn. xiv. 23, xv. 4; 2 Cor. xiii. 5; Eph. iii. 17]); (d.) as coming to and acting on men, Christians, exerting in and upon them an enlightening, strengthening, sanctifying influence (Mat. x. 20; Mk. xiii. 11; Lk. xii. 12; Jn. xiv. 17, 26, xv. 26, xvi. 13; Acts i. 8, ix. 31, x. 19, xi. 12, xx. 23, 23; xxi. 11; Rom. viii. 14, 16 a, 26 twice, 27, xiv. 17, xv. 13, 16; 1 Cor. ii. 10 [compare b above], 13, 14; 2 Cor. i. 22, iii. 17 [compare c above, and 2 c below], v. 5; Eph. iii. 16, iv. 30, vi. 18; 1 Th. i. 6; 2 Th. ii. 13; 1 Tim. iv. 1 a; Jas. iv. 5; 1 Pet. i. 22; Rev. ii. 7, 11, 17, 29, iii. 6, 13, 22, xiv. 13, xxii. 17); (2.) Metonymically, the Holy Spirit, put for the effects and consequences of the agency and operations of the Spirit of God, i. e. a Divine influence, a Divine energy or power, an inspiration, resulting from the immediate agency of the Holy Spirit; spoken (a.) of that physical procreative energy exerted in the miraculous conception of Jesus (Mat. i. 18, 20; Lk. i. 35), and in the conception of Isaac out of the ordinary course of nature (Gal. iv. 29); (b.) of that special Divine influence, inspiration, energy, which rested upon and existed in Jesus after the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Him at His baptism (Mat. iv. 1; xii. 18, 28 [compare Lk. xi. 20], 31, 32; Mk. i. 12, iii. 29; Lk. iv. 1 twice [compare iii. 22], 14, 18 [compare Is. lxi. 1], xii. 10; Jn. iii. 34; Acts i. 2, x. 38; Heb. ix. 14; 1 Jn. v. 6 twice, 8; comp. C above); (c.) of that Divine influence by which prophets and holy men were excited, when they are said to have spoken or acted in or through the Spirit, i. e. by inspiration (Mat. xxii. 43; Mk. xii. 36; Lk. i. 15, 41, 67, ii. 25-27; 1 Pet. i. 11; 2 Pet. i. 21; Rev. i. 10, iv. 2, xvii. 3, xix. 10, xxi. 10), by which Christians are taught, enlightened, guided, in respect to faith and practice (Lk. xi. 13; Jn. vii. 39 twice [compare xvi. 13, 14]; Rom. v. 5; 1 Cor. xii. 8 twice; 2 Cor. iii. 3; Gal. v. 5; Tit. iii. 5; Heb. vi. 4; 1 Pet. iv. 14), with which Christ's disciples are said to be baptized, i. e. richly furnished with spiritual gifts (Mat. xiii. 11; Mk. i. 8; Lk. iii. 16; Jn. i. 33 b; and see d below); emphatically as the Spirit of the Gospel, put for the Gospel in opposition to the letter of the Mosaic Law (2 Cor. iii. 6 twice, 8 [comp. ver. 17, and 1 d above]); (d.) of that influence of the Spirit by which the apostles were originally qualified to act as preachers and directors of the Church of Christ (Jn. xx. 22, compare 23), specially of that powerful energy and inspiration imparted by the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost and afterward, by which the apostles and early Christian teachers were endowed with high supernatural qualifications for their work, e. g. a full knowledge of Gospel truth, the power of prophesying, of working miracles, of speaking with tongues, &c., sometimes with special reference to holy boldness, energy, and zeal, in speaking and acting, or to support and comfort, Christian joy and triumph (Acts i. 5 [compare 8], ii. 4 twice, 17, 18, 33, 38, iv. 8, 31, v. 32, vi. 3, 5, 10 [compare 8], vii. 55, viii. 15, 17-18, 29, 39 [compare Mat. iv. 1], ix. 17, x. 44, 45, 47, xi. 15, 16, 24, 28, xiii. 2, 4, 9, 52, xv. 8, 28, xvi. 6, 7, xix. 2 twice, 6, xxi. 4; Rom. xv. 19; 1 Cor. ii. 4, vii. 40, xii. 7, 8 twice, 9 twice, 18 twice [compare 8, 9], xiv. 2, 32 [compare 33]; Gal. iii. 2, 3, 5, 14; Eph. i. 13, iii. 5, v. 18; Phil. i. 19; 1 Th. i. 5, iv. 8, v. 19 [compare 2 Tim. i. 6]; Heb. ii. 4; 1 Pet. i. 12); in the pl. spiritual gifts (1 Cor. xiv. 12, A. V. "spiritual gifts"); (e.) of that Divine influence by which the temper or disposition of mind in Christians is affected, or rather the spirit, temper, disposition of mind produced in Christians by the influences of the Holy Spirit, which corrects, elevates, ennobles, sanctifies their views and feelings, fills the mind with peace and joy, and is the pledge and foretaste of everlasting happiness; e. g. as opposed to "the flesh" (Jn. iii. 6 b; Rom. viii. 1, 2, 4, 5 twice, 6 [A. V. "to be spiritually minded;" margin, more literally, "the minding of the spirit"], 9 a, 13; 1 Cor. vi. 17; Gal. v. 16, 17 twice, 18, 22, 25 twice; vi. 8 twice); in a general sense (Rom. vii. 6, viii. 9 c [compare Eph. iii. 17], 15 b, 23; 1 Cor. ii. 12 b; 2 Cor. vi. 6; Gal. iv. 6; Eph. i. 17, ii. 18, 22, iv. 3, 4, v. 9 [in the common text]; Col. i. 8; 1 Tim. iv. 12; 1 Jn. iii. 24, iv. 13; Jude 19); (3.) Metonymi-cally, of a person or teacher acting, or professing to act, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, by Divine inspiration (1 Cor. xii. 3 a, 10, xiv. 32; 2 Th. ii. 2; 1 Tim. iv. 1 b; 1 Jn. iv. 1 twice, 2 twice, 3, 6 twice).—5. Gr. phantasma = a phantasm, phantom, apparition, spoken of a spirit, spectre, ghost, Rbn. N. T. Lex. (Mat. xiv. 26; Mk. vi. 49). ANGELS; ARCHANGEL; DEMON; DEMONIACS; DEVIL; GHOST; GOD; IMMORTALITY; INSPIRATION; MAN; QUICKEN; RESURRECTION; SALVATION; SANCTIFICATION; SIN; SOUL: SPIRIT, THE HOLY; TONGUES, GIFT OF.

Spirit, the Holy, in the O. T. generally called "the Spirit of God" or "the Spirit of the Lord" (SPIRIT 2 [4]); in the N. T. "the Holy Spirit" or "the Holy Ghost;" sometimes also "the Spirit of God," "the Spirit" (SPIRIT 4, III., D), "the Comforter," &c. In accordance with what seems to be the general rule of Divine Revelation, that the knowledge of heavenly things is given more abundantly and more clearly in later ages, the person, attributes, and operations of the Holy Ghost are made known to us chiefly in the N. T. And in the light of such later revelation, words, which when heard by patriarchs and prophets were probably understood imperfectly by them, become full of meaning to Christians (so Mr. Bullock). In the N. T., both in the teaching of our Lord and in the narratives of the events which preceded His ministry and occurred in its course, the existence and agency of the Holy Spirit are frequently revealed, and are mentioned in such a manner as shows that these facts were part of the common belief of the Jewish people at that time. It was made plain to the understanding of the Jews of that age that the same Spirit who wrought of old among the people of God was still at work. But the Ascension of our Lord is marked (Eph. iv. 8; Jn. vii. 39, &c.) as the commencement of a new period in the history of the inspiration of men by the Holy Ghost. The interval between that period and the end of the world is often described as the Dispensation of the Spirit. Under the old dispensation the gifts of the Holy Spirit were uncovenanted, not universal, intermittent, chiefly external. All this was changed. Our Lord, by ordaining (Mat. xxviii. 19) that every Christian should be baptized in the name of the Holy Ghost, indicated at once the absolute necessity from that time forth of a personal connection of every believer with the Spirit; and (in Jn. xvi. 7-15) He declares the internal character of the Spirit's work, and (in xiv. 16, 17, &c.) His permanent stay. And subsequently the Spirit's operations under the new dispensation are authoritatively announced as universal and internal in Acts ii. 16-21 and Heb. viii. 8-12. GHOST; GOD; INSPIRATION; MIRACLES; PROPHECY; QUICKEN; REGENERATION; REVELATION; SANCTIFICATION; SON OF GOD; SPIRIT; TONGUES, GIFT OF, &c.

* Spill. BOORY; WAR.

Sponge [o as in son] (fr. Gr. spoungos), a well-known porous and fibrous elastic substance, mentioned only in the N. T. (Mat. xxvii. 48; Mk. xv. 36; Jn. xix. 29). Some naturalists regard the sponges as belonging to the vegetable kingdom; but other recent authorities regard them as belonging to the animal kingdom. They have, when living, an apparently homogeneous jelly filling their pores and covering their surface. The sponges of commerce come mostly from the Mediterranean and the Bahama Islands. They are usually procured by divers, as they adhere firmly to the bottom of the sea. The commercial value of the sponge was known from very early times; and probably it was used by the ancient Hebrews.

Common Sponge (Spongia officinalis).—(Fbn.)

* Spoon, the A. V. translation of Heb. capk (literally = palm or hollow of the hand) in Ex. xxxv. 29, xxxvii. 16; Num. iv. 7, vii. 14 ff.; 1 K. vii. 50; 2 K. xxv. 14; 2 Chr. iv. 22, xxiv. 14; Jer. lii. 18, 19. Fürst renders the Heb. "a pan, a dish, on account of the resemblance to the bent hand;" Gesenius says, "a hollow vessel, a pan, dish, censer." The precise meaning probably cannot now be ascertained, and the A. V. may be correct. BASIN.

* Sponge = SPONGE.

Stachys [-kis] (L. fr. Gr. = an ear of grain), a Christian at Rome, saluted by St. Paul in Rom. xvi. 9. A tradition makes him bishop of Byzantium before Onesimus for sixteen years.

Stacte (L. fr. Gr.; Heb. nátiph), one of the sweet spices which composed the holy incense (Ex. xxx. 34). The Hebrew word occurs once again (Job xxxvi. 27, A. V. "drops" of water). Celsius identifies the Hebrew word in Ex. i. c. with the purest kind of MYRRH; Rosenmüller, Gesenius, Kalisch, Dr. J. Hamilton (in Fbn.) identify it with the gum of the storax-tree (Styrax officinalis; POPLAR); Fürst makes it "an aromatic gum or resin;" and Mr. Houghton "an odorous distillation from some plant."

* Stall. BARN; HERD; MANGER.

Standard. ENSIGN.

* Star (Heb. côchab; Gr. astér, astron), a general name for any of the heavenly bodies, usually excepting the SUN and MOON (Gen. i. 16; Mat. ii. 2 ff.; Acts xxvii. 20, &c.). (ASTRONOMY; HEAVEN; STAR IN THE EAST, &c.) In Num. xiv. 17 "star" is used metaphorically. (MESSIAH.) The "morning star" in Rev. ii. 28, xxii. 16, is a symbol of splendor and glory. "Wandering stars" (i. e. meteors soon to be quenched, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) in Jude 13 symbolize false and erring teachers, heirs of perdition. According to Stuart, Robinson, &c., "star" in Rev. ix. 1, and perhaps elsewhere, symbolizes one of the ANGELS. "Seven stars" in Rev. i. 16, 20, ii. 1, iii. 1, symbolize the "angels" (= pastors or teachers?) of the seven churches in Asia.

Star of the Wise Men. Until the last few years the interpretation of Mat. ii. 1-12, by theologians in general, coincided in the main with that which would be given to it by any person of ordinary intelligence who read the account with due attention. Some supernatural light resembling a star had appeared in some country (possibly Persia) far to the E. of Jerusalem, to men who were versed in the study of celestial phenomena, conveying to their minds a supernatural impulse to repair to Jerusalem, where they would find a new-born king. (EAST; MAGI.) It supposed them to be followers, and possibly priests, of the Zend religion, whereby they were led to expect a Redeemer in the person of the Jewish infant. On arriving at Jerusalem, after diligent inquiry and consultation with the priests and learned men who could naturally best inform them, they are directed to proceed to Bethlehem. The star which they had seen in the East reappeared to them and preceded them, until it took up its station over the place where the young child was. The whole matter, that is, was supernatural. (JESUS CHRIST; MESSIAH.)—Latterly, however, a very different opinion has gradually become prevalent upon the subject. The star has been displaced from the category of the supernatural, and has been referred to the ordinary astronomical phenomenon of a conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn. The idea originated with Kepler, whose suggestion was worked out by Dr. Ideler of Berlin. In May, B. C. 7, a conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn occurred not far from the first point of Aries, the planets rising in Chaldea about 3½ hours before the sun. It is said that on astrological grounds such a conjunction could not fail to excite the attention of men like the Magi. Supposing them to have set out at the end of May, B. C. 7, upon a journey for which the circumstances will be seen to require at least seven months, the planets were observed to separate slowly until the end of July, when their motions becoming retrograde, they again came into conjunction by the end of September. At that time, there can be no doubt, Jupiter would present to astronomers, especially in so clear an atmosphere, a magnificent spectacle. It was then at its most brilliant apparition, for it was at its nearest approach both to the sun and to the earth. Not far from it would be seen its duller and much less conspicuous companion Saturn. This glorious spectacle continued almost unaltered for several days, when the planets again slowly separated, then came to a halt, when, by reassuring direct motion, Jupiter again approached to a conjunction for the third time with Saturn, just as the Magi may be supposed to have entered the Holy City. And, to complete the fascination of the tale, about an hour and a half after sunset, the two planets might be seen from Jerusalem, hanging as it were in the meridian, and suspended over Bethlehem in the distance. These celestial phenomena thus described are, it will be seen, beyond the reach of question, and at the first impression they assuredly appear to fulfil the conditions of the Star of the Magi.—The first circumstance which created a suspicion to the contrary, arose from an exaggeration on the part of Dr. Ideler himself, who described the two planets as wearing the appearance of one bright but diffused light to persons having weak eyes. Not only is this imperfect eyesight inflicted upon the Magi, but it is quite certain that, had they possessed any remains of eyesight at all, they could not have failed to see, not a single star, but two planets, at the very considerable distance of double the moon's apparent diameter. Alford (first edition of his Greek Testament) represents the planets as forming a single star of surpassing brightness. Exaggerations of this description induced Mr. Pritchard, the original writer of this article, to undertake the very formidable labor of calculating afresh an ephemeris of the planets Jupiter and Saturn, and of the sun, from May to December, B. C. 7. The result was to confirm the fact of there being three conjunctions during the above period, though somewhat to modify the dates assigned to them by Dr. Ideler. Similar results have also been obtained by Encke, and the December conjunction has also been confirmed by the Astronomer Royal. But—(a.) It is inconceivable that solely on the ground of astrological reasons men would undertake a seven months' journey. And as to the widely-spread and prevalent expectation of some powerful personage about to show himself in the East, the fact of its existence depends on the testimony of Tacitus, Suetonius, and Josephus. But all these writers speak of this expectation as applying to Vespasian, in A. D. 69, which date was seventy-five years, or two generations, after the conjunction in question! Furthermore, in February, B. C. 66, a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn occurred in the constellation Pisces, closer than the one on December 4, B. C. 7. (b.) On December 4, B. C. 7, the sun set at Jerusalem at 5 P. M. Supposing the Magi to have then commenced their journey to Bethlehem, they would first see Jupiter and his dull and somewhat distant companion an hour and a half distant from the meridian, in a S. E. direction, and decidedly to the E. of Bethlehem. By the time they came to Rachel's tomb the planets would be due S. of them, on the meridian, and no longer over the hill of Bethlehem, which is S. 13° E. from Rachel's tomb. The road then takes a turn to the E., and ascends the hill near to its western extremity; the planets, therefore, would now be on their right hands, and a little behind them: the "star," therefore, ceased altogether to go "before them" as a guide. Arrived on the hill and in the village, it became physically impossible for the star to stand over any house whatever close to them, seeing that it was now visible far away beyond the hill to the W., and far off in the heavens at an altitude of 57°. As they advanced, the star would of necessity recede, and under no circumstances could it be said to stand "over" any house, unless at the distance of miles from the place where they were. If the Magi had left the Jaffa gate before sunset, they would not have seen the planets at the outset; and if they had left Jerusalem later, the star would have been a more useless guide than before. Thus the beautiful phantasm of Kepler and Ideler vanishes before the more perfect daylight of investigation.

* Stars, pl. of STAR. "The Seven Stars" = PLEIADES.

Stater (Gr.; A. V. "a piece of money;" margin, "stater"). 1. The term stater is held to signify a coin of a certain weight, but perhaps means a standard coin (so Mr. R. S. Poole). The gold staters were didrachms (DIDRACHMA; DRACHM) of the later Phœnician and the Attic talents. Of the former talent were the Daric staters or Darics (DRAM); of the latter, the stater of Athens. Electrum staters, coined by the Greek towns on the western coast of Asia Minor, are of gold and silver mixed, three parts of gold to one of silver. Thus far the stater is always a didrachm. In silver, however, the term is applied to the tetradrachm of Athens, which was of the weight of two gold staters of the same currency. 2. In the N. T. the stater is once mentioned, in the narrative of the miracle of the sacred tribute-money (Mat. xvii. 27 margin). The stater must here mean a silver tetradrachm; and the only tetradrachms then current in Palestine were of the same weight as the Hebrew SHEKEL. And it is observable, in confirmation of the minute accuracy of the Evangelist, that at this period the silver currency in Palestine consisted of Greek imperial tetradrachms, or staters, and Roman denarii (PENNY) of a quarter their value, didrachms having fallen into disuse (so Mr. Poole).

Steel. In all cases where the word "steel" occurs in the A. V., the true rendering of the Hebrew (so Mr. Wright) is "COPPER." (BRASS.) Whether the ancient Hebrews were acquainted with steel, is not perfectly certain. It has been inferred from Jer. xv. 12, that the "IRON from the north" there spoken of denoted a superior kind of metal, hardened in an unusual manner, like the steel obtained from the Chalybes of the Pontus. The hardening of iron for cutting-instruments was practised in Pontus, Lydia, and Laconia. (AXE; KNIFE.) The Heb. palldah, which occurs only in Nah. ii. 3 (Heb. 4), and is rendered in A. V. "torches," most probably (so Mr. Wright, with Gesenius, Henderson, &c.) denotes steel or hardened iron, and refers to the flashing scythes of the Assyrian chariots. But First would translate in flashing fire, i. e. quick (Kimchi), or in the fire of flashing armor, A. V. "with flaming (margin 'fiery') torches."

Steph'a-nas (Gr. a crown, or crowned?), a Christian convert of Corinth whose household Paul baptized as the "first-fruits of Achaia," and who was with the apostle at Ephesus when he wrote 1 Cor. (1 Cor. i. 16, xvi. 15).

Stephen [-ven] (fr. Gr. = a crown), the First Martyr. His Hebrew (or rather Syriac) name is traditionally said to have been Chelil or Cheliel (= a crown). He was the chief<sup>1</sup> of the Seven (commonly called "Deacons;" see DEACON) appointed to rectify the complaints in the early Church of Jerusalem, made by the Hellenistic against the Hebrew Christians. His Greek name indicates his own Hellenistic origin. His importance is stamped on the narrative by a reiteration of emphatic, almost superlative phrases: "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost" (Acts vi. 5); "full of grace and power" (ver. 8); irresistible "spirit and wisdom" (ver. 10); "full of the Holy Ghost" (vii. 55).<sup>2</sup> Of his ministrations among the poor we hear nothing. But he seems to have been an instance, such as is not uncommon in history, of a new energy derived from a new sphere. He shot far ahead of his six companions, and far above his particular office. First, he arrests attention by the "great wonders and miracles that he did." Then begins a series of disputations with the Hellenistic Jews of North Africa, Alexandria, and Asia Minor, his companions in race and birthplace. The subject of these disputations is not expressly mentioned; but, from what follows it is evident that he struck into a new vein of teaching, which eventually caused his martyrdom. Down to this time the apostles and the early Christian community had clung in their worship not merely to the Holy Land and the Holy City, but to the Holy Place of the Temple. This local worship, with the Jewish customs belonging to it, he now denounced. So we must infer from the accusations brought against him, confirmed as they are by the tenor of his defence.<sup>3</sup> The actual words of the charge may have been false, as the sinister and malignant intention which they ascribed to him was undoubtedly false. He was arrested at the instigation of the Hellenistic Jews, and brought before the Sanhedrim. When the charge was formally lodged against him, his countenance kindled, and his judges "saw his face as it had been the face of an angel" (vi. 15). For a moment, the account seems to imply, the judges of the Sanhedrim were awed at his presence. Then the high-priest that presided appealed to him to know his own sentiments on the accusations brought against him. To this Stephen replied in a speech which has every appearance of being faithfully reported (vii. 2-53). The framework in which his defence is cast is a summary of a history of the Jewish Church. In the facts which he selects from this history, he is guided by two principles—at first more or less latent, but gradually becoming more and more apparent as he proceeds. The first is the endeavor to prove that, even in the previous Jewish history, the presence and favor of God had not been confined to the Holy Land or the Temple of Jerusalem. This he illustrates with a copiousness of detail which makes his speech a summary almost as much of sacred geography as of sacred history. The second principle of selection is based on the attempt to show that there was a tendency from the earliest times toward the same ungrateful and narrow spirit that had appeared in this last stage of their political existence. Both of these selections are worked out on what may almost be called critical principles. (For explanations of the differences between this speech and the Mosaic history, see ABRAHAM; CHRONOLOGY; INSPIRATION; JACOB 1; JOSEPH 1; MOLECH; MOSES; OLD TESTAMENT C; REMPHAN; SYCHEM, &c.) It would seem that, just at the close of his argument, Stephen saw a change in the aspect of his judges, as if for the first time they had caught the drift of his meaning. He broke off from his calm address, and turned suddenly upon them in an impassioned attack which shows that he saw what was in store for him. As he spoke they showed by their faces that their hearts "were being sawn asunder," and they kept gnashing their set teeth against him; but still, though with difficulty, restraining themselves. He, in this last crisis of his fate, turned his face upward to the open sky, and as he gazed the vault of heaven seemed to him to part asunder; and the Divine Glory appeared through the rending of the earthly veil—the Divine Presence, seated on a throne, and on the right hand the human form of "Jesus." Stephen spoke as if to himself, describing the glorious vision; and, in so doing, alone of all the speakers and writers in the N. T., except only Christ Himself, uses the phrase, "the SON OF MAN." As his judges heard the words, they could forbear no longer. They broke into a loud yell; they clapped their hands to their ears; they flew as with one impulse upon him, and dragged him out of the city to the place of execution. Those were to take the lead in this wild and terrible act who had taken upon themselves the responsibility of denouncing him (Deut. xvii. 7; comp. Jn. viii. 7). In this instance, they were the witnesses who had reported or misreported the words of Stephen. They, according to the custom, for the sake of facility in their dreadful task, stripped themselves, as is the Eastern practice on commencing any violent exertion; and one of the prominent leaders in the transaction was deputed by custom to signify his assent to the act by taking the clothes into his custody, and standing over them whilst the bloody work went on. The person who officiated on this occasion was a young man from Tarsus—one probably of the Cilician Hellenists who had disputed with Stephen. His name, as the narrative significantly adds, was "Saul." (PAUL.) Every thing was now ready for the execution. It was outside the gates of JERUSALEM. The earlier tradition fixed it at what is now called the Damascus gate. The later, which is the present tradition, fixed it at what is hence called St. Stephen's gate. As the first volley of stones burst upon him, he called upon the Master whose human form he had just seen in the heavens, and repeated almost the words with which He Himself had given up His life on the cross, "O Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." Another crash of stones brought him on his knees. One loud piercing cry—answering to the loud shriek or yell with which his enemies had flown upon him—escaped his dying lips. Again clinging to the spirit of his Master's words, he cried, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge," and instantly sank upon the ground, and, in the touching language of the narrator, who then uses for the first time the word, afterward applied to the departure of all Christians, but here the more remarkable from the bloody scenes in the midst of which the death took place—"fell asleep." His mangled body was buried by the class of Hellenists and proselytes to which he belonged.—The legend of the fifth century says that his corpse, which the high-priest intended to leave for beasts of prey to devour, was carried off at night by GAMALIEL 2 in his own chariot, and buried at his expense in a new tomb on his property at Caphar Gamala (village of the camel), eight leagues from Jerusalem, the funeral lamentations, attended by all the apostles, lasting forty days. In A. D. 415 the martyr's remains are said to have been found and identified, and were then buried at Jerusalem.—The importance of Stephen's career may be briefly summed up under three heads:—I. He was the first great Christian ecclesiastic (see note 1), "the Archdeacon," as he is called in the Eastern Church.—II. He is the first martyr—the proto-martyr. To him the name "martyr" is first applied (Acts xxii. 20).—III. He is the forerunner of St. Paul. He was the anticipator, as, had he lived, he would have been the propagator, of the new phase of Christianity, of which St. Paul became the main support.

* Sting. ADDER; BEE; DEATH; HORNET; SCORPION.

Stocks. The term "stocks" is applied in the A. V. to two different articles, one of which (Heb. mahpecheth), in which the body was placed in a bent position by the confinement of the neck and arms as well as the legs, answers to the English pillory; while the other (Heb. sad) answers to the English "stocks," the feet alone being confined in it. The prophet Jeremiah was confined in the first sort (Jer. xx. 2), which appears to have been a common mode of punishment in his day (xxix. 26), as the prisons contained a chamber for the special purpose, termed

"the house of the pillory" (2 Chr. xvi. 10, A. V. "prison-house"). The stocks (Heb. sad; Gr. zulon, literally = wood) are noticed in Job xiii. 27, xxxiii. 11, and Acts xvi. 24. The Heb. 'eches used in Prov. vii. 22 (A. V. "stocks") properly = a fetter (so Mr. Bevan, with Gesenius, &c.). FETTERS; PRISON; PUNISHMENTS.

Sto'ics (fr. Gr., see below). The Stoics and Epicureans, who are mentioned together in Acts xvii. 18, represent the two opposite schools of practical PHILOSOPHY which survived the fall of higher speculation in Greece. The Stoic school, founded by Zeno of Citium (about B. C. 280), derived its name from the painted "portico" (Gr. stoa) in which he taught. Zeno was followed by Cleanthes (about B. C. 260), Cleanthes by Chrysippus (about A. C. 240), who was regarded as the intellectual founder of the Stoic system. Stoicism soon found an entrance at Rome, and under the Empire stoicism was not unnaturally connected with republican virtue. The ethical system of the Stoics has been commonly supposed to have a close connection with Christian morality. But the morality of stoicism is essentially based on pride, that of Christianity on humility; the one upholds individual independence, the other absolute faith in another; the one looks for consolation in the issue of fate, the other in Providence; the one is limited by periods of cosmical ruin, the other is consummated in a personal resurrection (Acts xvii. 18). But in spite of the fundamental error of stoicism, which lies in a supreme egotism, the teaching of this school gave a wide currency to the noble doctrines of the Fatherhood of God, the common bonds of mankind, the sovereignty of the soul.

Stom'ach-er [stum'ak-er] (= an ornament or support to the breast, Webster's Dict.), the A. V. translation of Heb. pehigil, which denotes some article of female attire (Is. iii. 24). The LXX. makes it a variegated tunic; the Vulgate, a species of girdle. DRESS.

Stones. The uses to which stones were applied in ancient Palestine were various. 1. They were used for the ordinary purposes of building, and were sometimes of very large size (Mk. xiii. 1). Robinson gives the dimensions of one as 24 feet long by 6 feet broad and 3 feet high. For most public edifices hewn stones were used (ARCHITECTURE; JERUSALEM, Quarries); an exception was made in regard to altars (Ex. xx. 25; Deut. xxvii. 5; Josh. viii. 31). The Phenicians were famous for skill in hewing stone (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 K. v. 18). (HANDICRAFT.) Stones were selected of certain colors to form ornamental string-courses (1 Chr. xxix. 2). They were also employed for pavements (2 K. xvi. 17; comp. Esth. i. 6). 2. Large stones were used for closing the entrances of caves (Josh. x. 18; Dan. vi. 17), sepulchres (Mat. xxvii. 60; Jn. xi. 38, xx. 1), and springs (Gen. xxix. 2). 3. Flint-stones occasionally served the purposes of a KNIFE (Ex. iv. 25; Josh. v. 2, 3). 4. Stones were used as a munition of war for slings (1 Sam. xvii. 40, 49), catapults (2 Chr. xxvi. 14), and bows (Wis. v. 22; comp. 1 Mc. vi. 51; ARMS, I. 3, 4); as boundary-marks (Deut. xix. 14, xxvii. 17; Job xxiv. 2; Prov. xxii. 28, xxiii. 10; BOHAN? ZOHELETH?); as weights for scales (Deut. xxv. 13; Prov. xvi. 11; BALANCE); and for mills (2 Sam. xi. 21; MILL). 5. Large stones were set up to commemorate any remarkable events (Gen. xxviii. 18, xxxi. 45, xxxv. 14; Josh. iv. 9; 1 Sam. vii. 12). Such stones were occasionally consecrated by ANOINTING (Gen. xxviii. 18). 6. The worship of stones prevailed among the heathen nations surrounding Palestine, and was borrowed from them by apostate Israelites (Is. lvii. 6; IDOL; IDOLATRY). 7. Heaps of stones were piled up on various occasions, as in token of a treaty (Gen. xxxi. 46); or over the grave of some notorious offender (Josh. vii. 26, viii. 29; 2 Sam. xviii. 17). 8. The "white stone" noticed in Rev. ii. 17 has been variously regarded as referring to the pebble of acquittal used in the Greek courts; to the lot cast in elections in Greece; to both these combined, the white conveying the notion of acquittal, the stone that of election (Bengel); to the stones in the high-priest's breast-plate; to the tickets presented to the victors at the public games (Hammond); to the custom of writing on stones (Alford); to the diamond, not dead white but lustrous, with an allusion to Urin and Thummim, which the high-priest alone saw, and which might have the name JEHOVAH graven on it (Trench). 9. The use of stones for tablets is alluded to in Ex. xxiv. 12, and Josh. viii. 32. 10. Stones for striking men are mentioned in 2 Mc. x. 3. 11. Stones were prejudicial to the operations of husbandry (AGRICULTURE); hence the custom of spoiling an enemy's field by throwing quantities of stones upon it (2 K. iii. 19, 25), and the necessity of gathering stones previous to cultivation (Is. v. 2; Eccl. iii. 6). 12. The notice in Zech. xii. 3 of the "burdensome stone" is referred by Jerome to the custom of lifting stones as an exercise of strength (comp. Eccl. vi. 21); but it may equally well be explained of a large corner-stone as a symbol of strength (Is. xxviii. 16). Stones are used metaphorically to denote hardness or insensibility (1 Sam. xxv. 37; Ez. xi. 19, xxxvi. 26), as well as firmness or strength (Gen. xlix. 24). The members of the Church are called "living stones," as contributing to rear that living temple in which Christ, Himself a "living stone," is the chief or head of the corner (Eph. ii. 20-22; 1 Pet. ii. 4-8). PUNISHMENTS; ROCK; STONES, PRECIOUS.

Stones, Precious [presh'us]. The identification of many of the Hebrew names of precious stones is a task of considerable difficulty. As far, however, as regards the stones of the high-priest's breastplate, the authority of Josephus, who had frequent opportunities of seeing it worn, is preferable to any other. The Vulgate agrees with his nomenclature, and in Jerome's time the breastplate was still to be inspected in the Temple of Concord: hence this agreement of the two is of great weight. Precious stones are frequently alluded to in the Holy Scriptures; they were known and very highly valued in the earliest times. The Tyrians traded in precious stones supplied by Syria (Ez. xxvii. 16). The merchants of Sheba and Raamah in South Arabia, and doubtless India and Ceylon, supplied the markets of Tyre with various precious stones. The art of engraving on precious stones was known from the very earliest times. Sir G. Wilkinson says, "The Israelites learned the art of cutting and engraving stones from the Egyptians;" but probably (so Mr. Houghton) it was known to them long before their sojourn in Egypt (Gen. xxxviii. 18). The twelve stones of the breastplate were engraved each one with the name of one of the tribes (Ex. xxviii. 17-21). It is an undecided question whether the DIAMOND was known to the early nations of antiquity. The A. V. gives it as the rendering of Heb. yahûlôn, which Mr. Houghton thinks is probably JASPER. The substance used for polishing precious stones by the ancient Hebrews and Egyptians was emery-powder or the emery-stone (Corundum), a mineral inferior only to the diamond in hardness. In the article on LIGHT Mr. Houghton objected to the "hyacinth-stone" representing the lyncurium of the ancients, because of its not possessing attractive powers in any marked degree. It appears, however, from a communication made by Mr. King, that the hyacinth (zircon) is highly electric when rubbed. Precious stones are used in Scripture in a figurative sense to signify value, beauty, durability, &c., in those objects with which they are compared (Cant. v. 14; Is. liv. 11, 12; Lam. iv. 7; Rev. iv. 3, xxi. 10, 21). Stork (Heb. hâsîdâh or châsîdâh), a wading bird allied to the herons. The White Stork (Ciconia alba, Linn.) is one of the largest and most conspicuous of land-birds, standing nearly four feet high, the jet black of its wings and its bright-red beak and legs contrasting finely with the pure white of its plumage (Zech. v. 9). In the neighborhood of Iran it devours readily all kinds of offal and garbage. For this reason, doubtless, it is placed in the list of unclean birds by the Mosaic Law (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18). The range of the white stork extends over the whole of Europe, except the British Isles, where it is now only a rare visitant, and over Northern Africa and Asia, as far at least as Birmah (so Mr. Tristram, original author of this article). The black stork (Ciconia nigra, Linn.), though less abundant in places, is scarcely less widely distributed, but has a more easterly range than its congener. Both species are very numerous in Palestine. While the black stork is never found about buildings, but prefers marshy places in forests, and breeds in the tops of the loftiest trees; the white stork attaches itself to man, and for the service which it renders in the destruction of reptiles and the removal of offal has been repaid from the earliest times by protection and reverence. The derivation of the Hebrew name (from a word translated "mercy," kindness, "loving-kindness") points to the paternal and filial attachment of which the stork seems to have been a type among the Hebrews no less than the Greeks and Romans. It was believed that the young repaid the care of their parents by attaching themselves to them for life, and tending them in old age. Pliny also notices their habit of always returning to the same nest. Probably there is no foundation for the notion that the stork so far differs from other birds as to recognize its parents after it has become mature; but of the fact of these birds returning year after year to the same spot, there is no question. That the parental attachment of the stork is very strong, has been proved on many occasions. Few migratory birds are more punctual to the time of their reappearance than the white stork, or at least, from its familiarity and conspicuousness, its migrations have been more accurately noted. "The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed time" (Jer. viii. 7). Pliny states that it is rarely seen in Asia Minor after the middle of August. This is probably a slight error, as the ordinary date of its arrival in Holland is the second week in April, and it remains until October. In Palestine it has been observed to arrive on the 22d March. The stork has no note, and the only sound it emits is that caused by the sudden snapping of its long mandibles. Some unnecessary difficulty has been raised respecting the expression in Ps. civ. 17, "As for the stork, the fir-trees are her house." The instinct of the stork seems to be to select the loftiest and most conspicuous spot he can find where his huge nest may be supported; and whenever he can combine this taste with his instinct for the society of man, he naturally selects a tower or a roof. In lands of ruins, which from their neglect and want of drainage supply him with abundance of food, he finds a column or a solitary arch the most secure position for his nest; but where neither towers nor ruins abound he does not hesitate to select a tall tree, as storks, swallows, and many other birds must have done before they were tempted by the artificial conveniences of man's buildings to desert their natural places of nidification. It is therefore needless to interpret the text of the stork merely perching on trees. It probably was no less numerous in Palestine when David wrote than now; but the number of suitable towers must have been far fewer, and it would therefore resort to trees. The black stork, no less common in Palestine, has never relinquished its natural habit of building upon trees. This species, in the northeastern portion of the land, is the most abundant of the two. OSTRICH.

* Storm. HAIL; RAIN; SNOW; THUNDER; WHIRLWIND.

Strain at. The A. V. of 1611 renders Mat. xxiii. 24, "Ye blind guides! which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel." There can be little doubt, that this obscure phrase is due to a printer's error, and that the true reading is "strain out." "Strain out," is the correct translation of the Gr. diulizô, and the reading of Tyndale's (1539), Cranmer's (1539), the Bishops' (1568), and the Geneva (1557) Bibles.

* Stranze Woman, in 1 K. xi. 1, = a foreign woman; but usually in A. V. is opposed to a wife, and spoken in respect to unlawful intercourse, and hence = an adulteress or harlot (Prov. ii. 16, v. 3, 20, vii. 5, &c.). ADULTERY; IDOLATRY; STRANGER.

Stran'ger [a as in gate] (Heb. gér, tôshab). A "stranger," in the technical sense of the term, = a person of foreign (i. e. non-Israelitish) extraction resident within the limits of the Promised Land (so Mr. Bevan). He was distinct from the proper "foreigner" (Heb. nochri'), inasmuch as the latter still belonged to another country, and would only visit Palestine as a traveller: he was still more distinct from the "nations," or non-Israelite peoples. (GEN-TILE.) The term may be compared with our expression "naturalized foreigner." The Heb. gér and tôshab applied to the "stranger" have special reference to the fact of his residing in the land. The existence of such a class of persons among the Israelites is easily accounted for: the "mixed multitude" that accompanied them out of Egypt (Ex. xii. 38) formed one element; the Canaanitish population, which was never wholly extirpated from their native soil, formed another and a still more important one; captives taken in war formed a third; fugitives, hired servants, merchants, &c., formed a fourth. The census of them in Solomon's time gave a return of 153,600 males (2 Chr. ii. 17), which was equal to about a tenth of the whole population. The enactments of the Mosaic Law, which regulated the political and social position of resident strangers, were conceived in a spirit of great liberality. With the exception of the Moabites and Ammonites (Deut. xxiii. 3), all nations were admissible to the rights of citizenship under certain conditions. (ANATHEMA; CITIZEN; SLAVE.) Whether a stranger could ever become legally a landowner is a question about which there may be doubt (Gen. xxiii. 4; Lev. xxv. 23; AGRICULTURE; ARAUAN). The stranger appears to have been eligible to all civil offices, that of king excepted (Deut. xvii. 15). In regard to religion, it was absolutely necessary that the stranger should not infringe any of the fundamental laws of the Israelitish state (Ex. xx. 10; Lev. xvii. 10, 15, xviii. 26, xx. 2, xxiv. 16, &c.; LAW OF MOSSES). If he was a bondman he was obliged to submit to CIRCUMCISION (Ex. xii. 44); if he was independent, it was optional with him; but if he remained uncircumcised, he was prohibited from partaking of the PASSOVER (xii. 48), and could not be regarded as a full citizen. Liberty was also given in regard to the use of prohibited food to an uncircumcised stranger. Assuming, however, that the stranger was circumcised, no distinction existed in regard to legal rights between the stranger and the Israelite (xii. 49; Lev. xxiv. 22; Num. xv. 16, &c.). The Israelite is enjoined to treat him as a brother (Ex. xxii. 21-23; Lev. xix. 34; Deut. x. 19; HOSPITALITY; POOR). It also appears that the "stranger" formed the class whence the hirelings were drawn; the terms being coupled together in Ex. xii. 45 and Lev. xxii. 10, xxv. 6, 40. The liberal spirit of the Mosaic regulations respecting strangers presents a strong contrast to the rigid exclusiveness of the Jews at the commencement of the Christian era. The growth of this spirit dates from the time of the Babylonish captivity. Our Lord condemns it in the parable of the good Samaritan, where He defines the term "neighbor" in a sense new to His hearers (Lk. x. 36). It should be observed, however, that the PROSELYTE of the N. T. is the true representative of the stranger of the O. T., and toward this class a cordial feeling was manifested. The term "stranger" (usually = Gr. xenos) is commonly used in the N. T. in the general sense of foreigner, and occasionally in its more technical sense as opposed to a citizen (Eph. ii. 19).

Straw (Heb. leben). Both wheat and barley straw were used by the ancient Hebrews chiefly as fodder for their horses, cattle, and camels (Gen. xxiv. 25; 1 K. iv. 28; Is. xi. 7, lxxv. 25). There is no intimation that straw was used for litter. It was employed by the Egyptians for making bricks (Ex. v. 7, 16), being chopped up and mixed with the clay to make them more compact and to prevent their cracking. (BRICK; CHAFF 3.) The ancient Egyptians reaped their corn close to the ear, and afterward cut the straw close to the ground and laid it by. This was the straw that Pharaoh refused to give to the Israelites, who were therefore compelled to gather "STUBBLE" (Heb. kash), i. e. the short straw left standing in the field, which was commonly set on fire (Is. v. 24; Joel ii. 5, &c.). "Stubble" (Heb. kash) also = the straw as broken up in treading out the grain and so separated by ventilation, CHAFF, Ges. (Ps. lxxxiii. 13 [Heb. 14]; Jer. xiii. 24, &c.). AGRICULTURE.

* Stream. BROOK; RIVER.

Stream of Egypt once in the A. V. = "the RIVER OF EGYPT" (Is. xxvii. 12).

Street (Heb. hûts or chûts, rêhûb or rêchûb, shûk; Gr. plateia, rhûmê). The streets of a modern Oriental town are generally narrow, crooked, and gloomy, even in the best towns. Their character is mainly fixed by the climate and the style of architecture, the narrowness being due to the extreme heat, and the gloominess to the circumstance of the windows looking for the most part into the inner court. As these same influences existed in ancient times, probably the streets were much of the same character as at present. (ANTIOCH 1; HOUSE; JERUSALEM; NINEVEH.) The street called "Straight," in DAMASCUS (Acts ix. 11), was an exception to the rule of narrowness: it was a noble thoroughfare, 100 feet wide, divided in the Roman age by colonnades into three avenues, the central one for foot-passengers, the side passages for vehicles and horsemen going in different directions. The shops and warehouses were probably collected together into bazars in ancient as in modern times; we read (so Mr. Bevan) of the baker's bazar (A. V. "street," Jer. xxxvii. 21), and of the wool, brazier, and clothes bazars in Jerusalem (Jos. B. J. v. 8, § 1), and perhaps the agreement between Ben-hadad and AHAZ, that the latter should "make streets in Damascus" (1 K. xx. 34), was in reference rather to bazars, and thus amounted to the establishment of a right of trade. That streets occasionally had names appears from Jer. xxxvii. 21 and Acts ix. 11. That they were generally unpaved may be inferred from the notices of the pavement laid by Herod the Great at Antioch, and by Herod Agrippa II. at Jerusalem. Hence pavement forms one of the peculiar features of the ideal Jerusalem (Tob. xiii. 17; Rev. xxi. 21). Each street and bazar in a modern town is locked up at night; the same custom appears to have prevailed in ancient times (Cant. iii. 3).

Sh'ba (L. fr. Gr.), ancestor of certain sons of Solomon's servants who returned with Zerobabel (1 Esd. v. 34); not in Ezra and Nehemiah.

* Sub'urbs (fr. L. = under [or near] a city), the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. migrâsh, pl. migrâshim, migrâshôh, = (so Gesenius) a place whither herds are driven to graze, a pasture (1 Chr. v. 16; Ez. xlviii. 15); especially the open country set apart for pasture round the Levitical cities (Lev. xxv. 34; Num. xxxv. 2 ff., &c.; LEVITES); also, an open place, area, round a city or building (Ez. xxvii. 28, xlv. 2, xlviii. 17). According to the Talmud, Maimonides, and most English expositors, the space measured "from the wall and outward 1,000 cubits round about" (Num. xxxv. 4) was used as a common or suburb, and the space measured "from without the city on the east side," &c. (ver. 5), was a further tract of land of 2,000 cubits, used for fields and vineyards, the former being "the suburbs" properly, the latter "the field of the suburbs" (Ginsburg, in Kitto). (CITY.)—2. Heb. parvâdîm (2 K. xxi. 11 only). PARBAR.

Succoth (Heb. booths, Ges.). 1. A town of ancient date in the Holy Land, first mentioned in the account of Jacob's homeward journey from Padan-aram (Gen. xxxiii. 17). Jacob there put up "booths" (Succoth) for his cattle, as well as a house for himself. From the itinerary of Jacob's return it seems that Succoth lay between PENIEL, near the ford of the JABBOK, and SHECHEM (compare xxxii. 30, and xxxiii. 18). In accordance with this is the mention of Succoth in the narrative of Gideon's pursuit of Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg. vii. 6-17). It would appear from this passage that it lay E. of Jordan, which is corroborated by its being allotted to Gad (Josh. xiii. 27). Succoth is named in 1 K. vii. 46 and 2 Chr. iv. 17 as marking the spot at which the brass-foundries were placed for casting the metal-work of the Temple. Jerome says there was in his time a town named Sochoth beyond the Jordan, in the district of Scythopolis. Burckhardt, having crossed the Jordan at a spot two hours (about six miles) S. S. E. from Beisan, says: "Near where we crossed to the S. are the ruins of Sukkot," evidently, from his narrative, on the E. of Jordan. Robinson and Van de Velde have discovered a place named Sâkût, evidently entirely distinct both in name and position from that of Burckhardt. In the accounts and maps of these travellers it is placed on the west side of the Jordan, less than a mile from the river, and about ten miles S. of Beisan. The distance of Sâkût from Beisan is too great, even if it were on the other side of the Jordan, to allow of its being the place referred to by Jerome. The Sukkot of Burckhardt is more suitable. But it is doubtful whether either of them can be the Succoth of the O. T. (so

Mr. Grove). For the events of Gideon's story the latter of the two is not unsuitable. Sukūt, on the other hand, seems too far S., and is also on the W. of the river. But both appear too far N. for the Succoth of Jacob. Until the position of Succoth is more exactly ascertained, it is impossible to say what was the "Valley of Succoth" mentioned in Ps. lx. 6 and cviii. 7.—2. The first camping-place of the Israelites when they left Egypt (Ex. xii. 37, xiii. 20; Num. xxxiii. 5, 6); apparently reached at the close of the first day's march. The distance traversed in each day's journey was about fifteen miles, and as Succoth was not in the desert, the next station, ETHAM, being "in the edge of the wilderness" (Ex. xiii. 20; Num. xxxiii. 6), it must have been in the valley, and consequently nearly due E. of RAHESES, and fifteen miles distant in a straight line (so Mr. R. S. Poole). EXODUS, THE; RED SEA, PASSAGE OF.

Succoth-be'noth (see below) occurs only in 2 K. xvii. 30. It has generally been supposed that this term is pure Hebrew = the "tents of daughters;" which some explain as "the booths in which the daughters of the Babylonians prostituted themselves in honor of their idol," others as "small tabernacles in which were contained images of female deities." Sir H. Rawlinson thinks that Succoth-benoth represents the Chaldean goddess Zirbanit, the wife of MERODACH, who was especially worshipped at Babylon.

Sud (fr. Gr., see below), a river in the immediate neighborhood of Babylon, on the banks of which Jewish exiles lived (Bar. i. 4). No such river is known to geographers: but the original (Hebrew?) text may have been Sur, the river Euphrates, which is always named by Arab geographers "the river of Sura."

Sud (fr. Gr.) = SIA, or SIAHA (1 Esd. v. 29; compare Neh. vii. 47; Ezr. ii. 44).

Su'di-as (fr. Gr.) = HODAVIAH 3 and HODEVAH (1 Esd. v. 26; compare Ezr. ii. 40; Neh. xii. 43).

"Ethiopians") as supplying part of the army which came with Shishak out of Egypt when he invaded Judah. The Sukklims may correspond to some one of the shepherd or wandering races mentioned on the Egyptian monuments (so Mr. R. S. Poole).

* Sun'mer. AGRICULTURE; CHRONOLOGY I.; PALESTINE, Climate.

* Sun'mer Fruit (Heb. kayits, literally = fruit-harvest, fig-harvest, summer, Ges., Fñ.) = FRUIT, especially figs, as harvested in summer (2 Sam. xvi. 1, 2; Am. viii. 1, 2, &c.). FIG.

Sun (Heb. usually shemesh; Gr. hēlios). In the history of the creation the sun is described as the "greater light" in contradistinction to the MOON or "lesser light," in conjunction with which it was to serve "for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and for years," while its special office was "to rule the DAY" (Gen. i. 14-16). The "signs" referred to were probably (so Mr. Bevan, original author of this article) such extraordinary phenomena as eclipses, which were regarded as conveying premonitions of coming events (Jer. x. 2; Mat. xxiv. 29, with Lk. xxi. 25)<sup>1</sup>. (ECLIPSE OF THE SUN.) The joint influence assigned to the sun and moon in deciding the "seasons," both for agricultural operations (AGRICULTURE) and for religious FESTIVALS, and also in regulating the length and subdivision of the "years," correctly describes the combination of the lunar and solar YEAR, which prevailed at all events subsequent to the Mosaic period. The sun "ruled the day," not only in reference to its powerful influences, but also as deciding the length of the day and supplying the means of calculating its progress. Sunrise and sunset are the only defined points of time in the absence of artificial contrivances for telling the hour of the day. Between these two points the Jews recognized three periods, viz. when the sun became hot, about nine A. M. (1 Sam. xi. 9; Neh. vii. 3); the double light or "noon" (Gen. xliii. 16; 2 Sam. iv. 5), and "the cool of the day" shortly before sunset (Gen. iii. 8). The sun also served to fix the quarters of the hemisphere, EAST, WEST, NORTH, and SOUTH, which were represented respectively by the rising sun, the setting sun (Ps. l. 1; Is. xlv. 6), &c.; or otherwise by their position relative to a person facing the rising sun—before, behind, on the left hand, and on the right hand (Job xxiii. 8, 9). The apparent motion of the sun (comp. HEAVEN) is frequently referred to (Josh. x. 13; 2 K. xx. 11; Ps. xix. 6; Eccl. i. 5; Hab. iii. 11). The worship of the sun, as the most prominent and powerful agent in the kingdom of nature, was widely diffused throughout the countries adjacent to Palestine. The Arabians appear to have paid direct worship to it without the intervention of any statue or symbol (Job xxxi. 26, 27), and this style of worship was probably familiar to the ancestors of the Jews in Chaldea and Mesopotamia. The Hebrews must have been well acquainted with the idolatrous worship of the sun during the captivity in Egypt, both from the contiguity of On, the chief seat of the worship of the sun as implied in the name itself (On = the Hebrew BETH-SHEMESH, "house of the sun," Jer. xlii. 13 marg.), and also from the connection between Joseph and Potiphar (i.e. he who belongs to Ra), the priest of On (Gen. xli. 45). After their removal to Canaan, the Hebrews came in contact with various forms of IDOLATRY, which originated in the worship of the sun; e. g. BAAL, MOLECH or Milcom, and the Hadad of the Syrians. These idols, except the last, were introduced into the Hebrew commonwealth at various periods; but it does not follow that the object symbolized by them was known to the Jews themselves. (ADAMMELECH.) If we have any notice at all of conscious sun-worship in the early stages of their history, it exists in the doubtful term hammāntm or chammāntm (Lev. xxvii. 30; Is. xvii. 8, &c.; Idol. 16). From the few notices on the subject in the Bible, we should conclude that the Jews derived their mode of worshipping the sun from several quarters, the Arabians (ARABIA), PERSIANS, &c. The importance attached to the worship of the sun by the Jewish kings may be inferred, from the fact that the horses were stalled within the precincts of the temple (2 K. xxiii. 11; PARBAR). In the metaphorical language of Scripture the sun is emblematic of the law of God (Ps. xix. 7), of the cheering presence of God (Isa. lxiv. 11), of the person of the Saviour (Jn. i. 9; Mal. iv. 2), and of the glory and purity of heavenly beings (Rev. i. 16, x. 1, xii. 1).

<sup>1</sup> Gesenius and Fñst more naturally explain "signs" in Gen. i. 14 as time-signs, marking the seasons, days, and years, the sense being then (by hendiadys, so Gesenius), "for signs both for seasons and for days and years."

* Sun'-di-al (Is. xxxviii. 8). DIAL.

* Su-per-sti'tion [-stish un] (fr. L.), the A. V. translation of Gr. deidaimonia, properly (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) = fear of the gods, then religiosity, religion (Acts xxv. 19 only). The kindred Gr. adj. deidaimonesteros, translated in the A. V. "too superstitious" (xvii. 22 only), is rather more god-fearing, more religious, sc. than others. Neither of these words is used in the N. T. in a bad sense. PAUL.

* Su'phah. NUMBERS, B; VAHEB.

* Sup'per. LORD'S SUPPER, THE; MEALS.

Sur (fr. Gr.), one of the places on the sea-coast of Palestine, named as disturbed at the approach of Holofernes (Jd. ii. 28). Some have suggested Dor, others a place named Sora (Athlit [?] between Dor and Carinél), others, again, Súrafend (ZAREPHATH). But none of these are satisfactory.

* Sur (Heb. removed, driven out, Ges.), the gate of (2 K. xi. 6), a gate of the Temple, at which Jehonida stationed guards at the inauguration of Joush: called also "the gate of the foundation" (2 Chr. xxiii. 5). The rabbins say it was the E. gate of the court, where the unclean were commanded to depart (Keil).

Sure'ti-ship, Sure'ty-ship. In the entire absence of commerce the law laid down no rules on the subject of suretyship, but it is evident that in the time of Solomon commercial dealings had become so multiplied that suretyship in the commercial sense was common (Prov. vi. 1, xi. 15, xvii. 18, xx. 16, xxii. 26, xxvii. 13). But in older times the notion of one man becoming a surety for a service to be discharged by another was in full force (see Gen. xlv. 8:). The surety of course became liable for his client's debts in case of his failure. DEPOSIT; LOAN, &c.

Su'san'-chites [-kites] (fr. Heb. = people of SUSHAN, Ges.) no doubt designates either the inhabitants of the city Susa (SUSHAN) or (less probably, so Rawlinson) those of the country—SUSIS or SUSIANA (Ezr. iv. 9 only).

Su'-san'-na [-zan-] (L. fr. Heb. = a lily). 1. The heroine of the Judgment of Daniel, or History of Susanna, in the APOCRYPHA. (DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO.)—2. One of the women who ministered to the Lord (Lk. viii. 3).

Swal'low [swol-], the A. V. translation of Heb. dérór, and 'dgúr. Dérór occurs twice (Ps. lxxiv. 3; Prov. xxvi. 2); 'dgúr, also twice (Is. xxxviii. 14; Jer. viii. 7), both times in conjunction with sís or sús, which in each passage is rendered, probably correctly, by LXX. SWALLOW, A. V. "CRANE," the latter being more probably (so Mr. Tristram, original author of this article) the true signification of 'dgúr. The Heb. dérór may include the "swallow" with other swiftly-flying birds, as the swift, martin, &c. Whatever be the precise rendering, the characters ascribed in the several passages where the names occur are strictly applicable to the swallow, viz. its swiftness of flight, its nesting in the buildings of the Temple, its mournful, garrulous note, and its regular migration, shared indeed in common with several others. Many species of swallow occur in Palestine, including all those familiar in Britain. The swallow, martin (Chelidon urbica, Linn.), and sand martin (Cotyle riparia, Linn.), abound. The Eastern swallow (Hirundo rufula, Temminck), which nestles generally in fissures in rocks, and the crag martin (Cotyle rupestris), which is confined to mountain-gorges and desert districts, are also common. The common European swift (Cypselus Apus, Linn.) is common, and the splendid alpine swift (Cypselus melba, Linn.) may be seen in all suitable localities. SPARROW.

Common European Swift (Cypselus Apus)—"Swallow" of Scripture!—(Fairbairn).

Swan [swon], the A. V. translation (after the Vulgate) of Heb. tiushemeth in Lev. xi. 18 and Deut. xiv. 16, where it occurs in the list of unclean birds. Bochart and Fürst translate owl; Gesenius suggests the pelican; but the owl and PELICAN are both distinctly expressed elsewhere in the catalogue. Mr. Tristram and Mr. Gosse (in Fairbairn) think that the swan was not known, or at least not familiar, to Moses and the Israelites, and, if known, would rather have been classed as clean. Swans are well-known web-footed water-fowls of the genus Cygnus, Linn., allied to the common goose, but usually larger, handsomer, and more graceful. Mr. Tristram regards what he considers to be the renderings of the LXX., porphyrio and ibis (Owl 2), as either of them more probably meant by the Hebrew word than the "swan" of the A. V.; for neither of these birds occurs elsewhere in the catalogue, both would be familiar to residents in Egypt, and the original seems to point to some water-fowl. The porphyrion or porphyrio (Porphyrio Antiquorum, Bp.), the purple water-hen, is a wading bird of the rail family, larger than the domestic fowl, with a rich dark-blue plumage, brilliant red beak and legs, and extraordinarily long toes. It frequents marshes and the sedge by the banks of rivers in all the countries bordering on the Mediterranean, and is abundant in Lower Egypt. From the miscellaneous character of its food it might reasonably be classed with unclean birds. MOLE 1.

Swear'ing. OATH.

Sweat, Bloody. One of the physical phenomena attending our Lord's AGONY (JESUS CHRIST) in the Garden of Gethsemane is thus described (Lk. xxii. 44): "His sweat was as it were great drops (literally clots) of blood falling down to the ground." The genuineness of this verse and of the preceding has been doubted, but it is now generally acknowledged (so Mr. Wright). Of this malady, known in medical science by the term diapedesis, there have been examples recorded both in ancient and modern times. Aristotle was aware of it. The cause assigned is generally violent mental emotion. Dr. Millingen (Curi*osities of Medical Experience*, p. 489, 2d ed.) gives the following explanation of the phenomenon: "It is probable that this strange disorder arises from a violent commotion of the nervous system, turning the streams of blood out of their natural course, and forcing the red particles into the cutaneous excretories. A mere relaxation of the fibres could not produce so powerful a revulsion. It may also arise in cases of extreme debility, in connection with a thinner condition of the blood." Several cases of so-called bloody sweat are reported. There is still, however, wanted a well-authenticated instance in modern times, observed with all the care and attested by all the exactness of later medical science.

* Sweet. FOOD; HONEY; INCENSE; REED 4; SPICES; WINE, &c.

Swine (Heb. hazir or chazir; Gr. choiros, hus), a well-known quadruped, the male of which is the "boar" (Ps. lxxx. 13) and the female the "sow" (2 Pet. ii. 22). (1.) Domestic. The flesh of swine was forbidden as food by the Levitical law (Lev. xi. 7; Deut. xiv. 8); the abhorrence which the Jews as a nation had of it may be inferred from Is. lxxv. 4, lxxvi. 3, 17, and 2 Mc. vi. 18, 19. Swine's flesh was forbidden to the Egyptian priests. The Arabians, Phenicians, Ethiopians, &c., were also disallowed the use of it. No other reason for the command to abstain from swine's flesh is given in the law of Moses beyond the general one which forbade any of the mammalia as food which did not literally fulfil the terms of the definition of a "CLEAN animal," viz. that it was to be a cloven-footed ruminant. It is, however, probable that dietetical considerations may have influenced Moses in his prohibition of swine's flesh; it is generally believed that its use in hot countries is liable to induce cutaneous disorders; hence in a people liable to leprosy the necessity for the observance of a strict rule. Although the Jews did not breed swine, during the greater period of their existence as a nation, there can be little doubt that the heathen nations of Palestine used the flesh as food. At the time of our Lord's ministry it would of Hyrcanus, "that it should not be lawful for any one to feed swine." Allusion is made in 2 Pet. ii. 22 to the fondness of swine for "wallowing in the mire." Solomon compares "a fair woman without discretion" to "a jewel of gold in a swine's snout" (Prov. xi. 22). Our Lord says, "Neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet" (Mat. vii. 6). The last part of this verse—"and turn again and rend you"—Theophylact, Hammond, Barnes, &c., refer to the "dogs;" but Lange (on Mat. i. c.) says, "it applies likewise to the swine." (2.) Wild. The wild boar of the wood (Ps. lxxx. 13) is the common wild boar or wild hog (Sus Scrofa) which is frequently met with in the woody parts of Palestine, especially in Mount Tabor.

Sword. ARMS.

Syc'a-mine-tree (Gr. sukamīnos), mentioned only in Lk. xvii. 6, is (so Mr. Houghton, with Dr. Royle [in Kitto], Dr. Hamilton [in Fairbairn], Dr. Daubeny, &c.) the mulberry-tree (Morus). Both black and white MULBERRY-TREES are common in Syria and Palestine, and are largely cultivated for supplying food to the silk-worm. Thomson (ii. 296) says the Damascus mulberry-tree is now grown extensively at Lydd (Lydda) for its fruit, which almost exactly resembles the largest American blackberries. appear that the Jews occasionally violated the law of Moses with respect to swine's flesh. Whether "the herd of swine" into which the devils were allowed to enter (Mat. viii. 32; Mk. v. 13) were the property of the Jewish or Gentile inhabitants of GADARA (DEMONIACS; GERASA; GERGESENES) does not appear from the sacred narrative; but that the practice of keeping swine did exist amongst some of the Jews seems clear from the enactment of the law

Syc'a-more (Heb. shikmah; Gr. sukomorea in N. T., sukamīnos in LXX.), according to Prof. Stowe (original author of this article) and most authorities, = the Fig-mulberry, or Sycamore-fig (Ficus Sycomorus), a tree of Egypt and Palestine, the fruit of which resembles the fig (1 K. x. 27; 1 Chr. xxvii. 28; 2 Chr. i. 15, ix. 27; Ps. lxxviii. 47; Is. ix. 10 [Heb. 9]; Am. vii. 14; Lk. xix. 4). It attains the size of a walnut-tree, has wide-spreading branches, and affords a delightful shade. On this account it is frequently planted by the waysides. Its leaves are heart-shaped, downy on the under side, and fragrant. The fruit grows directly from the trunk itself on little sprigs, and in clusters like the grape. To make it eatable, each fruit, three or four days before gathering, must, it is said, be punctured with a sharp instrument or the finger-nail. This was the original employment of the prophet Amos (Am. vii. 14). The wood, though very porous, is exceedingly durable, Egyptian mummy-coffins made of it being still perfectly sound. It was much used for doors and large furniture, as tables, &c. So great was the value of these trees, that David appointed for them in his kingdom a special overseer, as for the olives (1 Chr. xxvii. 28); and it is mentioned as one of the heaviest of Egypt's calamities, that her sycamores were destroyed by hailstones (Ps. lxxviii. 47). The "sycamore" of America (Platanus Occidentalis), a species of PLANE-TREE, and the "sycamore" of England (Acer pseudo-platanus), a species of maple, are both very different from the "sycamore" of the Scriptures.

Sy'char [-kar] (L. fr. Heb. = falsehood, or drunkard! Rbn. N. T. Lex.; a corruption of SHECHEM, Olshausen, &c.; see below), a place named only in Jn. iv. 5, as "a city of Samaria." "Sychar" was either a name applied to the town of SHECHEM, or it was an independent place. 1. The first of these alternatives is now almost universally accepted. In the words of Dr. Robinson, "In consequence of the hatred which existed between the Jews and the Samaritans, and in allusion to their idolatry, the town of Sichem received, among the Jewish common people, the by-name Sychar." No mention, however, of such a nickname is found either in the Targums or in the Talmud (so Mr. Grove, original author of this article). But presuming that Jacob's well was then, where it is now shown, at the entrance of the valley of Nabulus, SHECHEM would be too distant to answer to the words of St. John, since it must have been more than a mile off. Eusebius (Onom.) says that Sychar was in front of the city of Neapolis; and, again, that it lay by the side of Luza, which was three miles from Neapolis. Sychem, on the other hand, he places in the suburbs of Neapolis by the tomb of Joseph. The Bourdeaux Pilgrim describes Sechim as at the foot of the mountain, and as containing Joseph's monument and plot of ground, and then says that a thousand paces thence was the place called Sychar. 2. In favor of Sychar having been an independent place is the fact that a village named Askar still exists at the southeastern foot of Ebal, about N. E. of the Well of Jacob, and about half a mile from it. A village like Askar answers much more appropriately to the description of John than so large and so venerable a place as Shechem. On the other hand, there is an etymological difficulty in the way of this identification. Askar begins with the letter Ain, which Sychar does not appear to have contained. Yet the same difference is found between the ancient and modern names of Ashkelon.

Sy'chem, the Latinized Greek form of SHECHEM, the name of the well-known city of Central Palestine (Acts vii. 16 only). This verse exhibits an addition to, and a discrepancy in form from, the O. T. account. (1.) The patriarchs are said in it to have been buried at Sychem, whereas in the O. T. this is related of the bones of Joseph only (Josh. xxiv. 32). (2.) The sepulchre at Sychem is said to have been bought from Emmor by Abraham; whereas in the O. T. ABRAHAM bought the cave of Machpelah at Hebron for his sepulchre, and JACOB bought the plot of ground at Shechem from Hamor (Gen. xxxiii. 19). Various explanations have been given of these differences. That Joseph's brethren were buried in Shechem contradicts nothing that we know, is probable in itself, and may have been handed down by tradition. Biscoe refers the differences to the brevity with which the Hebrews related their well-known ancestral history, and their use in it of hints and ellipses, and would make out the whole thus: "And were carried over into Sychem, and were laid (some of them, Jacob at least) in the sepulchre that Abraham bought for a sum of money (and others of them in that which was bought) of the sons of Emmor the father of Sychem." Fairbairn says (Dictionary of the Bible, article Stephen), "Stephen's object is not properly to relate history, but to apply history to the elucidation of great principles and truths. . . . Stephen identifies the transactions as to Abraham and Jacob buying and using ground for burial, as before he had identified two words of God spoken at different times (ver. 7; compare Gen. xv. 16 and Ex. iii. 12) —not as if he ignored their actual or historical diversity, for the merest child could not but be aware of that—but because for his purpose, viz. as an expression of faith on the part of the patriarchs, and a sign of their interest in the land of Canaan, even when to the eye of sense there seemed so much against it, they were virtually one." A suggestion approved by Archdeacon Lee (Inspiration of Holy Scripture) is that Abraham may have purchased a plot of ground at Sychem as described, where Joseph and the patriarchs were buried. Professor Hackett (on Acts, l. c.) would omit "Abraham," or exchange it for "Jacob." Dr. S. Davidson regards Stephen as not inspired, and hence making a mistake. One of these or of other possible explanations may remove the difficulty in the case.

Sy'chem-ite, the = the inhabitants of SHECHEM, taken collectively (Jd. v. 16).

* Syc-o-more (in some copies) = SYCAMORE.

Sy-e-lus (fr. Gr.) = JEHIEL 8 (1 Esd. i. 8; compare 2 Chr. xxxv. 8).

Sy-e-me (L.; Heb. Sēvénēh; fr. Egyptian = the opening or key of Egypt, Champollion), a town of Egypt on the frontier of Cush or Ethiopia. Ezekiel speaks of the desolation of Egypt "from Migdol to Syene, even unto the border of Ethiopia" (Ex. xxix. 10 margin), and of its people being slain "from Migdol to Syene" (xxx. 6 margin; A. V. text in both "from the tower of Syene"). Migdol was on the eastern border, and Syene was always the last town of Egypt on the S., though at one time included in the nome Nubia. Its ancient Egyptian name is Sun, the modern Arabic Asuān. The modern town is slightly to the N. of the old site. Both are on the Nile, and near the tropic of Cancer. Syenite, which differs from granite only in having hornblend instead of mica, was anciently quarried at Syene. The town at some periods has had a large population and extensive trade.

Syn-a-gogue [sin'a-gog] (fr. Gr. synagōgē = an assembly; see below and ASSEMBLY 10). Professor Plumpton, original author of this article, thus notes the points of contact between the history and ritual of the synagogues of the Jews, and the facts to which the inquiries of the Biblical student are principally directed. (a.) They meet us as the great characteristic institution of the later phase of Judaism. (b.) We cannot separate them from the most intimate connection with our Lord's life and ministry. In them He worshipped in His youth, and in His manhood. They were the scenes of no small portion of His work (Mat. iv. 23, xii. 9, xiii. 54; Mk. i. 23; Lk. iv. 16, xiii. 11; Jn. vi. 59, xviii. 20, &c., &c.) (c.) There are the questions, leading us back to a remoter past: In what did the worship of the synagogue originate? what type was it intended to reproduce? what customs, alike in nature, if not in name, served as the starting-point for it? (d.) The synagogue, with all that belonged to it, was connected with the future as well as with the past. It was the order with which the first Christian believers were most familiar. The Church had its starting-point in the Synagogue.—Keeping these points in view, it remains to deal with the subject in a somewhat more formal manner.—I. Name. (1.) The Aramaic equivalent ḥēnīṣṭā first appears in the Targum of Onkelos as a substitute for Heb. 'ēdāh (= CONGREGATION; ASSEMBLY 5) in the Pentateuch. The more precise local designation (Bēyth ha-Ḥēnēseth = House of gathering) belongs to a yet later date. (2.) The word synagōgē, not unknown in classical Greek, appears in the LXX. as the translation of not less than twenty-one Hebrew words in which the idea of gathering is implied. It is used 130 times for 'ēdāh, and 25 times for kāhāl. (ASSEMBLY 5, 7.) In Prov. v. 14 the Gr. ekklesia (= Heb. kāhāl, A. V. "congregation") and synagōgē (Heb. 'ēdāh, A. V. "assembly") appear together. In the Apocrypha the word, as in the O. T., retains its general meaning, and is not used specifically for any recognized place of worship. In the N. T., however, the local meaning is the dominant one. Sometimes the word is applied to the tribunal which was connected with, or sat in, the synagogue, in the narrower sense (Mat. x. 17, xxiii. 34; Mk. xiii. 9; Lk. xxi. 12, xii. 11). Within the limits of the Jewish Church it perhaps kept its ground as denoting the place of meeting of the Christian brethren (Jas. ii. 2).—II. History. (1.) Jewish writers have claimed for their synagogues a very remote antiquity. In well-nigh every place where the phrase "before the Lord" appears, they recognize in it a known sanctuary, a fixed place of meeting, and, therefore, a synagogue. The Targum of Onkelos finds in Jacob's "dwelling in tents" (Gen. xxv. 27) his attendance at a synagogue or house of prayer. That of Jonathan finds them in Judg. v. 9 and in "the calling of assemblies" in Is. i. 13. (2.) Apart from these far-fetched interpretations, we know too little of the life of Israel, both before and under the monarchy, to be able to say with certainty whether there was any thing at all corresponding to the synagogues of later date (compare 1 Sam. xx. 5 and 2 K. iv. 23, with Judg. viii. 27, xvii. 5; 1 Sam. ix. 12, x. 5, xix. 20–24; PROPHET). (3.) During the exile, in the abeyance of the Temple-worship, the meeting of devout Jews probably became more systematic (Ez. viii. 1, xi. 15, 16, xiv. 1, xx. 1, xxiii. 31), and must have helped forward the change so conspicuous at the return. The whole history of Ezra presupposes the habit of solemn, probably of periodic, meetings (Ezr. viii. 15; Neh. viii. 2, ix. 1; Zech. vii. 5). To that period, accordingly, we may attribute the revival, if not the institution of synagogues; yet they are not in any way prominent in the Maccabean history. When that struggle was over, there appears to have been a freer development of what may be called the synagogue parochial system among the Jews of Palestine and other countries. Well-nigh every town or village had its one or more synagogues. (4.) It is hardly possible to overestimate the influence of the system thus developed. To it we may ascribe the tenacity with which, after the Maccabean struggle, the Jews adhered to the religion of their fathers, and never again relapsed into idolatry. The people were now in no danger of forgetting the Law, and the external ordinances that hedged it round. Here, as in the order of the SCRIBES, there was an influence tending to diminish and ultimately almost to destroy the authority of the hereditary priesthood. The way was silently prepared for a new and higher order, which should rise in "in the fulness of time" out of the decay and abolition of both the priesthood and the Temple.

—III. Structure. (1.) The size of a synagogue, like that of a church or chapel, varied with the population. Its position was, however, determinate. It stood, if possible, on the highest ground, in or near the city to which it belonged. And its direction, too, was fixed. Jerusalem was the central point of Jewish devotion. The synagogue was so constructed, that the worshippers, as they entered and as they prayed, looked toward it. The building was commonly erected at the cost of the district. Sometimes it was built by a rich Jew, or even, as in

<sup>1</sup> "The synagogue of SATAN" (Rev. ii. 9, iii. 9) — (so Rbn. N. T. Ler.) "Satan's assembly, i. e. Jews who slander the Christian Church—who, professing to be true Jews and to worship God, are not so, but worship Satan (compare Rom. ii. 29)."

<sup>2</sup> In Ps. lxxiv. 8 the Heb. pl. of mō'ēd (ASSEMBLY 1) is translated "synagogues" by the A. V. Ginsburg (in Kittō), &c.; and the Psalm itself is referred by some (Hitzig, Ginsburg, &c.) to Maccabean times. Gesenius translates the sacred places of assembly, and understands the phrase as referring to other places than the Temple, which were in a certain sense sacred, as Ramah, Beth-el, Gil-gal, &c., distinguished as seats of the prophets and as high places. Prof. J. A. Alexander translates and explains the latter part of ver. 8—"they have burned all the assemblies of God in the land, by burning the only place where such assemblies could be held (Deut. xii. 5, 11)."

Lk. vii. 5, by a friendly proselyte. (2.) In the internal arrangement of the synagogue we trace an obvious analogy to the type of the TABERNACLE. At the upper or Jerusalem end stood the Ark, the chest which, like the ARK OF THE COVENANT, contained the Book of the Law. It gave to that end the name and character of a sanctuary. This part of the synagogue was naturally the place of honor. Here were the "chief seats," after which Pharisees and Scribes strove so eagerly (Mat. xxiii. 6), to which the wealthy and honored worshipper was invited (Jas. ii. 2, 8). Here, too, in front of the Ark, still reproducing the type of the Tabernacle, was the eight-branched lamp, lighted only on the greater festivals. Besides this, there was one lamp kept burning perpetually. A little further toward the middle of the building was a raised platform on which several persons could stand at once, and in the middle of this rose a pulpit in which the Reader stood to read the lesson or sat down to teach. The congregation were divided, men on one side, women on the other, a low partition, five or six feet high, running between them. The arrangements of modern synagogues, for many centuries, have made the separation more complete by placing the women in low side-galleries, screened off by lattice-work.—IV. Officers. (1.) In smaller towns there was often but one RABBI. Where a fuller organization was possible, there was a college of Elders (Lk. vii. 8) presided over by one who was "the ruler of the synagogue" (viii. 41, 49, xiii. 14; Acts xviii. 8, 17). (2.) The most prominent functionary in a large synagogue was known as the Shāliah or Shē'iach (= L. legatus, i. e. one sent or appointed with a commission or charge, a legate), the officiating minister who acted as the delegate of the congregation, and was therefore the chief reader of prayers, &c., in their name. (3.) The Hazzan or Chazzan, the "MINISTER" of the synagogue (Lk. iv. 20), had duties of a lower kind. He was to open the doors, to get the building ready for service. (4.) Besides these, there were ten men attached to every synagogue, known as the Ballānim (= free from labor, at leisure), supposed to be men of leisure, not obliged to labor for their livelihood, able, therefore, to attend the week-day as well as the Sabbath services. By some (Lightfoot, &c.) they have been identified with the above officials, with the addition of the alms-collectors. Rhenferd, however, sees in them simply a body of men, permanently on duty, making up a congregation (ten being the minimum number), so that there might be no delay in beginning the service at the proper hours, and that no single worshipper might go away disappointed. (5.) It will be seen at once how closely the organization of the synagogue was reproduced in that of the Church. Here also there was the single presbyter-bishop (BISHOP) in small towns, a council of presbyters under one head in large cities. The legatus of the synagogues appears in the "angel" (Rev. i. 20, ii. 1; ANGELS), perhaps also in the "messenger" (Gr. apostolos; APOSTLE; EPAPHRODITUS, &c.) of the Christian Church.—V. Worship. (1.) The ritual of the synagogue was to a large extent the reproduction of the statelier liturgy of the Temple, and, no less than the organization, was connected with the facts of the N. T. history, and with the life and order of the Christian Church. It would hardly be an exaggeration to say that the worship of the Church was identical with that of the Synagogue, modified (a.) by the new truths, (b.) by the new institution of the Lord's Supper, (c.) by the spiritual "gifts." (2.) From the synagogue came the use of fixed forms of PRAYER. To that the first disciples had been accustomed from their youth. The forms might be and were abused. (LORD'S PRAYER; PHARISEES.) (3.) The large admixture of a didactic element in Christian worship, that by which it was distinguished from all Gentile forms of adoration, was derived from the older order. "Moses" was "read in the synagogues every Sabbath-day" (Acts xv. 21), the whole Law being read consecutively, so as to be completed, according to one cycle, in three years, according to that which ultimately prevailed, in a single year. (BIBLE IV.) The writings of the prophets were read as second lessons in a corresponding order. They were followed by the "word of exhortation" (Acts xiii. 15), the exposition, the sermon of the synagogue. (4.) To the ritual of the synagogue we may probably (so Prof. Plumptre) trace the practice of praying for the dead (2 Mc. xii. 44). Prayers for the dead have found a place in every early Christian liturgy, and the practice in the synagogues is as old at least as the traditions of the Rabbinic fathers. (5.) The conformity extends also to the times of prayer. In the hours of service this was obviously the case. The third, sixth, and ninth hours were in the times of the N. T. (Acts iii. 1, x. 3, 9), and had been probably for some time before (Ps. lv. 17; Dan. vi. 10), the fixed times of devotion. The same hours were recognized in the Church of the second, probably in that of the first century also. The solemn days of the synagogue were the second, the fifth, and the seventh, the last or Sabbath being the conclusion of the whole. The transfer of the sanctity of the SABBATH to the LORD'S DAY involved a corresponding change in the order of the week, and the first, the fourth, and the sixth became to the Christian society what the other days had been to the Jewish. (6.) The following suggestion as to the mode in which this transfer was effected, involves, it is believed, fewer arbitrary assumptions than any other, and connects itself with another interesting custom, common to the Church and the Synagogue. It was a Jewish custom to end the Sabbath with a feast, in which they did honor to it as to a parting king. The feast was held in the synagogue. A cup of wine, over which a special blessing had been spoken, was handed round. It is obvious that, so long as the apostles and their followers continued to use the Jewish mode of reckoning, so long i. e. as they fraternized with their brethren of the stock of Abraham, this would coincide in point of time with their LORD'S SUPPER on the first day of the week. By degrees the time became later, passed on to midnight, to the early dawn of the next day. (7.) From the synagogue lastly came many of the less conspicuous practices, which meet us in the liturgical life of the first three centuries. Ablution, entire or partial, before entering the place of meeting (Heb. x. 22; Jn. xiii. 1-15); standing, and not kneeling, as the attitude of prayer (Lk. xviii. 11); the arms stretched out; the face turned toward the E.; the responsive Amen of the congregation to the prayers and benediction of the elders (1 Cor. xiv. 16).—VI. Judicial Functions. (1.) The language of the N. T. shows that the officers of the synagogue exercised in certain cases a judicial power (Mat. x. 17; Mk. xiii. 9; Lk. xii. 11, xxi. 12; Jn. xii. 42, xvi. 2; Acts ix. 2, xiii. 5; 1 Cor. v. 5, xvi. 22; Gal. i. 8, 9; 1 Tim. i. 20; EXCOMMUNICATION; JUDGE). (2.) It is not easy, however, to define the nature of the tribunal, and the precise limits of its jurisdiction. In Mat. x. 17 and Mk. xiii. 9 they are carefully distinguished from the "councils." It seems probable that the COUNCIL was the larger tribunal of twenty-three, which sat in every city (SANHEDRIM), and that under the term "synagogue" we are to understand a smaller court, probably that of the Ten judges mentioned in the Talmud, consisting either of the elders, "minister," and legates, or otherwise of the ten men of leisure (see above, IV. 2-4). (3.) Here also we trace the outline of a Christian institution. The Church, either by itself or by appointed delegates, was to act as a Court of Arbitration in all disputes among its members. The elders of the Church were not, however, to descend to the trivial disputes of daily life (1 Cor. vi. 1-8). For the elders, as for those of the synagogue, were reserved the graver offences against religion and morals (v. 4). EXCOMMUNICATION; EDUCATION.

Synagogue (see above), the Great. (1.) On the return of the Jews from Babylon, a great council was appointed, according to Rabbinic tradition, to reorganize the religious life of the people. It consisted of 120 members, and these were known as the men of the Great Synagogue, the successors of the prophets, themselves, in their turn, succeeded by scribes prominent, individually, as teachers. EZRA 2 was recognized as president. Among the other members, in part together, in part successively, were JOSHUA 4, ZERUBBABEL, and their companions, DANIEL 4 and the three "children," HAGGAI, ZECHARIAH 1, MALACHI, NEHEMIAH 1, MORDECAI, SIMON 2. Their aim was to restore again the crown or glory of Israel. To this end they collected all the sacred writings of former ages and their own, and so completed the CANON of the O. T. They instituted the feast of PURIM. They organized the ritual of the SYNAGOGUE, and gave their sanction to the eighteen solemn benedictions in it. (2.) Much of this is evidently uncertain. The absence of any historical mention of such a body, not only in the O. T. and the Apocrypha, but in Josephus, Philo, and the Seder Olam, so that the earliest record of it is found in the Pirke Aboth, about the second century A. C., had led some critics to reject the whole statement as a Rabbinic invention. The narrative of Neh. viii. 13 clearly implies the existence of a body of men acting as counsellors under the presidency of Ezra, and these may have been an assembly of delegates from all provincial synagogues—a synod of the National Church (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article). Dr. Ginsburg (in Kitto) indorses the conclusion of Graetz that Nehemiah originated the Great Synagogue after Ezra's death, and considers its period as embracing about 110 years (B. C. 410-300), or from the latter days of Nehemiah to the death of Simon the Just, when it passed into the SANHEDRIM. He obtains the traditional 120 members of Nehemiah's time from Neh. x. 1-27, &c., making 28 priests, viz. 24 chiefs (1 Chr. xxiv. 7-18) and 4 others; 19 Levites, viz. 7 chiefs (Ezr. v. 18, 19, 24; Neh. ix. 4, 5), and 12 others; 50 Israelites, viz. 29 chiefs (comp. Ezr. viii. 2, 9), and 21 others; 22 representatives of cities (Ezr. ii. 18-30; Neh. vii. 24-33, 36, 37), and Nehemiah. The 87 besides chiefs and representatives he considers to be doctors of the Law.

Syracuse, or Sy'ra-cuse (fr. Gr., named from an adjacent marsh or lake called Syraco), a celebrated city on the eastern coast of Sicily, founded B. C. 734 by Archias, a Corinthian exile, and said to have had in its most prosperous period from 500,000 to 1,200,000 inhabitants. It was the native place of Archimedes, the celebrated mathematician, and the residence of some able kings, as Hiero, Dionysius, &c. St. Paul arrived thither in an Alexandrian ship from Melita, on his voyage to Rome (Acts xxviii. 12). The magnificence which Cicero describes as still remaining in his time was then no doubt greatly impaired. But it was a convenient place for the African corn-ships to touch at, for the harbor was excellent, and the fountain Arethusa furnished an unfailling supply of excellent water. In the time of St. Paul's voyage Sicily did not supply the Romans with corn to the extent it had done in the time of King Hiero, and in a less degree as late as the time of Cicero. The country had become depopulated by wars, and when it passed into the hands of Rome (B. C. 212) her great nobles turned vast tracts into pasture. Syracuse was a Roman colony in St. Paul's time, and was the provincial capital of Sicily. Syracuse has been repeatedly destroyed by wars and earthquakes. Its present population is about 16,000 (New Amer. Cyc.).

Syria (L. fr. Gr., see below), the usual A. V. term for the Heb. ARAM, and Gr. Syria. Most probably Syria is for Tyria, the country about Tyre, which was the first of the Syrian towns known to the Greeks (so Prof. Rawlinson, original author of this article). 1. Geographical extent. It is very difficult to fix the limits of Syria. The Hebrew Aram seems to commence on the northern frontier of Palestine, and to extend thence northward to the skirts of Taurus, westward to the Mediterranean, and eastward probably to the Khabour River. (EUPHRATES.) Its chief divisions are Aram-dammeseck = Syria of DAMASCUS, Aram-zobah = Syria of ZOBAB, Aram-naharaim = "MESOPOTAMIA" = Syria of the Two Rivers, and PADAN-ARAM = the plain Syria, or the plain at the foot of the mountains. Of these the first is the rich country about Damascus, lying between ANTILIBANUS and the desert, and the last is the district about Harran and Orfsah, the flat country stretching out from the western extremity of Mons Masius toward the source of the Khabour. Aram-naharaim seems to include this last tract, and extend beyond it, though how far beyond is doubtful. (MESOPOTAMIA.) Aram-zobah seems to be the tract between the Euphrates and Coele Syria. The other divisions of Aram, such as Aram-machah, and Aram-beth-rehob, were probably portions of the tract between Antilibanus and the desert. (BETH-REHOB; MACHAH.)—The Greek writers used "Syria" still more vaguely than the Hebrews did "Aram." On the one hand they extended it to the Euxine, including CAPPADOCIA and even BITHYNIA; on the other they carried it to the borders of Egypt, and made it comprise PHILISTIA and EDOM. Still they seem always to regard Syria Proper as a narrower region. The LXX. and N. T. distinguish Syria from PHENICIA on the one hand, and from SAMARIA, JUDEA, IDUMEA, &c., on the other. In the present article it seems best to take the word in this narrow sense, and to regard Syria as bounded by Amanus and Taurus on the N., by the Euphrates and the Arabian desert on the E., by Palestine on the S., by the Mediterranean near the mouth of the Orontes, and then by Phenicia on the W. The tract thus circumscribed is about 800 miles long from N. to S., and from 50 to 150 miles broad, with an area of about 30,000 square miles.—2. General Physical Features. The general character of the tract is mountainous, as the Hebrew ARAM implies. On the

W., two longitudinal chains (LEBANON and ANTI-LIBANUS, or Anti-Lebanon, the former becoming Bargylus on the N.), running parallel with the coast at no great distance from one another, extend along two-thirds of the length of Syria, from the latitude of Tyre to that of ANTIOCH 1, where they are met by the chain of Amanus, an outlying barrier of Taurus, having the direction of that range, which in this part is from S. W. to N. E. The most fertile and valuable tract of Syria is the long valley between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. (CELOSRYIA.) The northern mountain region is also fairly productive; but the soil of the plains about Aleppo is poor, and the eastern flank of the Antilibanus, except in one place, is peculiarly sterile.—8. The Mountain-Ranges. (a.) LEBANON, the most interesting of the mountain-ranges of Syria, extends from the mouth of the Litány to Arka (ARKITE), nearly 100 miles. (b.) ANTI-LIBANUS, or Anti-Lebanon, as the name implies, stands over against Lebanon, running in the same direction, i. e. nearly N. and S., and extending the same length. (HÆRMON.) (c.) Bargylus. Mount Bargylus, called now Jebel en-Nuairiyeh, toward the S., and toward the N. Jebel Kraad, extends from the mouth of the Nahr el-Kebir (Eleutherus), nearly opposite Hama, to the vicinity of Antioch, a distance of rather more than 100 miles. One of the western spurs terminates in a remarkable headland, more than 5,000 feet high, anciently known as Mount Casius, now Jebel el-Akra (= the Bald Mountain). (d.) Amanus. N. of the mouth of the Orontes, between its course and the eastern shore of the Gulf of Issus (Jakanderin), lies the range of Amanus, which divides Syria from CILICIA. Its average elevation is 5,000 feet, and it terminates abruptly at Râs el-Khanzir, in a high cliff overhanging the sea.—4. The Rivers. The principal rivers of Syria are the Litány (anciently Leontes), and the Orontes. The Litány springs from a small lake in the middle of the Coelesyrian valley (CELOSRYIA), about six miles S. W. of Ba'albek. It enters the sea about five miles N. of Tyre. The source of the Orontes is but about fifteen miles from that of the Litány. Its modern name is Nahr el-'Âsy (= Rebel Stream), from its violence and impetuosity in many parts of its course. The other Syrian streams of some consequence, besides the Litány and the Orontes, are the Barada (ABANA), or river of Damascus, the Koweik, or river of Aleppo, and the Sajur, a tributary of the Euphrates.—5. The Lakes. The principal lakes of Syria are the Agh-Dengiz, or Lake of Antioch; the Sabakhah, or Salt Lake, between Aleppo and Balis; the Bahr el-Kadra, on the upper Orontes.—6. The Great Valley. By far the most important part of Syria, and on the whole its most striking feature, is the great valley which reaches from the plain of Umk, near Antioch, to the narrow gorge on which the Litány enters in about latitude 33° 30'. This valley, which runs nearly parallel with the Syrian coast, extends the length of 230 miles, and has a width varying from six or eight to fifteen or twenty miles. The more southern portion of it was known to the ancients as Coelesyria, or CELOSRYIA (= the Hollow Syria).—7. The Northern Highlands. Northern Syria, especially the district called Commagene, between Taurus and the Euphrates, is still very insufficiently explored. It seems to be altogether an elevated tract, consisting of twisted spurs from Taurus and

Amanus, with narrow valleys between them, which open out into bare and sterile plains. The highest elevation of the plateau between the two rivers is 1,500 feet; and this height is reached soon after leaving the Euphrates, while toward the W. the decline is gradual.—8. The Eastern Desert. E. of the inner mountain-chain, and S. of the cultivable ground about Aleppo, is the great Syrian Desert, an elevated dry upland, for the most part of gypsum and marls, producing nothing but a few spare bushes of wormwood, and the usual aromatic plants of the wilderness. The most remarkable oasis is at Palmyra. (TADMOR.) The best known and most productive of the fertile tracts toward the more western part of this region is the famous plain of DAMASCUS.—9. Chief Divisions. According to Strabo, Syria Proper was divided into the following districts:—(1.) Commagene in the N.; (2.) Cyrrhestica, S. of Commagene, and of Ain-tah; (3.) Seleucia, on the Mediterranean, embracing the region about SELEUCIA, ANTIOCH 1, Laodicea (now Ladikiyeh), Apamea, &c.; (4.) Coelesyria; and (5.) Damascus, or the region of Damascus, E. of the last. If we take its limits, however, as laid down above (§ 1), we must add to these districts three others: Chalybonitis, or the country about Aleppo, and S. of Cyrrhestica; Chalcis or Chalcidice, a small tract S. of this, about the lake in which the river of Aleppo ends; and Palmyrene, or the desert so far as we consider it to have been Syrian. 10. Principal towns. The chief towns of Syria may be thus arranged, as nearly as possible in the order of their importance: (1.) ANTIOCH 1; (2.) DAMASCUS; (3.) Apamea; (4.) SELEUCIA; (5.) TADMOR or Palmyra; (6.) Laodicea; (7.) Epiphanea (HAMATH); (8.) Samosata; (9.) Hierapolis (Mabug); (10.) Chalybon (now Aleppo); (11.) Emesa (Hama); (12.) Heliopolis (Ba'albek); (13.) Laodicea ad Libanum; (14.) Cyrrhus; (15.) Chalcis; (16.) Posideum; (17.) Heraclea; (18.) Gindarus; (19.) Zeugma; (20.) Thapsacus (TIPHSAN). Of these, Samosata, Zeugma, Thapsacus, are on the Euphrates; Seleucia, Laodicea, Posideum, and Heraclea, on the sea-shore; Antioch, Apamea, Epiphanea, and Emesa (Hama) on the Orontes; Heliopolis and Laodicea ad Libanum, in Coelesyria; Hierapolis, Chalybon, Cyrrhus, Chalcis, and Gindarus, in the northern highlands; Damascus on the skirts, and Palmyra in the centre of the eastern desert.—11. History. The first occupants of Syria appear to have been of Hamitic descent. The Canaanitish races, the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, &c., are connected in Scripture with Egypt and Ethiopia, Cush and Mizraim (Gen. x. 6, 15-18). These tribes occupied not Palestine only, but also lower Syria, in very early times, as Hamath is assigned to them in Gen. x. 18. Afterward they seem to have become possessed of Upper Syria also. (HAM; HITTITES.) After a while the first comers, who were still to a great extent nomads, received a Semitic infusion, which most probably came to them from the S. E. (ABRAHAM; CHEDORLAOMER; SEMITIC LANGUAGES.) The only Syrian town distinctly marked as then existing is DAMASCUS (Gen. xiv. 15, xv. 2), apparently already a place of some importance. Next to Damascus must be placed HAMATH (Num. xiii. 21, xxiv. 8). Syria at this time, and for many centuries afterward, seems to have been broken up among a number of petty kingdoms (§ 1, above; ARAM). The Jews first came into hostile contact with the Syrians, under that name (compare Josh. xi. 2-18, in the time of David. Claiming the frontier of the Euphrates, which God had promised to Abraham (Gen. xv. 18), David made war on, and signally defeated, HADADZER, king of ZOBAB (2 Sam. viii. 3, 4, 13). The Damascus Syrians were likewise defeated with great loss, and soon became David's subjects (ver. 5, 6). Zobah, however, was far from being subdued as yet. When, a few years later, the Ammonites determined on engaging in a war with David, and applied to the Syrians for aid, Zobah, together with BETH-REHOB, sent them 20,000 footmen, and two other Syrian kingdoms furnished 13,000 (x. 6). This army being completely defeated by Joab, Hadadzer obtained aid from Mesopotamia, but a third battle likewise went against him, and produced the general submission of Syria to David (ver. 16 ff.). The submission thus begun continued under the reign of Solomon (1 K. iv. 21), who seems to have lost only Damascus, where an independent kingdom was set up by REZON, a native of Zobah (xi. 23-25). On the separation of the two kingdoms, soon after the accession of Rehoboam, the remainder of Syria no doubt shook off the yoke. DAMASCUS now became decidedly the leading state, HAMATH being second to it, and the northern HITTITES third. The result of the wars at this period was to attach Syria to the great Assyrian empire (ASSYRIA), from which it passed to the Babylonians (BABEL), and from them to the PERSIANS. In B. C. 333 it submitted to ALEXANDER THE GREAT without a struggle. On the death of Alexander Syria became, for the first time, the head of a great kingdom. On the division of the provinces among his generals (B. C. 321), Seleucus Nicator received Mesopotamia and Syria. He became the founder of the Seleucidæ or Seleucid kings. The era of the Seleucidæ, much used in ancient chronology, is reckoned from the recovery of Babylon by Seleucus Nicator, B. C. 312. The successors of Seleucus Nicator (who reigned till B. C. 280) were—Antiochus Soter, ANTIOCHUS THEOS, Seleucus Callinicus, Seleucus Ceraunus, ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT, SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR, ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR, DEMETRIUS SOTER, ALEXANDER BALAS, DEMETRIUS NICATOR, ANTIOCHUS SIDETES, Antiochus Grypus, Antiochus Cyzicenus (i. e. of Cyzicus), Antiochus Eusebes (= the Pious) and Philip, Tigranes (king of ARMENIA), and Antiochus Asiaticus (i. e. of ASIA), who was deposed by Pompey, about B. C. 64. ANTIOCH I was begun by Seleucus B. C. 300, and, being finished in a few years, was made the capital of his kingdom. Syria grew rich with the wealth which now flowed into it on all sides. The most flourishing period under the Seleucid kings was the reign of the founder, Nicator. The empire was then almost as large as that of the Achemenian Persians, for it at one time included Asia Minor, and thus reached from the Ægean to India. The reign of Nicator's son, Antiochus I., called Soter, was the beginning of the decline, which was progressive from his date. It passed under the power of Tigranes, king of Armenia, in B. C. 83, and was not made a province of the Roman empire till after Pompey's complete defeat of Mithridates and his ally Tigranes, B. C. 64.—As Syria holds an important place, not only in the O. T., but in the N. T., some account of its condition under the Romans must now be given. That condition was somewhat peculiar. While the country generally was formed into a Roman province, under governors who were at first proprætors or questors, then proconsuls, and finally legates, there were exempted from the direct rule of the governor, (1.) a number of "free cities," which retained the administration of their own affairs, subject to a tribute levied according to the Roman principles of taxation; and (2.) a number of tracts, which were assigned to petty princes, commonly natives, to be ruled at their pleasure, subject to the same obligations with the free cities as to taxation. (DEPUTY; GOVERNOR; PROCURATOR; PROVINCE; TAXES, &c.) The free cities were ANTIOCH I, SELEUCIA, Apamea, Epiphanea, Tripolis, SIDON, and TYRE; the principalities, Commagene, Chalcis ad Beluum (near Be'albek), Arethusa, Abila or ABILENE, Palmyra (TADMOR), and DAMASCUS. The principalities were sometimes called kingdoms, sometimes tetrarchies. (ARETAS; HEROD; JUDEA; LY-SANIAS, &c.) They were established where it was thought that the natives were so inveterately wedded to their own customs, and so well disposed for revolt, that it was necessary to consult their feelings, to flatter the national vanity, and to give them the semblance without the substance of freedom. The list of the governors of Syria, from its conquest by the Romans to the destruction of Jerusalem, has been made out with a near approach to accuracy, and is as follows:—

The history of Syria during this period may be summed up in a few words. Down to the battle of Pharsalia, Syria was fairly tranquil, the only troubles being with the Arabs, who occasionally attacked the eastern frontier. The Roman governor labored hard to raise the condition of the province, taking great pains to restore the cities, which had gone to decay under the later Seleucidæ. After the battle of Pharsalia (B. C. 46) the troubles of Syria were renewed. Julius Cesar gave the province to his relative Sextus, B. C. 47; but Pompey's party was still so strong in the East, that the next year one of his adherents, Cæcilius Bassus, put Sextus to death, and established himself in the government so firmly that he was able to resist for three years three proconsuls appointed by the Senate to dispossess him, and only finally yielded upon terms which he himself offered to his antagonists. Bassus had but just made his submission, when, upon the assassination of Cesar, Syria was disputed between Cassius and Dolabella, the friend of Antony, a dispute terminated by the suicide of Dolabella, B. C. 48. The next year Cassius left his province and went to PHILIPPI, where, after the first unsuccessful engagement, he, too, committed suicide. Syria then fell to Antony, who appointed as his legate, Lucius Decidius Saxa, B. C. 41. Pacorus, the crown-prince of Parthia, son of Arsaces XIV. (PARTHIANS), assisted by the Roman refugee Labienus, overran Syria and Asia Minor, defeating Antony's generals, and threatening Rome with the loss of all her Asiatic possessions (B. C. 40-39). Ventidius, however, B. C. 38, defeated the Parthians, slew Pacorus, and recovered for Rome her former boundary. A quiet time followed. Syria was then governed peaceably, B. C. 38-31, by the legates of Antony, and afterward by those of Augustus. In B. C. 27 took place that formal division of the provinces between Augustus and the Senate from which the imperial administrative system dates; and Syria, being from its exposed situation among the imperial provinces, continued to be ruled by legates who were of consular rank and bore severally the full title of Legatus Augusti pro pretore (L. = Legate of Augustus as pretor). During this period Syria enlarged or contracted its limits as the reigning emperor bestowed tracts of land on the native princes or placed them again under his legate. Judea was ruled by a special PROCURATOR, who was subordinate to the governor of Syria, but within his own province had the power of a legate. Syria continued without serious disturbance from the expulsion of the Parthians (B. C. 38) to the breaking out of the Jewish war (A. D. 66). It was visited by Augustus B. C. 19. It was the scene of a severe famine, A. D. 44-47. (AGABUS.) A little earlier Christianity had begun to spread into it, partly by means of those who "were scattered" at the time of Stephen's persecution (Acts xi. 19), partly by the exertions of St. PAUL (Gal. i. 21). The Syrian Christians soon became very numerous (Acts xiii. 1, xv. 23, 35, 41, &c.).—To the above from Prof. Rawlinson it may be added, that Syria was a part of the ROMAN EMPIRE, and, after the division, of the Eastern Empire. Chosroes II. of Persia took Antioch, &c., A. D. 611, but was driven out of the country in 627; but the Mohammedan conquest soon followed. (ARABIA.) In the Crusades (A. D. 1099-1187) a large part of Syria came under Christian authority. Afterward it was the prey of contending powers, Egyptian, Tartar, &c.; but since its conquest by Sultan Selim I., in 1517, it has formed a part of the Ottoman Empire or Turkey, except in 1832-41, when it was under Egyptian control. Syria now forms a portion of three pashalics, viz. Aleppo, Damascus, and Sidon (Porter, in Kitto). The population (exclusive of the Arab tribes that roam over the desert, and may number 200,000, possibly 500,000) is estimated (Thn. i. 246-7) at about 1,610,000; viz. 800,000

<sup>3</sup> L. — a questor or treasurer, who administered the prætorship of the province while the prætor was absent. The prætor was originally a kind of third consul at Rome; but at an early period two were appointed to be judicial magistrates, one for the city, and one for foreigners; and still later, those who had been prætors a year at Rome were sent the next year to the provinces as governors with the title of prætor or propretor. A legate (L. legatus, literally one sent) was sent to govern an imperial province as the emperor's deputy. (PROCURATOR.) A prolegat was a legate's substitute. For proconsul see DEPUTY.

Moslems, 50,000 Kûrds, 150,000 Nusairiyyeh (living in the mountains N. of Tripoli, and perhaps descended from the ancient Canaanites), 100,000 Druzes, 20,000 Ismailiyyeh, Yezidees and Gypsies, 25,000 Jews, 200,000 Maronites (probably descendants of the ancient Syrians), 150,000 orthodox Greeks, 20,000 Armenians, 15,000 Jacobites, 80,000 Roman Catholics of various sects, some Protestants, &c. "The various religions and sects live together, and practise their conflicting superstitions in close proximity, but the people do not coalesce into one homogeneous community, nor do they regard each other with fraternal feelings. . . . With the exception of the Jews and Bedawin Arabs, no one can trace back his own origin to any ancient race or nation. The general mass of the Moslems are the mingled descendants of the various races who composed the population of the Greek Empire at the time of Mohammed, and this original confusion of races has been infinitely augmented during the twelve centuries of their lawless occupation. In all the Christian sects there has been the same blending of primitive races, and a large infusion of foreign and European blood during the times of the Crusades, and subsequently even to our day, so that the most intelligent and learned admit that it is absolutely impossible now to ascertain their true national origin" (Thn. i. 247-8).

* Syr'-lan = a native or inhabitant of SYRIA (Gen. xxv. 20; Deut. xxvi. 5; 2 K. v. 20, &c.). Syriac (or Syriac) language (or longue); see SHEMITIC LANGUAGES.

Syr'-phe-ni'cian, also written Syr'-phe-ni'cian (Gr. Syrophœnissa in the common text; but Lachmann [after A, K, &c.; see NEW TESTAMENT, I., § 28] reads Syrophœnikissa, and Tischendorf [after E, F, &c.] has Syrophœnikissa), occurs only in Mk. vii. 26, and has been generally supposed to distinguish the PHENICIANS of Syria from those of Africa, i. e. from the Carthaginians (Alford, Rtn. N. T. Lxx., &c.), but Prof. Rawlinson thinks the word may properly denote a mixed race, half-Phœnician and half-Syrian, though he regards Tischendorf's reading (= a Phœnician-Syrian) as perhaps most probable. The Emperor Hadrian (A. D. 117-138) divided Syria into three parts, Syria Proper, Syro-Phœnicia, and Syria Palæstina; and henceforth a Syro-Phœnician meant a native of this sub-province, which included Phœnicia Proper, Damascus, and Palmyrene. Lange (Conciliar) says of the woman in Mk. vii. 26: "She was a Phœnician-Syrian woman; most generally viewed, a Gentile (A. V. 'GREEK'); more specially, a Syrian; and still more specifically, a Phœnician. Phœnicia belonged to the province of SYRIA. But the word may also, more precisely still, describe the Syrian of Phœnicia, the Canaanite woman" (compare Mat. xv. 22).

Ta'a-nach [-nak] (Heb. sandy soil, Ges.), an ancient Canaanitish city, whose king was conquered by Joshua (Josh. xii. 21); given to the half-tribe of Manasseh (xvii. 11, xxi. 25; 1 Chr. vii. 29), and then to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 25; A. V. "Tanach"). But the Canaanites held it (xvii. 12; Judg. i. 27), and it appears to have formed the headquarters of Sisera's army (v. 19). Taanach is almost always named with Μεγιδόο, and they were evidently the chief towns of the western portion of the great plain of Esdraelon (1 K. iv. 12). There it is still to be found at the modern hamlet of Ta'anuk, about four miles S. E. of Lejjün.

Ta'a-nath-shiloh (Heb. approach to Shiloh, Ges.), a place named once only (Josh. xvi. 6) as on the boundary of Ephraim, JANOHAH being E. of it. In a list of places in the Talmud, Taanath-shiloh is said to be = SHILOH. The view of Kurtz and Hengstenberg, that Taanath was the ancient Canaanite name of the place, and Shiloh the Hebrew name, is ingenious, but at present it is a mere conjecture (so Mr. Grove).

Tab'a-oth (Gr.) = TABBAOTH (1 Esd. v. 29).

Tab'ba-oth (Heb. rings, Ges.), ancestor of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 43; Neh. vii. 46).

Tab'bath (Heb. the celebrated? Ges.), a place mentioned only in Judg. vii. 22, in describing the flight of the Midianite host after Gideon's night attack. The host fled from the valley by the hill of MOREH to BETH-SITTAN, to (A. V. "in") ZERERATH, to the brink of ABEL-MEHOLOH on (A. V. "unto") Tabbath. Mr. Grove suggests that it must be at or near Tubukat Fahil (= Terrace of Fahil or of Pella), a very striking natural bank, 600 feet high, on the E. of JORDAN, over against Beth-shean.

Tab'e-al (Syr. = TABEEL). The "son of Tabeal" was apparently an Ephraimite, or more probably a Syrian, whom the Syrians and Israelites designed to place on the throne of Judah in the place of ANAZ (Is. vii. 6).

Tab'e-el (Syr. God is good, Ges.), an officer of the Persian government in Samaria in the reign of ARTAXERXES (Ezr. iv. 7); probably a Syrian.

Tab'hel'li-nis (fr. Gr.) = TABEEL (1 Esd. ii. 16).

Tab'e-rah (Heb. a burning, Ges.), a place in the wilderness of PARAN, where the "fire of the Lord" consumed some of the people (Num. xi. 3; Deut. ix. 22); not identified. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Tab'ber-lay (Heb. pl. participle methóphēphēh), an obsolete word used in the A. V. of Nah. ii. 7. The Hebrew word connects itself with tóph, "a TIMBREL." The A. V. reproduces the original idea. The "tabour" or "tabor" was a musical instrument of the drum-type, which with the pipe formed the band of a country-village. To "tabor," accordingly, is to beat with loud strokes as men beat upon such an instrument, and "taboring" or "tabering" = drumming.

Tab'er-ni-cle (fr. L. = a tent). The description of the Tabernacle and its materials will be found under TEMPLE. The present article, originally by Prof. Plumptre, treats—(I.) of the word and its synonyms; (II.) of the history of the Tabernacle itself; (III.) of its relation to the religious life of Israel; (IV.) of the theories of later times respecting it.—I. The Hebrew word and its synonyms. (1.)

The first word used (Ex. xxv. 9, and usually in xxvi., xxvii., xxv., xxxvi., xxxix., xl.; Lev. viii. 10, xv. 31, xvii. 13 [Heb. 28], xxvi. 11; Num. i. 50-53, &c.; comp. 6, 7, below) is Heb. miškan = dwelling. It connects itself with the Jewish, though not Scriptural, word Shechinah, as describing the dwelling-place of the Divine Glory. It is not applied in prose to the common "dwellings" of men, but seems to belong rather to the speech of poetry (Job xviii. 21; Ps. lxxxvii. 2; Cant. i. 8, A. V. "tent"). (2.) Another word, however, is also used, more connected with the common life of men, Heb. dhal, the "TEXT" of the patriarchal age, of Abraham, and of Jacob (Gen. iv. 20, ix. 21, &c.). For the most part this is used, when applied to the Sacred Tent, with some distinguishing epithet (Ex. xxvi. 9, xxvii. 21, xxviii. 43, xxix., xxx., xxxi. 7 twice, xxxiii. 7 thrice, 8 twice, 9 twice, 10, 11, &c.; compare 6, 7, below). In 1 K. i. 39 it appears with this meaning by itself. (3.) Heb. bayith (= "house"), construct béyth (= "house of") is applied to the Tabernacle in Ex. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26, and in Josh. vi. 24, ix. 23, and Judg. xviii. 31, xix. 18, xx. 18, as it had been, apparently, to the tents of the patriarchs (Gen. xxxiii. 17). So far as it differs from the two preceding words, it expresses more definitely the idea of a fixed settled habitation. (4.) Heb. kódenāh (A. V. "holiness," "holy," sc. name, place, &c., "sanctuary"), mikdāsh (A. V. usually "sanctuary"), the holy, consecrated place, and therefore applied, according to the gradual scale of holiness of which the Tabernacle bore witness, sometimes to the whole structure (Ex. xxv. 8; Lev. xii. 4), sometimes to the court into which none out the priests might enter (iv. 6; Num. iii. 38, iv. 12), sometimes to the innermost sanctuary of all, the Holy of Holies (Lev. iv. 6?). (5.) Heb. and Chal. hēykhāl (A. V. "temple," "palace"), as meaning the stately building, or palace, of Jehovah (compare Heb. birāh, A. V. "PALACE," in 1 Chr. xxix. 1, 19), is applied more commonly to the Temple (2 K. xxiv. 13, &c.), but was used also of the Tabernacle at Shiloh (1 Sam. i. 9, iii. 3), and Jerusalem (Ps. v. 7, Heb. 8, &c.). (6.) The two Hebrew words (No. 1 and No. 2)<sup>1</sup> receive a new meaning in combination (a.) with mō'ēl (A. V. usually "CONGREGATION"; see ASSEMBLY 1), and (b.) with hā'ēdūth (A. V. "the TESTIMONY," "witness"). To understand the full meaning of the distinctive titles thus formed is to possess the key to the significance of the whole Tabernacle. (a.) The real meaning of the word rendered "congregation" is to be found in Ex. xxix. 42-46. It is clear that "congregation" is inadequate. Not the gathering of the worshippers only, but the meeting of God with His people, to commune with them, to make Himself known to them, was what the name embodied. (7.) The other compound phrase (b.) is rightly rendered "the tent of the testimony" (Num. ix. 15), "the tabernacle of the testimony" (x. 11), "the tabernacle of witness" (xvii. 7, 8 [Heb. 22, 23], xviii. 2). In this case the tent derives its name from that which is the centre of its holiness. The two tables of stone within the ark are emphatically the testimony (Ex. xxv. 16, 21, xxxi. 18).—II. History. (1.) The outward history of the Tabernacle begins with Ex. xxv. It comes after the first great group of Laws (xix.-xxiii.), after the covenant with the people, after the vision of the Divine Glory (xxiv.). For forty days and nights Moses is in the mount. There rose before him, not without points of contact with previous associations, yet in no degree formed out of them, the "pattern" of the Tabernacle. He is directed in his choice of the two chief artists, Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah, Aholiab of the tribe of Dan (xxxi.). The sin of the golden calf apparently postpones the execution. As in a transition period, the whole future depending on the penitence of the people, on the intercession of their leader, a tent is pitched, probably that of Moses himself, outside the camp, to be provisionally the Tabernacle of Meeting. Of this provisional

Tabernacle it has to be noticed, that there was as yet no ritual and no priesthood. The people went out to it as to an oracle (xxxiii. 7). Joshua, though of the tribe of Ephraim, had free access to it (11). (2.) Another outline Law was, however, given; another period of solitude, like the first, followed. The work could now be resumed. The people offered the necessary materials in excess of what was wanted (xxxvi. 5, 6). Other workmen (xxxvi. 2) and work-women (xxxv. 25) placed themselves under the direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab. The parts were completed separately, and then, on the first day of the second year from the Exodus, the Tabernacle itself was erected and the ritual appointed for it begun (xl. 2). (3.) The position of the new Tent was itself significant. It stood, not, like the provisional Tabernacle, at a distance from the camp, but in its very centre. The PRIESTS on the E., the other three families of the LEVITES on the other sides, were closest in attendance, the "body-guard" of the Great King. In the wider square, Judah, Zebulun, Issachar, were on the E.; Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin, on the W.; the less conspicuous tribes, Dan, Asher, Naphtali, on the N.; Reuben, Simeon, Gad, on the S. When the army put itself in order of march, the position of the Tabernacle, carried by the Levites, was still central, the tribes of the E. and S. in front, those of the N. and W. in the rear (Num. ii.). Upon it rested the symbolic cloud, dark by day, and fiery red by night (Ex. xl. 38; CLOUD, PILLAR OF). (4.) In all special facts connected with the Tabernacle, the original thought reappears. It is the place where man meets with God (Num. xi. 24, 25, xii. 4, xiv. 10, &c.). (5.) As long as Canaan remained unconquered, and the people were still therefore an army, the Tabernacle was probably moved from place to place, wherever the host of Israel was, for the time, encamped; and, finally, was placed at SHILON (Josh. ix. 27, xviii. 1). There it continued during the whole period of the Judges. There, too, as the religion of Israel sunk toward the level of an orgiastic heathenism, troops of women assembled, shameless as those of Midian, worshippers of Jehovah, and concubines of His priests (1 Sam. ii. 22). (6.) A state of things which was rapidly assimilating the worship of Jehovah to that of ASHTORETH, &c. (IDOLATRY), needed to be broken up. The Ark of God was taken and the sanctuary lost its glory; and the Tabernacle, though it did not perish, never again recovered it (iv. 22). It probably became once again a movable sanctuary, less honored as no longer possessing the symbol of the Divine Presence, yet cherished by the priesthood, and some portions, at least, of its ritual, kept up. For a time it seems, under Saul, to have been settled at Nob (xxi. 1-6). The massacre of the priests and the flight of Abiathar must, however, have robbed it yet further of its glory. It had before lost the Ark. It now lost the presence of the HIGH-PRIEST, and with it the oracular ephod, the URIM AND THUMMIM (xxii. 20, xxiii. 6). What change of fortune then followed we do not know. In some way or other, it found its way to GIBION (1 Chr. xvi. 39). The capture of JERUSALEM and the erection there of a new Tabernacle, with the ark, of which the old had been deprived (2 Sam. vi. 17; 1 Chr. xv. 1), left it little more than a traditional, historical sanctity. (HIGH PLACE.) It retained only the old altar of burnt-offerings (xxi. 29). The divided worship continued all the days of David. (ZADOK I.) The sanctity of both places was recognized by SOLOMON on his accession (1 K. iii. 15; 2 Chr. i. 8). But the purpose of David, fulfilled by Solomon, was that the claims of both should merge in the higher glory of the Temple.—III. Relation to the religious life of Israel. (1.) Whatever connection may be traced between other parts of the ritual of Israel and that of the nations with which Israel had been brought into contact, the thought of the Tabernacle meets us as entirely new. The "house of God" (BETH-EL) of the patriarchs had been the large "pillar of stone" (Gen. xxviii. 18, 19), bearing record of some high spiritual experience, or the grove which, with its dim, doubtful light, attuned the souls of men to a divine awe (xxi. 38). A sacred tent, a moving Beth-el, was the fit sanctuary for a people still nomadic. It was capable of being united afterward, as it actually came to be, with "the grove" of the older worship (Josh. xxiv. 26). (2.) The structure of the Tabernacle was obviously determined by a complex and profound symbolism; but its meaning we can but dimly guess. No interpretation is given in the Law itself. That which meets us in the Epistle to the Hebrews, the application of the types of the Tabernacle to the mysteries of Redemption, was latent till those mysteries were made known. And, yet, we cannot but believe that, as each portion of the wonderful order rose before the inward eye of the law-giver, it must have embodied distinctly manifold truths which he apprehended himself, and sought to communicate to others. (3.) The thought of a graduated sanctity, like that of the outer court, the Holy Place, the Holy of Holies, had its counterpart, often the same number of stages, in the structure of Egyptian temples. In the Adyton, or secret apartment, often at least, was the sacred ARK, the culminating point of holiness, containing the highest and most mysterious symbols, winged figures, generally like those of the cherubim, the emblems of stability and life. Here were outward points of resemblance. Of all elements of Egyptian worship this could be transferred with least hazard, with most gain. No one could think that the Ark itself was the likeness of the God he worshipped. When we ask what gave the Ark its holiness, we are led on at once to the infinite difference, the great gulf between the two systems. That of Egypt was predominantly cosmical, starting from the productive powers of nature. (IDOLATRY.) That of Israel was predominantly ethical. In the depths of the Holy of Holies, and for the high-priest as for all Israel, there was the revelation of a righteous Will requiring righteousness in man. And over the Ark was the MERCY-SEAT (Heb. cupporeth = cover), which covered the Ark, and was the witness of a mercy covering sins. And over the mercy-seat were the CHERUBIM. Representing as they did created life in its highest form, their overshadowing wings, meeting as in token of perfect harmony, declared that nature as well as man found its highest glory in subjection to a Divine Law, that men might take refuge in that Order, as under the shadow of the wings of God. The material not less than the forms, in the Holy of Holies, was significant. The acacia or shittim-wood, least liable, of woods then accessible, to decay, might well represent the imperishableness of Divine Truth, of the Laws of Duty. Ark, mercy-seat, cherubim, the very walls, were all overlaid with gold, the noblest of all metals, the symbol of light and purity, sunlight itself as it were, fixed and embodied, the token of the inconvertible, of the glory of a great king. Dimensions also had their meaning. There can be little doubt that the older religious systems of the world attached a mysterious significance to each separate number. The perfect cube of the Holy of Holies, the constant remembrance of the numbers 4 and 10 may symbolize order, stability, perfection. (4.) Into the inner sanctuary neither people nor the priests as a body ever entered. Strange as it may seem, that in which every thing represented light and life was left in utter darkness, in profound solitude. Once only in the year, on the Day of Atonement (ATONEMENT, DAY OF), might the high-priest enter. The strange contrast has, however, its parallel in the spiritual life. Death and life, light and darkness, are wonderfully united. Only through death can we truly live. Only by passing into the "thick darkness" where God is (Ex. xx. 21; 1 K. viii. 12) can we enter at all into the "light inaccessible," in which He dwells everlastingly. For the high-priest to enter into the Holy of Holies, as representing man in his humiliation, with blood, the symbol of life, touching with that blood the mercy-seat, with incense, the symbol of adoration (Lev. xvi. 12-14), what did that express but the truth, (a.) that man must draw near to the righteous God with no lower offering than the pure worship of the heart, with the living sacrifice of body, soul, and spirit; (b.) that could such a perfect sacrifice be found, it would have a mysterious power working beyond itself, in proportion to its perfection, to cover the multitude of sins? (5.) From all others, from the high-priest at all other times, the Holy of Holies was shrouded by the double VAIL, bright with many colors and strange forms, even as curtains of golden tissue hung before the Adytum of an Egyptian temple, a strange contrast often to the bostial form behind them. Within the veil light and truth were seen in their unity. The veil itself represented the infinite variety and manifold wisdom of the Divine order in Creation (Eph. iii. 10). Upon the veil were seen the mysterious forms of the cherubim; how many, or in what attitude, or of what size, or in what material, we are not told. (6.) The outer sanctuary was one degree less awful in its holiness than the inner. Silver, the type of Human Purity, took the place of gold, the type of the Divine Glory. It was to be trodden daily by the priests, as if by men perpetually conscious of the nearness of God, of the mystery behind the veil. Barefooted and in garments of white linen, like the priests of Isis, they accomplished their ministrations. And here, too, were other emblems of Divine realities. With no opening to admit light from without, it was illumined only by the golden LAMP with its seven lights, one taller than the others, as the Sabbath is more sacred than the other days of the week, never all extinguished together, the perpetual symbol of all derived gifts of wisdom and holiness in man, reaching their mystical perfection when they shine in God's sanctuary to His glory (Ex. xxv. 31, xxvii. 20; Zech. iv. 1-14). The SHEW-BREAD, the bread of the Divine Presence, served as a token that, though there was no form or likeness of the Godhead, He was yet there, accepting all offerings, recognizing in particular that special offering which represented the life of the nation at once in the distinctness of its tribes and in its unity as a people. The meaning of the ALTAR OF INCENSE was not less obvious. The cloud of fragrant smoke was the emblem of the heart's adoration (Ps. cxli. 2). Upon that altar no "strange fire" was to be kindled. When fresh fire was needed it was to be taken from the Altar of Burnt-offering in the outer court (Lev. ix.

24, x. 1). (7.) Outside the tent, but still within the consecrated precincts, was the COURT, fenced in by an enclosure, yet open to all the congregation, except the ceremonially unclean. No Gentile might pass beyond the curtains of the entrance, but every member of the priestly nation might thus far "draw near" to the presence of Jehovah. Here, therefore, stood the ALTAR OF BURNT-OFFERING, at which SACRIFICES in all their varieties were offered by penitent or thankful worshippers (Ex. xxvii. 1-8, xxxviii. 1). the brazen LAYER at which those worshippers purified themselves before they sacrificed, the priests before they entered into the sanctuary (xxx. 17-21). Here the graduated scale of holiness ended.—IV. Theories of later times. (1.) Probably the elaborate symbolism of such a structure was not understood by the rude and sensual multitude that came out of Egypt. Yet it was not the less, perhaps the more, fitted, on that account, to be an instrument for the education of the people. To the most ignorant and debased it was at least a witness of the nearness of the Divine King. It met the craving of the human heart which prompts to worship, with an order which was neither idolatrous nor impure. More thoughtful minds were not slow to see in the Tabernacle the parable of God's presence manifested in Creation. If the words, "He that dwelleth between the cherubim," spoke on the one side of a special, localized manifestation of the Divine Presence, they spoke also on the other of that Presence, as in the heaven of heavens, in the light of setting suns, in the blackness and the flashes of the thunder-clouds. (2.) The thought thus uttered, essentially poetical in its nature, had its fit place in the psalms and hymns of Israel. It lost its beauty, it led men on a false track, when it was formalized into a system. At a time when Judaism and Greek PHILOSOPHY were alike effete, when a feeble physical science, which could read nothing but its own thoughts in the symbols of an older and deeper system, was after its own fashion rationalizing the mythology of heathenism, there were Jewish writers willing to apply the same principle of interpretation to the Tabernacle and its order. The result appears in Josephus and in Philo (ALEXANDRIA), in part also in Clement of Alexandria and Origen. (3.) The Epistle to the Hebrews has not been looked on as designed to limit our inquiry into the meaning of the symbolism of the Tabernacle, and there is consequently no ground for adopting the system of interpreters who can see in it nothing but an aggregate of types of Christian mysteries. Rightly viewed, there is, it is believed, no antagonism between the interpretation which starts from the idea of symbols of Great, Eternal Truths, and that which rests on the idea of types foreshadowing Christ and His work, and His Church.<sup>2</sup> OLD TESTAMENT, B.

<sup>2</sup> Prof. A. B. Davidson (in Fairbairn) regards the Tabernacle as symbolizing, on a smaller scale, the same principles as the theocracy, viz.—(1.) The revealing and sanctifying presence of God in the midst of the Church. (2.) The meeting of God and His people, and continuous and reciprocal intercourse between them. (3.) In order to this intercourse, even in its lowest form, the separation of the Church from the rest of the world. This was shown by the court. (4.) The progressiveness through various stages of this intercourse with God and nearness to Him, once begun by separation from without. (5.) The foundation of all intercourse in atonement by blood; and that each new stage of progress must be won by atonement; and that all intercourse and service and life of men around God must, however true, and pure, and high, yet be atoned for as in many ways sinful. (6.) The necessity of holiness in those drawing near to God (Ps. cxiv.). The Tabernacle is

Tab'er-na-cles (see above), the Feast of, the third of the three great festivals of the Hebrews, which lasted from the 15th to the 22d of Tisri. (AGRICULTURE.) I. The principal passages in the Pentateuch which refer to it are—Ex. xxiii. 16, "the feast of ingathering;" Lev. xxiii. 34-36, 39-43; Num. xxix. 12-38; Deut. xvi. 13-15, xxxi. 10-13. In Neh. viii. there is an account of the observance of the feast by Ezra. It was also mentioned in Jn. vii. 2.—II. The time of the festival fell in the autumn, when the whole of the chief fruits of the ground, the corn, the wine, and the oil, were gathered in (Ex. xxiii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 39; Deut. xvi. 13-15). Its duration was strictly only seven days (xvi. 13; Ez. xlv. 25). But it was followed by a day of holy convocation, which had sacrifices of its own, and was sometimes spoken of as an eighth day (Lev. xxiii. 36; Neh. viii. 18). During the seven days the Israelites were commanded to dwell in booths or huts formed of the boughs of trees. (COTTAGE 3; PAVILION 2.) The boughs were of the olive, palm, pine, myrtle, and other trees with thick foliage (viii. 15, 16). According to Rabbinical tradition, each Israelite used to tie the branches into a bunch, to be carried in his hand, to which the name lulab was given. The "fruit (Lev. xxiii. 40 margin) of goodly trees" is generally taken by the Jews to mean the citron. The "boughs of thick trees" were understood by Onkelos, &c., to be myrtles (but comp. Neh. viii. 15). The burnt-offerings of the Feast of Tabernacles were far more numerous than those of any other festival. There were offered each day two rams, fourteen lambs, and a kid for a sin-offering. But what was most peculiar was the arrangement of the sacrifices of bullocks (thirteen the first day, twelve the second, eleven the third, &c.), in all amounting to seventy (Num. xxix. 12-38). The eighth day was a day of holy convocation of peculiar solemnity, and, with the seventh day of the Passover, and the day of Pentecost, was designated utsareth. (ASSEMBLY 3, 6.) The special offerings of the day were a bullock, a ram, seven lambs, and a goat for a sin-offering (xxix. 36, 38). When the Feast of Tabernacles fell on a SABBATICAL YEAR, portions of the Law were read each day in public, to men, women, children, and strangers (Deut. xxxi. 10-13). It is said that, in the time of the kings, the king read from a wooden pulpit erected in the court of the women, and the people were summoned by the trumpet. Ezra read the Law during the festival "day by day, from the first day to the last day" (Neh. viii. 18).—III. Two particulars in the observance of the Feast of Tabernacles, not noticed in the O. T., appear to be referred to in the N. T., viz. the ceremony of pouring out some water of the pool of SILOAM, and the display of some great lights in the court of the women. We are told that each Israelite, in holiday attire, having made up his lulab, before he broke his fast, repaired to the Temple with the lulab in one hand and the citron in the other, at the time of the ordinary morning sacrifice. The parts of the victim were laid on the altar. One of the priests fetched some water in a golden ewer from the pool of Siloam, which he brought into the court through the water-gate. As he entered the trumpets sounded, and he ascended the slope of the altar. At the top of this were fixed two silver basins with small openings at the bottom. Wine was poured into that on the eastern side, and the water into that on the western side, whence it was conducted by pipes into the Cedron. In the evening, both men and women assembled in the court of the women, expressly to hold a rejoicing for the drawing of the water of Siloam. The hallel (HALLELUJAH) was then sung, the sacrifices of the day were offered, and special passages from the psalms were chanted.—At this feast were set up in the court two lofty stands, each supporting four great lamps. These were lighted on each night of the festival. Many in the assembly carried flambeaux. Levites on the fifteen steps leading up to the women's court played instruments of music, and chanted the "Songs of Degrees" (Psalms cxx.-cxxxiv.). Singing and dancing were afterward continued for some time.—It appears to be generally admitted that the words of our Saviour (Jn. vii. 37, 38)—"If any man thirst, let him come unto Me and drink. He that believeth on Me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water"—were suggested by the pouring out of the water of Siloam (comp. Is. xii. 3 and 1 Cor. x. 4). But "the last day, that great day of the feast" (Jn. vii. 37) may mean either the last day of the feast itself, i. e. the seventh,<sup>1</sup> or the last day of the religious observances of the series of annual festivals, the eighth. Dean Alford supposes that the eighth day may be meant, and that the reference of our Lord was to an ordinary and well-known observance of the feast, though it was not, at the very time, going on. We must resort to some such explanation (so Mr. Clark, original author of this article) if we adopt the notion that our Lord's words (viii. 12)—"I am the light of the world"—refer to the great lamps of the festival.—IV. Many directions for the dimensions and construction of the huts are given in the Mishna. They were not to be lower than ten palms, nor higher than twenty cubits. They were to stand by themselves, not to rest on any external support, nor to be under the shelter of a larger building, or of a tree. They were not to be covered with skins or cloth of any kind, but only with boughs, or, in part, with reed mats or laths. The furniture of the huts was to be, according to most authorities, of the plainest description. It is said that the altar was adorned throughout the seven days with sprigs of willows, one of which each Israelite who came into the court brought with him. The great number of the sacrifices has been already noticed. But besides these, the private peace-offerings (Heb. hagigah or chagigah; PASSOVER, II. 3, 4) were more abundant than at any other time.—V. Though all the Hebrew annual festivals were seasons of rejoicing, the Feast of Tabernacles was, in this respect, distinguished above them all. The huts and the lulabs must have made a gay and striking spectacle over the city by day, and the lamps, the flambeaux, the music, and the joyous gatherings in the court of the Temple must have given a still more festive character to the night. Hence, it was called by the Rabbis preeminently the festival. There is a proverb in the Mishna, "He who has never seen the rejoicing at the pouring out of the water of Siloam also a condensation of the theocracy as to its typology. In a general way the Tabernacle will be found to signify Christ. But this will widen out into several concentric spheres: (1.) Christ's person, in which the two natures, God and man, meet in inseparable fellowship and life forever. Christ's whole person is the sphere of intercourse between God and man. (2.) The Christian Church, which is a Temple of God by His Spirit (Eph. ii.). (3.) The glorified Church around God's throne will most fully realize the symbol, and therefore the Tabernacle was typical of this.

has never seen rejoicing in his life."—VI. The main purposes of the Feast of Tabernacles are plainly set forth (Ex. xxiii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 43). It was to be at once a thanksgiving for the harvest, and a commemoration of the time when the Israelites dwelt in tents during their passage through the wilderness. In one of its meanings ("feast of ingathering") it stands in connection with the Passover, as the Feast of Abib; and with PENTECOST, as the feast of harvest: in its other meaning, it is related to the Passover as the great yearly memorial of the deliverance from the destroyer, and from the tyranny of Egypt. But naturally connected with this exultation in their regained freedom was the rejoicing in the more perfect fulfilment of God's promise, in the settlement of His people in the Holy Land. Besides this, Philo saw in this feast a witness for the original equality of all the members of the chosen race. But the culminating point of this blessing was the establishment of the central spot of the national worship in the Temple at Jerusalem.<sup>2</sup> Hence it was evidently fitting that the Feast of Tabernacles should be kept with an unwonted degree of observance at the dedication of Solomon's Temple (1 K. viii. 2, 65; Jos. viii. 4, § 5), again, after the rebuilding of the Temple by Ezra (Neh. viii. 13-18), and a third time by Judas Maccabeus when he had driven out the Syrians and restored the Temple to the worship of Jehovah (2 Mc. x. 5-8).

Tab'i-tha (see below), also called Dorcas, a female disciple of Joppa, "full of good works," among which that of making clothes for the poor is specifically mentioned. While St. Peter was at the neighboring town of Lydda, Tabitha died, upon which the disciples at Joppa sent an urgent message to the apostle, begging him to come to them without delay. Upon his arrival Peter found the deceased already prepared for burial, and laid out in an upper chamber where she was surrounded by the recipients and the tokens of her charity. After the example of our Saviour, in the house of Jairus (comp. Mk. v. 40, 41, &c.), "Peter put them all forth" prayed for the Divine assistance, and then commanded Tabitha to arise. She opened her eyes and sat up, and then, assisted by the apostle, rose from her couch. This great miracle produced an extraordinary effect in Joppa, and was the occasion of many conversions there (Acts ix. 36-42). The name of "Tabitha" is the Grecized Aramaic form answering to the Heb. tabithâh = a female gazelle, A. V. "roe." St. Luke gives "Dorcas" as the Greek equivalent of the name. MIRACLES.

* Table [-bl], the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. lûah or lûach = a tablet, table, Ges.; used especially of the tablets or slabs of stone on which were the TEN COMMANDMENTS (Ex. xxiv. 12, xxxi. 18, xxxii. 15 ff., xxxiv. 1 ff., &c.), also of other tablets for writing (Is. xxx. 8; Hab. ii. 2), and figuratively of the heart (Prov. iii. 3, vii. 3; Jer. xvii. 1), also translated "board" (Ex. xxvii. 8, xxxviii. 7; Cant. viii. 9; Ez. xxvii. 5), "plate" once (1 K. vii. 36).—2. Heb. mê'ab once (Cant. i. 12, A. V. "at his table," on his divan, i. e. in his company seated on the divan round the room, Ges.), usually translated "round about" (1 K. vi. 29, &c.).—3. Heb. shulhân or shulchân, uniformly; = a table, especially as spread with food

(Ex. xxv. 23 ff.; Judg. i. 7; 2 Sam. ix. 7 ff., &c.). (MEALS.)—4. Gr. klinê (Mk. vii. 4 only); usually translated "BED" (Mat. ix. 2, 6; Mk. iv. 21, vii. 30, &c.); = a bed, couch, for resting, lying upon, reclining at MEALS, &c. (Rbn. N. T. Lex.).—5. Gr. plaz (2 Cor. iii. 3 twice; Heb. ix. 4), = (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) a table or tablet of wood or stone, on which any thing is inscribed, used figuratively of the heart; in LXX. = No. 1.—6. Gr. trapeza usually (Mat. xv. 27, xxi. 12, &c.); once translated "meat" (Acts xvi. 34), and once "bank" (Lk. xix. 23). Rbn. N. T. Lex. defines this word, "a table, properly with four legs; generally, a table for setting on food, taking meals; specially, a money-changer's table, a broker's table or counter; hence, a broker's office or bank, where money is deposited and loaned out." (LOAN; MONEY-CHANGERS.)—Writing-table; see WRITING. TABLES.

* Tablets, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. botléy han-nephesh (literally, houses of the soul) = perfume-boxes, scent-cases, or smelling-bottles. Ges., Fû., &c. (PERFUMES.)—2. Heb. cûmûz (Ex. xxxv. 22; Num. xxxi. 50), = a globe, globule of gold, perhaps collectively, globules, drops, or rather a string of gold drops like beads worn round the neck or arm by the Israelites in the desert (Ges.). CHAIN; TABLE.

Ta'bor (Heb. a mound, mount, height, or [so others] a quarry, Ges.), or Mount Ta'bor, a remarkable mountain of Palestine, rises abruptly from the northeastern arm of the Plain of Esdrelon, and stands entirely insulated except on the W., where a narrow ridge connects it with the hills of Nazareth. It is beautiful and symmetrical in its proportions, as seen from a distance. The body of the mountain consists of the peculiar limestone of the country. On it is a comparatively dense forest of oaks, and other trees and bushes, with an occasional opening on the sides, and a small uneven tract on the summit. Its height is estimated at 1,000 feet. It is now called Jebel et-Tûr. It lies about six or eight miles almost due E. from Nazareth. The ascent is usually made on the W. side, near the little village of Dabûrieh (probably the ancient DABERATH), though it can be made with entire ease in other places. It requires three-quarters of an hour or an hour to reach the top. The path is circuitous and at times steep, but one may ride the entire way. The top of Tabor consists of an irregular platform, embracing a circuit of half-an-hour's walk, and commanding extensive and beautiful views. From it may be seen on the E. the entire outline of the Sea of Tiberias and some portion of its waters, the course of the Jordan for miles, the Haurân and the mountains of Gilead and Bashan; Hermon and intervening hills on the N. and N. E.; Carmel on the N. W.; on the W. the Mediterranean as a dark line on the horizon and the rich plains of Galilee filling up the intermediate space; on the S. are Gilboa, En-dor, Nain, &c. Tabor does not occur in the N. T., but is prominent in the O. T. (Ps. lxxxix. 12, &c.). Josh. xix. 22 mentions it as the boundary between Issachar and Zebulun (see ver. 12). BARAK, at the command of Deborah, assembled his forces on Tabor, and descended thence with "ten thousand men after him" into the plain, and conquered Sisera on the banks of the Kishon (Judg. iv. 6-15). The brothers of GIDEON were murdered here by Zebah and Zalmunna (viii. 18, 19). Some writers, after Herder and others, think that Tabor is intended when it is said of Issachar and Zebulun, in Deut. xxxiii. 19, that "they shall call the people unto the mountain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness." Dr. Robinson (ii. 353) has thus described the ruins on the summit of Tabor. "All around the top are the foundations of a thick wall built of large stones, some of which are bevelled, showing that the entire wall was perhaps originally of that character. In several parts are the remains of towers and bastions.

The chief remains are upon the ledge of rocks on the S. of the little basin, and especially toward its eastern end; here are—in indiscriminate confusion—walls and arches, and foundations, apparently of dwelling-houses, as well as other buildings, some of hewn and some of large bevelled stones. The walls and traces of a fortress are seen here, and further W. along the southern brow, of which one tall pointed arch of a Saracenic gateway is still standing, and bears the name of Bab el-Hawa, 'Gate of the Wind.' The Latin Christians have now an altar here, at which their priests from Nazareth perform an annual mass. The Greeks also have a chapel, where, on certain festivals, they assemble for the celebration of religious rites. In the monastic ages Tabor was crowded with hermits. The idea that our Saviour was transfigured on Tabor prevailed extensively among the early Christians, who adopted legends of this nature, and reappears often still in popular religious works. It is impossible, however, to acquiesce in the correctness of this opinion (so Prof. Hackett, original author of this article, with Robinson, Porter [in Kitto], Bonar [in Fairbairn], Stanley, Ayre, &c.). It can be proved from the O. T., and from later history, that a fortress or town existed on Tabor from very early times down to B. C. 53 or 50,<sup>1</sup> and, as Josephus says that he strengthened the fortifications there, about A. D. 60, it is morally certain that Tabor must have been inhabited during the intervening period, i. e. in the days of Christ. Tabor, therefore, could not have been the Mount of Transfiguration; for when it is said that Jesus took His disciples "up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them" (Mat. xvii. 1, 2), we must understand that He brought them to the summit of the mountain, where they were alone by themselves. HERMON.

Ta'bor (see above), mentioned in 1 Chr. vi. 77, as a city of the Merarite Levites, in the tribe of Zebulun. It is possible (so Mr. Grove), either that CHISLOTH-TABOR (Josh. xix. 12) = Tabor, or that, by the time the later lists in 1 Chr. were compiled, the Merarites had established themselves on the sacred mountain, and that "Tabor" is Mount Tabor (see last article).

Ta'bor (see above), the Plain of (Heb. elón), properly the Oak of Tabor (PLAIN 7), mentioned in 1 Sam. x. 3 only, as one of the points in the homeward journey of SAUL after his anointing by SAMUEL; site unknown. Ewald identifies the oak of Tabor with the tree under which DEBORAH 1, Rachel's nurse, was buried (Gen. xxv. 8). But this can only be received as a conjecture (so Mr. Grove).

Tab'et. TIMBREL.

Tab'ri-mon (fr. Syr., properly Talrimmon = god is Rimmon, the Syrian god), father of Ben-hadad I., king of Syria in the reign of ASA (1 K. xv. 18).

Tache [tatsh] (Heb. kerem) = hook. The word thus rendered occurs only in the description of the structure of the Tabernacle and its fittings (Ex. xxvi. 6, 11, 33, xxxv. 11, xxxvi. 13, xxxix. 33), and appears to indicate the small hooks by which a curtain is suspended to the rings from which it hangs, or connected vertically, as in the case of the veil of the Holy of Holies, with the loops of another curtain (so Prof. Plumpton).

Tach'mo-nite [tak-] (fr. Heb., see below), the. "The Tachmonite that sat in the seat," chief among David's captains (2 Sam. xxiii. 8), is in 1 Chr. xi. 11 called "JASHOBAM AN HACHMONITE," or, as the margin gives it, "son of Hachmoni," Kennicott has shown that the words translated "he that sat in the seat" are probably a corruption of Jashobeam, and "the Tachmonite" a corruption of "the son of Hachmoni," which was the family or local name of Jashobeam. Therefore he concludes "Jashobeam the Hachmonite" to have been the true reading.

<sup>1</sup> Antiochus the Great obtained possession of the city on the summit B. C. 218, and afterward fortified it; here a battle was fought between the Romans and Jews about B. C. 53, in which 10,000 Jews were slain; here in the sixth century A. C. were three churches and afterward a monastery, and still later two monasteries, one Greek, the other Latin; here a strong fortress was erected by the Moslems A. D. 1212, but soon afterward destroyed by them (Rbn. II. 357). In 1799 Napoleon gained at Mount Tabor a victory over the Turks. A new convent has recently been erected on the summit (Trm. 498).

Tad'mor (Heb., see below), called "Tadmor in the wilderness" (2 Chr. viii. 4). There is no reasonable doubt (so Mr. Twisleton, with most scholars) that this city, said to have been built by Solomon, is the same as Palmyra. The identity of the two cities is thus established: (1.) Josephus (viii. 6, § 1) mentions the same city as bearing in his time the name of Tadmor among the Syrians, and Palmyra among the Greeks; and Jerome translates Tadmor by Palmyra (2 Chr. viii. 4). (2.) The modern Arabic name of Palmyra is substantially the same as the Hebrew word, being Tadmur or Tadmur. (3.) The word Tadmor has nearly the same meaning as Palmyra, signifying probably the City of Palms, from Heb. tāmār = a palm. (4.) The name Tadmor or Tadmōr actually occurs as the name of the city in Aramaic and Greek inscriptions found there. (5.) In 2 Chr. viii. the city is mentioned as built by Solomon after his conquest of HACHATH-ZOBAN, and is named with "all the store-cities which he built in HACHATH." This accords fully with the situation of Palmyra; and there is no other known city, either in the desert or not in the desert, which can lay claim to the name of Tadmor.—In 1 K. ix. 18, according to the Hebrew marginal reading (Keri), the statement that Solomon built Tadmor, likewise occurs. But the original Hebrew text (Cethib) has here not Tadmor, but TAMAR, which Mr. Twisleton thinks, with Thémis, Movers, &c., does not refer to Palmyra (compare Ez. xlvii. 19); but Keil, Bertheau, Gesenius, Kitto, Ayre, &c., maintain that 1 K. ix. 18 and 2 Chr. viii. 4 both refer to Palmyra.—It is evident that SOLOMON had large views of COMMERCE, and he would naturally wish to trade with Babylon. Now, Palmyra is only about 120 miles across the desert from a point on the Euphrates N. W. from Babylon, and about the same distance across the desert from Damascus, and would be in the regular caravan-route between Babylon and Jerusalem. The first Roman author who mentions Palmyra is Pliny the Elder, who notices its fine situation, rich soil and excellent water, with a great desert on every side, and speaks of it as in an important position between the Roman and Parthian Empires. Appian mentions Mark Antony's design to let his cavalry plunder it, but the inhabitants having gone with their effects to a strong position on the Euphrates, the cavalry entered an empty city. In the second century A. C. it seems to have been beautified by the Emperor Hadrian, and the name changed to Hadrianopolis. It became a Roman colony under Caracalla (A. D. 211-217). Subsequently, in the reign of Gallienus, the Roman senate invested Odenathus, a senator of Palmyra, with the regal dignity, on account of his services in defeating Sapor, king of Persia. On the assassination of Odenathus, his celebrated wife Zenobia seems to have conceived the design of erecting Palmyra into an independent monarchy; and, in prosecution of this object, she, for a while, successfully resisted the Roman arms. She was at length defeated and taken captive by the Emperor Aurelian (A. D. 273), who left a Roman garrison in Palmyra. This garrison was massacred in a revolt; and Aurelian punished the city by the execution not only of those who were taken in arms, but likewise of common peasants, of old men, women, and children. From this blow Palmyra never recovered, though there are proofs of its having continued to be inhabited until the downfall of the Roman Empire. In 1172 Benjamin of Tudela found 4,000 Jews there, and at a later period Abulfeda mentioned it as full of splendid ruins. Subsequently its very existence became unknown to modern Europe, when in 1691 it was visited by some merchants from the English factory at Aleppo. The long lines of Corinthian columns at Palmyra, as seen at a distance, are peculiarly imposing; and in their general effect and apparent vastness they seem to surpass all other ruins of the same kind. The principal ruin is the great temple of the sun, the great colonnade supposed to have consisted of 1,500 columns, and the tombs, which are tower-like buildings, two, three, or four stories high. The present Tadmor consists of peasants' mud-huts inhabited by Arabs. It is said to be in N. lat. 34° 18' and E. long. 38° 18'.

Ta'ban (Heb. station, camp, Ges.), a son or descendant of Ephraim (Num. xxvi. 35); son of Telah (1 Chr. vii. 25). SHUTHELAH.

Ta'ban-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of TAHAN (Num. xxvi. 35).

* Ta-hap'a-nes [-neez] (fr. Heb.) = TAHPANHES.

Ta'bath (Heb. below, place, station, Ges.). 1. A Kohathite Levite, ancestor of Samuel and Heman (1 Chr. vi. 24, 37 [Heb. 9, 22]).—2. Son of Bered, and great-grandson of Ephraim (vii. 20). Burrington, &c., make him = TAHAN. (SHUTHELAH.)—3. Grandson of No. 2 (vii. 20). Burrington, &c., consider him a son of Ephraim, and = No. 2. SHUTHELAH.

Ta'bath (see above), a desert-station of the Israelites between Makkeloth and Tarah (Num. xxxiii. 26); not identified. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Tah'pan-hes [-heez], Te-haph'ne-hes (both Heb.), Ta-hap'a-nes (fr. Heb. form of Egyptian; compare TAHPENES, and see below), a city of Egypt, evidently near or on the eastern border of Lower Egypt. When Johanan and the other captains went into Egypt, "they came to Talpanhes" (Jer. xliii. 7). Here Jeremiah prophesied Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Egypt (8-13). Ezekiel foretells a battle to be there fought (Ez. xxx. 18). The Jews in Jeremiah's time remained here (Jer. xlii. 1). It was an important town, twice mentioned with Noph or MEMPHIS (Ez. ii. 16, xlii. 14). Here stood a house of Pharaoh-hophra before which Jeremiah hid great stones, where Nebuchadnezzar's throne and pavilion were to be (Jer. xliii. 8-10). It is mentioned with "Ramesse and all the land of Gesen" in Jd. i. 9. Herodotus calls this place Daphne of Pelusium. In the Itinerary of Antoninus this town, called Dafno, is placed sixteen Roman miles S. W. of Pelusium. (HANES; SIX.) This position seems to agree with that of Tel-Defenneh, which Sir Gardner Wilkinson supposes to mark the site of Daphne. Can the name be of Greek origin? Mr. R. S. Poole rejects as untenable Jablonski's Egyptian etymology = the head or beginning of the age, or (so Gesenius) the beginning of the world, i. e. of the Egyptian world, in reference to its position at the northeastern extremity of Egypt.

Tah'pe-nes (fr. Egyptian, see above), an Egyptian queen, wife of the PHARAOH 6 who received Hadad the Edomite, and who gave him her sister in marriage (1 K. xi. 18-20). In the LXX. the latter is called the elder sister of Thekemina, and in the addition to ch. xii. Shishak (Susakim) is said to have given Aho, the elder sister of Thekemina his wife, to Jeroboam. It is obvious that this and the earlier statement are irreconcilable. There is therefore but one Tahpenes or Thekemina. No name that has any near resemblance to either Tahpenes or Thekemina has yet been found among those of the period (so Mr. R. S. Poole).

Tah-re'a (Heb. cunning, Ges.), son of Micah, and grandson of Mephibosheth (1 Chr. ix. 41); = TARE'A.

Tah'tim-hod'shi (Heb., see below), the Land of; one of the places visited by Joab during his census of the land of Israel. It occurs between Gilead and Dan-jaan (2 Sam. xxiv. 6). Porter (in Kitto) regards "the land of Tah'tim-hod'shi" as a section of the upper Jordan valley, probably the modern Ar el-Huleh, lying deep down at the western base of Hermon. But the exact signification is doubtful.

The Vulgate has "the lower land of Hod'si;" some translate "nether (or low) land newly inhabited;" Fürst would separate "the land of the Tah'tim" from "Hod'shi," and make "Hod'shi" a city in northern Palestine = HAROSHETH; Gesenius makes "Hod'shi" = descendant of HODESH.

Tal'ent (Heb. cicdr; Gr. talanton), the greatest weight of the Hebrews; = 3,000 shekels. SHEKEL; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Ta-l'itha cu'mi, two Latinized Syriac words (Mk. v. 41), signifying "Damsel, arise."

Tal'mai (Heb. furrowed, Ges.). 1. One of the three sons of ANAK slain by the men of Judah (Num. xiii. 22; Josh. xv. 14; Judg. i. 10).—2. Son of Ammihud, and king of GESHUR; father of MAACHAR 1 (2 Sam. iii. 3, xiii. 37; 1 Chr. iii. 2).

Tal'mon (Heb. oppressed, Ges.), the head of a family of doorkeepers in the Temple, "the porters for the camps of the sons of Levi" (1 Chr. ix. 17; Neh. xi. 19). Some of his descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45), and were employed in their hereditary office in the days of Nehemiah and Ezra (Neh. xii. 25). TELEM.

* Tal'mud. PHARISEES.

Ta'mah (Sam. laughter, Ges.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 55); = THAMAH.

Ta'mar (Heb. palm-tree), the name of three women remarkable in the History of Israel.—1. The wife successively of the two sons of JUDAH, ER and ONAN (Gen. xxxviii. 6-80). It seemed as if Judah's family, on the death of Er and Onan and of Judah's wife, were on the point of extinction. There only remained a child SHULAI, whom Judah was unwilling to trust to the dangerous union, as it appeared, with Tamar, lest he should meet with the same fate as his brothers. (MARRIAGE, II. ii. 1.) Accordingly she resorted to the desperate expedient of entrapping the father himself into the union which he feared for his son. He took her for one of the unfortunate women who were consecrated to the impure rites of the Canaanite worship. (HARLOT; IDOLATRY.) He promised her, as the price of his intercourse, a kid from the flocks to which he was going, and left as his pledge his ornaments and his staff. The kid he sent back by Hirah of Adullam. The woman could nowhere be found. Months afterward it was discovered to be his own daughter-in-law Tamar. She was sentenced to be burnt alive, and was only saved by the discovery, through the pledges which Judah had left, that her seducer was no other than Judah himself. The fruits of this intercourse were twins, PHARAZ and ZARAH, and through Pharez the sacred line was continued. She is mentioned in Ru. iv. 12 and Mat. i. 3 (A. V. and Greek "Tamar").—2. Daughter of DAVID and MAACHAH 5 the Geshurite princess, and thus sister of ABSALOM (2 Sam. xiii. 1-82; 1 Chr. iii. 9). She and her brother were alike remarkable for their extraordinary beauty. This fatal beauty inspired a frantic passion in her half-brother AMNON, who, by Jonadab's advice, feigned sickness, and on the king's coming to visit him, entreated the presence of Tamar, on the pretext that she alone could give him food that he would eat. It would almost seem that Tamar was supposed to have a peculiar art of baking palatable cakes. She came to his house, took the dough and kneaded it, and then in his presence kneaded it a second time into the form of cakes. She then took the pan, in which they had been baked, and poured them all out in a heap before the prince. He caused his attendants to retire, called her to the inner room, and there accomplished his wicked design. In her touching remonstrance two points are remarkable (so Dean Stanley, original author of this article). First, the expression of the infamy of such a crime "in Israel," implying the loftier standard of morals that prevailed, as compared with other countries at that time; and, secondly, the belief that even this standard might be overborne lawfully by royal authority—"Speak to the king, for he will not withhold me from thee." The brutal hatred of Amnon succeeding to his brutal passion, and the indignation of Tamar at his barbarous insult, even surpassing her indignation at his shameful outrage, are pathetically and graphically told. She remained in Absalom's house as if in widowhood, and out of his vengeance on Amnon grew the series of calamities which darkened the close of David's reign. The story of Tamar, revolting as it is, has the interest of revealing to us the interior of the royal household beyond any other incident of those times: (1.) The establishments of the princes; (2.) The simplicity of the royal employments (WOMEN); (3.) The dress of the princesses; (4.) The relation of the king to the princesses and to the law.—3. Daughter of Absalom, and niece of No. 2 (2 Sam. xiv. 7). She ultimately, by her marriage with URIEL of Gibeah, became the mother of MAACHAN 3, the future queen of Judah, or wife of Abijah (1 K. xv. 2).

TAMAR (see above), a spot on the southeastern frontier of Judah (Ez. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28 only). If not = HAZAZON-TAMAR, the old name of EX-GEZI, it may be a place called Thamar in the Onomasticon, a day's journey S. of Hebron (so Dean Stanley). Robinson supposes Tamar (Thamara of Ptolemy) was at Kurnub, a site with extensive ruins, about twenty miles W. of the south end of the Dead Sea. KINAH; TAMOR.

TAMMUZ (Heb., see below; properly "the Tammuz," the article indicating that at some time or other the word had been regarded as an appellative). In the sixth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, on the fifth day of the sixth month, the prophet Ezekiel (Ez. viii. 14), as he sat in his house surrounded by the elders of Judah, was transported in spirit to the far distant Temple at Jerusalem. The hand of the Lord God was upon him, and led him "to the door of the gate of the house of Jehovah," which was toward the north; and behold there the women sitting, weeping for the Tammuz." Some translate the last clause "causing the Tammuz to weep." No satisfactory etymology of the word has been proposed (so Mr. Wright, original author of this article). Roediger (in Gesenius) suggests = a melting away, dissolution, departure, and so the disappearance of Adonis, which was mourned by the Phenician women, and after then by the Greeks. The LXX., the Targum of Jonathan Ben Uzziel, the Peshito-Syriac, and the Arabic in Walton's Polyglot, merely reproduce the Hebrew word. The Vulgate gives Adonis as a modern equivalent, and this rendering has been adopted by subsequent commentators, with few exceptions. Jerome in his note on Ez. viii. 14 adds that since, according to the Gentile fable, Tammuz had been slain in June, the Syrians name this month Tammuz, and then celebrate to him an anniversary solemnity, in which he is lamented by the women as dead, and afterward coming to life again is celebrated with songs and praises. Jerome elsewhere speaks of him as the lover of Venus. According to the Greek legend, he was slain by a wild boar, and afterward restored to life. The Syriac translation of Melito's Apology, the original of which, if genuine, must belong to the second century, has this account: "The sons of Phenicia worshipped Balthi, the queen of Cyprus. For she loved Tamuzo, the son of Cuthar, the king of the Phenicians, and forsook her kingdom and came and dwelt in Gebal, a fortress of the Phenicians. And at that time she made all the villages subject to Cuthar the king. For before Tamuzo she had loved Ares, and committed adultery with him, and Hephestus her husband caught her, and was jealous of her. And he (i. e. Ares) came and slew Tamuzo on Lebanon while he made a hunting among the wild boars. And from that time Balthi remained in Gebal, and died in the city of Aphaca, where Tamuzo was buried." Here the Greek legend of Adonis is reproduced with a change of name. Rabbi Solomon Isaaki (= Rashi) has the following note on the passage in Ezekiel: "An image which the women made hot in the inside, and its eyes were of lead, and they melted by reason of the heat of the burning and it seemed as if it wept; and they (the women) said, He asketh for offerings. Tammuz is a word signifying burning." Solomon ben Abraham Parchon (A. D. 1161) has the following observations upon Tammuz: "It is the likeness of a reptile which they make upon the water, and the water is collected in it and flows through its holes, and it seems as if it wept." At the close of this century R. David Kimchi says, "Our Rabbi Mosheh bar Maimon (= Maimonides) of blessed memory, has written, that it is found written in one of the ancient idolatrous books, that there was a man of the idolatrous prophets, and his name was Tammuz. And he called to a certain king and commanded him to serve the seven planets and the twelve signs. And that king put him to a violent death, and on the night of his death there were gathered together all the images from the ends of the earth to the temple of Babel, to the golden image which was the image of the sun. Now this image was suspended between heaven and earth, and it fell down in the midst of the temple, and the images likewise (fell down) round about it, and it told them what had befallen Tammuz the prophet. And the images all of them wept and lamented all the night; and, as it came to pass, in the morning all the images flew away to their own temples in the ends of the earth." The book of the ancient idolaters from which Maimonides quotes is the work on the agriculture of the Nabatheans, and this identification of Tammuz with an idolatrous prophet has been recently revived by Prof. Chwolson. (NEBALOTH.) The tradition recorded by Jerome, which identifies Tammuz with Adonis, has been followed by most subsequent commentators (Cyril, Theodoret, Selden, Simonis, Calmet, J. D. Michaelis, Gesenius, Rosenmüller, Maurer, Ewald, Hävernick, Hitzig, Movers, &c.). Luther and others regarded Tammuz as a name of Bacchus. That Tammuz was the Egyptian Osiris, and that his worship was introduced to Jerusalem from Egypt, was held by Calvin, Piscator, Junius, Leusden, and Pfeiffer. All that can be said is, that it is not impossible that Tammuz may be a name of Adonis the sun-god, but that there is nothing to prove it.—Byblos in Phenicia (GEBAL) was the headquarters of the Adonis-worship. The feast in his honor was celebrated each year in the temple of Aphrodite on Lebanon, with rites partly sorrowful, partly joyful. The Emperor Julian was present at Antioch when the same festival was held. It lasted seven days, and began with the disappearance of Adonis. Then followed the search made by the women after him. His body was represented by a wooden image placed in the so-called "gardens of Adonis," which were earthenware vessels filled with mould, and planted with wheat, barley, lettuce, and fennel. In one of these gardens Adonis was found again. The finding-again was the commencement of a wake, accompanied by all the usages which in the East attend such a ceremony, prostitution, cutting off the hair, cutting the breast with knives (Jer. xvi. 6), and playing on pipes (compare Mat. ix. 23). The image of Adonis was then washed and anointed with spices, placed in a coffin on a bier, and the wound made by the boar was shown on the figure. The people sat on the ground round the bier, with their clothes rent (compare Bar. vi. 31, 32), and the women howled and cried aloud. The whole terminated with a sacrifice for the dead, and the burial of the figure of Adonis. —In the Targum of Jonathan on Gen. viii. 5, "the tenth month" is translated "the month Tammuz."

Tan'hu-meth (Heb. comfort, Ges.), father of Seraiah in the time of Gedaliah (2 K. xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8).

* Tan'ner. HANDICRAFT; LEATHER.

* Tap'es-try is an ornamental figured fabric woven of worsted or silk for lining the walls of apartments. In Prov. vii. 16, xxxi. 22, the Heb. pl. marbaddin, A. V. "coverings of tapestry," = (so Gesenius, &c.) coverings, coverlets, as spread on beds. BED; EMBROIDERER.

Ta'phath (Heb. drop, Ges.; ornament, Fii.), Solomon's daughter, married to the son of Abinadab or Ben-abinadab (1 K. iv. 11).

Ta'phon (fr. Gr.), one of the cities of Judea fortified by Bacchides (1 Mc. ix. 50); probably = BETH-TAPPUAH.

Tappu-ah (Heb. apple-region, Ges.; see APPLE).
1. A city of Judah, in the lowland district (Josh. xv. 34). It was no doubt situated on the lower slopes of the mountain of the northwestern portion of Judah, about twelve miles W. of Jerusalem (so Mr. Grove).—2. A place on the boundary of the "children of Joseph" (xvi. 8, xvii. 8); probably = EX-TAPPUAH (xvii. 7); not identified. It seems natural to look for it somewhere to the S. W. of Nabu'us, in the neighborhood of the Wady Falaik (so Mr. Grove).

Tappu-ah (see above), one of the sons of Hebron, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 43); doubtless = BETH-TAPPUAH, i. e. Tappuah was colonized by the men of Hebron.

Tappu-ah (see above), the Land of, a district named in the specification of the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 8); apparently near the torrent KANAH (Wady Falaik?), but not identified.

Ta'rah (Heb. = TERAH), a desert-station of the Israelites between Tahath and Mitheah (Num. xxxiii. 27, 28). WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Tara-lah (Heb. a reeling? Ges.), a city of Benjamin, named between Irpeel and Zelah (Josh. xviii. 27); site unknown.

Ta-re a (Heb.) = TAHREA (1 Chr. viii. 35).

Tares, properly = the common vetch (Vicia sativa), a leguminous plant of the bean kind; but critics and expositors are agreed that the Gr. pl. sizania, A. V. "tares," of the parable (Mat. xiii. 25 ff.) denotes the weed called "bearded darnel" (Lolium temulentum), a widely-distributed grass, and the only species of the order that has deleterious properties. The bearded darnel before it comes into ear is very similar in appearance to wheat, and the roots of the two are often intertwined; hence the command that the "tares" should be left to the harvest, lest while men plucked up the tares "they should root up also the wheat with them." This darnel is easily distinguishable from the wheat and barley, when headed out, but, when both are less developed, "the closest scrutiny will often fail to detect it. Even the farmers, who in this country generally weed their fields, do not attempt to separate the one from the other. . . . The taste is bitter, and, when eaten separately, or even when diffused in ordinary bread, it causes dizziness, and often acts as a violent emetic" (Thn. ii. 111, 112). The grain-growers in Palestine believe that this darnel ("tares") is merely a degenerate wheat; that in wet seasons the wheat turns to "tares."

Tar-pel-lites (fr. Heb., as if from Tarpeh), the, a race of colonists planted in the cities of Samaria after the captivity of the northern kingdom of Israel (Ezr. iv. 9); not identified with any certainty, though supposed by some = the Tapyri, a Median tribe E. of Elvmais; by others = the Targites, a people at the Palus Maeotis, now Sea of Azov.

Tar'shish (Heb., perhaps = a breaking, subjection, i. e. subdued country, Ges.). 1. Probably = Tartessus, a city and emporium of the Phœnicians in the S. of SPAIN. With three exceptions in 2 Chronicles, the following are references to all the passages in the O. T., in which "Tar'shish" or "Thar'shish" occurs as the name of a place (Gen. x. 4; 1 K. x. 22 twice, xxii. 48 [Heb. 49]; 1 Chr. i. 7; Ps. xlviii. 7 [Heb. 8], lxxii. 10; Is. ii. 16, xxxiii. 1, 6, 10, 14, lx. 9, lxi. 19; Jer. x. 9; Ez. xxvii. 12, 25, xxxviii. 13; Jon. 1, 3 thrice, iv. 2; see No. 2 and 3, below). Not one of these passages furnishes direct proof that Tarshish = Tartessus. But their identity is rendered highly probable by—(1.) The close similarity of name between them, Tartessus being merely Tarshish in the Aramaic form; (2.) The apparently special relation between Tarshish and Tyre, such as existed at one time between Tartessus and the Phenicians, Tartessus being a Phenician colony; (3.) The articles which Tarshish (Ez. xxvii. 12) supplied to Tyre (silver, lead, iron, and especially tin), being precisely such as we know through classical writers to have been productions of the Spanish Peninsula. Even now, the countries in Europe, or on the shores of the Mediterranean Sea, where tin is found, are very few; and in reference to ancient times it would be difficult to name any such countries except Iberia or Spain, Lusitania (nearly = the modern Portugal), and Cornwall in Great Britain. Now, if the Phenicians, for purposes of trade, really made coasting voyages on the Atlantic Ocean, as far as to Great Britain, no emporium was more favorably situated for such voyages than Tartessus.—When Tyre lost its independence, the relation between it and Tarshish was probably altered, and for a while the exhortation of Is. xxiii. 10 may have been realized by the inhabitants passing through their land, free as a river. This independence of Tarshish, combined with the overshadowing growth of the Carthaginian power, would explain why in after-times the learned Jews do not seem to have known where Tarshish was. Thus, although, in the LXX. translation of the Pentateuch, the Hebrew word was as closely followed as it could be in Greek (Gr. Tharceia), the LXX. translators of Isaiah and Ezekiel translate the word Carthage and the Carthaginians (Is. xxiii. 1, 10, 14; Ez. xxvii. 12, xxxviii. 13); and in the Targum of Kings and of Jeremiah, it is translated Africa (1 K. xxii. 48; Jer. x. 9). In one passage of the LXX. (Is. ii. 16), and in others of the Targum, the word is translated sea; which receives apparently some countenance from Jerome, in a note on Is. ii. 16, wherein he states that the Hebrews believe that Tharsis is the name of the sea in their own language. And Josephus, misled, apparently, by misinterpreting the LXX. translation of the Pentateuch, regarded Tharsis as Tarsus in Cilicia. In the absence of positive proof, we may acquiesce in the statement of Strabo, that the river Bætis (now the Guadalquivir) was formerly called Tartessus, that the city Tartessus was situated between the two arms by which the river flowed into the sea, and that the adjoining country was called Tartessus. But there were two other cities which some deemed to have been Tartessus; one, Gadir, or Gadira (Cádiz), and the other, Carteia, in the Bay of Gibraltar.—2. If the Book of Chronicles is to be followed, there would seem to have been a Tarshish, accessible from the Red Sea, in addition to the Tarshish of the S. of Spain (so Mr. Twisleton, original author of this article and of No. 1). Thus, the ships of Tarshish, which Jehoshaphat caused to be constructed at Ezion-geber on the Elanitic Gulf of the Red Sea (1 K. xxii. 48), it is said in 2 Chr. xx. 36 were made to go to Tarshish; and so the navy of ships which Solomon had made in Ezion-geber (1 K. ix. 26) is said in 2 Chr. ix. 21 to have gone to Tarshish with the servants of Hiram. It is not to be supposed that the author of Chronicles contemplated a voyage to Tarshish in the S. of Spain by going round what has since been called the Cape of Good Hope. Keil (Commentary on Kings) supposes the vessels built at Ezion-geber, as mentioned in 1 K. xxii. 49, 50, were really destined for the trade to Tarshish, in Spain, but were to be transported across the isthmus of Suez (as Cleopatra afterward wished to convey her whole fleet over this isthmus, and as in ancient times whole fleets were often transported over necks of land), and to make the voyage to Spain from one of the havens of Palestine on the Mediterranean. But this is improbable (so Mr. Twisleton); and the two alternatives from which selection should be made seem to be, first, That there were two emporia or districts called Tarshish, viz. one in the S. of Spain, and one in the Indian Ocean; or, secondly, That the compiler (or some copyist) of the Chronicles, misapprehending the expression “ships of Tarshish,” supposed that they meant ships destined to go to Tarshish; whereas, although this was the original meaning, the words had come to signify large Phenician ships, of a particular size and description, destined for long voyages, just as in England “East Indiaman” was a general name given to vessels some of which were not intended to go to India at all. The first alternative was adopted by Bochart, and has probably been the ordinary view of those who have perceived a difficulty in the passages of the Chronicles. The second, first suggested by Vitranga, has been adopted by the acutest Biblical critics of our own time (De Wette, Winer, Gesenius, Ewald, Movers, Hävernicks, Dr. J. Eadie [in Fbn.], Dr. J. R. Beard [in Kitto], &c.). This alternative is in itself by far the most probable.—Although, however, the point to which the fleet of Solomon and Hiram went once in three years did not bear the name of Tarshish, the question here arises, What was that point, however it was called? And the reasonable answer seems to be India, or the Indian Islands. This is shown by the nature of the imports with which the fleet returned, which are specified as “gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks” (1 K. x. 22). The gold might possibly have been obtained from Africa, or from Ophir, in Arabia, and the ivory and the apes might likewise have been imported from Africa; but the peacocks point conclusively not to Africa, but to India. The inference to be drawn from the importation of peacocks is confirmed by the Hebrew names for ape and peacock. Neither of these names is of Hebrew, or even Shemitic origin; and each points to India. Thus the Hebrew word for ape is kôph, while the Sanscrit word is kapi. Again, the Hebrew word for peacock is tukki, which cannot be explained in Hebrew, but is akin to tôka in the Tamil language, in which it is likewise capable of explanation. It is only to be added, that there are not sufficient data for determining what were the ports in India or the Indian Islands which were reached by the fleet of Hiram and Solomon. Sir Emerson Tennent has made a suggestion of Point de Galle, in Ceylon; but this can only be received as a conjecture.—3. One of the seven princes of Media and Persia in the time of Ahasuerus 3 (Esth. i. 14). THARSHISH.

TARSES (L. fr. Gr., fabled [so Juvenal] to have been named from the fall here of the wing [Gr. tarsoo = the flat of the foot or wing] of Pegasus, L. & S.; but the name in Phenician indicates firmness, hardness, Ges., Wr.), the chief town of CILICIA, “no mean city” in other respects, but illustrious as the birthplace and early residence of the Apostle PAUL (Acts ix. 11, 30, xi. 25, xxi. 39, xxii. 3). It is said to have been founded by the Assyrian king Sardanapalus. Even in the flourishing period of Greek history it was a city of some considerable consequence. After Alexander's conquest had swept this way, and the Seleucid kingdom was established at Antioch (SYRIA), Tarsus usually belonged to that kingdom, though for a time it was under the Ptol-emies. In the Civil Wars of Rome it took Cesar's side, and on the occasion of a visit from him had its name changed to Juliopolis. Augustus made it a "free city." It was renowned as a place of philosophy and general education under the early

Tarsus.—(From Smith's Smaller Dictionary.)

Roman emperors. Strabo compares it in this respect to Athens and Alexandria. Tarsus also was a place of much commerce. It was situated in a wide and fertile plain on the banks of the River Cydnus. No ruins of any importance remain. The modern town of Tarsus covers only a part of the ancient site, has a population of 7,000 or 8,000 (30,000, it is said, in winter), and is twelve miles from the mouth of the river. TARSISH 1.

Tar'tak (Heb., see below), one of the gods of the Avite (AVA) colonists of Samaria (2 K. xvii. 31); worshipped, according to Rabbinical tradition, under the form of an ass. A Persian or Pehlvi origin has been suggested for the name, according to which it signifies either intense darkness, or hero of darkness, or the underworld, and so perhaps some planet of ill-luck as Saturn or Mars.

Tar'tan (Heb., see below), which occurs only in 2 K. xviii. 17 and Is. xx. 1, has been generally regarded as the proper name of an Assyrian general under SARGON and SENNACHERIB (Gesenius, Fürst, Winer, &c.). Rawlinson, however, considers Tartan, like RAB-SARIS and RABSHAKEN, to be only an Assyrian title or official designation = general, or commander-in-chief. Fürst gives supposed derivations from Persian = high personage, or star-form.

Tat'nal, or Tat'na-l (Heb. fr. Pers. = gift Ges.), satrap of the province W. of the Euphrates in the time of DARIUS HYSTASPIS and ZERUBBAHEL (Ezr. v. 8, 6, vi. 6, 13). REHUM 2; SETHAR-BOZNAI.

Tau (Heb. tau = a mark, sign, especially in the form of a cross, Ges.), the twenty-second (or twenty-third, if Shin and Sin are counted as two letters) and last letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.). WRITING.

Tav'ers, the three. THREE TAVERS.

Tax'es. I. Under the Judges, according to the theocratic government contemplated by the law, the only payments incumbent upon the people as of permanent obligation were the TITHES, the FIRST-FRUIT, the Redemption-money of the first-born, and other offerings as belonging to special occasions. (PRIEST.) The payment by each Israelite of the half-shekel as "atonement-money," for the service of the Tabernacle, on taking the census of the people (Ex. xxx. 13), does not appear to have had the character of a recurring tax, but to have been supplementary to the free-will-offerings of Ex. xxv. 1-7, levied for the construction of the sacred tent (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article). In later times, indeed, after the return from Babylon, there was an annual payment for maintaining the fabric and services of the Temple; but the fact that this begins by the voluntary compact to pay one-third of a shekel (Neh. x. 32) shows that till then there was no such payment recognized as necessary. A little later the third became a half, and under the name of the didrachma (A. V. "tribute-money," Mat. xvii. 24; TRIBUTE) was paid by every Jew, in whatever part of the world he might be living.—II. The kingdom, with its centralized government and greater magnificence, involved, of course, a larger expenditure, and heavier taxation. (KING.) The chief burdens appear to have been: (1.) A tithe of the produce both of the soil and of live-stock (1 Sam. viii. 15, 17). (2.) Forced military service for a month every year (viii. 12; 1 K. ix. 22; 1 Chr. xiv. 1; ARMY). (3.) Gifts to the king (1 Sam. x. 27, xvi. 20, xvii. 18; GIFT). (4.) Import duties (1 K. x. 15). (5.) The monopoly of certain branches of commerce (ix. 28, xxii. 48, x. 28, 29). (6.) The appropriation to the king's use of the early crop of hay (Am. vii. 1).

This may have been peculiar to the northern kingdom, or occasioned by a special emergency. (MOWING.)—At times, too, in the history of both the kingdoms there were special burdens. (ADORAM; RHOBAM; SOLOMON.) A tribute of fifty shekels a head had to be paid by Menahem to the Assyrian king (2 K. xv. 20), and under Hoshea this assumed the form of an annual tribute (xvii. 4; comp. xxiii. 35).—III. Under the Persian empire the taxes paid by the Jews were, in their broad outlines, the same in kind as those of other subject races. The financial system of Darius Hystaspis involved the payment by each satrap of a fixed sum as the tribute due from his province. In Judea, as in other provinces, the inhabitants had to provide in kind for the maintenance of the governor's household, besides a money-payment of forty shekels a day (Neh. v. 14, 15). In Ezr. iv. 13, 20, vii. 24, we get a formal enumeration of the three great branches of the revenue, "toll" (Chal. mid'ath or mid'ath = fixed, measured, payment, probably direct taxation, Grotius), "tribute" (Chal. b'ith = ex-ise on articles of consumption, Ges.), "custom" (Chal. h'ith'ach = wa-tax, toll, Ges.). The influence of Ezra secured for the whole ecclesiastical order, from the priests down to the Nethinim, an immunity from all three (Ezr. vii. 24); but the burden pressed heavily on the great body of the people (Neh. v. 1-11, ix. 37).—IV. Under the Egyptian and Syrian kings the taxes paid by the Jews became yet heavier. The "farthing" system of finance was a lopped in its worst form. The taxes were put up to auction. The contract sum for those of Phenicia, Judea, Samaria, had been estimated at about 8,000 talents. An unscrupulous adventurer would bid double that sum, and would then go down to the province, and by violence and cruelty, like that of Turkish and Hindoo collectors, squeeze out a large margin of profit for himself (Jos. xii. 4, §§ 1-5; 1 Mc. x. 23, 39, xi. 28, 35, xiii. 39; 2 Mc. iv. 9; SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR).—V. The pressure of Roman taxation, if not absolutely heavier, was probably more galling, as being more thorough and systematic, more distinctively a mark of bondage. The capture of Jerusalem by Pompey was followed immediately by the imposition of a tribute, and within a short time the sum thus taken from the resources of the country amounted to 10,000 talents. By the decrees of Julius Caesar the tribute was not to be farmed, not to be levied the Sabbatic year, and only one-fourth the following year. But after his death Cassius levied 700 talents from Judea. Under Herod taxation became heavier. When Judea became formally a Roman province, the whole financial system of the empire came as a natural consequence. The taxes were systematically farmed, and the publicans appeared as a new curse to the country. (PUBLICAN.) The customs (Latin, portoria) were levied at harbors, piers, and the gates of cities (Mat. xvii. 24; Rom. xiii. 7). The poll-tax, paid by every Jew, was looked upon as the special badge of servitude. Probably there was also a property-tax of some kind. In addition to these general taxes, the inhabitants of Jerusalem were subject to a special house-duty about this period. JUDAS OF GALILEE; TAXING.

Taxiuz (Gr. apographē). I. The English word conveys to us more distinctly the notion of a tax or tribute actually levied, but it appears to have been used in the sixteenth century for the simple assessment of a subsidy upon the property of a given county, or the registration of the people for the purpose of a poll-tax (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article). The Gr. apographē by itself leaves the question whether the returns made were of population or property undetermined. Robinson (N. T. Lex.) makes apographē = census, enrolment.—II. Two distinct registrations, or "taxings," are mentioned in the N. T., both of them by St. Luke. The first is said to have been the result of an edict of the Emperor Augustus, that "all the world (i. e. the Roman empire) should be taxed" (Lk. ii. 1), and is connected by the Evangelist with the name of CYRENIUS, or Quirinus. The second, and more important (Acts v. 37), is distinctly associated with the revolt of JUDAS OF GALILEE.—III. There are, however, some other questions connected with the statement of Lk. ii. 1-3, which call for some notice. (i.) The truth of the statement has been questioned by Strauss and De Wette, and others, on the ground that neither Josephus nor any other contemporary writer mentions a census extending over the whole empire at this period (A. U. C. 750). (ii.) Palestine, it is urged further, was, at this time, an independent kingdom under Herod, and therefore would not have come under the operation of an imperial edict. (iii.) If such a measure, involving the recognition of Roman sovereignty, had been attempted under Herod, it would have roused the same resistance as the undisputed census under Quirinus did at a later period. (iv.) The statement of St. Luke, that "all went to be taxed, every one into his own city," is said to be inconsistent with the rules of the Roman census, which took cognizance of the place of residence only, not of the place of birth. (v.) Neither in the Jewish nor the Roman census would it have been necessary for the wife to travel with her husband in order to appear personally before the registrar.—These five objections may be thus answered:—(i.) It must be remembered that our history of this portion of the reign of Augustus is defective. Tacitus begins his annals with the emperor's death. Suetonius is gossiping, inaccurate, and ill-arranged. Dion Cassius leaves a gap from A. U. C. 748 to 756, with hardly any incidents. Josephus does not profess to give a history of the empire. It might easily be that a general census, about A. U. C. 749-750, should remain unrecorded by them. St. Luke's testimony can hardly be set aside in the absence of any evidence against it. There was undoubtedly a geometrical survey of the empire at some period in Augustus's reign, which none of the above writers notice. In A. U. C. 726 Augustus laid before the senate a statistical table of the empire, and another with full returns of population, wealth, and resources of the whole empire, was produced after his death. There is, however, some evidence, more or less circumstantial, in confirmation of St. Luke's statement. (1.) The inference drawn from the silence of historians may be legitimately met by an inference drawn from the silence of objectors. It never occurred to Celsus, or Lucian, or Porphyry, questioning all that they could in the Gospel history, to question this. (2.) Suidas mentions a general census made by Augustus, and agreeing, in some respects, with that of St. Luke. (3.) Tertullian appeals to the returns of the census for Syria under Sentius Saturninus as accessible to all who cared to search them, and proving the birth of Jesus in the city of David. (4.) Greswell has pointed to some circumstances mentioned by Josephus in the last year of Herod's life, which imply some special action of the Roman government in Syria, the nature of which the historian carelessly or deliberately suppresses. (ii.) The statistical document already referred to included subject kingdoms and allies, no less than the provinces. If Augustus had any desire to know the resources of Judea, the position of Herod made him neither willing nor able to resist. (iii.) We need not wonder that the measure should have been carried into effect without any popular outbreak. It was a return of the population only, not a valuation of property; there was no immediate taxation as the consequence. (iv.) The alleged inconsistency of what St. Luke narrates is precisely what might be expected under the known circumstances of the case. The census, though Roman in origin, was effected by Jewish instrumentality, and in harmony therefore with Jewish customs. (v.) If Mary were herself of the house and lineage of David, there may have been special reasons for her appearance at Bethlehem. In any case the Scripture narrative is consistent with itself.

* Teacher = one that imparts instruction or communicates knowledge of religious truth or other things. EDUCATION; MINISTER; PREACHER; RABBI.

* Tears (i. e. drops of water from the eye) are the well-known expression of grief or MOURNING (2 K. xx. 5; 2 Cor. ii. 4, &c.). The words "Put thou my tears into Thy bottle" (Ps. lvi. 8, Heb. 9) are understood to refer to the custom among the ancient Romans, &c., of collecting the tears of mourners for the dead and preserving them in a tear-bottle or lachrymatory (Thn. i. 147), and hence denote figuratively preserve them in Thy memory (J. A. Alexander, on Ps. l. c.).

Te'bah (Heb. slaughter, Ges.), eldest of the sons of NAHOR 2, by his concubine Reumah (Gen. xxii. 24).

Te'b-a-l'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah has immersed, purified, Ges.), a Merarite Levite, third son of Hosah (1 Chr. xxvi. 11).

Te'beth. MONTH.

* Teeth, plural of TOOTH.

* Te-haph'ne-hes [-heez] (Heb.) = TAHPANHES.

Te-hi'nah (Heb. mercy, cry for mercy, Ges.), father or founder of IR-NAHASH (marg. "the city of Nahash"), and son of Eshton (1 Chr. iv. 12).

Tell'-tree [teel-] = the lime-tree or linden. OAK.

* Te'kel (Chal.). MENE, &c.

Te-ko'a and Te-ko'ah (both Heb. = a pitching of tents, perhaps trumpet-clang, Ges.), a town of Judah (2 Chr. xi. 6), on the range of hills which rise near Hebron, and stretch eastward toward the Dead Sea. Jerome says that Tekoa was six Roman miles from Bethlehem, and that as he wrote he had that village daily before his eyes. It is not enumerated in the catalogue of towns in Judah (Josh. xv. 49), except in the LXX. "The wilderness of Tekoa" (2 Chr. xx. 20; comp. 1 Mc. ix. 33; DESERT 2) = the adjacent region E. of the town, which in its physical character answers entirely to that designation (so Prof. Hackett, original author of this article). The people of Tekoa must have been mainly shepherds, and Tekoa in its best days could have been little more than a cluster of tents, to which the men returned at intervals from the neighboring pastures, and in which their families dwelt during their absence. (See the next article.) The "wise woman" whom Joab employed to effect a reconciliation between David and Absalom was from this place (2 Sam. xiv. 2). Here also, Ira, the son of Ikkes, "the Tekoite," was born (xxiii. 26). It was one of the places which Rehoboam fortified, at the beginning of his reign, as a defence against invasion from the S. (2 Chr. xi. 6). Some of the people took part in building the walls of Jerusalem, after the Captivity (Neh. iii. 5, 27). In Jer. vi. 1, the prophet exclaims, "Blow the trumpet in Tekoa and set up a sign of fire in BETH-HACCEREM" (probably the "Frank Mountain"). But Tekoa is chiefly memorable as the birthplace of the prophet AMOS (Am. vii. 14). Tekoa is known still as Tekû'a, a village within sight of the "Frank Mountain," beyond question the famous Herodium, or site of Herod's Castle, which Josephus represents as near the ancient Tekoa. It lies on an elevated hill, which spreads itself out into an irregular plain of moderate extent. Its high position gives it a wide prospect, especially on the S. E. toward the mountains of Moab. Various ruins exist at Tekoa, as the walls of houses, cisterns, broken columns, and heaps of building-stones. Some of these stones have the so-called "bevelled" edges which are supposed to show a Hebrew origin. There was a convent here at the beginning of the sixth century, and a Christian settlement in the time of the Crusaders; and undoubtedly most of these remains belong to modern times rather than ancient. Among them is a baptismal font of limestone, 3 feet 9 inches deep, 4 feet in internal diameter at the top, designed evidently for baptism as administered in the Greek Church. Near Tikû'a, among the same mountains, near the brink of a frightful precipice, are the ruins of Khureitîn, possibly a corruption of KERIOTH (Josh. xv. 25), and perhaps the birthplace of JUDAS ISCARIOT. High up from the bottom of the ravine is an opening in the face of the rocks which leads into an immense subterranean labyrinth, which many suppose was the cave of ADULLAM. One of the gates of Jerusalem in Christian times seems to have borne the name of Tekoa.

Te-ko'a (see above), son of Ashur in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 24, iv. 5); probably = the town of Tekoa, implying that the town was colonized or founded by a man or town named Ashur.

Te-ko'ite (fr. Heb. = one from Tekoa), the. IRA, the son of Ikkes, one of David's warriors, is thus designated (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chr. xi. 28, xxvii. 9). The common people among the Tekoites displayed great activity in the repairs of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah, though their lords or "nobles" took no part in the work (Neh. iii. 5, 27).

Tel-a'bib (Chal. corn-hill, Ges.), a place by the river of CHERAR; according to Gesenius, Fürst, Winer, W. L. Alexander (in Kitto), and most Biblical scholars, in Upper Mesopotamia; but according to Rawlinson, probably a city of Chaldea or Babylonia (Ez. iii. 15).

Te'lah (Heb. breach, Ges.), a descendant of Ephraim, and ancestor of Joshua (1 Chr. vii. 25). SUTHELAH.

Te-la'im, or Tel'a'im (Heb. lambs, young and tender, Ges.), the place at which Saul collected and numbered his forces before his attack on Amalek (1 Sam. xv. 4 only); perhaps = TELEM. The LXX. in 1 Sam. xv. 4, and Josephus (vi. 7, § 2), have Gilgal. Wilton makes Telaim = TELEM, and supposes it at a ruined site, el-Kuair, in the region of the Drau'dan Arabs, between Beer-sheba and the S. end of the Dead Sea.

Te-las'ar (Chal., probably = Assyrian Hill, Ges.) is mentioned in 2 K. xix. 12 (A. V. "Thelasar"), and in Is. xxxvii. 12 as a city inhabited by "the children of Eden," which had been conquered, and was held in the time of Sennacherib by the ASSYRIANS. In both it is connected with GOZAN, HARAN, and REZEPH, all of which belong to the hill-country above the Upper Mesopotamian plain. It must have been in Western Mesopotamia, in the neighborhood of Harrah and Orfa (so Rawlinson). Layard (Nineveh, i. ch. ix.) conjectures that Telassar may be at the modern Tel Afer, a town with a castle on a mound, thirty-five or forty miles W. of Mosul.

Te'lem (Heb. oppression, Ges.), one of the cities in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 24); named between Ziph and Bealoth. The name Dhullam is attached to a district N. of the Kubbet el-Baul, S. of el-Milh (Moladah) and 'Ar'arah (Aroer)—a position very suitable (so Mr. Grove). Rowlands (in Fbn.) connects Telem with the following name "BEALOTH," and makes the compound name = the modern Kubbet el-Baul. TELAIM.

Te'lem (see above), a porter or doorkeeper of the Temple in Ezra's time, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 24); = TALMON?

Tel-har'sa (fr. Chal.), or Tel-har'-e-sha (Chal. forest-hill, Ges.; hill of the magus, Ff.), one of the Babylonian towns or villages, from which some returned with Zerubbabel who could not prove their Israelitish descent (Ezr. ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61); probably (so Rawlinson) in the low country near the sea, in the neighborhood of Tel-melah and Cherub. First places it on the Chebar in Upper Mesopotamia with TEL-ABIB.

Tel-melah (Chal. salt-hill, Ges.) is joined with TEL-HAR'SA and CHERUB in Ezr. ii. 59 and Neh. vii. 61. Rawlinson supposes it perhaps = the Thelme of Ptolemy, a city near the Persian Gulf. First places it in Upper Mesopotamia with TEL-HAR'SA.

Te'ma (Heb. right hand, south, Ges.; Ar. = desert, E. S. Poole, Ptr. [in Kit.]), ninth son of ISHMAEL I (Gen. xxv. 16; 1 Chr. i. 30); whence the tribe called after him, mentioned in Job vi. 19 and Jer. xxv. 23, and also the land occupied by this tribe (Is. xxi. 13, 14). The name (so Mr. E. S. Poole, &c.) is identified satisfactorily with Teymd, a small town and district on the confines of Syria, on the road of the Damascus pilgrim-caravan to Mecca. It is in the neighborhood of Doomat-el-Jendel = DUMAH, and the country of Keydâr or KEDAR.

Te'man (Heb. what is on the right hand, hence south, Ges.; see below). 1. Son of ELIPHAZ I, and grandson of ESAU; a "duke" or phylarch of EDOM (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15, 42; 1 Chr. i. 36, 53).—2. A country, and probably a city, named after the Edomite phylarch, or from which the phylarch took his name. The Hebrew signifies "south," &c.; and it is probable that the land of Teman was a southern portion of the land of EDOM, or, in a wider sense, that of the sons of the EAST. Teman is mentioned in five places by the Prophets (Jer. xlix. 7, 20; Ez. xxv. 13; Am. i. 12; Ob. 9; Hab. iii. 3), in four of which it is connected with Edom, and in two with Dedan (Jer. xlix. 7, 8; Ez. xxv. 13). In wisdom, the descendants of Esau, and especially the inhabitants of Teman, seem to have been preëminent among the sons of the East (Jer. xlix. 7; Ob. 9; TEMANITE). In common with most Edomite names, Teman appears to have been lost. Eusebius and Jerome mention Teman, as a town in their day, distant fifteen miles from Petra, and a Roman post. The identification of the existing Maan, E. of Petra, with this Teman may be geographically correct, but it cannot rest on etymological grounds (so Mr. E. S. Poole).

Tem'a-ni, or Te'ma-ni (fr. Heb.) = TEMANITE (Gen. xxxvi. 34).

Te'man-ite (fr. Heb.) = a descendant of TEMAN, Ges. (1 Chr. i. 45). ELIPHAZ the Temanite (Job's friend) was one of the wise men of Edom (Job ii. 11, &c.).

Tem'e-ni, or Te'me-ni (fr. Heb. = TEMANITE, Ges.; the lucky, Ff.), son of Ashur, the father of Tekoa, by his wife Naarah (1 Chr. iv. 6).

* Tem'pest. HAIL; PAUL; RAIN; SNOW; THUNDER; WHIRLWIND.

Tem'ple (Heb. usually hêyôd; Gr. hieron, naos). There is perhaps no building of the ancient world which has excited so much attention since the time of its destruction as the Temple which Solomon built at Jerusalem, and its successor, as rebuilt by Herod (so Mr. Fergusson, original author of this article). Its spoils formed the principal illustration of one of the most beautiful of Roman triumphal arches, and Justinian's highest architectural ambition was to surpass it. Throughout the middle ages it influenced to a considerable degree the forms of Christian churches, and its peculiarities were the watchwords and rallying-points of all associations of builders. When the French expedition to Egypt, in the first years of this century, had made the world familiar with the wonderful architectural remains of that country, every one jumped to the conclusion that Solomon's Temple must have been designed after an Egyptian model. The Assyrian discoveries of Botta and Layard have, within the last twenty years, given a new direction to the researches of the restorers; but no Assyrian temple yet exhumed throws much light on this subject, and we are still forced to have recourse to the later buildings at PERSEPOLIS, or to general deductions from the style of the nearly contemporary secular buildings at NINEVEH and elsewhere, for such illustrations as are available. Before proceeding, however, to investigate the arrangements of the Temple, it is indispensable first carefully to determine those of the TABERNACLE which Moses caused to be erected in the Desert of SINAI immediately after the promulgation of the Law from that mountain.

TABERNACLE. The written authorities for the restoration of the Tabernacle are, first, the detailed account to be found in Ex. xxvi., and repeated in xxxvi. 8-88; secondly, the account given of the building by Josephus (Ant. iii. 6), which is nearly a repetition of the account in the Bible. The additional indications contained in the Talmud and in Philo practically add nothing to our knowledge.—Outer Enclosure. The court of the Tabernacle was surrounded by canvas-screens. Those of the Tabernacle were 5 cubits in height, and supported by pillars of brass 5 cubits apart, to which the curtains were attached by hooks and fillets of silver (Ex. xxvii. 9, &c.). This enclosure was only broken on the eastern side by the entrance, which was 20 cubits wide, and closed by curtains of fine twined linen wrought with needlework, and of the most gorgeous colors. The space enclosed within these screens was a double square, 50 cubits, or 75 feet N. and S., and 100 cubits, or 150 feet E. and W. In the outer or eastern half was placed the ALTAR of burnt-offerings, described in Ex. xxvii. 1-8, and between it and the Tabernacle the LAYER, at which the priests washed their hands and feet on entering the Temple. In the square toward the W. was situated the TABERNACLE itself. Josephus states its dimensions as 30 cubits long by 10 broad, or 45 feet by 15, and the Bible says that the N. and S. walls were each composed of twenty upright boards (Ex. xxvi. 15, &c.), each board 1½ cubits in width, and at the W. end there were six boards (= 9 cubits), which, with the angle-boards or posts, made up the 10 cubits of Josephus (see fig. 1). Each of these boards was furnished with two tenons at its lower extremity, which fitted into silver sockets placed on the ground. At the top at least they were jointed and fastened together by bars of shittim or acacia-wood run through rings of gold (Ex. xxvi. 26). Both authorities agree that there were five bars for each side, but a little difficulty arises from the Bible describing (ver. 28) a middle bar which reached from end to end. As we shall presently see, this bar was probably applied to a totally different purpose, and we therefore assume that Josephus's description of the mode in which they were applied is correct:—"Every one," he says (Ant. iii. 6, § 3), "of the pillars or boards had a ring of gold affixed to its front outward, into which were inserted bars gilt with gold, each of them 5 cubits long, and these bound together the boards; the head of one bar running into another after the manner of one tenon inserted into another. But for the wall behind there was only one bar that went through all the boards, into which one of the ends of the bars on both sides was inserted." The Tabernacle was, therefore, an oblong rectangular structure, 30 cubits long by 10 broad, open at the eastern end, and divided internally into two apartments. The Holy of Holies, into which no one entered—not even the HIGH-PRIEST, except on extraordinary occasions (ATONEMENT, DAY OF)—was a cube, 10 cubits square in plan, and 10 cubits high to the top of the wall. In this was placed the MERCY-SEAT, surmounted by the CHERUBIM, and on it was placed the ARK containing the tables of the Law. In front of these was an outer chamber, called the Holy Place—20 cubits long by 10 broad, and 10 high, appropriated to the use of the priests. In it were placed the golden CANDLESTICK on one side, the table of SHEW-BREAD opposite, and between them in the centre the ALTAR of incense. The roof of the Tabernacle was formed by 3, or rather 4 sets of curtains, the dimensions of two of which are minutely given both in the Bible and by Josephus. The innermost (Ex. xvi. 1, &c.), of "fine twined LINEN" (Josephus calls them wool), were 10 in number, each 4 cubits wide and 28 cubits long. These were of various colors, and ornamented with cherubim of "cunning work." Five of these were sewn together so as to form larger curtains, each 20 cubits by 28, and these two again were joined together, when used, by fifty gold buckles or clasps. (TACHE.) Above these were placed 11 curtains of goats' hair, each 4 cubits wide by 30 cubits long; these were also sewn together, six into one curtain, and five into the other, and, when used, were joined together by fifty "BRASS" buckles (A. V. "taches"). Over these again was thrown a curtain of rams' skins with the wool on, dyed red, and a fourth covering is also specified in the A. V. as "BADGERS' SKINS," but probably (so Mr. Fergusson) of seal-skins. This did not, of course, cover the rams' skins, but most probably was only used as a coping or ridge-piece to protect the junction of the two curtains of rams' skins, which were laid on each slope of the roof, and probably only laced together at the top. The question, hitherto a stumbling-block to restorers, is, to know how these curtains were applied as a covering to the Tabernacle. The solution of the difficulty appears singularly obvious. It is simply that the tent had a ridge, as all tents have had from the days of Moses down to the present day; and we have also very little difficulty in predicating that the angle formed by the two sides of the roof at the ridge was a right angle—not only because it is a reasonable and usual angle for such a roof, and one that would most likely be adopted in so regular a building, but because its adoption reduces to harmony the only abnormal measurement in the whole building (see fig. 2 and 3). It is now easy to explain all the other difficulties which have met previous restorers. (1.) The Holy of Holies was divided from the Holy Place by a screen of four pillars supporting curtains which no one was allowed to pass. But in the entrance there were five pillars in a similar space. Now, no one would put a pillar in the centre of an entrance without a motive; but the moment a ridge is assumed it becomes indispensable. By the hypothesis here adopted the pillars in front would, like every thing else, be spaced exactly 5 cubits apart. (2.) Josephus twice asserts that the Tabernacle was divided into three parts, though he specifies only two—the Adytum (i. e. the "Holy of Holies") and the Pronaos (i. e. the vestibule or "Tabernacle" where the priests were). The third was of course the porch, 5 cubits deep, which stretched across the width of the house. (3.) In speaking of the western end, the Bible always uses the plural, as if there were two sides there (Ex. xxvi. 22, 27, &c.). There was, of course, at least one pillar in the centre beyond the wall,—there may have been five,—so that there practically were two sides there. (4.) We now understand why there are 10 breadths in the under curtains and 11 in the upper. It was that they might break joint, i. e. that the seam of the one, and especially the great joining of the two divisions, might be over the centre of the lower curtain, so as to prevent the rain penetrating through the joints. As the two cubits which were in excess at the W. hung at an angle, the depth of fringe would be practically about the same as on the sides. (5.) As to the disposition of the side-bars of shittim-wood that joined the boards together, the explanation hinted at above seems the most reasonable—that the 5 bars named in verses 26, 27, were joined end to end, as Josephus asserts, and the bar mentioned in ver. 28 was the ridge-pole of the roof. The Hebrew will equally well bear the translation "and the middle bar which is between (instead of, 'in the midst of') the boards shall reach from end to end." Probably a ridge-pole was employed with supports. One pillar in the centre where the curtains were joined would be sufficient, and if the centre-board at the back of the Holy of Holies was 16 cubits high, the whole would be easily constructed. (6.) Mr. Fergusson supposes the sides of the Verandah which surrounded the Sanctuary were enclosed, for Solomon's Temple was surrounded on all sides but the front by a range of small cells 5 cubits wide, in which resided the priests who were specially attached to the Temple-service, and such an arrangement would have been both easy and convenient at the Tabernacle.

Solomon's Temple. It was David who first proposed to replace the Tabernacle by a more permanent building, but was forbidden for the reasons assigned by the prophet Nathan (2 Sam. vii. 5, &c.), Fig. 4.—Plan of Solomon's Temple, showing the disposition of the chambers in two stories, by J. Fergusson, Esq.

and though he collected materials and made arrangements, the execution of the task was left for his son SOLOMON. He, with the assistance of Hiram, king of Tyre, commenced this great undertaking in the fourth year of his reign, and completed it in

seven years, about B. C. 1005 according to the received chronology. (CHRONOLOGY, pp. 173-4: KING, 1ST AND 2D BOOKS OF, p. 519.) On comparing the Temple, as described in 1 K. vi. and 2 Chr. ii. and by Jos. vii. 3, with the Tabernacle, as just explained, the first thing that strikes us is that all the arrangements were identical, and the dimensions of every part exactly double those of the preceding structure. Thus the Holy of Holies in the Tabernacle was a cube, ten cubits each way; in the Temple it was twenty cubits. The Holy Place or outer hall was ten cubits wide by twenty long and ten high in the Tabernacle. In the Temple all these dimensions were exactly double. The porch in the Tabernacle was five cubits deep, in the Temple ten; its width in both instances being the width of the house. The chambers round the House and the Tabernacle were each five cubits wide on the ground-floor, the difference being that in the Temple the two walls taken together made up a thickness of five cubits, thus making ten cubits for the chambers. Taking all these parts together, the ground-plan of the Temple measured eighty cubits by forty; that of the Tabernacle was forty by twenty; and though the walls were ten cubits high in the one and twenty cubits in the other, the whole height of the Tabernacle was fifteen, that of the Temple thirty cubits; the one roof rising five, the other ten cubits above the height of the internal walls. The dimensions above quoted are as clear and as certain as any thing that can be predicated of any building of which no remains exist; but beyond this are certain minor problems by no means so easy to resolve, but of much less importance. (1.) The Height. That given in 1 K. vi. 2—of thirty cubits—is so reasonable in proportion to the other dimensions, that the matter might rest there were it not for the assertion (2 Chr. iii. 4) that the height, though apparently only of the porch, was 120 cubits = 180 feet.<sup>1</sup> Both Josephus and the Talmud persistently assert that there was a superstructure on the Temple equal in height to the lower part, and the total height they also call 120 cubits or 180 feet. In looking through the monuments of antiquity for something to suggest what this might be, the only thing that occurs is the platform or Talar that existed on the roofs of the palace-temples at Persepolis. (SHUSHAN.) Nothing could represent more correctly "the altars on the top of the upper chambers" which Josiah beat down (2 K. xxiii. 12) than this, or more fully meet the architectural or devotional exigencies of the case; but its height could never have been sixty cubits, or even thirty, but very probably the twenty cubits which Josephus (xv. 11, § 3) mentions as "sinking down in the failure of the foundations." (2.) Jachin and Boaz. No features connected with the Temple of Solomon have given rise to so much controversy, or been so difficult to explain, as the form of the two pillars of brass which were set up in the porch of the house. It has even been supposed that they were not "pillars" in the ordinary sense, but obelisks; for this, however, there does not appear to be any authority. According to 1 K. vii. 15 ff., the pillars were eighteen cubits high and twelve in circumference, with capitals five cubits in height. Above this was (ver. 19) another member, called also "chapter" of lily-work, four cubits in height, but which from ver. 22 seems more probably to have been an entablature, which is necessary to complete the order. As these members make out twenty-seven cubits, leaving three cubits or four and a half feet for the slope of the roof, the whole design seems reasonable and proper. (Boaz.) If this conjecture is correct, the lily-work must have been something like the Persepolitan cornice (fig. 5), which is probably nearer in style to that of the buildings at Jerusalem than any thing else we know of. (3.) Internal Supports. The existence of these two pillars in the porch suggests an inquiry: Were there any pillars in the interior of the Temple? Mr. Fergusson maintains the affirmative as altogether probable. If introduced at all, there must have been four in the sanctuary, and ten in the hall, not necessarily equally spaced, in a

transverse direction, but probably standing six cubits from the walls, leaving a centre aisle of eight cubits. The Palace or Temple of Darius at Persepolis, which closely resembles the Jewish Temple, having a porch, a central hall, an adytum, and a range of small chambers on each side, has four pillars in its porch instead of two, and consequently four rows in its interior hall, instead of two rows as suggested above. No internal supports to the roofs of either the Temple or the Tabernacle are mentioned anywhere. But the difficulties of construction without them would have been enormous, and their introduction usual and entirely unobjectionable. (4.) Chambers. There remains to be noticed the application of three tiers of small chambers to the walls of the Temple externally on all sides, except that of the entrance. Though not expressly so stated, these were appropriated to the residence of the priests who were either permanently or in turn devoted to the service of the Temple. The lowest story was five cubits in width, the next six, and the upper seven, allowing an offset of one cubit on the side of the Temple, or of nine inches on each side, on which the flooring joists rested, so as not to cut into the walls of the Temple (fig. 4). Only at Persepolis, again, do we find any thing at all analogous to this; in the Palace of Darius is a similar range on either hand. (5.) Outer Court. The enclosure of the Temple consisted, according to 1 K. vi. 36, of a low wall of three courses of stones and a row of cedar-beams, both probably highly ornamented. As probably the same duplication of dimensions took place in this as in all the other features of the Tabernacle, we may safely assume that it was ten cubits, or fifteen feet, in height, and almost certainly 100 cubits N. and S., and 200 E. and W.

Temple of Zerubbabel. We have very few particulars regarding the Temple which the Jews erected after their return from the Captivity (about 520 B. C.), and no description that would enable us to realize its appearance. (HAGGAI; ZECHARIAH 1; ZERUBBABEL.) But some dimensions given in the Bible and elsewhere afford points of comparison between it and the Temples which preceded it, or were erected after it. Ezr. vi. 3, quoting the decree of Cyrus, says, "Let the house be builded, the place where they offered sacrifices, and let the foundations thereof be strongly laid; the height thereof threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof threescore cubits, with three rows of great stones and a row of new timber." Josephus quotes this passage almost literally, but in doing so enables us with certainty to translate the word here called Row as "Story"—as indeed the sense would lead us to infer. The dimension of 60 cubits in breadth, is 20 cubits in excess of that of Solomon's Temple, but there is no reason to doubt its correctness, for we find both from Josephus and the Talmud that it was the dimension adopted for the Temple when rebuilt, or rather repaired, by Herod. We must, therefore, assume that the porch and the chambers all round were 20 cubits in width, including the thickness of the walls, instead of 10 cubits, as in the earlier building. This alteration made the Temple 100 cubits in length by 60 in breadth, with a height, it is said, of 60 cubits, including the upper room or Talar, though we cannot help suspecting that this last dimension is somewhat in excess of the truth.—The only other description of this Temple is found in Hecataeus the Abderite, who wrote shortly after Alexander the Great. As quoted by Josephus, he says, that "In Jerusalem toward the middle of the city is a stone walled enclosure about 500 feet in length, and 100 cubits in width, with double gates," in which he describes the Temple as situated. Hecataeus also mentions that the altar was 20 cubits square and 10 high. And although he mentions the Temple itself, he does not supply us with any dimensions. From these dimensions we gather, that if "the Priests and Levites and Elders of the families were disconsolate at seeing how much more sumptuous the old Temple was than the one which on account of their poverty they had just been able to erect" (Ezr. iii. 12), it certainly was not because it was smaller, as almost every dimension had been increased one-third. In speaking of these temples we must always bear in mind that their dimensions were practically very far inferior to sides. The whole shows what were the aspirations of the Jews in this direction, and how different they were from those of other nations; and there can be little doubt that the arrangements of Herod's Temple were in a great measure influenced by the description here given.

Temple of Herod. For our knowledge of the last and greatest of the Jewish Temples we are indebted almost wholly to the works of Josephus, with an occasional hint from the Talmud. (HIEROD; JERUSALEM.) The Temple or naos itself was in dimensions and arrangement very similar to that of Solomon, or rather that of Zerubbabel—more like the latter; but this was surrounded by an inner enclosure of great strength and magnificence, measuring as nearly as can be made out 180 cubits by 240, and adorned by porches and ten gateways of great magnificence; and beyond this again was an outer enclosure measuring externally 400 cubits each way. Mr. Fergusson maintains that the Temple was certainly situated in the S. W. angle of the area now known as the Haram area at JERUSALEM, and that its dimensions were what Josephus states them to be, 400 cubits, or one stadium, each way. What Herod did apparently was to take in the whole space between the Temple and the city wall on its eastern side, and to add a considerable space on the N. and S. to support the porticoes which he added there. As the Temple terrace thus became the principal defence of the city on the E. side, there were no gates or openings in that direction. The N. side, too, where not covered by the fortress Antonia, became part of the defences of the city, and was likewise without external gates. On the S. side, which was enclosed by the wall of Ophel, there were double gates nearly in the centre.

those of the heathen. It was the lavish display of the precious metals, the elaboration of carved ornament, and the beauty of the textile fabrics, which made up their splendor and rendered them so precious in the eyes of the people.

Temple of Ezekiel. The vision of a Temple which the prophet EZEKIEL saw, while residing on the banks of the Chebar in the twenty-fifth year of the Captivity, does not add much to our knowledge of the subject. It is not a description of a Temple that ever was built or ever could be erected at Jerusalem, and can consequently only be considered as the beau idéal of what a Shemitic Temple ought to be.<sup>3</sup> The Temple itself was of the exact dimensions of that built by Solomon. Beyond this were various courts and residences for the priests, and places for sacrifice and other ceremonies of the Temple, till he comes to the outer court which measured 500 reeds ( $= 500 \times 10\frac{1}{2}$  feet  $=$  nearly an English mile) on each of its sides. These gates still exist at about 365 feet from the southwestern angle, and are perhaps the only architectural features of the Temple of Herod

xli. 2; 1 K. vi. 2)—that the house of the last Temple was similar to that of the first in being widest at the top—that the galleries of both overjutting, or projected over, 20 cubits on each side. The annexed diagram of the front or E. side may illustrate his view: a being a projecting porch supported by the two pillars, Jachin and Baza; b, c, over the main entrance, d; the projecting galleries denoted by the figures 1, 2, 3, being supported by 3 rows of stone pillars, e, f, g, and forming porches on the sides and rear of the building. At h on each side is a side-door to which a-c and winding stairs behind the pillars b, c; and at each of the figures 1, 2, 3, is a window with palm-trees on each side of it.

which remain in position. This entrance consists of a double archway of Cyclopean architecture on the level of the ground, opening into a square vestibule measuring 40 feet each way. From this a double tunnel, nearly 200 feet in length, leads to a flight of steps which rise to the surface in the court of the Temple, exactly at that gateway of the inner Temple (a little E. of the exact centre of the enclosure) which led to the altar. We learn from the Talmud, that the gate of the inner Temple to which this passage led was called the "Water Gate" (comp. Neh. xiii. 37). Toward the W. there were four gateways to the external enclosure of the Temple, and the position of three of these can still be traced. The first or more southern led over the bridge the remains of which were identified by Dr. Robinson (cut under JERUSALEM, p. 459), and joined the Stoa Basilica (or royal porch) of the Temple with the royal palace. The second was that discovered by Dr. Barclay, 270 feet from the S. W. angle, at a level of 17 feet below that of the southern gates just described. The site of the third has not yet been seen, but Mr. Fergusson places it between 200 and 250 feet from the N. W. angle of the Temple area. The fourth led over the causeway which still exists at a distance of 600 feet from the S. W. angle.—Cloisters. The most magnificent part of the Temple, in an architectural point of view, seems to have been the cloisters added to the outer court when it was enlarged by Herod. The cloisters in the W., N., and E. side were composed of double rows of Corinthian columns, 25 cubits or 37 feet 6 inches in height with flat roofs, and resting against the outer wall of the Temple. These, however, were immeasurably surpassed in magnificence by the royal porch or Stoa Basilica which overhung the southern wall. This, minutely described by Josephus, consisted of a nave and two aisles, that toward the Temple being open, that toward the country closed by a wall. The breadth of the centre aisle was 45 feet; of the side aisles 30 from centre to centre of the pillars; their height 30 feet, and that of the centre aisle 100 feet. This magnificent structure was supported by 162 Corinthian columns, in 4 rows, the 2 odd pillars forming apparently a screen at the end of the bridge leading to the palace. At a short distance from the front of these cloisters was a marble screen or enclosure, 3 cubits in height. Again, at a short distance within this was a flight of steps supporting the terrace or platform on which the Temple itself stood. According to Josephus this terrace was 15 cubits or 22½ feet high, and was approached first by 14 steps, at the top of which was a platform 10 cubits wide, called the Hil or Chil; and there were again in the depths of the gateways 5 or 6 steps more leading to the inner court of the Temple. To the E., where the court of the women was, this arrangement was reversed; 5 steps led to the Hil or Chil, and 15 from that to the court of the Temple. The court of the Temple was very nearly a square. It may have been exactly so, for we have not all the details. The Talmud (Mi'd'ih) says it was 187 cubits E. and W., and 137 N. and S. To the eastward of this was the court of the women, the dimensions of which are not given by Josephus, but are given in the Talmud as 137 cubits square—a dimension we may safely reject. If the enclosure of the court of the Gentiles, or the Chil, was nearly equidistant on all four sides from the cloisters, its dimension must have been about 37 or 40 cubits E. and W., most probably the former. The great ornament of these inner courts seems to have been their gateways, the three especially on the N.

and S. leading to the Temple court. These, according to Josephus, were of great height, strongly fortified and ornamented with great elaboration. But the wonder of all was the great eastern gate leading from the court of the women to the upper court—covered with carving, richly gilt, having apartments over it. This was in all probability the one called the "Beautiful Gate" in the N. T. Immediately within this gateway stood the ALTAR of burnt-offering. Both the Altar and the Temple were enclosed by a low parapet one cubit in height. Within this last enclosure toward the W. stood the Temple itself. Its internal dimensions were the same as those of the Temple of Solomon, but there seems no reason to doubt that the whole plan was augmented by the surrounding parts (porch and chambers) being increased from 10 to 20 cubits, so that the third Temple, like the second, measured 60 cubits across, and 100 cubits E. and W. The width of the façade or front was also augmented by wings or shoulders projecting 20 cubits each way, making the whole breadth 100 cubits, or equal to the length. So far all seems certain, but when we come to the height, every measurement seems doubtful. Both Josephus and the Talmud seem delighted with the truly Jewish idea of a building which, without being a cube, was 100 cubits long, 100 broad, and 100 high. We cannot help suspecting that in this instance Josephus systematically doubled the altitude of the building he was describing, as it can be proved he did in some other instances. There is tolerable certainty as to the horizontal dimensions of the various parts of the Temple, and their arrangement in plan, and, indeed, as to their real height. But when we try to realize the appearance of the Temple or the details of its architecture, we launch into a sea of conjecture with very little to guide us, at least in regard to the appearance of the Temple itself. We are told (Jos. xv. 11, §§ 5, 6) that the priests built the Temple itself in eighteen months, while it took Herod eight years to complete his part; and as only priests apparently were employed, we may fairly assume that it was not a rebuilding, but only a repair—it may be with additions—which they undertook, and that a great part of the Temple of Zerubbabel was still standing, and was incorporated in the new. The only things added at this period were the wings to the façade, and it may consequently be surmised that the façade was entirely remodelled at this time, especially as we find in the centre a great ARCH, which was a very Roman feature. It is nearly certain that the style of the second Temple must have been identical with that of the buildings we are so familiar with at Persepolis and Susa. (SHUSHAN.) The Jews were too closely connected with the Persians and Babylonians at this period to know of any other style, and in fact their Temple was built under the superintendence of the very parties who were erecting the contemporary edifices at Persepolis and Susa. Whatever the appearance of its details, the triple Temple of Jerusalem—the lower court, standing on its magnificent terraces—the inner court, raised on its platform in the centre of this—and the Temple itself rising out of this group and crowning the whole—must have formed, when combined with the beauty of its situation, one of the most splendid architectural combinations of the ancient world. ARCHITECTURE; HOUSE; PALACE.

* Templ, to, and Temp-tation (both fr. L. through Fr.). These words etymologically denote the trying or putting one to the proof, like the words (Heb. verbs bāhan or bāchan, nādh, and noun masādh; Gr. verbs peirazo, ekpeirazō, noun peirasmos, &c.)

represented by them in the A. V. They may therefore designate the action of God or the course of His Providence, or the earthly trial by which human character, views, feelings are brought out, as when "God did tempt ABRAHAM" (Gen. xxii. 1), i. e. proved or put to the proof his faith and obedience by the command to sacrifice Isaac, &c. These trials or "temptations" often severely test the patience, submission and religious principle of those who endure them, and are deeply afflictive, and are hence not to be sought or rashly encountered (Deut. iv. 84, vii. 19; Mat. vi. 13; Lk. xxii. 28, 40, 46; 1 Cor. x. 13 twice; Jas. i. 2, 12, &c.). But the words "tempt" and "temptation" often designate particularly that trying (by Satan, wicked men, &c.), which is adapted and designed to lead astray from God and virtue, and thus nearly = entice or entice-ment to sin (Mat. iv. 1, xvi. 1; Lk. iv. 13; 1 Tim. vi. 9; Jas. i. 13, &c.). The words are also used of the trial of God's patience, forbearance, &c., by those who disobey, or distrust, or murmur against Him (Ex. xvii. 2; Ps. xcvi. 8; Mal. iii. 15; Mat. iv. 7; Acts v. 9; Heb. iii. 8, &c.). The Temptation may be used with special reference to the temptation of our first parents in Eden (Gen. iii.; ADAM) or of the Lord JESUS CHRIST (Mat. iv. 1-11, &c.), in both of which SATAN was the "TEMPTER."

* Tempter = one who tempts or entices another to sin, especially SATAN (Mat. iv. 3; 1 Th. iii. 5). TEMPT. to.

* TEN. MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS 3; NUMBER; TEN COMMANDMENTS; TITHE.

Ten Com-mand-ments. (1.) The popular name in this, as in many other instances, is not that of the Hebrew Scriptures. There we have the "ten words" (Heb. debārīm, pl. of dābār, a word; our decalogue literally = the ten words), not the Ten Commandments (Heb. and margin of Ex. xxxiv. 28; Deut. iv. 13, x. 4, Heb.). The difference is not altogether an unmeaning one. The word of God, the "word of the Lord," the constantly recurring term for the fullest revelation, was higher than any phrase expressing merely a command, and carried with it more the idea of a self-fulfilling power. Other names are even more significant. These, and these alone, are "the words of the COVENANT" (Ex. xxxiv. 28). They are also the Tables of Testimony, sometimes simply "the TESTIMONY" (xxv. 16, xxxi. 18, &c.). (2.) The circumstances in which the Ten great Words were first given to the people surrounded them with an awe which attached to no other precept. In the midst of the cloud, and the darkness, and the flashing lightning, and the fiery smoke, and the thunder, like the voice of a trumpet, at SINAI, Moses was called to receive the Law without which the people would cease to be a holy nation. Here, as elsewhere, Scripture unites two facts which men separate. God, and not man, was speaking to the Israelites in those terrors, and yet, in the language of later inspired teachers, other instrumentality was not excluded (Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2). No other words were proclaimed in like manner. Of no other words could it be said that they were written as these were written, engraved on the Tables of Stone (TABLES), not as originating in man's contrivance or sagacity, but by the power of the Eternal Spirit, by the "finger of God" (Ex. xxxi. 18, xxxii. 16). (3.) The NUMBER Ten was, we can hardly doubt, itself significant to Moses and the Israelites. The received symbol of completeness, it taught the people that the Law of Jehovah was perfect (Ps. xix. 7). The fact that they were written not on one, but on two tables, probably in two groups of five each, taught men the great division of duties toward God, and duties toward our neighbor, which we recognize as the groundwork of every true moral system. It taught them also, five being the symbol of imperfection, how incomplete each set of duties would be when divorced from its companion. (4.) In what way the Ten Commandments were to be divided has, however, been a matter of much controversy. At least four distinct arrangements present themselves. (a.) In the received teaching of the Roman Catholic Church, resting on that of Augustine, the first Table contained three commandments, the second the other seven. It involved, however, and in part proceeded from an alteration in the received arrangement. What we know as the first and second were united, and consequently the Sabbath law appeared at the close of the First Table as the third, not as the fourth commandment. The completeness of the number was restored in the Second Table by making a separate (the ninth) command of the precept, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife," which with us forms part of the tenth. (b.) The familiar division, referring the first four to our duty toward God, and the six remaining to our duty toward man, is, on ethical grounds, simple and natural. (c.) A modification of (a.) has been adopted by later Jewish writers (Jonathan ben Uzziel, Aben Ezra, &c.). Retaining the combination of the first and second commandments of the common order, they have made a new "word" of the opening declaration, "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage," and so have avoided the necessity of the subdivision of the tenth. (d.) The arrangement recognized by the older Jewish writers, Josephus and Philo, and supported ably and thoughtfully by Ewald, places five commandments in each Table, and thus preserves the grouping by five and ten which pervades the whole code. A modern jurist would perhaps object that this places the fifth commandment in a wrong position, that a duty to parents is a duty toward our neighbor. From the Jewish point of view, it is believed the place thus given to that commandment was essentially the right one (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article). Instead of duties toward God, and duties toward our neighbors, we must think of the First Table as containing all that belonged to the Eusebeia (= reverence or piety); of the Greeks, to the Pietas (= piety) of the Romans, duties i. e. with no corresponding rights, while the Second deals with duties which involve rights, and come therefore under the head of Justitia (L. = justice). The duty of honoring, i. e. supporting, parents came under the former head. (5.) To these Ten Commandments we find in the SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH an eleventh added: "But when the Lord thy God shall have brought thee into the land of Canaan, whither thou goest to possess it, thou shalt set thee up two great stones, and shalt plaster them with plaster, and shalt write upon these stones all the words of this Law. Moreover, after thou shalt have passed over Jordan, thou shalt set up those stones which I command thee this day, on Mount Gerizim, and thou shalt build there an altar to the Lord thy God, an altar of stones: thou shalt not lift up any iron thereon. Of unhewn stones shalt thou build that altar to the Lord thy God, and thou shalt offer on it burnt-offerings to the Lord thy God, and thou shalt sacrifice peace-offerings, and shalt eat them there, and thou shalt rejoice before the Lord thy God in that mountain beyond Jordan, by the way where the sun goeth down, in the land of the Canaanite that dwelleth in the plain country over against Gilgal, by the oak of Moreh, toward Sichem." The interpolation (from Deut. xxvii. 2-7, xi. 30, changing "Ebal" to "Gerizim") has every mark of being a bold attempt to claim for the worship on GERIZIM the solemn sanction of the voice on Sinai, to place it on the same footing as the Ten great Words of God. (6.) In the Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel the first and second commandments are united, to make up the second, and the words "I am the Lord thy God," &c., are given as the first. A distinct reason is also given for the last five commandments no less than for the first five: "Thou shalt commit no murder, for because of the sins of murderers the sword goeth forth upon the world," &c. (7.) The absence of any distinct reference to the Ten Commandments as such in the Pirke

Aboth (= Maxims of the Fathers) is both strange and significant. With all their ostentation of profound reverence for the Law, the teaching of the Rabbis turned on other points than the great laws of duty. DEATH; FAITH; JEHOVAH: JUSTIFY; LAW; LAW OF MOSES; LOVE; REVELATION; SALVATION; SIN, &c.

Tent (Heb. usually ohel; see TABERNACLE). Among the leading characteristics of the nomad races, those two have always been numbered, whose origin has been ascribed to Jabal the son of Lamech (Gen. iv. 20), viz. to be tent-dwellers and keepers of cattle. (HERD; SHEPHERD.) The same may be said of the forefathers of the Hebrew race (PATRIARCH); nor was it until the return into Canaan from Egypt that the Hebrews became inhabitants of cities. (ARCHITECTURE.) Among tent-dwellers at the present day are (1.) the great Mongol and Tartar hordes of Central Asia, whose tents are sometimes of gigantic size, and (2.) the Bedouin Arab tribes, whose tents are probably like those of Abraham and Isaac. An Arab tent is minutely described by Burekhardt. It is called beit = "house;" its covering consists of stuff, about three-quarters of a yard broad, made of black goats'-hair (Cant. i. 5), laid parallel with the tent's length. This is sufficient to resist the heaviest rain. The tent-poles are usually nine, placed in three groups, but many tents have only one pole, others two or three. The ropes which hold the tent in its place are fastened, not to the tent-cover itself, but to loops consisting of a leathern thong tied to the ends of a stick, round which a piece of old cloth sewed to the tent-cover is twisted. The ends of the tent-ropes are fastened to short sticks or pins, which are driven into the ground with a mallet (Judg. iv. 21; Jael). Round the back and sides of the tents runs a piece of stuff removable at pleasure to admit air. The tent is divided into two apartments, separated by a carpet partition drawn across the middle of the tent and fastened to the three middle posts. The tents of Sarah, Leah, Rachel, &c., may have been either separate tents or separate apartments in the principal tent (Gen. xxiv. 67, xxxi. 33). When the PASTURE near an encampment is exhausted, the tents are taken down, packed on camels, and removed (Is. xxxviii. 12; Gen. xxvi. 17, 22, 25). In choosing places for encampment, Arabs prefer the neighborhood of trees, for the shade and coolness which they afford (xviii. 4, 8). PAVILION; TABERNACLE; TENT-MAKER.

Te'rah (Heb. station, Ges.), in N. T. THARA, the father of ABRAM, NAHOR 2, and HARAN 1, and through them the ancestor of the great families of the Israelites, Ishmaelites, Midianites, Moabites, and Ammonites (Gen. xi. 24-32; 1 Chr. i. 26). We learn from the O. T. that he was an idolater (Josh. xxiv. 2; compare Jd. v. 6-8), that he dwelt beyond the Euphrates in Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. xi. 28), and that in his old age he went with his son Abram, his daughter-in-law Sarai, and his grandson Lot, "to go into the land of Canaan, and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there. And the days of Terah were two hundred and five years: and Terah died in Haran" (xi. 31, 32). From the simple facts of Terah's life recorded in the O. T. has been constructed the entire legend of Abram in Jewish and Arabian traditions. Terah the idolater is turned into a maker of images, and "Ur of the Chaldees" is the original of the "furnace" into which Abram was cast (compare Ez. v. 2). In the Jewish traditions Terah is a prince and a great man in the palace of Nimrod, the captain of his army, his son-in-law according to the Arabs. His wife is called in the Talmud Aمتلئ, or Eمتلئ, the daughter of Carnebo (so Mr. Wright).

Ter'a-phim (Heb., see below), only in plural, images connected with magical rites. (DIVINATION; MAGIC.) The derivation of the name is obscure. Gesenius derives the word from an obsolete Hebrew root = to live in comfort, and defines it "household gods, perhaps so called as the supposed guardians and givers of prosperous life" (Lex., translated by Robinson, 1854). In one case a single statue seems to be intended by the plural (1 Sam. xix. 13, 16). The teraphim carried away from LABAN by Rachel do not seem to have been very small; and the image hidden in David's bed by MICHAEL to deceive Saul's messengers, was probably of the size of a man, and perhaps in the head and shoulders, if not lower, of human or like form. Laban regarded his teraphim as gods, and it would therefore appear that they were used by those who added corrupt practices to the patriarchal religion. Teraphim again are included among Micah's images (Judg. xvii. 3-5, xviii. 17, 20). Teraphim were consulted for oracular answers by the Israelites (Zech. x. 2; compare Judg. xviii. 5, 6; 1 Sam. xv. 22, 23, xix. 13, 16, LXX.; 2 K. xxiii. 24), and by the Babylonians, in the case of Nebuchadnezzar (Ez. xxi. 19-22). There is no evidence that they were ever worshipped (so Mr. R. S. Poole, original author of this article).

Teresh (Heb. fr. Pers. = severe, austere? Ges.), one of the two eunuchs whose plot to assassinate Ahasuerus was discovered by Mordecai (Esth. ii. 21, vi. 2). He was hanged.

Ter'ti-us [-she-us] (L. third), probably a Roman, amanuensis of Paul in writing the Epistle to the Romans from Corinth, and sender of a greeting to the Roman Christians (Rom. xvi. 22). Some would, without reason, identify him with SILAS. Nothing certain is known of him, though some writers have spoken of him as bishop of Iconium.

Ter-tul'ius (L., a diminutive from TERTIUS), "a certain ORATOR" (Acts xxiv. 1) retained by the high-priest and Sanhedrim to accuse the Apostle PAUL at Cesarea before FELIX. He evidently belonged to the class of professional orators. We may infer that Tertullus was of Roman, or at all events of Italian origin. The exordium of his speech is designed to conciliate the good-will of the procurator, and is accordingly overcharged with flattery. St. Luke probably gives only an abstract of his speech, with the most salient points (as the exordium and the character ascribed to Paul) in full. The part (ver. 6-8) "and would have judged . . . to come unto thee" is omitted by Lachmann and Tischendorf, and marked doubtful by Alford, Hackett, Mill, Bengel, Griesbach, &c., as omitted in all the uncial MSS. except E (that of Laud at Oxford).

* Testa-ment (fr. L.) is properly a will or document by which the estate of the "testator" or person who signs and seals it is to be disposed of after his death. It is a common translation of the Gr. diathiké (Mat. xxvi. 28; Mk. xiv. 24; Lk. xxii. 20; 1 Cor. xi. 25; 2 Cor. iii. 6, 14; Heb. vii. 22, ix. 15 twice, 16, 17, 20; Rev. xi. 19), which primarily (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) = a disposition, arrangement, and is elsewhere translated "COVENANT" (Acts iii. 25, vii. 8; Rom. ix. 4, xi. 27; Gal. iii. 15, 17, iv. 24; Eph. ii. 12; Heb. viii. 6, 8, 9 twice, 10, ix. 4 twice, x. 16, 29, xii. 24, xiii. 20), and commonly in the LXX. = Heb. berith, A. V. "COVENANT" or "league." "NEW TESTAMENT" and "OLD TESTAMENT," in popular language, are the two great divisions of the BIBLE.

* Testi-mo-ny (Heb. 'édh, 'édhth, te'údáh; Gr. marturia, marturion) = witness, evidence, proof (Mat. viii. 4; Jn. iii. 32, 33, &c.), applied also to the precepts, law, revelation of God (Ps. xix. 7 [Heb. 8], cxix.; Is. viii. 16, 20, &c.), and especially to the TEN COMMANDMENTS or Decalogue inscribed on the tables of stone which were deposited in the ARK OF THE COVENANT (Ex. xvi. 34, xxv. 16, 21, 22, &c.).

TABERNACLE.

Te'ta = HATITA (1 Esd. v. 28).

Tetrarch [-trark] (fr. Gr.), properly = the sovereign or governor of the fourth part of a country. (1.) HEROD ANTIPAS (Mat. xiv. 1; Lk. iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1), who is commonly distinguished as "Herod the tetrarch," although the title of "king" is also assigned to him (Mat. xiv. 9; Mk. vi. 14, 22 ff.). (2.) HEROD PHILIP II., who is called (Lk. iii. 1) "tetrarch of ITURÆA, and of the region of TRACHONITIS." (3.) LYSANIAS, called (iii. 1) "tetrarch of ABILENE." The title of tetrarch was at this time probably applied to petty tributary princes without any such determinate meaning. But it appears from Josephus that the tetrarchies of Antipas and Philip were regarded as constituting each a fourth part of their father's kingdom. We conclude that in these two cases, at least, the title was used in its strict and literal sense (so Mr. Jones).

Tha'mah (fr. Heb.) = TAMAR, ancestor of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. ii. 53).

Tha'mar (Gr.) = TAMAR 1 (Mat. i. 3).

Tham-na-tha (Gr. fr. Heb. = THIMNATHAN or TIMNATH), one of the cities of Judea fortified by Bacchides (1 Mc. ix. 50); possibly (so Mr. Grove, &c.) = TIMNAR 1; but, according to Robinson (ii. 17, n.), and Smith (B. S. for 1843, 484-5), probably the Thamna of Josephus (xiii. 1, § 3, xiv. 11, § 2, B. J. iii. 3, § 5), which was the capital of one of the Roman toparchies or districts of Judea, and was probably at the modern Tikrah, a ruined site, fifteen or twenty miles N. N. W. from Jerusalem, and nearly as far E. N. E. from Ludd (Lydda). The LXX. joins Thamnatha to the following PHARATHONI. TIMNATH-SERAH.

The'atre [-ter] (Fr. fr. Gr. theatron, see below). The Greek term, like the corresponding English term, denotes the place where dramatic performances or other public spectacles are exhibited (Acts xix. 29; EPHESUS; GADARA; HEROD AGRIPPA I.; SELA), and also the scene itself or spectacle which is witnessed there (1 Cor. iv. 9, A. V. "spectacle," i. e. public show, translated "gazing-stock" by Tyndale, Cranmer, and the Geneva version). Theatres were often used among the Greeks for public assemblies and the transaction of public business. Criminals were sometimes exposed and punished in the theatre; and to this practice some refer 1 Cor. iv. 9 and Heb. x. 33, while others consider the allusion as figurative, pointing out Christians as objects of earnest attention to a great multitude in earth and heaven who behold their endurance of reproaches and afflictions.

Thebes [theebz] (fr. Gr. Thēbai, derived fr. Egyptian Tape = the head, Smith's Dict. of Geog.; Heb. Nô-âmôn; A. V. "No," "the multitude of No," "populous No"), a chief city of ancient Egypt, long the capital of the upper country, and the seat of the Diospolitan dynasties, that ruled over all Egypt at the era of its highest splendor. The sacred name of Thebes was P-amen, "the abode of AMON," which the Greeks reproduced in their Diospolis (= city of Zeus or of JUPITER), especially with the addition the Great. NO-AMON is the name of Thebes in the Hebrew Scriptures (Jer. xlv. 23; Nah. iii. 8). Ezekiel uses No simply to designate the Egyptian seat of Ammon (Ez. xxx. 14, 16). The origin of the city is lost in antiquity (so Dr. Thompson, original author of this article). Niebuhr is of opinion that Thebes was much older than Memphis, and that, "after the centre of Egyptian life was transferred to Lower Egypt, MEMPHIS acquired its greatness through the ruin of Thebes." Other authorities assign priority to Memphis. But both cities date from our earliest authentic knowledge of Egyptian history. The first allusion to Thebes in classical literature is in the Iliad of Homer (ix. 381-385):—"Egyptian Thebes, where are vast treasures laid up in the houses; where are a hundred gates, and from each two hundred men go forth with horses and chariots." Its fame as a great capital had crossed the sea when Greece was yet in its infancy as a nation. Herodotus says, "I went to Heliopolis and to Thebes, expressly to try whether the priests of those places would agree in their accounts with the priests at Memphis" (ii. 3). Afterward he describes the features of the Nile valley, and the chief points and distances upon the river, as only an eye-witness would be likely to record them. In the first century B. C., Diodorus visited Thebes, and though he saw the city when it had sunk to quite secondary importance, he preserves the tradition of its early grandeur—its circuit of 140 stadia, the size of its public edifices, the magnificence of its temples, the number of its monuments, the dimensions of its private houses, some of them four or five stories high—all giving it an air of grandeur and beauty surpassing not only all other cities of Egypt, but of the world. Diodorus deplors the spoiling of its buildings and monuments by Cambyses. Strabo, who visited Egypt at about the beginning of the Christian era, describes the city under the name

Diospolis, and speaks of its ruins as extending eighty stadia (nearly ten miles) in length, of its numerous temples, many of them mutilated by Cambyses, and of its site as then occupied by villages. He also notices the two colossal statues of stone on the western plain, one of which is known as the "vocal Memnon," from the noise, as of a slight blow, which was believed to issue at sunrise from that part of the statue then remaining in the seat and on its base.—But the monuments of Thebes are the most reliable witnesses for the ancient grandeur of the city. These are found in almost equal proportions upon both sides of the Nile. The parallel ridges which skirt the narrow Nile valley upon the E. and W. from the northern limit of Upper Egypt, here sweep outward upon either side, forming a circular plain whose diameter is nearly ten miles. The plan of the city, as indicated by the principal monuments, was nearly quadrangular, measuring two miles from N. to S., and four from E. to W. Its four great landmarks were, Karnak and Luxor on the eastern or Arabian side, and Qoornah and Medeenet Haboo on the western or Libyan side. There are indications that each of these temples may have been connected with those facing it upon two sides by grand avenues, lined with sphinxes and other colossal figures. Upon the western bank there was almost a continuous line of temples and public edifices for two miles, from Qoornah to Medeenet Haboo; and Wilkinson conjectures that from a point near the latter, perhaps in the line of the colossi, the "Royal street" ran down to the river, which was crossed by a ferry terminating at Luxor on the eastern side. Beginning at the northern extremity on the western bank, the first conspicuous ruins are those of the Menephtheion, a palace-temple of the nineteenth dynasty, and therefore belonging to the middle style of Egyptian architecture, on a slight elevation, nearly a mile from the river, in the now deserted village of old Qoornah. Nearly a mile S. from the Menephtheion are the remains of the combined palace and temple known since the days of Strabo as the Memnonium, but clearly erected by Rameses II. The general form of the Memnonium is that of a parallelogram in three main sections, the interior areas being successively narrower than the first court, and the whole terminating in a series of sacred chambers beautifully sculptured and ornamented. But the most remarkable feature of these ruins is the gigantic statue of Rameses II., once a single block of syenite (SYENE) carved to represent the king on his throne, now scattered in fragments on the floor of the first hall. Its weight has been computed at 887 tons and its height at 75 feet. About one-third of a mile farther S. are the "vocal Memnon" and its mate, the height of each being about 53 feet above the plain. At Medeenet Haboo, about a mile S. of the Memnonium, we find ruins upon a more stupendous scale than at any other point on the western bank of Thebes. These con-

god. Its second court is one of the most remarkable in Egypt for the massiveness of its columns, which measure 24 feet in height by nearly 23 in circumference. Behind this long range of temples and palaces are the Libyan hills, which, for a distance of 5 miles, are excavated to the depth of several hundred feet for sepulchral chambers, some of them of vast extent. Some of the sepulchres of kings, in the number and variety of their chambers, the finish of their sculptures, and the beauty and freshness of their frescoes, are among the most remarkable monuments of Egyptian grandeur and skill. From the adornments of these subterranean tombs we derive our principal knowledge of the manners and customs of the Egyptians.—The eastern side of the river is distinguished by the remains of

and towers, which were the appendages of later times to the original structure. The temple properly faces the river, i. e. toward the N. W. The courts and propylæa connected with this structure occupy a space nearly 1,800 feet square, and the buildings represent almost every dynasty of Egypt, from Sesortasen I. to Ptolemy Euergetes I. Every thing pertaining to Karnak is on the grandest scale. Nearest the river is an area of 275 feet by 329, which once had a covered corridor on either side, and a double row of columns through the centre, leading to the entrance of the hypostyle hall, the most wonderful monument of Egyptian architecture. This grand hall is a forest of sculptured columns: in the central avenue are twelve, each 68 feet high by 12 in diameter, which formerly supported the most elevated portion of the roof, answering to the clerestory in Gothic architecture; on either side of these are seven rows, each column nearly 42 feet high by 9 in diameter, making a total of 184 pillars in an area of 170 feet by 330. Most of the pillars are yet standing, though the roof in many places has fallen in. The outer wall of Karnak is 40 feet thick at the base and nearly 100 feet high. The grandeur of Egypt is here in its architecture, and almost every pillar, obelisk, and stone tells its historic legend of her greatest monarchs.—Probably before the time of Menes, who was a native of This in the Thebaid (the territory of Thebes), there was a local sovereignty in the Thebaid, but the historical nationality of Egypt dates from the founding of MEMPHIS. When the Shepherds or Hyksos, a nomadic race from the E., invaded Egypt and fixed their capital at Memphis, a native Egyptian dynasty was maintained at Thebes, at times tributary to the Hyksos, and at times in military alliance with Ethiopia against the invaders; until at length, by a general uprising of the Thebaid, the Hyksos were expelled, and Thebes became the capital of all Egypt under the resplendent eighteenth dynasty. This supremacy continued until the close of the nineteenth dynasty, or for more than 500 years; but under the twentieth dynasty the glory of Thebes began to decline, and after the close of that dynasty her name no more appears in the lists of kings. Still the city was retained as the capital, in whole or in part, and the achievements of Shishonk the Bubastite (SHISHAK), of TIHAKAH the Ethiopian, and other monarchs of celebrity, are recorded upon its walls. Ezekiel proclaims the destruction of Thebes by the arm of Babylon (Ez. xxx. 14-16). The Persian invader Cambyses completed the destruction that the Babylonian had begun.

The person to whom St. Luke inscribes his Gospel (LUKE, GOSPEL OF) and the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES (Lk. i. 3; Acts i. 1). Several commentators, especially among the Fathers, have been disposed to regard the name either as that of a fictitious person, or as applicable to every Christian reader. But the epithet "most excellent" (Gr. kratiste), applied to Theophilus in Lk. i. 3 (comp. Acts xxiii. 26, xxiv. 3, xxvi. 25), is a sufficient evidence of his historical existence. It does not, indeed, prove that he was a Roman governor, or a person of senatorial rank, as Theophylact conjectures, but it makes it most probable that he was a person of high rank. His supposed connection with Antioch, Alexandria, or Achaia, rests on too slender evidence either to claim acceptance or to need refutation. All that can be conjectured with any degree of safety concerning him, comes to this, that he was a Gentile of rank and consideration, who came under the influence of St. Luke, or under that of St. Paul, at Rome, and was converted to the Christian faith (so Mr. Jones, original author of this article).—2. Thes-sa-l'o-n'i-ans (= people [i. e. Christians] of THESSALONICA), First Epistle to the. I. The date. During his second missionary journey, probably in A. D. 52, St. PAUL founded the Church of Thessalonica. Leaving Thessalonica he passed on to Berea. From Berea he went to Athens, and from Athens to Corinth (Acts xvii. 1–xviii. 18). Now, when this Epistle was written, Silvanus and Timothy were in the apostle's company (1 Th. i. 1; comp. 2 Th. i. 1)—a circumstance which confines the date to the second missionary journey (Acts xviii. 5; 2 Cor. i. 19). The Epistle then must have been written between St. Paul's leaving Thessalonica and the close of his residence at Corinth, i. e. according to the received chronology within the years 52–54. Other considerations (1 Th. iii. 1, 2, 6; comp. the following article, &c.) enable us to place the writing of this Epistle early in St. Paul's residence at Corinth, a few months after he had founded the Church at Thessalonica, at the close of A. D. 52 or the beginning of 53 (so Prof. Lightfoot, original author of this article, in accordance with most critics). The statement in the subscription appearing in several MSS. and versions, that it was written "from Athens," is a superficial inference from 1 Th. iii. 1, to which no weight should be attached.—II. The Epistles to the Thessalonians then (for the second followed the first after no long interval) are the earliest of St. Paul's writings—perhaps the earliest written records of Christianity. Comparing the Thessalonian Epistles with the later letters, the points of difference are mainly threefold. (1.) In the general style of these earlier letters there is greater simplicity and less exuberance of language. The brevity of the opening salutation is an instance of this. The closing benediction is correspondingly brief. And throughout the Epistles there is much more evenness of style. (2.) The antagonism to St. Paul is not the same. Here the opposition comes from Jews (1 Th. ii. 16). A period of five years changes the aspect of the controversy (comp. 1 and 2 Cor.; Gal.; Rom.). The opponents of St. Paul are then no longer Jews, so much as Judaizing Christians, who urged that though the Gentiles may be admitted to the Church of Christ, the only door of admission is the Mosaic covenant-rite of circumcision. The language of St. Paul, speaking of the Jewish Christians in this Epistle, shows that the opposition to his teaching had not at this time assumed this second phase. (3.) Many of the distinctive doctrines of Christianity, though implicitly contained in the teaching of these earlier letters, were yet not evolved and distinctly enunciated till the needs of the Church drew them out into prominence at a later date. In the Epistles to the Thessalonians, there is, e. g., no mention of the characteristic contrast of "faith and works;" the word "justification" does not once occur; the idea of dying with Christ and living with Christ, so frequent in St. Paul's later writings, is absent in these. In the Epistles to the Thessalonians, the Gospel preached is that of the coming of Christ, rather than of the cross of Christ. Christ's coming was closely bound up with the fundamental fact of the Gospel, viz. His resurrection, and thus formed a natural starting-point of Christian doctrine; it satisfied the Messianic hopes of the Jewish converts; it was the best consolation and support of the infant Church under persecution; it was essential to the call to repentance which must everywhere precede the divine and positive teaching of the Gospel (Acts xvii. 30, 31).—III. The occasion of this Epistle was as follows: St. Paul had twice attempted to revisit Thessalonica, and both times had been disappointed. Thus prevented from seeing them in person, he had sent Timothy to inquire and report to him as to their condition (1 Th. iii. 1–5). Timothy returned with most favorable tidings, reporting not only their progress in Christian faith and practice, but also their strong attachment to their old teacher (iii. 6–10). This Epistle is the outpouring of the apostle's gratitude on receiving this welcome news. At the same time the report of Timothy was not unmixed with alloy. There were certain features in the condition of the Thessalonian Church which called for St. Paul's interference, and to which he addresses himself in his letter. (1.) The very intensity of their Christian faith, dwelling too exclusively on the day of the Lord's coming, had been attended with evil consequences (iv. 11; comp. 2 Th. ii. 1, iii. 6, 11, 12). On the other hand, a theoretical difficulty had been felt. Certain members of the Church had died, and there was great anxiety lest they should be excluded from any share in the glories of the Lord's advent (1 Th. iv. 13–18). (2.) The Thessalonians needed consolation and encouragement under persecution (ii. 14, iii. 2–4). (3.) An unhealthy state of feeling with regard to spiritual gifts was manifesting itself (v. 19, 20). (4.) There was the danger, which they shared with most Gentile churches, of relapsing into their old heathen profligacy (iv. 4–8).—IV. Yet the condition of the Thessalonian Church was highly satisfactory, and the most cordial relations existed between St. Paul and his converts there. This honorable distinction it shares with the other great Church of Macedonia, that of Philippi (comp. Phil.).—V. A comparison of the narrative in the Acts with the allusions in this and 2 Th. is instructive. Passing over patent coincidences, we may single out one of a more subtle and delicate kind. It arises out of the form which the accusation brought against St. Paul and his companions at Thessalonica takes in Acts xvii. 7; "All these do contrary to the decrees of Cesar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus." The allusions in the Epistles to the Thessalonians enable us to understand the ground of this accusation. It appears that the kingdom of Christ had entered largely into his oral teaching in this city, as it does into that of the Epistles themselves (1 Th. i. 10, iv. 6; 2 Th. ii. 5). On the other hand, the language of these Epistles diverges from the narrative of St. Luke on two or three points in such a way as to establish the independence of the two accounts, and even to require some explanation. (1.) The first of these relates to the composition of the Church of Thessalonica. In 1 Th. i. 9, 10 St. Paul addresses his readers distinctly as Gentiles, who had been converted from idolatry to the Gospel. In Acts xvii. 4 we are told that "some (of the Jews) believed . . . and of the devout Greeks (i. e. proselytes) a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few." Even if we retain the common reading ("devout Greeks;" some read "devout ones [i. e. proselytes] and Greeks"), the account of St. Luke does not exclude a number of believers converted directly from heathendom. Both convey the impression that the Gospel made but little progress with the Jews themselves. (2.) In 1 Th. ii. 14 the persecutors of the Thessalonian Christians are represented as their fellow-countrymen, whereas in Acts xvii. 5 the Jews are regarded as the bitterest opponents of the faith. This is fairly met by Paley, who points out that the Jews were the instigators of the persecution, which, however, they were powerless of themselves to carry out without aid from the heathen. (3.) The narrative of St. Luke appears to state that St. Paul remained only three weeks at Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 2), whereas in the Epistle, though there is no direct mention of the length of his residence amongst them, the whole language (1 Th. i. 4, ii. 4-11) points to a much longer period. In the Acts it is stated simply that for three Sabbath days St. Paul taught in the synagogue. The silence of the writer does not exclude, but his success rather implies, subsequent labor among the Gentile population. (4.) The notices of the movements of Silas and Timotheus in the two documents do not accord at first sight. In the Acts St. Paul is conveyed away secretly from Berea to escape the Jews. Arrived at Athens, he sends to Silas and Timothy, whom he had left behind at Berea, urging them to join him as soon as possible (Acts xvii. 14-16). It is evident from the language of St. Luke that the apostle expects them to join him at Athens. Yet we hear nothing more of them for some time, when at length after St. Paul had passed on to Corinth, and several incidents had occurred since his arrival there, we are told that Silas and Timotheus came from Macedonia (xviii. 5). From the First Epistle, on the other hand, we gather the following facts. St. Paul there tells us that they (i. e. himself, and probably Silas), no longer able to endure the suspense, "consented to be left alone at Athens, and sent Timothy their brother" to Thessalonica (1 Th. iii. 1, 2). Timothy returned with good news (iii. 6) (whether to Athens or Corinth does not appear), and when the two Epistles to the Thessalonians were written, both Timothy and Silas were with St. Paul (1 Th. i. 1; 2 Th. i. 1; comp. 2 Cor. i. 19). Now, we may suppose either that (a) Timotheus was dispatched to Thessalonica, not from Athens, but from Berea. In this case Timotheus would take up Silas somewhere in Macedonia on his return, and the two would join St. Paul in company; not, however, at Athens, but later on at Corinth, some delay having arisen. Or (b) Timotheus and Silas did join the apostle at Athens, where we learn from the Acts that he was expecting them. From Athens he dispatched Timotheus to Thessalonica, so that he and Silas had to forego the services of their fellow-laborer for a time. This mission is mentioned in the Epistle, but not in the Acts. Subsequently he sends Silas on some other mission, not recorded either in the history or the Epistle; probably to another Macedonian Church, e. g. Philippi (comp. 2 Cor. xi. 9; Phil. iv. 14-16). Silas and Timotheus returned together from Macedonia and joined the apostle at Corinth.—VI. This Epistle is rather practical than doctrinal. It was suggested rather by personal feeling, than by any urgent need, which might have formed a centre of unity, and impressed a distinct character on the whole. Under these circumstances we need not expect to trace unity of purpose, or a continuous argument, and any analysis must be more or less artificial. The body of the Epistle, however, may be conveniently divided into two parts, the former of which, extending over the first three chapters, is chiefly taken up with a retrospect of the apostle's relation to his Thessalonian converts, and an explanation of his present circumstances and feelings, while the latter, comprising the fourth and fifth chapters, contains some seasonable exhortations. At the close of each of these divisions is a prayer, commencing with the same words, "May God Himself," &c., and expressed in somewhat similar language. The Epistle closes with personal injunctions and a benediction (v. 25-26).—VII. The external evidence in favor of the genuineness of 1 Th. is chiefly negative, but important. There is no trace that it was ever disputed at any age or in any section of the Church, or even by any individual, till the present century. On the other hand, the allusions to it in writers before the close of the second century are confessedly faint and uncertain. The Epistle was included in the Old Latin and Syriac Versions, is found in the Canon of the Muratorian fragment, and was also contained in that of Marcion. Toward the close of the second century, from Irenæus downward, we find this Epistle directly quoted and ascribed to St. Paul. The evidence derived from the character of the Epistle itself—its style and matter—is so strong that it may fairly be called irresistible. In regard to the matter, (1.) The firmness and delicacy of touch with which the apostle's relations toward his Thessalonian converts are drawn, are quite beyond the reach of the clumsy forgeries of the early Church; and (2.) the writer uses language which, however it may be explained (see the next article), is certainly colored by the anticipation of the speedy advent of the Lord. Such a position would be an anachronism in a writer of the second century. The genuineness of this Epistle was first questioned by Schrader, who was followed by Baur. The following is a summary of Baur's arguments: (i) He attributes great weight to the general character of the Epistle, the difference of style, and especially the absence of distinctive Pauline doctrines (see II. above). (ii.) In the mention of the "wrath" overtaking the Jewish people (ii. 16), Baur sees an allusion to the destruction of Jerusalem, and, therefore, a proof of the later date of the Epistle (see the next article; MIRACLES; PROPHECY). (iii.) He urges the contradictions to the account in the Acts (see V. above). (iv.) He discovers references to the Acts, which show that the Epistle was written later. But the coincidences are subtle and incidental, and the points of divergence and apparent contradictions are so numerous as to preclude the supposition of copying, and evince the independence of the Epistle. (v.) He supposes passages in this Epistle to have been borrowed from the acknowledged letters of St. Paul. The resemblances, however, which he points out are not greater than, or indeed so great as, those in other Epistles, and bear no traces of imitation. BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; NEW TESTAMENT.

Thes-sa-lo-ni-ans (see above), Second Epistle to the. I. This Epistle appears to have been written from Corinth not very long after the First (see the preceding article), for Silvanus and Timotheus were still with St. Paul (2 Th. i. 1). In the former letter we saw chiefly the outpouring of strong personal affection, occasioned by the renewal of the apostle's intercourse with the Thessalonians, and the doctrinal and hortatory portions are there subordinate. In the Second Epistle, on the other hand, his leading motive seems to have been the desire of correcting errors in the Church of Thessalonica. We notice two points especially which call forth his rebuke. First, it seems that the anxious expectation of the Lord's advent, instead of subsiding, had gained ground since the writing of the First Epistle. They now looked on this great crisis as imminent, and their daily business was neglected in consequence. Expressions in 1 Th., taken by themselves, might seem to favor this view; and at all events such was falsely represented to be the apostle's doctrine. He now writes to soothe this restless spirit and quell their apprehensions by showing that many things must happen first, and that the end was not yet, referring to his oral teaching at Thessalonica in confirmation of this statement (2 Th. ii. 1-12, iii. 6-12). Secondly, the apostle had also a personal ground of complaint. His authority was not denied by any, but it was tampered with, and an unauthorized use was made of his name. Designing men might misrepresent his teaching either by suppressing what he actually had written or said, or by forging letters and in other ways representing him as teaching what he had not taught. St. Paul's language hints in different places at both these modes of false dealing (compare 1 Th. v. 27). Two passages allude to these misrepresentations of his teaching. In the first he tells them in vague language, "not to be troubled either by spirit or by word or by letter, as coming from us, as if the day of the Lord were at hand" (2 Th. ii. 2, 3). In the second he says, "The salvation of Paul with mine own hand, which is a token in every Epistle: so I write" (iii. 17)—evidently a precaution against forgery. It will be seen then that the teaching of the Second Epistle is corrective of, or rather supplemental to, that of the First, and therefore presupposes it (ii. 15).—II. This Epistle, in the range of subject as well as in style and general character, closely resembles the First (see the preceding article). The structure also is somewhat similar, the main body of the Epistle being divided into two parts in the same way, and each part closing with a prayer (ii. 16, 17, iii. 16). The first part, after the salutation (i. 1, 2), consists of a general expression of thankfulness and interest, leading up to the difficulty about the Lord's Advent (i. 3-ii. 17): the second part consists of direct exhortation (iii. 1-16). The Epistle ends with a special direction and benediction (iii. 17, 18).—III. The external evidence in favor of the Second Epistle is somewhat more definite than that in favor of the First. It seems to be referred to in one or two passages of Polycarp; and the language in which Justin Martyr speaks of the Man of Sin is so similar that it can scarcely be independent of this Epistle. The Second Epistle, like the First, is found in the Canons of the Syriac and Old Latin Versions, and in those of the Muratorian fragment and of Marcion; is quoted expressly and by name by Irenæus and others at the close of the second century, and was universally received by the Church. The internal character of the Epistle, too, as in the former case, bears the strongest testimony to its Pauline origin. Its genuineness, in fact, was never questioned until the beginning of the present century. It has been rejected by some modern critics who acknowledge 1 Th. to be genuine. The apocalyptic passage (2 Th. ii. 1-12) is the great stumbling-block. It has been objected to, either as alluding to events subsequent to St. Paul's death, e. g. the Neronian persecution; or as betraying religious views derived from the Montanism of the second century; or lastly, as contradicting St. Paul's anticipations expressed elsewhere, especially in the First Epistle, of the near approach of the Lord's Advent.—IV. The most striking feature in the Epistle is this apocalyptic passage, announcing the revelation of the "Man of Sin" (ii. 1-12), and it will not be irrelevant to investigate its meaning.—(1.) The passage speaks of a great apostasy which is to usher in the advent of Christ, the great judgment. There are three prominent figures in the picture, Christ, Antichrist, and the Restrainer. The "mystery of lawlessness" (A. V. "iniquity;" SIN) is already at work. At present it is checked by the Restrainer; but the check will be removed, and then it will break out in all its violence. Then Christ will appear.—(2.) Many different explanations have been offered of this passage. By one class of interpreters it has been referred to circumstances which passed within the circle of the apostle's own experience. Others, again, have seen in it the prediction of a crisis yet to be realized, the end of all things. The former of these, the Preterists, have identified the "Man of Sin" with divers historical characters—with Caligula, Nero, Titus, Simon Magus, Simon son of Giora, the high-priest Ananias, &c., and have sought for an historical counterpart to the Restrainer in like manner. The latter, the Futurists, have also given various accounts of the ANTICHRIST, the mysterious power of evil which is already working. To Protestants, e. g., it is the Papacy; to the Greek Church, Mohammedanism.—(3.) Now, in arbitrating between the Preterists and the Futurists, we are led by the analogy of other prophetic announcements, as well as by the language of the passage itself, to take a middle course (so Prof. Lightfoot, original author of this article). Neither is wholly right, and yet both are to a certain extent right. It is the special characteristic of prophecy to speak of the distant future through the present and immediate. Following the analogy of the older prophets and of our Lord himself (OLD TESTAMENT B; PROPHECY), we may agree with the Preterists that St. Paul is referring to events which fell under his own cognizance; for, indeed, the Restrainer is said to be restraining now, and the mystery of iniquity to be already working: while at the same time we may accept the Futurist view that the apostle is describing the end of all things, and that, therefore, the prophecy has not yet received its most striking and complete fulfilment — (4.) If this view be correct, it remains to inquire what particular adversary of the Gospel, and what particular restraining influence, St. Paul may have had in view. But, before attempting an explanation, we may lay down two rules. First. The imagery of the passage must be interpreted mainly by itself, and by the circumstances of the time. The great adversary in the Revelation seems to be the Roman power; but it may be widely different here. There were even in the apostolic age "many Antichrists;" and we cannot be sure that the ANTICHRIST present to the mind of St. Paul was the same with the Antichrist contemplated by St. John. Secondly. In all figurative passages it is arbitrary to assume that a person is denoted where we find a personification. Thus the "Man of Sin" here need not be an individual man; it may be a body of men, or a power, a spiritual influence.—(5.) Now we find that the chief opposition to the Gospel, and especially to St. Paul's preaching at this time arose from the Jews (compare the preceding article). It seems on the whole probable that the ANTICHRIST is represented especially by Judaism, and that the Roman Empire is the restraining power. It was to Roman justice and Roman magistrates that the apostle had recourse at this time to shield him from the enmity of the Jews, and to check their violence (Acts xvi. 37 f., xvii. 6 ff., xviii. 12 ff.; APPEAL; CITIZEN). It was only at a later date, under Nero, that Rome became the antagonist of Christendom, and then she also, in turn, was fitly portrayed by St. John as the type of Antichrist. Thes-sa-lo-ni-ca (L. fr. Gr., see below), a maritime city of MACEDONIA; originally named Therma, and situated on the Thermaic Gulf, now the Gulf of Salonica. The city rose into importance with the decay of Greek nationality. Cassander, the son of Antipater, rebuilt and enlarged it, and named it after his wife Thessalonica, the sister of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, whose name commemorated in Greek a victory over the Thessalonians which her father (PHILIP 1) obtained on the day when he heard of her birth (so Dr. Howson, original author of this article). The name, ever since, under various slight modifications, has been continuous, and the city has never ceased to be eminent. It is now known as Saloniki or Salonica, and is still the most important town of European Turkey, next after Constantinople. Under the Romans, when MACEDONIA was divided into four governments, Thessalonica was the capital of the second; afterward, when the whole was consolidated into one province, this city became practically the metropolis. It was made a "free city" (ROMAN EMPIRE; and see below), and in the first and second centuries A. C. was the most populous city in Macedonia. ST. PAUL visited it (with Silas and Timothy) during his second missionary journey, and thus Christianity was introduced into Thessalonica.

Three circumstances illustrate in an important manner this visit and this journey as well as the Two Epistles to the Thessalonians:—(1.) This was the chief station on the great Roman Road, called the Egnatian Way, which connected Rome with ANTI-NOPIA, APOLLONIA, NEAPOLIS, PHILIPPI, and the whole region N. of the Egean Sea. (2.) Placed on this great Road, in connection with other important Roman ways, and being also a great emporium of trade by sea, Thessalonica was an invaluable centre for the spread of the Gospel (1 Th. i. 8). It was nearly, if not quite, on a level with COMSTON and EPHESUS in its share of the commerce of the Levant. (3.) The circumstance (Acts xvii. 1) that here was the synagogue of the Jews in this part of Macedonia, had evidently much to do with the apostle's plans, and also doubtless with his success. Trade would inevitably bring Jews to Thessalonica; and

It is remarkable that, ever since, they have had a prominent place in the annals of the city. In the fifteenth century there was a great influx of Jews from SPAIN. The Jewish quarter is in the south-eastern part of the town.<sup>1</sup> The first scene of the apostle's work at Thessalonica was the synagogue (xvii. 2, 3). His ministrations among the Jews continued for three weeks (ver. 2), but probably he remained longer in the city (ver. 5-10; 1 Th. i. 6, ii. 2, 14, 15, iii. 3, 4; 2 Th. i. 4-7; JASON). He was certainly there again on his missionary journey, both in going and returning (Acts xx. 1-3). Possibly he was also there again, after his liberation from his first imprisonment (Phil. i. 25, 26, ii. 24; 1 Tim. i. 3; 2 Tim. iv. 13; Tit. iii. 12). A flourishing Church was formed there: and the Existles show that its elements were much more Gentile than Jewish (1 Th. i. 9; ARISTARCHUS; DEMAS; GAIUS [Acts xix. 29]; JASON; SECUNDUS). The narrative in the Acts affords a singularly accurate illustration of the political constitution of Thessalonica. Not only is "the people" mentioned (Gr. dēmos, Acts xvii. 5) in harmony with its being a "free city," but the peculiar title (Gr. pl. politarchai = politarchs, or, as in the A. V., "rulers of the city," ver. 6) of the chief magistrates. This term occurs in no other writing; but it may be read to this day conspicuously on an arch of the early Imperial times, which spans the main street of the city, and from which it appears that the number of politarchs was seven. The arch just mentioned (called the Vardār gate) is at the western extremity of the town. At its eastern extremity is another Roman arch of later date, and probably commemorating some victory of Constantine. The main street, which both these arches cross, and which intersects the city from E. to W., is undoubtedly the line of the Egnatian Way.—Thessalonica, during several centuries, was the bulwark, not simply of the later Greek Empire (ROMAN EMPIRE), but of Oriental Christendom, and was largely instrumental in the conversion of the Slavonians and Bulgarians. Thus it received the designation of "the Orthodox City;" and its struggles are very prominent in the writings of the Byzantine historians. It was taken by the Saracens A. D. 904, by the Crusaders 1185, and by the Turks, under Amurath II., in 1430.

Then dōs (Gr. = Theodore, i. e. gift of God [so Pott, &c.], but in N. T. probably fr. Syr. or Heb. = acknowledgment, confession, thanksgiving [so Sonntag, Prof. Hackett, &c.]), an insurgent mentioned in Gamaliel's speech before the Jewish council (Acts v. 35-39) at the time of the arraignment of the apostles. He appeared, according to St. Luke's account, at the head of about four hundred men, but was slain and his party annihilated. Josephus speaks of a Theudas who played a similar part in the time of Claudius, about A. D. 44, i. e. some ten or twelve years at least later than the delivery of Gamaliel's speech; and since Luke places his Theudas, in the order of time, before JUDAS OF GALILEE, who made his appearance soon after the dethronement of Archelaus, i. e. A. D. 6 or 7, it has been charged that the writer of the Acts either fabricated the speech put into the mouth of Gamaliel, or has wrought into it a transaction which took place thirty years or more after the time when it is said to have occurred.

But either of the two following solutions of the difficulty fulfils every reasonable requisition, and both must be disproved before Luke can be justly charged with having committed an anachronism in this passage (so Prof. Hackett, original author of this article): (1.) Since Luke represents Theudas as having preceded Judas the Galilean, he could not have appeared later, at all events, than the latter part of the reign of Herod the Great. Now, the very year of that monarch's death was remarkably turbulent; the land was overrun by insurrectionary chiefs or fanatics. Josephus mentions but three of these disturbers by name; he passes over the others with a general allusion. Among those whom the Jewish historian has omitted to name, may have been the Theudas whom Gamaliel cites (so Lardner, Bengel, Kuinoel, Olshausen, Anger, Winer, &c.). The name was not uncommon (Winer). (2.) Another explanation (essentially different only as proposing to identify the person) is, Luke's Theudas may have been one of the three insurgents whose names are mentioned by Josephus in connection with the disturbances which took place about the time of Herod's death. Sonntag ably maintains this view, and argues that the Theudas referred to by Gamaliel is the individual whom Josephus mentions as Simon, a slave of Herod, who attempted to make himself king, and died a violent death.

* THIS. DEPOSIT; PUNISHMENTS; ROBBERY; THIEVES, THE TWO.

Thieves, the Two. The men who under this name appear in the history of the crucifixion (Mat. xxvii. 38, 44; Mk. xv. 37, 42; co np. Lk. xliii. 32-43; Jn. xix. 18, 31 ff.) were robbers (Gr. lēstai; ROBBERY) rather than thieves (Gr. kleptai), belonging to the lawless bands by which Palestine was at that time and afterward infested. Against these brigands every Roman procurator had to wage continual war. (JERUSALEM.) It was necessary to use an armed police to encounter them (Lk. xxii. 52). Of the previous history of the two who suffered on Golgotha we know nothing. They had been tried and condemned, and were waiting their execution before our Lord was accused. It is probable enough, as the death of BARABBAS was clearly expected at the same time, that they had taken part in his insurrection, and had expected to die with him. They find themselves crucified with JESUS OF NAZARETH. (CROSS; CRUCIFIXION; JESUS CHRIST; PUNISHMENTS.) They could hardly fail to have heard something of his fame as a prophet, of his triumphal entry as a king. They catch at first the prevailing tone of scorn. But over one of them came a change. He looked back upon his past life, and saw an infinite evil. He looked to the man dying on the cross beside him, and saw an infinite compassion. There indeed was one unlike all other "kings of the Jews," whom the robber had ever known. Such a one must be all that He had claimed to be. To be forgotten by that King seems to him now the most terrible of all punishments; to take part in the triumph of His return, the most blessed of all hopes. The yearning prayer was answered, not in the letter, but in the spirit. "To-day shalt thou be with Me in PARADISE."—The simplest and truest way of looking at this history has been that of those who have seen in the "dying thief" the first great typical instance that "a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law" (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article). Bengel finds in the Lord's words to him an indication that the penitent thief was a Gentile, the impenitent a Jew, and that thus the scene on Calvary was typical of the position of the two Churches. Stier reads in the words of reproof the language of one who had all along listened with grief and horror to the revellings of the multitude, the burst of an indignation previously suppressed. The Apocryphal Gospels give his name as Demas or Dismas, and make him the first of all mankind to enter Paradise. "St. Dismas" has been canonized in the Syrian, Greek, and Latin Churches.

Thim'na-thi'h (fr. Heb. Timnathah = TIMNAH, Ges.), a city named between Elon and Ekron, regarded by Gesenius, Robinson, &c., as = TIMNAH 1.

This'be (Gr. Thisbé or Thibé), a city of Naphtali from which Tobit's ancestor had been carried captive by the Assyrians (Tob. i. 2 only); maintained by some interpreters to be the native place of ELIJAH the TISHBITE; not identified.

This'tie [this's]. THORNS and THISTLES.

Thom'as [tom-] (Gr. fr. Heb. tóm, tómá = twin; see below), one of the apostles. (APOSTLE.) According to Eusebius (H. E. i. 13), his real name was Judas. This may have been a mere confusion with Thaddeus, who is mentioned in the extract. But it may also be that Thomas was a surname (so Dean Stanley, original author of this article). The word Thómá means a twin; and so it is translated in Jn. xi. 16, xxi. 2 (Gr. ho didymos, A. V. "DIDYMUS"). Out of this name has grown the tradition that he had a twin-sister, Lydia, or that he was a twin-brother of our Lord; which last, again, would confirm his identification with Judas (comp. Mat. xiii. 55). He is said to have been born at Antioch. In the catalogue of the apostles he is coupled with Matthew (Mat. x. 3; Mk. iii. 18; Lk. vi. 15) and with Philip (Acts i. 13). All that we know of him is derived from the Gospel of St. John; and this amounts to three traits, presenting his character as that of a man slow to believe, seeing all the difficulties of a case, subject to despondency, viewing things on the darker side, and yet full of ardent love for his Master. The first trait is his speech when our Lord determined to face the dangers that awaited Him in Judea on His journey to Bethany. Thomas said to his fellow-disciples, "Let us also go, that we may die with Him" (Jn. xi. 16). The second was his speech during the Last Supper. "Thomas saith unto Him, Lord, we know not whither Thou goest, and how can we know the way" (xiv. 5). It was the prosaic, incredulous doubt as to moving a step in the unseen future, and yet an eager inquiry to know how this step was to be taken. The third was after the Resurrection. He was absent—possibly by accident, perhaps characteristically—from the first assembly when Jesus had appeared. The others told him what they had seen. He broke forth into an exclamation, the terms of which convey to us at once the vehemence of his doubt, and the vivid picture that his mind retained of his Master's form as he had last seen Him lifeless on the cross. "Except I shall see in His hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into His side, I will not believe" (xx. 25). On the eighth day he was with them at their gathering, perhaps in expectation of a recurrence of the visit of the previous week; and Jesus stood amongst them. He uttered the same salutation, "Peace be unto you;" and then turning to Thomas, as if this had been the special object of His appearance, uttered the words which convey as strongly the sense of condemnation and tender reproof as those of Thomas had shown the sense of hesitation and doubt, "Reach hither thy finger, and behold My hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into My side; and be not faithless, but believing." The effect on Thomas is immediate. The conviction produced by the removal of his doubt became deeper and stronger than that of any of the other apostles. The words in which he expressed his belief contain a far higher assertion of his Master's divine nature than is contained in any other expression used by apostolic lips, "My Lord, and my God." The answer of our Lord sums up the moral of the whole narrative: "Because thou hast seen Me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen Me, and yet have believed" (xx. 29). In the N. T. we hear of Thomas only twice again, once on the Sea of Galilee with the seven disciples, where he is named next after Peter (xxi. 2), and again in the assemblage of the apostles after the Ascension (Acts i. 13). The earlier traditions, as believed in the fourth century, represent him as preaching in Parthia or Persia, and as finally buried at Edessa. The later traditions make him founder of the Christian Church in Malabar, still called "the Christians of St. Thomas;" and his tomb is shown in the neighborhood. This, however, is now usually regarded as arising from a confusion with a later Thomas, a missionary from the Nestorians. His martyrdom (whether in Persia or India) is said to have been occasioned by a lance; and is commemorated by the Latin Church on December 21, by the Greek Church on October 6, and by the Indians on July 1. The "Gospel of Thomas" (chiefly relating to the Infancy), and "Acts of Thomas," are apocryphal.

Thom'o-l (Gr.) = THAMAH or TAMAH (1 Esd. v. 32).

Thorns and This'ties. There appear to be eighteen or twenty Hebrew words which point to different kinds of prickly or thorny shrubs, and are variously rendered in the A. V. "thorns," "briers," "thistles,"

"brambles," &c. We shall confine our remarks (so Mr. Houghton) to some of the most important names, and those which seem to afford some slight indications as to the plants they denote.—1. Heb. dād occurs as the name of some spinous plant in Judg. ix. 14, 15 (A. V. "bramble," marg. "thistle"), and in Ps. lviii. 9 (Heb. 10, A. V. "thorns"). The plant in question is supposed to be Lycium Europæum or Lycium Afrum (box-thorn), both of which species occur in Palestine. The Arabic name of this plant is identical with the Hebrew. Lycium Europæum (European box-thorn) is a native of the S. of Europe and the N. of Africa; in the Grecian islands it is common in hedges.—2. Heb. hēdek or chēdek occurs in Prov. xv. 19 (A. V. "thorns"), and in Mic. vii. 4 (A. V. "brier"). Celsius, referring the Hebrew to the Ar. Chadak, is of opinion that some spinous species of Solanum is intended. The Arabic term = some kind of Solanum, either the Solanum melongela, variety esculentum (Egg-plant) or the Solanum Sodomæum (apple of Sodom); but it is hardly probable that these are meant by the Hebrew word, which denotes any thorny plant suitable for hedges.—3. Heb. hōah or chōach denotes some thorny plant (A.

V. "thickets," 1 Sam. xiii. 6: "thistle," 2 K. xiv. 9 twice; 2 Chr. xxv. 18 twice; Job. xxxi. 40: "thorn," 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11; Job xli. 2 [xl. 26 Heb.]; Prov. xxvi. 9; Cant. ii. 2; Hos. ix. 6: "brambles," Is. xxxiv. 13). Celsius believes the blackthorn (Prunus sylvestris) is denoted; but from Job xxxi. 40—A. V. "Let thistles grow instead of wheat"—it is probable that some thorny weed of quick growth is intended. Perhaps the term is used in a wide sense to signify any thorny plant.—4. Heb. dardar (A. V. "thistle") is mentioned twice with Heb. kōts (A. V. "thorn"), viz. in Gen. iii. 18, and Hos. x. 8. The Gr. tribolos (in LXX. for dardar) occurs in Mat. vii. 16 (A. V. "thistle") and Heb. vi. 8 (A. V. "brier"). Probably the Tribulus terrestris (caltrop), which, however, is not a spiny or thorny plant, but has spines on the fruit, or else the Centaurea calcitrapa (star-thistle), is the plant more particularly intended by dardar.—5. Heb. shānīr (A. V. "briers") is almost always found with Heb. shayith (Is. v. 6, vii. 23–25, ix. 18 [Heb. 17], x. 17, xxvii. 4), once with Heb. kōts (xxxii. 13): it is variously rendered by the LXX. (ANAMANT.) According to Abu'lfaḍl, cited by Celsius, "the Samur of the Arabs is a thorny tree; it is a species of Sidra which does not produce fruit." No thorny plants are more conspicuous in Palestine and the Bible Lands than different kinds of Rhamnaceæ (buckthorns), such as Paliurus aculeatus (Christ's Thorn), and Zizyphus Spina Christi; this latter plant is the nebk of the Arabs, a shrub or tree which grows abundantly in Syria and Palestine. The Heb. naṭṭūn (A. V. "thorn") of Is. vii. 19, lv. 13, probably denotes some species of Zizyphus. The "CROWN OF THORNS" which was put in derision upon our Lord's head just before His crucifixion, was probably composed of the plant thorny twigs of the nebk (Zizyphus Spina Christi) mentioned above; being common everywhere, they could readily be procured. Still, as Rosenmüller remarks, "there being so many kinds of thorny plants in Palestine, all conjectures must remain uncertain." Although it is not possible to fix on any one definite Hebrew word as the representative of any one kind of "thistle," this plant is doubtless sometimes alluded to, as thistles of various species (Caranus, Ononis) are numerous in Palestine, and often of prodigious size. Hasselquist thinks the rest-harrow (Ononis spinosa), a troublesome thorny plant, which often covers entire fields and plains both in Egypt and Palestine, is referred to in some parts of the Scriptures. Thorns and briars grow so luxuriantly in some parts of Palestine that they must be burned off always before the plough can operate (Thn. ii. 5, 28). Thomson (i. 81) says, thorns are cut up only for burning in the lime-kiln (comp. Is. xxxiii. 12); but are set on fire where they grow, if they are merely to be destroyed. BUSH; PALESTINE, Botany; PAUL.

Thra'ci-a [-she-a] (L. fr. Gr. Thraké; fr. TIRAS, so Bochart, &c.), usually called Thrace [pronounced thræ in one syllable] in our language. A Thracian horseman is incidentally mentioned in 2 Mc. xli. 35, apparently one of the body-guard of Gorgias, governor of Idumea under Antiochus Epiphanes. Thrace at this period included the whole of the country within the boundary of the Strymon, the Danube, and the coasts of the Ægean, Propontis, and Euxine—all the region of European Turkey, now comprehended in Bulgaria and Roumelia. In the early times it was inhabited by a number of fierce predatory tribes, each under its own chief; but, at the Peloponnesian war, Sitalces, king of the Odrææ, had acquired the predominant power in the country. In the wars after the death of Alexander the Great the Thracians found a demand for their services as mercenaries everywhere. They furnished cavalry chiefly, the rich pastures of Roumelia abounding in horses. In Gen. x. 2, TIRAS has by some been supposed to mean Thrace.

Thra-sé-as (fr. Gr.), father of APOLLONIUS 1 (2 Mc. iii. 5).

? Three. NUMBER.

Three Taverns (fr. L. Tres Tabernæ; probably named from three inns or eating-houses for travellers), a station on the Appian Road, along which St. PAUL travelled from PUTEOLI to ROME (Acts xxviii. 15). The distances southward from Rome are given in the Antonine Itinerary, "to Aricia, sixteen miles; to Three Taverns, seventeen miles; to APPII FORUM, ten miles;" hence "Three Taverns" must have been near the modern Cisterna. Just at this point a road came in from Antium on the coast. There is no doubt that "Three Taverns" was a frequent meeting-place of travellers. Here St. Paul met a group of Christians who had come from Rome to meet him.

Threshold. AGRICULTURE.

Threshold (Heb. miphlán, saph) = a door-sill; a piece of timber, stone, or other material under a door or entrance (Judg. xix. 27; 1 Sam. v. 4, 5, &c.). GATE; HOUSE; LINTEL; POST I.

Thresholds, the, the A. V. translation of Heb. duppéy (construct state of duppim; see ASUPPIM). In Neh. xii. 25 the A. V. has "the thresholds (margin 'or treasuries, or assemblies') of the gates" (Heb. duppéy hash-khe 'ár.m); Gesenius, Fürst, &c., translate the store-chambers of the gates. ASUPPIM.

Throne (Heb. cissé; Gr. thronos). The Hebrew and Greek terms = any elevated seat occupied by a person in authority, whether a high-priest (1 Sam. i. 9, A. V. "seat"), a judge (Ps. cxxii. 5), or a military chief (Jer. i. 15). The use of a chair in a country where the usual postures were squatting and reclining (FURNITURE; HOUSE; MEALS) was at ship were costly: Solomon's was of "ivory," "overlaid with gold," i. e. where the ivory did not appear. It was furnished with arms or "stays." The steps were also lined with pairs of lions. As to the form of the chair, we are only informed in 1 K. x. 19 that "the top was round behind." The king sat on his throne on state occasions, arrayed in his royal robes. The throne was the symbol of supreme power and dignity (Gen. xli. 40). Similarly, "to sit upon the throne," implied the exercise of regal power (Deut. xvii. 18; 1 K. xvi. 11). "Thrones" in Col. i. 16 = (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) potentates or higher powers in general, earthly or celestial (i. e. Archangels; ANGELS).

Thum'mim. URIM AND THUMMIM.

Thun'der (Heb. ra'am; Gr. bronté) and LIGHTNING are extremely rare during the summer months in Palestine and the adjacent countries. From the middle of April to the middle of September it is hardly ever heard. Hence it was selected by Samuel as a striking expression of the divine displeasure toward the Israelites (1 Sam. xii. 17). In the poetic language of the Hebrews, thunder was the voice of Jehovah (Job xxxvii. 2, 4, 5, xl. 9; Ps. xviii. 13, xxix. 8-9; Is. xxx. 30, 31), who dwelt behind the thunder-cloud (Ps. lxxxi. 7). Thunder was the symbol of Divine power (xxix. 3, &c.) and vengeance (1 Sam. ii. 10; 2 Sam. xxii. 14, &c.). HAIL; PALESTINE, Climatic; PLAGUES, THE TEN, 7; RAIN; WHIRLWIND, &c.

Thy-a-t'ra (L. fr. Gr.; named [so Stephen of Byzantium] by Seleucus Nicator on the birth of his daughter [Gr. thugatér]), a city on the Lycus, founded by Seleucus Nicator, king of SYRIA; one of the many Macedonian colonies established in Asia Minor after the destruction of the Persian Empire by Alexander. It lay to the left of the road from Pergamos to Sardis, on the southern incline of the watershed which separates the valley of the Caicus (Bakyrtska) from that of the Ilcrmus, on the confines of Mysia and Ionia, sometimes reckoned in one, sometimes in the other. In earlier times it had borne the names of Peleopia, Semiramia, and Euhippia. At the Christian era, the Macedonian element so preponderated as to give a distinctive character to the population. The original inhabitants had probably been distributed in hamlets round about, when Thyatira was founded. During the continuance of the Attalic dynasty (PERGAMOS), Thyatira scarcely appears in history; and of the various inscriptions found on the site, now called Ak Hisar,<sup>1</sup> not one unequivocally belongs to earlier times than those of the Roman Empire. The prosperity of the city seems to have received a new impulse under Vespasian (about A. D. 70). Dyeing apparently formed an important part of the industrial activity of Thyatira, as of that of Colosse and Laodicea (Acts xvi. 14; COLORS; DRESS; LYDIA). The principal deity of the city was Apollo, worshipped as the sun-god under the surname Tyrimnas, and no doubt introduced by the Macedonian colonists. (IDOLATRY.) A priestess of all times regarded as a symbol of dignity (2 K. iv. 10; Prov. ix. 14). "The throne of the kingdom" = royal dignity (Deut. xvii. 18; 1 K. i. 46; 2 Chr. vii. 18, &c.). The characteristic feature in the royal throne was its elevation: Solomon's throne was approached by six steps (1 K. x. 19; 2 Chr. ix. 18); and Jehovah's throne is described as "high and lifted up" (Is. vi. 1). The materials and workman-

Artemis (DIANA) is also mentioned in the inscriptions. Another superstition, which existed at Thyatira, seems to have been brought thither by some of the corrupted Jews of the dispersed tribes. A fane stood outside the walls, dedicated to

Sambatha—a sibyl sometimes called Chaldean, sometimes Jewish, sometimes Persian—in the midst of an enclosure designated “the Chaldean’s court.” This seems to illustrate “the prophetic” (“JEZEBEL”) in Rev. ii. 20, 21, which Grotius interprets of the wife of the bishop. In Thyatira there was a great amalgamation of races. But amalgamation of different races, in pagan nations, always went together with a syncretism of different religions, every relation of life having its religious sanction. If the sibyl Sambatha was really a Jewess, lending her aid to this proceeding, and not discounteranced by the authorities of the Jewish-Christian Church at Thyatira, both the censure and its qualification become easy of explanation (so Mr. Blakesley, original author of this article).

Thy'ine- [-in] (fr. Gr., named from the pleasant odor given out by the wood as burnt in ancient sacrifices) wood (Rev. xviii. 12 only, margin “sweet” wood) is probably the wood of the Thuya articulata, Desfont., the Callitris quadrivalvis of present botanists, a tree of the cypress tribe, much prized by the ancient Greeks and Romans, on account of the beauty of its wood for tables and various ornamental purposes. By the Romans the tree was called citrus, the wood citrum or citron-wood. It is a native of Barbary, and grows to the height of fifteen to twenty-five feet. The roof of the mosque at Cordova is of thyine-wood. Lady Calcott says the wood is dark nut-brown, close-grained, and very fragrant. The resin known by the name of Sandarach is the produce of this tree.

Ti-be'ri-as (Gr. and L., see below), a city in the time of Christ, on the Sea of Galilee (GENNESARET, SEA OF); first mentioned in the N. T. (Jn. vi. 1, 23, xxi. 1), and then by Josephus, who states that it was built by HEROD ANTIPAS, and was named by him in honor of the Emperor TIBERICUS (so Prof. Hackett, original author of this article). It was probably a new town, and not a restored or enlarged one merely; for “RAKATH” (Josh. xix. 35), said in the Talmud to have occupied the same position, lay in Naphtali, whereas Tiberias appears to have been in Zebulun (Mat. iv. 13). (Compare CHINNERETH and HAMMATH.) Tiberias was the capital of Galilee from its origin until the reign of HEROD AGRIPPA II., who changed the seat of power back again to Sepphoris, where it had been before the founding of the new city. Many of the inhabitants were Greeks and Romans, and foreign customs prevailed there to such an extent as to give offence to the stricter Jews. (HERODIANS.) Herod Antipas built there a palace, race-course, &c. The modern Tubariyeh occupies unquestionably the original site, but with narrower limits than those of the original city. On the shore, about a mile S. of Tubariyeh, are the celebrated warm baths, which the Roman naturalists reckoned among the greatest known curiosities of the world. The space between these baths and the town abounds with traces of ruins, such as the foundations of walls, heaps of stone, blocks of granite, and the like. Tiberias stood anciently as now, on the western shore, about two-thirds of the way between the northern and southern end of the Sea of Galilee. There is a margin or strip of land between the water and the steep hills (which elsewhere in that quarter come down so boldly to the edge of the lake), about two miles long and a quarter of a mile broad, somewhat undulating, but ap-proximating to the character of a plain. Tubariyeh, the modern town, occupies the northern end of this parallelogram, and the Warm Baths the southern extremity; so that the more extended city of the Roman age must have covered all, or nearly all of the peculiar ground whose limits are thus clearly defined. The inhabitants, as of old, draw their subsistence in part from the neighboring lake. (FISU.) The place is four and a half hours from NAZARETH, one hour from Mejdel (MAGDALA?), and thirteen hours, by the shortest route, from Baniās or CESAREA PHILIPPI. It is remarkable that the Gospels give us no information, that the Saviour, who spent so much of His public life in Galilee, ever visited Tiberias (compare Lk. xxiii. 8). Tiberias bore a conspicuous part in the wars between the Jews and the Romans. The Sanhedrim, subsequently to the fall of Jerusalem, after a temporary sojourn at Jamnia and Sephoris, became fixed there about the middle of the second century. Celebrated schools of Jewish learning flourished there through a succession of several centuries. (EDUCATION.) The Mishna was compiled at this place by the great Rabbi Judah Hakkodesh (A. D. 190). (OLD TESTAMENT A, § 1; PHARISEES.) The place passed, under Constantine, into the power of the Christians; and during the Crusades was lost and won repeatedly by the different combatants. Since that time it has been possessed successively by Persians, Arabs, and Turks; and contains now, under the Turkish rule, a mixed population of Mohammedans, Jews, and Christians, variously estimated at from two to four thousand. The Jews are about one-fourth of the whole, and occupy a quarter in the middle of the town near the lake. Tiberias suffered terribly in the EARTHQUAKE of 1837.

Ti-be-ri-as (see above), the Sea of = the Sea of Galilee (Jn. vi. 1, xxi. 1). GENNESARET, SEA OF; TIBERIAS.

Ti-be-ri-us (L.; named from the River Tiber, near which he was born? Schl.), in full, Tiberius Claudius Nero; the second Roman emperor, successor of AUGUSTUS, reigned A. D. 14–87. He was the son of Tiberius Claudius Nero and Livia, and hence a stepson of Augustus. He was born at Rome, November 16th, B. C. 42; distinguished himself as a commander in various wars, evinced talents of a high order as an orator, and an administrator of civil affairs, and even gained the reputation of possessing the sterner virtues of the Roman character. Yet, on being raised to the supreme power, he lived a life of inactivity, sloth, and self-indulgence; he gave up the affairs of state to the vilest favorites, and wallowed in the very kennel of all that is low and debasing (so Prof. Hackett). He was despotic in his government, cruel and vindictive in his disposition. He died at seventy-eight, after a reign of twenty-three years.

Tib'hath (Heb. slaughter, Ges.), a city of Hadad-ezer, king of ZOBAB (1 Chr. xviii. 8); = BETAN.

Tib'ni (Heb. building of Jehovah, Ges.). After ZIMRI burnt himself in his palace, there was a division in the northern kingdom, half of the people following Tibni, the son of Ginath, and half following OMRI (1 K. xvi. 21, 22). Omri was the choice of the army. The struggle between the contending factions lasted four years (compare ver. 15, 23), when "Tibni died," i. e. probably, was slain. ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

Tidal (Heb. fear, veneration, Ges.), a "king of nations" under CHEDORLAOMER (Gen. xiv. 1, 9 only). Prof. Rawlinson regards his name as probably Thurgal (the LXX. has Thargal), which he interprets, from the early Hamitic dialect of the lower Tigris and Euphrates country, as = the great chief. The title "king of nations" he understands as = a chief over various nomadic tribes.

Tiglath-pileser (Heb. fr. Assyrian = lord of the Tigris, Ges.; a loration be to the sun of the Zodiac, i. e. to Nin or Hercules, Oppert; see below). In 1 Chr. v. 26, and 2 Chr. xxviii. 20, the name of this king is written "Tigath-pileser;" but in this form there is a double corruption (so Prof. Rawlinson, original author of this article). The native word reads as Tigulti-pal-taira, for which the Tiglath-pileser of 2 Kings is a fair equivalent. Tiglath-pileser, the second king of Assyria mentioned in Scripture as having come into contact with the Israelites, attacked Samaria in the reign of PEKAH, probably because Pekah withheld his tribute, and, having entered his territories, "took Ijon, and Abel-beth-maachah, and Janoah, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilead, and Galilee, and all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria" (2 K. xv. 29). After his first expedition, a close league was formed between REZIN, king of Syria, and Pekah, having for its special object the humiliation of Judah. At first great successes were gained by Pekah and his confederate (xv. 37; 2 Chr. xxviii. 6-8); but, on their proceeding to attack Jerusalem itself, AHAZ applied to Assyria for assistance, and Tiglath-pileser, consenting to aid him, again appeared at the head of an army in these regions. He first marched, naturally, against DAMASCUS, which he took (2 K. xvi. 9), razing it to the ground, and killing Rezin. After this, probably, he proceeded to chastise Pekah, whose country he entered on the N. E., where it bordered on "Syria of Damascus." Here he overran the whole district E. of Jordan, carrying into captivity "the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh" (1 Chr. v. 26; compare Is. ix. 1; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF). Thus the result of this expedition was the absorption of the kingdom of Damascus, and of an important portion of Samaria, into the Assyrian empire; and it also made the king of Judah a vassal of the Assyrian monarch. Before returning into his own land, Tiglath-pileser had an interview with AHAZ at Damascus (2 K. xvi. 10). This is all that Scripture tells us of Tiglath-pileser. He appears to have succeeded PUL, and to have been succeeded by SHALMANESER; to have been contemporary with Rezin, Pekah, and AHAZ; and therefore to have ruled Assyria during the latter half of the eighth century before our era. From his own inscriptions we learn that his reign lasted at least seventeen years; that, besides warring in Syria and Samaria, he attacked Babylonia, Media, Armenia, and the independent tribes in Upper Mesopotamia; thus, like the other great Assyrian monarchs, warring along the whole frontier of the empire; and finally, that he was (probably) not a legitimate prince, but a usurper and the founder of a dynasty. From Berosus, Herodotus, and the monumental indications, Rawlinson concludes that the founder of the Lower Dynasty or Empire, the first monarch of the New Kingdom, was the Tiglath-pileser of Scripture, and that he reigned from B. C. 747 to B. C. 780, and possibly till B. C. 725. Tiglath-pileser's wars advanced the limits of the empire only on the western frontier, in Syria, &c., as mentioned above. No palace or great building can be ascribed to this king. His slabs, which are tolerably numerous, show that he must have built or adorned a residence at Calah (Nimrud), where they were found.

Tigris (Gr. fr. Median = arrow, so named from its swiftness, Str., Pliny, Ges., Wr.), in the LXX. = HIDDEKEL; occurs also in Tob. vi. 1, and in Jd. i. 6, and Ecclus. xxiv. 25. The Tigris, like the EUPHRATES, rises from two principal sources, the western and most distant one being in latitude 38° 10', longitude 39° 20' nearly, a little S. of the high mountain-lake called Gölik or Gülenjik, and not more than two or three miles from the channel of the Euphrates. The course of the Tigris is somewhat N. of E. for the first twenty-five miles, then S. to Diarbekr, then E. past Osman Kieu to Til, whence it flows in a southeasterly direction, with certain slight variations, to its final junction with the Euphrates. At Osman Kieu it receives from the N. the Second or Eastern Tigris; and near Til a large stream from the N. E. From Til the Tigris runs southward for twenty miles through a long, narrow, and deep gorge, at the end of which it emerges upon the comparatively low, but still hilly country of MESOPOTAMIA, near Jezireh. At Samara (between latitude 34° and 35°), the hills end and the river enters on the great alluvium. The length of the whole stream, exclusive of meanders, is reckoned at 1146 miles. It can be descended on rafts during the flood season from Diarbekr; and it has been navigated by steamers of small draught nearly up to Mosul. Below Samara there are no obstructions; the river is deep, with a bottom of soft mud, and an average width of 200 yards; the stream moderate; and the course very meandering. Besides the three head-streams of the Tigris, the river receives, along its middle and lower course, five important tributaries, the river of Zakko or Eastern Khabour, the Great Zab (Zab Ala), the Lesser Zab (Zab Anfal), the Athem, and the Diyalet or ancient Gyndes. All these rivers flow from the high range of Zagros. The Tigris, like the Euphrates, has a flood season. Early in March, in consequence of the melting of the snows on the southern flank of Niphates, the river rises rapidly. Its breadth gradually increases at Diarbekr from 100 or 120 to 250 yards. The stream is swift and turbid. The rise continues through March and April, reaching its full height generally in the first or second week of May. About the middle of May the Tigris begins to fall, and by midsummer it has reached its natural level. In October and November there is another rise and fall in consequence of the autumnal rains, but insignificant compared with the spring flood. The Tigris is at present better fitted for purposes of traffic than the Euphrates; but in ancient times it does not seem to have been much used as a line of trade. (COMMERCE; SOLOMON; TADNOR.) The Tigris appears in Scripture under the name of HIDDEKEL, among the rivers of EDEM (Gen. ii. 14), as "running eastward to Assyria." But after this we hear no more of it, if we accept one doubtful allusion in Nah. ii. 6, until the Captivity, when it becomes well known to the prophet Daniel. With him it is "the Great River" (Dan. x.-xii.). The Tigris, in its upper course, anciently ran through ARMENIA and ASSYRIA. Lower down, from about the point where it enters on the alluvial plain, it sep-

 1. A "captain of the Ammonites" defeated on several occasions by Judas Maccabeus, B. C. 164 (1 Mc. v. 6, 11, 31-44; 2 Mc. xii. 2-23). He was probably a Greek adventurer.—2. A leader who took part in the invasion of Nicanor B. C. 166 (2 Mc. viii. 30, ix. 3), and being afterward driven to a stronghold, Gazara (= Gezer), which was stormed by Judas, was there taken and slain (x. 24-37). It has been supposed that the events recorded in this latter narrative are identical with those in 1 Mc. v. 6-8. But the name Timotheus was very common, and it is evident that Timotheus the Ammonite leader was not slain at Jazer (1 Mc. v. 34).—3. The Latinized Greek name of TIMOTHY (Acts xvi. 1, xvii. 14, &c.).

Timothy (fr. Gr. = TIMOTHEUS). The disciple thus named (= TIMOTHEUS 3) was the son of one of those mixed marriages which, though condemned by stricter Jewish opinion, were yet not uncommon in the later periods of Jewish history. (MARRIAGE, II. i.) The father's name is unknown: he was a "GREEK," i. e. a Gentile by descent (Acts xvi. 1, 3). The absence of any personal allusion to the father in the Acts or Epistles suggests the inference that he must have died or disappeared during his son's infancy (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article). The care of the boy thus developed upon his mother Eunice and her mother Lois (2 Tim. i. 5). Under their training his education was emphatically Jewish. "From a child" he learned (probably in the LXX. version) to "know the Holy Scriptures" daily. A constitution far from robust (1 Tim. v. 23), a morbid shrinking from opposition and responsibility (iv. 12-16, v. 20, 21, vi. 11-14; 2 Tim. ii. 1-7), a sensitiveness even to tears (i. 4), a tendency to an ascetic rigor which he had not strength to bear (1 Tim. v. 23), united, as it often is, with a temperament exposed to some risk from "youthful lusts" (2 Tim. ii. 22) and the softer emotions (1 Tim. v. 2)—these we may well think of as characterizing the youth as afterward the man. The language of Acts xvi. 1, 2, and xx. 4, leaves it uncertain whether LYSTRA or DERBE were the residence of the devout family. The arrival of PAUL and BARNABAS in LYCAONIA (Acts xiv. 6) brought the message of glad-tidings to Timotheus and his mother, and they received it with "unfigned faith" (2 Tim. i. 5). If at Lystra, as seems probable from 2 Tim. iii. 11, he may have witnessed the half-completed sacrifice, the half-finished martyrdom, of Acts xiv. 19. The preaching of the apostle on his return from his short circuit prepared him for a life of suffering (Acts xiv. 22). From that time his life and education must have been under the direct superintendence of the body of elders (23). During the interval of seven years between the apostle's first and second journeys, the boy grew up to manhood. His zeal, probably his asceticism, became known both at Lystra and Iconium. Those who had the deepest insight into character, and spoke with a prophetic utterance, pointed to him (1 Tim. i. 18, iv. 14), as others had pointed before to Paul and Barnabas (Acts xiii. 2), as specially fit for the missionary work in which the apostle was engaged. Personal feeling led St. Paul to the same conclusion (xvi. 3), and he was solemnly set apart to do the work and possibly to bear the title of EVANGELIST (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6, iv. 5). A great obstacle, however, presented itself. Timotheus, though reckoned as one of the seed of Abraham, had been allowed to grow up to the age of manhood without the sign of CIRCUMCISION. His condition was that of a negligent, almost of an apostate Israelite. The Jews might tolerate a heathen, as such, in the synagogue or the church, but an uncircumcised Israelite would be to them a horror and a portent. With a special view to their feelings, making no sacrifice of principle, the apostle, who had refused to permit the circumcision of Titus, "took and circumcised" Timotheus (Acts xvi. 3); and then, as conscious of no inconsistency, went on his way distributing the decrees of the council of Jerusalem, the great charter of the freedom of the Gentiles (4). Henceforth Timotheus was one of his most constant companions. They and Silvanus, and probably Luke also, journeyed to Philippi (12), and there already the young evangelist was conspicuous at once for his filial devotion and zeal (Phil. ii. 22). His name does not appear in the account of St. Paul's work at Thessalonica, and it is possible that he remained some time at Philippi. He appears, however, at Berea, and remains there when Paul and Silas are obliged to leave (Acts xvii. 14), going on afterward to join Paul at Athens (1 Th. iii. 2). From Athens he is sent back to Thessalonica, as having special gifts for comforting and teaching. He returns from Thessalonica, not to Athens but to Corinth, and his name appears united with St. Paul's in the opening words of both the letters written from that city to the THESSALONIANS (1 Th. i. 1; 2 Th. i. 1). Here also he was apparently active as an evangelist (2 Cor. i. 19). Of the next five years of his life we have no record. When we next meet with him it is as being sent on in advance when the apostle was contemplating the long journey which was to include Macedonia, Achaia, Jerusalem, and Rome (Acts xix. 22; comp. 1 Cor. iv. 17, xvi. 10). Probably he returned by the same route and met St. Paul according to a previous arrangement (xvi. 11), and was thus with him when the second Epistle was written to the church of Corinth (2 Cor. i. 1). He returns with the apostle to that city, and joins in messages of greeting to the disciples whom he had known personally at Corinth, and who had since found their way to Rome (Rom. xvi. 21). He forms one of the company of friends who go with St. Paul to Philippi, and then sail by themselves, waiting for his arrival by a different ship (Acts xx. 3-6). The language of St. Paul's address to the elders of Ephesus (17-35) renders it unlikely that he was then left there with authority. The absence of his name from Acts xxvii. in like manner leads to the conclusion that he did not share in the perilous voyage to Italy. He must have joined the apostle, however, apparently soon after his arrival in Rome, and was with him when the Epistles to the Philippians, to the Colossians, and to Philemon were written (Phil. i. 1, ii. 19; Col. i. 1; Phm. 1). All the indications of this period point to incessant missionary activity (Phil. ii. 19-23; 2 Tim. iv. 21; Heb. xiii. 23). Assuming the genuineness of the later date of the two epistles addressed to him (TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO), we are able to put together a few notices as to his later life. It follows from 1 Tim. i. 3 that he and St. Paul, after the release of the latter from his imprisonment, revisited the proconsular Asia, that the apostle then continued his journey to Macedonia, while the disciple remained, half-reluctantly, even weeping at the separation (2 Tim. i. 4), at Ephesus, to check, if possible, the outgrowth of heresy and licentiousness which had sprung up there. The position in which he found himself might well make him anxious (1 Tim. iii. 14, 15, iv. 12, v. 1 ff., &c.). There was the risk of being entangled in the disputes, prejudices, covetousness, sensuality of a great city. Leaders of rival sects were there (2 Tim. ii. 17, iv. 14, 15). The name of his beloved teacher was no longer honored as it had been (i. 15). We cannot wonder that the apostle, knowing these trials, should be full of anxiety and fear for his disciple's steadfastness (1 Tim. i. 18, iii. 15, iv. 14, v. 21, vi. 11). In the second epistle to him this deep personal feeling utters itself yet more fully. The last recorded words of the apostle express the earnest hope, repeated yet more earnestly, that he might see him once again (2 Tim. iv. 9, 13, 21). We may hazard the conjecture that he reached him in time, and that the last hours of the teacher were soothed by the presence of the disciple whom he loved so truly. Some writers have even seen in Heb. xiii. 23 an indication that he shared St. Paul's imprisonment and was released from it by the death of Nero. Beyond this all is apocryphal and uncertain. He continues, according to the old traditions, to act as bishop of Ephesus, and dies a martyr's death, under Domitian or Nerva. A somewhat startling theory as to the intervening period of his life has found favor with Calmet and others. If he continued, according to the received tradition, to be bishop of Ephesus, then he, and no other, must have been the "angel" of that church to whom the message of Rev. ii. 1-7 was addressed. (ANGELS.) The conjecture has been passed over unnoticed by most of the recent commentators on the Apocalypse.

Timothy (see above), Epistles to. 1. Authorship. The question whether these Epistles were written by St. PAUL was one to which, till within the last half-century, hardly any answer but an affirmative one was thought possible (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article). They are reckoned among the Pauline Epistles in the Muratorian Canon and the Peshito version. Eusebius places them among the acknowledged books (CANON, p. 146) of the N. T., and while recording the doubts which affected the second Epistle of St. Peter and the other disputed books, knows of none which affect these. They are cited as authoritative by Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Irenæus. There were indeed some notable exceptions to this general agreement. The three Pastoral Epistles were all rejected by Marcion, Basilides, and other Gnostic teachers. Tatian, while strongly maintaining the genuineness of the Epistle to Titus, denied that of the other two. In these instances we can discern a dogmatic reason for the rejection. The sects which these leaders represented could not but feel that they were condemned by the teaching of the Pastoral Epistles. Origen mentions some who excluded 2 Tim. from the Canon because the names of Jannes and Jambres belonged to an apocryphal history, and from such a history St. Paul never would have quoted. The Pastoral Epistles have, however, been subjected to a more elaborate scrutiny by the criticism of Germany. The first doubts were uttered by J. C. Schmidt. Schleiermacher, assuming the genuineness of 2 Tim. and Titus, undertook, on that hypothesis, to prove the spuriousness of 1 Tim. Eichhorn and De Wette denied the Pauline authorship of all three. Schott supposed that Luke was the writer. Baur assigns them to no earlier period than the latter half of the second century, after the death of Polycarp in A. D. 167. (JOHN, GOSPEL OF.) The chief elements of the alleged evidence of spuriousness of the three Pastoral Epistles may be arranged as follows:—1. Language. It is urged that the style is different from that of the acknowledged Pauline Epistles—that there is less logical continuity, a want of order and plan, subjects brought up, one after the other, abruptly—that not less than fifty words, most of them striking and characteristic, and some of them belonging to the Gnostic terminology of the second century, are found in these Epistles which are not found in St. Paul's writings.—On the other side it may be said (a.) that there is no test so uncertain as that of language and style thus applied. The style of one man is stereotyped, formed early, and enduring long. That of another changes, more or less, from year to year. In proportion as the man is a solitary thinker, or a strong asserter of his own will, will he tend to the former state. In proportion to his power of receiving impressions from without, of sympathizing with others, will be his tendency to the latter. (b.) If this is true generally, it is so yet more emphatically when the circumstances of authorship are different. The language of a bishop's charge is not that of his letters to his private friends. (c.) Other letters, again, were dictated to an amanuensis. These have every appearance of having been written with his own hand, and this can hardly have been without its influence on their style. (d.) To whatever extent a forger of spurious Epistles would be likely to form his style after the pattern of the recognized ones, to that extent the diversity which has been dwelt on is, within the limits that have been above stated, not against but for the genuineness of these Epistles. (e.) There is a large common element, both of thoughts and words, shared by these Epistles and the others (e. g. the grounds of faith, the law of life, the tendency to digress, the personal affection, the free reference to his own sufferings for the truth), the coincidences being precisely those, in most instances, which a forger would have been unlikely to think of.—2. It has been urged against the reception of the Pastoral Epistles that they cannot be fitted in to the records of St. Paul's life in the Acts. To this there is a threefold answer. (a.) The difficulty has been enormously exaggerated. (PAUL.) (b.) The mere fact that we cannot fix the precise date of three letters in the life of one of whose ceaseless labors and journeyings we have, after all, but fragmentary records, ought not to be a stumbling-block. (c.) A man composing counterfeit Epistles would have been likely to make them square with the acknowledged records of the life.—3. The three Epistles present, it is said, a more developed state of Church organization and doctrine than that belonging to the lifetime of St. Paul; particularly (a.) the rule that the bishop is to be "the husband of one wife" (1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 6) indicates the strong opposition to second marriages which characterized the second century. (b.) The "younger widows" of 1 Tim. v. 11 cannot be literally widows. It follows therefore that the word "widows" (Gr. chêrai) is used, as it was in the second century, in a wider sense, as denoting a consecrated life. (c.) The rules affecting the relation of the bishops and elders indicate a hierarchic development characteristic of the post-apostolic period. (d.) The term "heretic" (Tit. iii. 10) is used in its later sense. (e.) The upward progress from the office of deacon to that of presbyter, implied in 1 Tim. iii. 13, belongs to a later period.—It is not difficult to meet objections which contain so large an element of mere arbitrary assumption. (a.) The rule which makes monogamy a condition of the episcopal office is very far removed from the harsh, sweeping censures of all second marriages which we find in Athenagoras and Tertullian. (b.) There is not a shadow of pro-

that the "younger widows" were not literally such (comp. Acts vi. 1, ix. 39; Widow). (c.) The use of "BISHOP" and "ELDERS" in the Pastoral Epistles as equivalent (Tit. i. 5, 7), and the absence of any intermediate order between the bishops and deacons (1 Tim. iii. 1-8), are quite unlike what we find in the Ignatian Epistles and other writings of the second century. (d.) The word "heretic" has its counterpart in the "heresies" of 1 Cor. xi. 19. (e.) The best interpreters do not see in 1 Tim. iii. 13 the transition from one office to another. (DEACON).—4. Still greater stress is laid on the indications of a later date in the descriptions of the false teachers noticed in the Pastoral Epistles. These point, it is said, unmistakably to Marcion and his followers (e. g. "opposition of science falsely so called," 1 Tim. vi. 20). The "genealogies" of 1 Tim. i. 4 and Tit. iii. 9, in like manner, point to the Æons of the Valentinians and Ophites. The doctrine that the "Resurrection was past already" (2 Tim. ii. 18) was thoroughly Gnostic in its character. This part of Baur's attack is perhaps the weakest and most capricious of all. The false teachers of the Pastoral Epistles are predominantly Jewish (1 Tim. i. 7), belonging altogether to a different school from that of Marcion (Tit. i. 4, iii. 9). Even the denial of the Resurrection belongs as naturally to the mingling of a Sadducean element with an Eastern mysticism as to the teaching of Marcion. (HYMENÆUS; PHILETUS.) The whole line of argument, indeed, first misrepresents the language of St. Paul in these Epistles and elsewhere, and then assumes the entire absence from the first century of even the germs of the teaching which characterized the second. (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; NEW TESTAMENT).—II. Date. Assuming the two Epistles to Timothy to have been written by St. Paul, to what period of his life are they to be referred?—1. First Epistle to Timothy. The direct data in this instance are very few. (1.) 1 Tim. i. 8 implies a journey of St. Paul from Ephesus to Macedonia, Timothy remaining behind. (2.) The age of Timothy is described as "youth" (iv. 12). (3.) The general resemblance between the two Epistles indicates that they were written at or about the same time. Three hypotheses have been maintained as fulfilling these conditions. (A) The journey in question has been looked on as an unrecorded episode in the two years' work at Ephesus of Acts xix. 10 (Mosheim, Schrader, Wieseler, &c.). (B) It has been identified with the journey of Acts xx. 1, after the tumult at Ephesus (Theodoret, Grotius, Lightfoot, Witsius, Lardner, W. L. Alexander [in Kitto], Barnes, &c.). On either of these suppositions the date of the Epistle has been fixed at various periods after St. Paul's arrival at Ephesus, before the conclusion of his first imprisonment at Rome. (C) It has been placed in the interval between St. Paul's first and second imprisonments at Rome (Pearson, Le Clerc, Cave, Mill, Whitby, MacKnight, Paley, Huther [translated in B. S. viii. 320 ff.], Elliott, E. A. Litton [in Fairbairn], Conybeare & Howson, Alford, Ayre, &c.). Of these conjectures, A and B bring the Epistle within the limit of the authentic records of St. Paul's life, but they have scarcely any other merit. In favor of C, as compared with A or B, is the internal evidence of the contents of the Epistle (the errors against which Timothy is warned being present and dangerous, and all the circumstances implying the apostle's prolonged absence). The language of the Epistle also has a bearing on the date. Assume a later date, and then there is room for the changes in thought and expression which, in a character like St. Paul's, were to be expected as the years went by. The only objections to the later date are—(a.) the doubtfulness of the second imprisonment altogether (PAUL); and (b.) the "youth" of Timothy at the time when the letter was written (iv. 12). But the later date would probably make him not more than thirty-four or thirty-five, young for authority over older presbyters or "elders."—2. Second Epistle to Timothy. The number of special names and incidents in the Second Epistle make the chronological data more numerous. Here also are conflicting theories of an earlier and later date, (A) during the imprisonment of Acts xxviii. 30, and (B) during the second imprisonment already spoken of. (1.) A parting apparently recent, under circumstances of special sorrow (i. 4). Not decisive (compare Acts xx. 37; 1 Tim. i. 3). (2.) A general desertion of the apostle even by the disciples of Asia (2 Tim. i. 15). Nothing in the Acts indicates any thing like this before the imprisonment of Acts xxviii. 30. This, therefore, must be placed on the side of B. (3.) The position of St. Paul as suffering (i. 12), in bonds (ii. 9), expecting "the time of his departure" (iv. 6), forsaken by almost all (iv. 16). Not quite decisive, but tending to B rather than A. (4.) The mention of ONESIPHORUS, and of services rendered by him both at Rome and Ephesus (i. 16-18). Not decisive again, but tends to B rather than A. (5.) The abandonment of St. Paul by DEMAS (iv. 10). Strongly in favor of B. (6.) The presence of LUKE (iv. 11). Agrees with A (Col. iv. 14), but is perfectly compatible with B. (7.) The request that Timothy would bring MARK (2 Tim. iv. 11). In connection with the mention of Demas, tends decidedly to B. (8.) Mention of TYCHICUS as sent to Ephesus (iv. 12). Appears, as connected with Eph. vi. 21, 22, and Col. iv. 7, in favor of A, yet compatible with B. (9.) The request that Timothy would bring the cloak and books left at Troas (2 Tim. iv. 13). On the assumption of A, Paul's last visit to Troas would have been at least four or five years before, affording probable opportunities for his regaining what he had left, and presenting in its circumstances no trace of the haste and suddenness which the request more than half implies. In favor of B. (10.) "ALEXANDER the coppersmith did me much evil," "greatly withstood our words" (iv. 14, 15). Somewhat in favor of A (compare Acts xix.), yet easily reconcilable with B. (11.) The abandonment of the apostle in his first defence, and his deliverance "from the mouth of the lion" (2 Tim. iv. 16, 17). Fits in as a possible contingency with either hypothesis, but like (5.) evinces a later date than any other Epistles written from Rome. (12.) "ERASTUS abode at Corinth, but TROPHIMUS I left at Miletus sick" (iv. 20). Language, as in (9.), implying a comparatively recent visit to both places, and favoring B (compare Acts xxi. 29, xx. 4). (13.) "Hasten to come before winter" (2 Tim. iv. 21). Assuming A, the presence of Timothy in Phil. i. 1, and Col. i. 1, and Phn. 1, might be regarded as the consequence of this; but (compare 5 and 7 above) there are almost insuperable difficulties in supposing this Epistle to have been written before those three. (14.) The salutations from EUBULUS, PUDENS, LINUS, and CLAUDIA (2 Tim.

<sup>1</sup> Timothy was then in that period of life which both by Greeks and Romans was considered as "youth." Servius Tullius, it is said, classed the Romans from seventeen to forty-six years old as in youth, those older as in old age, those younger as in childhood. Others make youth = the period of military age, or from twenty to forty years.

iv. 21). The absence of these names from all the Epistles, which, according to A, belong to the same period, would be difficult to explain. B leaves it open to conjecture that they were converts of more recent date, and might have become acquainted with TIMOTHY at Rome. On the whole, it is believed that the evidence preponderates strongly in favor of the later date.—III. Places. In this respect also 1 Tim. leaves much to conjecture. The absence of any local reference but that in i. 3, suggests Macedonia or some neighboring district. In A and other MSS. (NEW TESTAMENT, I. § 28), in the Peshito, Ethiopic, and other versions (VERSIONS, ANCIENT), LAODICEA is named in the inscription as the place whence it was sent, but this seems to have grown out of a traditional belief resting on very insufficient grounds. The Coptic version as improbably suggests Athens. The Second Epistle is free from this conflict of conjectures. With the exception of Böttger, who suggests Cesarea, there is a general agreement in favor of Rome.—IV. Structure and Characteristics. On the language, see I. 1, above. Assuming the genuineness of the Epistles, some characteristic features remain to be noticed. (1.) The ever-deepening sense in St. Paul's heart of the Divine Mercy, of which he was the object. (2.) The greater abruptness of the Second Epistle, which is full of emotion and without any carefully arranged plan. (3.) The absence, as compared with St. Paul's other Epistles, of O. T. references (compare 2, above, and 2 Tim. iv. 13). (4.) The conspicuous position of the "faithful sayings" as taking the place occupied in other Epistles by the O. T. Scriptures (1 Tim. i. 15, iv. 9; 2 Tim. ii. 11; Tit. iii. 8; compare 1 Tim. iv. 1; 1 Cor. xiv.). (5.) The tendency of the apostle's mind to dwell more on the universality of the redemptive work of Christ (1 Tim. ii. 3-6, iv. 10), and his strong desire that all the teaching of his disciples should be "sound" (1 Tim. i. 10, vi. 3 [A. V. "wholesome"]); 2 Tim. i. 13, iv. 3; Tit. i. 9, 13, ii. 1, 2). (6.) The importance attached by him to the practical details of administration. (7.) The recurrence of doxologies (1 Tim. i. 17, vi. 15, 16; 2 Tim. iv. 18). EPISTLE; TITUS, EPISTLE TO.

Tin (Heb. badil), a well-known white metal, easily melted and very malleable. Tin was found among the spoils of the Midianites (Num. xxxi. 22). It was known to the Hebrew metal-workers as one of the inferior metals (lead, tin, &c.) combined with silver in the ore and separated from it by smelting (Is. i. 25; Ez. xxii. 18, 20). The markets of Tyre were supplied with it by the ships of TARSHISH (xxvii. 12). It was used for plummets (Zech. iv. 10), and was so plentiful as to furnish Eccl. xlvii. 18 a figure by which to express the wealth of Solomon. In the Homeric times the Greeks were familiar with it. The melting of tin in a smelting-pot is mentioned by Hesiod. Tin is not found in Palestine. Whence, then, did the ancient Hebrews obtain their supply? "Only three countries are known to contain any considerable quantity of it: Spain and Portugal, Cornwall and the adjacent parts of Devonshire (in England), and the islands of Junk, Ceylon, and Banca, in the Straits of Malacca" (Kenrick, Phœnicia, p. 212). There can be little doubt that the mines of Britain were the chief source of supply to the ancient world (so Mr. Wright, with Sir G. C. Lewis, &c.). The tin obtained from Spain does not appear to have been produced in sufficient quantities to supply the Phœnician markets. METALS; MINES.

Tiph'sah (Heb. passage, ford, Ges.), mentioned in

1 K. iv. 24 as the limit of Solomon's empire toward the Euphrates, and in 2 K. xv. 16 said to have been attacked by Menahem. It is generally admitted that the town intended, at any rate in the former passage,<sup>1</sup> is that known by the Greeks and Romans as Thapsacus, a town of considerable importance in northern Syria, at a point where it was usual to cross the Euphrates. It must have been a place of considerable trade, the land-traffic between East and West passing through it. It is a fair conjecture that Solomon's occupation of the place was connected with his efforts to establish a line of trade with Central Asia directly across the continent, and that TADMOR was intended as a resting-place on the journey to Thapsacus. (COMMERCE; SOLOMON.) At Thapsacus armies marching E. or W. usually crossed the "Great River." It has been generally supposed that the site of Thapsacus was the modern D-ir (D'Anville, Rennell, Vaux, &c.). But the Euphrates expedition proved that there is no ford at D-ir, and that the only ford in this part of the Euphrates is at Suriyeh, 45 miles below Balis, and 165 above Deir, where the river is 800 yards wide and was 20 inches deep in the winter of 1841-2, and where a paved causeway is visible on each side, and a long line of mounds in the form of an irregular parallelogram probably marks the site of the ancient city. This, then, must have been the position of Thapsacus (so Rawlinson).

Tyras (Heb. longing, desire, Sim.), youngest son of JAPHETH (Gen. x. 2 only); identified by ancient authorities generally (Josephus, Jerome, Targums) and by many moderns (Bochart, Michaelis, Fürst, &c.) with the Thracians. (THRACIA; TOXOGES, CONFUSION OF.) The precise ethnic position of the Thracians is, indeed, uncertain; but all authorities agree in their general Indo-European character. Other explanations have identified Tyras with the Agathyrsi, a Scythian tribe in Transylvania (Kno-bel); with Taurus and the various tribes occupying that range (Kalisch); the river Tyras, Dniester, with its cognominous inhabitants, the Tyræ (Hävernick, Schultess); and, lastly, the Tyrrhenians, ancestors of the Etrurians of Italy (Tuch).

Tyrath-ites (fr. Heb. sing. collective = people of Tirah [i. e. gate], a place otherwise unknown, Ges. l. the; one of the three families of Scribes residing at Jabez (1 Chr. ii. 55), the others being the SEIMEATH-ITES and SUCIATH-ITES.

Tire (Heb. pi'ér), an ornamental HEAD-DRESS worn on festive occasions (Ez. xxiv. 17, 23). CHAIN.

Tir'ha-kah (Heb. fr. Ar. = brought forth, created, Sim.), king of ETHIOPIA (Cush), and the opponent of SENNACHERIB (2 K. xix. 9; Is. xxxvii. 9). He advanced to fight Sennacherib (so Mr. R. S. Poole, original author of this article) B. C. about 713, unless we suppose that the expedition took place in the twenty-fourth, instead of the fourteenth year of HEZEKIAH, which would bring it to A. C. about 703 (see CHRONOLOGY, and table under ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF). If it were an expedition later than that of which the date is mentioned, it must have been before B. C. about 698, Hezekiah's last year. But if the reign of Manasseh is reduced to thirty-five years, these dates would be respectively B. C. about 693, 683, and 678, and these numbers might have to be slightly modified, the fixed date of the capture of Samaria, B. C. 721, being abandoned. According to Manetho's epitomists, Tarkos or Tarakos was the third and last king of the twenty-fifth dynasty, which was of Ethiopians, and reigned eighteen (so Africanus) or twenty (so Eusebius) years. (So.) We should probably date Tirhakah's accession B. C. about 695, and assign him a reign of twenty-six years. In this case we should be obliged to take the later reckoning of the Biblical events, were it not for the possibility that Tirhakah ruled over Ethiopia before becoming king of Egypt. The name of Tirhakah is written in hieroglyphics Teharka. Sculptures at Thebes commemorate his rule, and at Gebel Berkel, or Napata, he constructed one temple, and part of another.

Tir'ha-ash (Heb. inclination ? Ges.; condescension, goodness, Fù.; a permanent dwelling, Sim.), son of CALEB 1 by his concubine Maachah (1 Chr. ii. 48).

Tir'-a (fr. Heb. = fear, Ges.), son of Jehaleleel of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 16).

Tir-sha'tha, or Tir'sha-tha (Heb., always written with the article; see below), the title of the governor of Judea under the Persians, derived by Gesenius from a Persian root signifying stern, severe, = your Severity (compare the English expression "dread sovereign"). It is added as a title after the name of NEHEMIAH (Neh. viii. 9, x. 1 [Heb. 2]); and occurs also in three other places (Ezr. ii. 63; Neh. vii. 65, 70). It is usually rendered "governor" in the margin (compare Neh. xii. 26 and GOVERNOR 7).

Tir'zah (fr. Heb. = delight, Ges.), the youngest of the five daughters of ZLOPHEHAD (Num. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1, xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3). HEIR.

Tir'zah (see above), an ancient Canaanite city, whose king is enumerated among the twenty-one overthrown in the conquest of the country (Josh. xii. 24). It reappears as a royal city—the residence of JEROBOAM 1 (1 K. xiv. 17), and of his successors BAASHA, ELAH, and ZIMRI (xv. xvi.). Zimri was besieged there by Omri, and perished in the flames of his palace (xvi. 18). OMRI reigned six years in Tir'zah, and then made SAMARIA his capital. Once only does Tir'zah reappear as the seat of the conspiracy of MENAHEM against Shallum (2 K. xv. 14, 16). Its reputation for beauty must have been wide-spread (Cant. vi. 4). Eusebius mentions it in connection with Menaheh, and identifies it with a "village of Samaritans in Batanæa," E. of Jordan. Brocardus places "Thersa" on a high mountain, three leagues from Samaria to the E. This is the direction, and very nearly the distance of Tull'azah, which Robinson (iii. 302-3) and others would identify with Tir'zah. It is a large and thriving village, on a commanding eminence N. of Nabûnia.

Tishbite (fr. Heb. Tishbi; see below), the; the well-known designation of ELIJAH (1 K. xvii. 1, xxi. 17, 28; 2 K. i. 3, 8, ix. 36). (1.) The name naturally points to a place called Tishbeh, Tishbi, or rather, perhaps, Tesheb, as the residence of the prophet. Assuming that a town is alluded to, as Elijah's native place, it is not necessary to infer that it was itself in Gilead, as Epiphanius, Adrichomius, Castell, and others, have imagined; for the Heb. tôshab, rendered "inhabitant" (viz. of Gilead, 1 K. xvii. 1), really = resident, or even STRANGER (A.V. "sojourner" in Gen. xxiii. 4, &c.). The commentators and lexicographers, with few exceptions, adopt the name "Tishbite" as referring to the place THISBE in Naphtali, which is found in the LXX. text of Tob. i. 2. The difficulty in the way of this is the great uncertainty in which the text of that passage is involved. Bunsen suggests in support of the reading "the Tishbite from Tishbi of Gilead," that the place may have been purposely so described, to distinguish it from the town of the same name in Galilee. (2.) Michaelis translates the Heb. hat-tishbi (differently pointed) as an appellative denoting "the stranger."

Ti'tans (fr. Gr. = [so Hesiod] the stretchers, strikers; or [so others] avengers; or [so others] kings, L. & S.). These children of Uranus (= Heaven) and Gaia (= Earth) were, according to the earliest Greek legends, the vanquished predecessors of the Olympian gods, condemned by Zeus (= L. JUPITER) to dwell in Tartarus (HELL), yet not without retaining many relics of their ancient dignity. By later (Latin) poets they were confounded with the kindred Gigantes (= giants), and both terms were transferred by the LXX. to the Rephaim (GIANTS 3) of Palestine. In 2 Sam. v. 18, 22, "the valley of Rephaim" is in the LXX. the valley of the Titans; and in 1 Chr. xi. 15, xiv. 9, it is the valley of the giants. So in Jd. xvi. 7, "the sons of the Titans" stands parallel with "high giants." Several Christian Fathers inclined to the belief that Teitan (= Titan) was the mystic name of "the beast" indicated in Rev. xiii. 18. RIDDLE.

Tithe (Heb. ma'asér; Gr. dekate) = a tenth part. (NUMBER.) Numerous instances of the use of tithes are found both in profane and in Biblical history, prior to or independently of the appointment of the Levitical tithes under the Law. In Biblical history the two prominent instances are—(1.) Abram presenting the tenth of all his property, or rather of the spoils of his victory, to MELCHIZEDEK (Gen. xiv. 20; Heb. vii. 2, 6). (2.) Jacob, after his vision at Luz, devoting a tenth of all his property to God in case he should return home in safety (Gen. xxviii. 22).—The Law first lays down the general principle that the tenth of all produce, as well as of flocks and cattle, belongs to Jehovah, and must be paid in kind, or, if redeemed, with an addition of one-fifth to its value (Lev. xxvii. 30-33). This tenth, called a "heave-offering," is assigned to the Levites, as the reward of their service, and it is ordered further, that they are themselves to dedicate to the Lord a tenth of these receipts, to be devoted to the maintenance of the priests (Num. xvii. 21-28).—This legislation is modified or extended in Deuteronomy, i. e. from thirty-eight to forty years later. Commands are given to the people, (a.) to bring their tithes, votive, and other offerings and first-fruits to the chosen centre of worship, the metropolis, there to be eaten in festive celebration in company with their children, their servants, and the Levites (Deut. xii. 5-18). (b.) To tithe all the produce of the soil every year, these tithes with the firstlings of the flock and herd to be eaten in the metropolis. (c.) In case of distance, permission is given to convert the produce into money, to be taken to the appointed place, and there laid out in the purchase of food for a festal celebration, in which the Levite is, by special command, to be included (xiv. 22-27). (d.) At the end of three years all the tithe of that year is to be gathered and laid up "within the gates," and a festival is to be held, in which the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, together with the Levite, are to partake (ver. 28, 29). (e.) After taking the tithe in each third year, "which is the year of tithing," an exculpatory declaration is to be made by every Israelite, that he has done his best to fulfil the Divine command (xxvi. 12-14).—From all this we gather, 1. That one-tenth of the whole produce of the soil was to be assigned for the maintenance of the Levites. 2.

That out of this the Levites were to dedicate a tenth to God, for the use of the priests. 3. That a tithe, in all probability a second tithe, was to be applied to festival purposes. 4. That in every third year, either this festival tithe or a third tenth was to be eaten in company with the poor and the Levites. The question arises, were there three tithes taken in this third year; or is the third tithe only the second under a different description? It must be allowed that the third tithe is not without support. Josephus distinctly says that one-tenth was to be given to the priests and Levites, one-tenth was to be applied to feasts in the metropolis, and that a tenth besides these was every third year to be given to the poor (compare Tob. i. 7, 8). On the other hand, Maimonides says the third and sixth years' second tithe was shared between the poor and the Levites, i. e. that there was no third tithe. Of these opinions, that which maintains three separate and complete tithings seems improbable (so Mr. Phillott, Dr. Ginsburg [in Kittó], Prof. Douglas [in Fbn.], Ayre, &c.). It is plain that under the kings the tithe-system partook of the general neglect into which the observance of the Law declined, and that Hezekiah, among his other reforms, took effectual means to revive its use (2 Chr. xxxi. 5, 12, 19). Similar measures were taken after the Captivity by Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 44), and in both these cases special officers were appointed to take charge of the stores and storehouses for the purpose. Yet, notwithstanding partial evasion or omission, the system itself was continued to a late period in Jewish history (Heb. vii. 5-8; Mat. xxiii. 23; Lk. xviii. 12). AGRICULTURE; ALMS; LEVITES; POOR; PRIEST; STRANGER.

TITUS (L., a common Roman first name; possibly fr. Gr. = [so Schl., &c.] honorable or honored). Our materials for the biography of this companion of St. Paul must be drawn entirely from 2 Cor., Gal., Tit., and 2 Tim. He is not mentioned in the Acts at all. Taking the passages in the Epistles in the order of the events referred to, we turn first to Gal. ii. 1, 3. We conceive the journey mentioned here (so Dr. Howson, original author of this article) to be identical with that (recorded in Acts xv.) in which PAUL and BARNABAS went from Antioch to Jerusalem to the conference which was to decide the question of the necessity of circumcision to the Gentiles. Here we see Titus in close association with Paul and Barnabas at Antioch.<sup>1</sup> He goes with them to Jerusalem. His circumcision was either not insisted on at Jerusalem, or, if demanded, was firmly resisted. He is very emphatically spoken of as a Gentile ("GREEK"), by which is most probably meant that both his parents were Gentiles. Titus would seem, on the occasion of the council, to have been specially a representative of the church of the uncircumcision. In the passage cited above, Titus is so mentioned as apparently to imply that he had become personally known to the Galatian Christians. After leaving Galatia (Acts xviii. 23), and spending a long time at Ephesus (xix. 1-xx. 1), the apostle proceeded to Macedonia by way of THOAS. Here he expected to meet Titus (2 Cor. ii. 13), who had been sent on a mission to Corinth. In this hope he was disappointed, but in Macedonia Titus joined him (vii. 6, 7, 13-15). The mission to Corinth had reference to the immoralities rebuked in 1 Cor. and to the effect of 1 Cor. on the offending church, and it was so far successful and satisfactory. Another part of the mission with which he was intrusted had reference to the collection, at that time in progress, for the poor Christians of Judea (2 Cor. viii. 6). The apostle now, after his encouraging conversations with Titus regarding the Corinthian Church, sends him back from Macedonia to Corinth, with two other trustworthy Christians (TROPHIMUS; TYCHICUS), bearing the Second Epistle, and with an earnest request (viii. 6, 17) that he would see to the completion of the collection (viii. 6). It has generally been considered doubtful who the "brethren" were (1 Cor. xvi. 11, 12) that took the First Epistle to Corinth. Most probably they were Titus and his companion, whoever that might be, who is mentioned with him in 2 Cor. xii. 18. (TROPHIMUS; TYCHICUS).—A considerable interval now elapses. St. Paul's first imprisonment is concluded, and his last trial is impending. In the interval between the two, he and Titus were together in Crete (Tit. i. 5). We see Titus remaining in the island when St. Paul left it, and receiving there a letter written to him by the apostle. (TITUS, EPISTLE TO.) From this letter we gather the following biographical details:—First we learn that he was originally converted through St. Paul's instrumentality (i. 4). Next we learn the various particulars of the responsible duties which he had to discharge in CRETE. He is to complete what St. Paul had been obliged to leave unfinished (i. 5), and to organize the Church throughout the island by appointing presbyters in every city. Next he is to control and bridle (ver. 11) the restless and mischievous Judaizers, and to be peremptory in so doing (ver. 13). He is to urge the duties of a decorous and Christian life upon the women (ii. 3-5), some of whom (ii. 3) possibly had something of an official character (ver. 3, 4). He is to be watchful over his own conduct (ver. 7), to impress upon the servants their peculiar duties (ii. 9, 10), to check all social and political turbulence (iii. 1), and all wild theological speculations (ver. 9), and to exercise discipline on the heretical (ver. 10). The notices which remain are more strictly personal. Titus is to look for the arrival in Crete of ARTEMAS and TYCHICUS (iii. 12), and then to hasten to join St. Paul at NICOPOLIS, where the apostle is proposing to pass the winter. ZENAS and AROLOS are in Crete, or expected there; for Titus is to send them on their journey, and supply them with whatever they need for it (iii. 13). Whether Titus did join the apostle at Nicopolis we cannot tell. But we naturally connect the mention of this place with what St. Paul wrote not long afterward, in 2 Tim. iv. 10 ("TITUS TO DALMATIA"); for Dalmatia lay to the N. of Nicopolis, at no great distance from it. From the form of the whole sentence it seems probable that this disciple had been with St. Paul in Rome during his final imprisonment; but this cannot be asserted confidently. Titus is connected by tradition with Dalmatia; but his traditional connection with Crete is much more specific and constant, though here again we cannot be certain of the facts. He is said to have been permanent Bishop in the island, and to have died there at an advanced age. The modern capital, Candia, appears to claim the honor of being his burial-place. In the fragment by the lawyer Zenas, Titus is called Bishop of Gortyna. The name of Titus was the watchword of the Cretans when they were invaded by the Venetians. EVANGELIST; TIMOTHY.

orate treatment distinct from the other Pastoral Letters of St. PAUL (TIMOTHY, EPISTLES 10). If those two were not genuine, it would be difficult confidently to maintain the genuineness of this. On the other hand, if the Epistles to Timothy are received as St. Paul's, there is not the slightest reason for doubting the authorship of that to Titus. Nothing can well be more explicit than the quotations in Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, to say nothing of earlier allusions in Justin Martyr, Theophilus, and Clemens Romanus. As to internal features, we may notice, in the first place, that the Epistle to Titus has all the characteristics of the other Pastoral Epistles. This tends to show that this letter was written about the same time and under similar circumstances with the other two. But, on the other hand, this Epistle has marks in its phraseology and style which assimilate it to the general body of the Epistles of St. Paul. As to any difficulty arising from supposed indications of advanced hierarchical arrangements, it is to be observed that in this Epistle "ELDER" = "BISHOP" (i. 5, 7), just as in the address at Miletus about A. D. 58 (Acts xx. 17, 28). At the same time this Epistle has features of its own, especially a certain tone of abruptness and severity, which probably arises partly out of the circumstances of the Cretan population, partly out of the character of Titus himself. Concerning the contents of this Epistle, something has already been said in the article on TITUS. No very exact subdivision is either necessary or possible. As to the time and place and other circumstances of the writing of this Epistle, the following scheme of filling up St. Paul's movements after his first imprisonment will satisfy all the conditions of the case:—We may suppose him (possibly after accomplishing his long-projected visit to Spain) to have gone to Ephesus, and taken voyages from thence, first to Macedonia and then to Crete, during the former to have written 1 Tim., and after returning from the latter to have written the Epistle to Titus, being at the time of dispatching it on the point of starting for Nicopolis, to which place he went, taking Miletus and Corinth on the way. At Nicopolis we may conceive him to have been finally apprehended and taken to Rome, whence he wrote the Second Epistle to Timothy (so Dr. Howson, original author of this article.) TITUS MANLIUS. MANLIUS, TITUS.

Ti'zite (fr. Heb. Titsi = one from an unknown place called Tis, Ges.; one from Tayits [=extension], Fû; but see below), the designation of Joha, one of David's heroes (1 Chr. xi. 45 only). Nothing is known of the place or family which it denotes (so Mr. Grove).

Toah (Heb. inclined, lowly? Ges.), a Kohathite Levite, ancestor of Samuel and Heman (1 Chr. vi. 34 [Heb. 19]); = TOHU and NAHATH ?

Tob (Heb. good, Ges.), the Land of; the place in which JEPHTHAH took refuge when expelled from home by his half-brothers (Judg. xi. 3); and where he remained, at the head of a band of freebooters, till he was brought back by the "elders" of Gilead (verse 5); evidently not far from Gilead; but toward the eastern deserts. In 2 Sam. x. 6, 8, ISHTOB, i. e. Man of Tob, according to a common Hebrew idiom, = the men of Tob. It appears again, in the Maccabean history in the names TOBIE and TUBIENI. Mr. Grove gives the names Tell Dobbe, or Tell Dibbe, attached to a ruined site at the S. end of the Lejah, a few miles N. W. of Kenawât (KENATH), and of ed-Dah, some twelve hours E. of the mountain el-Kuleib, and hence thirty to forty miles S. S. E. of Kenawât, as both suggestive of Tob, but does not positively identify either of them with it.

Tob'-ad-e-ni'jah (fr. Heb. = good is Adonijah, or good is my Lord Jehovah), one of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat through the cities of Judah to teach the Law to the people (2 Chr. xvii. 8).

To-bi'ah (fr. Heb. = pleasing to Jehovah, Ges.).

1. "The children of Tobiah" were a family who returned with Zerubbabel, but were unable to prove their connection with Israel (Ezr. ii. 60; Neh. vii. 62). —2. "Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite," played a conspicuous part in the rancorous opposition made by SANBALLAT and his adherents to the rebuilding of Jerusalem. The two races of Moab and Ammon found in these men fit representatives of their hereditary hatred to the Israelites. But Tobiah, though a SLAVE (A. V. "SERVANT," Heb. 'ebed; Neh. ii. 10, 19), unless this is a title of opprobrium, and an Ammonite, was himself son-in-law of SHECHANIAH 6, and his son JOHANAN 10 married the daughter of MESHULLAM 13, who was probably a priest (vi. 17, 18); and these family relations created for him a strong faction among the Jews. Tobiah gave venom to the pitying scorn of Sanballat (iv. 3), and provoked the bitter cry of NEHEMIAH (4, 5); he kept up communications with the factious Jews, and sent letters to put Nehemiah in fear (vi. 17, 19); and finally took up his residence in the Temple in the chamber which Eliashib had prepared for him in defiance of the Mosaic statute (Deut. xxiii. 3), upon which Nehemiah "cast forth all the household stuff of Tobiah out of the chamber" (Neh. xiii. 7, 8). Nothing further is known of him. Ewald conjectures that Tobiah had been a page (slave) at the Persian court, and, being in favor there, had been promoted to be satrap of the Ammonites.

To-bi'as (Gr. form of TOBIAH or TOBIJAH). 1. Son of TOBIT, and central character in the book of that name. (TOBIT, BOOK OF). —2. Father (or grandfather) of the Hyrcanus or HIRCANUS, who was apparently a man of great wealth and reputation at Jerusalem in the time of SELEUCES PHILOPATOR, about B. C. 187 (2 Mc. iii. 11). In the high-priestly schism which happened afterward (MENELAUS), "the sons of Tobias" took a conspicuous part.

To'bie (fr. Gr.), the Places of (1 Mc. v. 13), probably = the land of Tob.

To-bi-el, or To-bi-el (Gr. fr. Heb. = the goodness of God), father of TOBIT and grandfather of TOBIAS 1 (Tob. i. 1).

To-bi'jah (fr. Heb. = TOBIJAH). 1. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (2 Chr. xvii. 8). —2. One of the Captivity in the time of Zechariah, in whose presence the prophet was commanded to take crowns of silver and gold and put them on the head of Joshua the high-priest (Zech. vi. 10, 14). Rosenmüller conjectures that he was one of a deputation who came up to Jerusalem, from the Jews who still remained in Babylon, with contributions of gold and silver for the Temple. But Maurer considers the offerings presented by Tobijah and his companions.

To'bit (Gr. fr. Heb. = my goodness, Ilgen; more probably = TOBIJAH, Fritzsche), father of TOBIAS 1 (Tob. i. 1, &c.). TOBIT, BOOK OF.

To'bit (see above), Book of. The book is called simply Tobit in the old MSS. At a later time the opening words of the book were taken as a title. I. Text. The book exists at present in Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Hebrew texts, which differ more or less from one another in detail, yet are so far alike that

It is reasonable to suppose all derived from one written original, which was modified in the course of translation or transcription. The Greek text is found in two distinct recensions. The one is followed by the mass of the MSS. of the LXX., and gives the oldest text which remains. The other is only fragmentary, and manifestly a revision of the former. Of this, one piece (i. 1-ii. 2) is contained in the Sinaitic MS. (NEW TESTAMENT, I. § 28), and another in three later MSS. The Latin texts are also of two kinds. The common (Vulgate) text Jerome formed by a very hasty revision of the old Latin version with the help of a Chaldee copy translated into Hebrew for him by an assistant who was master of both languages. It is of very little critical value. The old Latin texts are far more valuable, though these present considerable variations among themselves, and represent the revised and not the original Greek text. Of the Hebrew versions, one is closely moulded on the common Greek text, the other an extremely free version of the revised text. The Syriac version to ch. vii. 9 is a close rendering of the common Greek text, in the rest it follows the revised text.—2. Contents. The outline of the book is as follows. Tobit, an Israelite of the tribe of Naphtali and strict observer of the Law, was carried captive to Assyria by Shalmaneser. While "purveyor" at court, he exerted himself to relieve his countrymen, and lent ten talents of silver to Gabael at Rages in Media. Before Sennacherib's death he had to flee from Nineveh with his wife Anna and son Tobias, but returned under Esar-haddon. As he lay one night in the court of his house, being unclean from having buried a Jew whom his son had found strangled in the market-place, sparrows muted warm dung into his eyes, and he became blind, and impoverished, and prayed to God for help. The same day his kinswoman SARA 2, whose seven husbands had successively been slain by ASMODEUS, also sought help from God. The angel RAPHAEL was sent to deliver both from sorrow. As a kinsman (AZARIAS 5) he accompanied Tobias on his journey to reclaim the money lent to Gabael. At the Tigris a fish attacked Tobias, but by Raphael's direction he speared it and took out the heart and liver and gall. At ECHATANA Tobias married Sara, Asmodeus being driven to the utmost parts of Egypt by a snake made with the fish's heart and liver. The money was obtained from Raguel by Raphael, and Tobias returned with Sara and half her father's goods to Nineveh. Tobit was restored to sight by the fish's gall rubbed on his eyes. Raphael made himself known. Tobit expressed his gratitude in a fine psalm, and lived to see the long prosperity of his son. After Tobit's death Tobias returned to Echbatana, where "before he died he heard of the destruction of Nineveh," of which "Jonas the prophet spake."—3. Historical Character. The narrative seems to have been received as true till the Reformation. Luther expressed doubts as to its literal truth, and these doubts gradually gained a wide currency among Protestant writers. Bertholdt has given a summary of alleged errors in detail, but the question turns rather upon the general complexion of the history than upon minute objections. This, however, is fatal to the supposition that the book could have been completed shortly after the fall of Nineveh (B. C. 606; Tob. xiv. 15), and written, in the main, some time before (xii. 20). The whole tone of the narrative bespeaks a later age; and above all, the doctrine of good and evil spirits is elaborated in a form which belongs to a period considerably posterior to the Babylonian Captivity. The incidents are not referred to in any part of Scripture nor in Josephus or Philo. The character of the alleged miraculous events taken together is alien from the general character of such events in the Scriptures, while there is nothing exceptional, as in the case of DANIEL, to explain the difference. The narrative is not simply history, but possibly some real occurrences related by tradition formed its basis. As the book stands it is a distinctly didactic narrative. Its point lies in the moral lesson which it conveys, not in the incidents.—4. Original Language. The superior clearness, simplicity, and accuracy of the LXX. text prove conclusively that this is nearer the original than any other text which is known, if it be not, as some have supposed, the original itself. Indeed, the arguments brought to show that it is a translation are far from conclusive; yet there is no internal evidence against the supposition that the Greek text is a translation (see § 5, below).—5. Date and place of Composition. The data for determining these are scanty. Eichhorn places the author after the time of Darius Hystaspis. Bertholdt brings the book considerably later than Seleucus Nicator (about B. C. 250-200), and supposes it written by a Galilean or Babylonian Jew, from the prominence given to those districts in the narrative. De Wette leaves the date undetermined, but argues that the author was a native of Palestine. Ewald fixes the composition in the far East, toward the close of the Persian period (about B. C. 350). This last opinion is almost certainly correct (so Mr. Westcott, original author of this article). Its date will fall somewhere within the period between the close of the work of Nehemiah and the invasion of Alexander (about B. C. 430-334). The contents of the book would suggest that he was living out of Palestine, in some Persian city, perhaps Babylon, where his countrymen were exposed to the capricious cruelty of heathen governors, and in danger of neglecting the Temple-service. If these conjectures as to the date and place of writing be correct, we must assume a Hebrew or Chaldean original. Even if the date of the book be brought much lower, to the beginning of the second century B. C., it must have been written in some Aramaic dialect, as the Greek literature of Palestine belongs to a much later time. As long as this was held to be strict history, it was supposed to be written by the immediate actors, Tobit and Tobias, the concluding verses (xiv. 12-15) by a surviving friend. But if the historical character of the narrative is set aside, there is no trace of the person of the author.—6. History. The history of the book is in the main that of the LXX. version. (CASON; SEPTUAGINT.) There appears to be a reference to it in the Latin version of the Epistle of Polycarp. Clement of Alexandria and Origen practically use the book as canonical; but Origen distinctly notices that neither Tobit nor Judith was received by the Jews, and rests the authority of Tobit on the usage of the Churches. Athanasius quotes Tobit as Scripture, but definitely excludes it from the Canon. In the Latin Church, Cyprian, Hilary, and Lucifer, quote it as authoritative; Augustine includes it with the other apocrypha of the LXX. among "the books which the Christian Church received," and in this he was followed by the mass of the later Latin Fathers. Jerome, however, followed by Rufinus, maintained the purity of the Hebrew Canon of the O. T. Luther pronounced it, if only a fiction, yet "a truly beautiful, wholesome, and profitable fiction, the work of a gifted poet. . . . A book useful for Christian reading." The same view is held also in the English Church, yet the book, like the rest of the APOCRYPHA, seems to have fallen into neglect.—7. Religious Character. Nowhere else is there preserved so complete and beautiful a picture of the domestic life of the Jews after the Return. There may be symptoms of a tendency to formal righteousness of works, but as yet the works are painted as springing from a living faith. Of the special precepts one (Tob. iv. 15) contains the negative side of the golden rule of conduct (Mat. vii. 12), which in this partial form is found among the maxims of Confucius. Almost every family relation is touched upon with natural grace and affection. The most remarkable doctrinal feature in the book is the prominence given to the action of spirits<sup>2</sup> (see § 2, above; MAGIC). A second doctrinal feature of the book is the firm belief in a glorious restoration of the Jewish people; but there is not the slightest trace of the belief in a personal MESSIAH.

To-gar'mah (Heb. fr. Sansc. = tribe of Armenia, Grimm), son of GOMER, and brother of ASHKENAZ and RIPHATH (Gen. x. 3). Togarmah, as a geographical term, is connected with ARMENIA, and the subsequent notices of the name (Ez. xxvii. 14, xxxviii. 6) accord with this view. Herodotus says the Armenians were Phrygian colonists (Hdt. vii. 73), which probably implies only a common origin of the two peoples (so Mr. Bevan). There can be little doubt that the Phrygians were once the dominant race in the peninsula, and that they spread westward from the confines of Armenia to the shores of the Ægean. The Phrygian language is undoubtedly to be classed with the Indo-European family. The Armenian language presents many peculiarities which distinguish it from other branches of the Indo-European family; but no hesitation is felt by philologists in placing it in this family of languages. To'la (Heb. a worm, Ges.). 1. First-born of Issachar, and ancestor of the TOLAITES (Gen. xlii. 13; Num. xxvi. 23; 1 Chr. vii. 1, 2).—2. Judge of Israel after Abimelech (Judg. x. 1, 2); "the son of Puah, the son of Dudo, a man of Issachar." Tola judged Israel twenty-three years at SHAMIR 2 in Mount Ephraim, where he died and was buried.

<sup>2</sup> "The agency of Asmodeus and of Raphael is out of keeping with sober history. The modes of repelling evil spirits and curing blindness betray a superstitious or trifling mind. The angel is made to feign himself a man, of a family known to Tobit, and to be the voucher for the false charms which are introduced. The moral of the story rests on the error that 'ALMS deliver from death' (Tob. iv. 10). The book is of no historical value, and tends to beget a weak, indiscriminating moral feeling, encourage self-righteousness, and cherish superstition" (Prof. J. G. Murphy, in Fbn.).

Tomb. The sepulchral rites of the Jews (BURIAL) were marked with the same simplicity that characterized all their religious observances (so Mr. Fergusson, original author of this article). This simplicity of rite led to what may be called the distinguishing characteristic of Jewish sepulchres—the deep loculus (L. literally a little place, i. e. a little chamber, cell, or recess)—which, so far as is now known, is universal in all purely Jewish rock-cut tombs, but hardly known elsewhere. Its form will be understood by referring to the annexed diagram, representing the forms of Jewish sepulture. In the apartment marked A, are twelve such loculi, about two feet wide by three feet high. On the ground-floor these generally open on the level of the floor; when in the upper story, as at C, on a ledge or platform, on which the body might be laid to be anointed, and on which the stones might rest which closed the outer end of each loculus. The shallow loculus, shown in chamber B, but apparently only used when sarcophagi were employed, and, therefore, so far as we know, only in the Greco-Roman period, would have been inappropriate, where an unembalmed body was laid out to decay—as there would evidently be no means of shutting it off from the rest of the catacomb. The deep loculus on the other hand was as strictly conformable with Jewish customs, and could easily be closed by a stone fitted to the end, and luted into the groove which usually exists there. This fact affords a key to much that is otherwise hard to be understood in certain passages in the N. T. Thus in Jn. xi. 39 Jesus says, "Take away the stone," and (ver. 40) "they took away the stone" without difficulty, apparently. And in xx. 1, the same expression is used, "the stone is taken away." There is one catacomb—that known as the "Tombs of the Kings"—which is closed by a stone rolling across its entrance; but it is the only one, and the immense amount of contrivance and fitting which it has required is sufficient proof that such an arrangement was not applied to any other of the numerous rock-tombs around Jerusalem, nor could the traces of it have been obliterated, had it anywhere existed. Although, therefore, the Jews were singularly free from the pomps and vanities of funereal magnificence, they were at all stages of their independent existence an eminently burying people.—Tombs of the Patriarchs. One of the most striking events in the life of ABRAHAM is the purchase of the field of Ephron the Hittite at Hebron, in which was the cave of MACHPELAH, that he might therein bury Sarah his wife, and that it might be a sepulchre for himself and his children. Aaron died on the summit of Mount Hor (Num. xx. 28, xxxiii. 39), and was probably buried there. Moses died in the plains of Moab, and was buried there, "but no man knoweth of his sepulchre to this day" (Deut. xxxiv. 6). Joshua was buried in his own inheritance, in Timnath-serah (Josh. xxiv. 30), and SAMUEL in his own house at RAMAH (1 Sam. xxv. 1). Joab was also buried "in his own house in the wilderness" (1 K. ii. 34). From the time when Abraham established the burying-place of his family at Hebron till David fixed that of his family in the city which bore his name, the Jewish rulers had no fixed or favorite place of sepulture. Each was buried on his own property, or where he died, without much caring either for the sanctity or convenience of the place chosen.—Tomb of the Kings.

Of the twenty-two kings of Judah who reigned at Jerusalem from 1048 to 590 B. C., eleven (David, Solomon, Rehoboam, Abijah, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Ahaziah, Amaziah, Jotham, Hezekiah, Josiah, with the good priest Jehoiada) were buried in one hypogeum (= subterranean structure) in the "city of David." Of all these it is merely said that they were buried in "the sepulchres of their fathers" or "of the kings" in the city of David, except of two—Asa and Hezekiah. Two more of these kings (Jehoram and Joash) were buried also in the city of David, "but not in the sepulchres of the kings." Neh. iii. 16, and Ez. xliii. 7, 9, with the reiterated assertion of the Books of Kings and Chronicles that these sepulchres were situated in the city of David, leave no doubt but that they were on Zion, or the Eastern Hill, and in the immediate proximity of the Temple (so Mr. Fergusson, but see JERUSALEM, III. § 5). Manasseh was (2 Chr. xxxiii. 20) buried in his own house, i. e. "in the garden of his own house, in the garden of Uzza" (2 K. xxi. 18), where his son Amon was also buried in his sepulchre (ver. 26). Ahaz was buried "in the city even in Jerusalem, but they brought him not into the sepulchres of the kings of Israel" (2 Chr. xxviii. 27). Up to the present time we have not been able to identify one single sepulchral excavation about Jerusalem which can be said with certainty to have been used for burial before the time of the Romans. The only important hypogeum which is wholly Jewish in its arrangements, and may consequently belong to an earlier or to any epoch, is that known as the Tombs of the Prophets in the western flank of the Mount of Olives. It has every appearance of having originally been a natural cavern improved by art, and with an external gallery some 140 feet in extent, into which twenty-seven deep or Jewish loculi open. Other chambers and loculi have been commenced in other parts, and in the passages are spaces where many other graves could have been located. It has no architectural mouldings, no sarcophagi or shallow loculi, nothing to indicate a foreign origin.—Greek-Roman Tombs. Besides the tombs above enumerated, there are around Jerusalem, in the Valleys of Hinnom and Jehoshaphat, and on the plateau to the N., a number of remarkable rock-cut sepulchres, with more or less architectural decoration, sufficient to enable us to ascertain that they are all of nearly the same age, and to assert with very tolerable confidence that the epoch to which they belong must be between the introduction of Roman influence and the destruction of the city by Titus. The excavations in the Valley of Hinnom with Greek inscriptions are comparatively modern, the inscriptions being all of Christian import, and such as to render it doubtful whether the chambers were not the dwellings of ascetics. In the village of Siloam there is a monolithic cell of singularly Egyptian aspect, which

De Sanley assumes to be a chapel of Solomon's Egyptian wife. It is probably of very much more modern date, more Assyrian than Egyptian in character, but probably not sepulchral. The principal remaining architectural sepulchres may be divided into three groups: (1.) Those existing in the Valley of Jehoshaphat (JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF), and known popularly as the Tombs of Zechariah, of St. James, and of Absalom. Of these the most southern is known as that of Zechariah, a popular name which there is not even a shadow of tradition to justify. It consists of a square solid basement, measuring 18 feet 6 inches each way, and 20 feet high to the top of the cornice. On each face are four engaged Ionic columns between antæ (the wall-pilasters at the corners), and these are surmounted by a cornice of purely Assyrian type, such as is found at Khorsabad. In all its details it is so distinctly Roman that it is impossible to assume that it belongs to an earlier age than that of their influence. Above the cornice is a pyramid rising at rather a sharp angle, and hewn, like all the rest, out of the solid rock. To call this building a tomb is evidently a misnomer, as it is absolutely solid—hewn out of the living rock by cutting a passage round it. It has no internal chambers, nor even the semblance of a doorway. Only the outward face or that fronting Jerusalem is completely finished. The so-called tomb of ABSALOM is somewhat larger, the base being about 21 feet square, and probably 23 or 24 to the top of the cornice. Like the other, it is of the Roman Ionic order, surmounted by a cornice of Ionic type; but between the pillars and the cornice a frieze, unmistakably of the Roman Doric order, is introduced. It is by no means clear whether it had originally a pyramidal top like its neighbor. Immediately in rear of the monolith we find a sepulchral cavern, indiscriminately called the Tomb of Jehoshaphat, now closed by the rubbish and stones thrown at the tomb of the undutiful son, but externally crowned by a pediment of considerable beauty, and in the same style as that of the Tombs of the Judges (see below). The third tomb of this group, called that of St. James, is situated between the other two, and is of a very different character. It consists of a verandah with two Doric pillars in antis, which may be characterized as belonging to a very late Greek order rather than a Roman example. Behind this screen are several apartments, which in another locality we might be justified in calling a rock-cut monastery appropriated to sepulchral purposes. In the rear of all is an apartment, apparently unfinished, with three shallow loculi meant for the reception of sarcophagi, and so indicating a post-Jewish date for the whole, or at least for that part of the excavation. (2.) The hypogeum known as the Tombs of the Judges, about a mile north of the city, is one of the most remarkable of the catacombs around Jerusalem, containing about sixty deep loculi, arranged in three stories; the upper stories with ledges in front to give convenient access, and to support the stones that closed them; the lower flush with the ground: the whole, consequently, so essentially Jewish that it might be of any age if it were not for its distance from the town, and its architectural character, which is identical with that of the Tomb of Jehoshaphat, and has nothing Jewish about it. The so-called "Jewish Tomb" in this neighborhood has bevelled facets over its façade, but with late Roman Doric details at its angles. (3.) The group known as the Tombs of the Kings, about half a mile N. of the Damascus gate (KIDRON, BROOK or), mentioned by Josephus (B. J. v. 4, § 2) as the Sepulchral Caverns of the Kings, and twice (B. J. v. 3, § 2, 12, § 2) as the Monuments of Herod. The architecture exhibits the same Roman Doric arrangements as are found in all these tombs, mixed with bunches of grapes, which first appear on Maccabean coins, and foliage which is local and peculiar, and, so far as any thing is known elsewhere, might be of any age. Its connection, however, with that of the Tombs of Jehoshaphat and the Judges fixes it to the same epoch. The entrance doorway of this tomb is

bule or entrance-hall about twenty feet square, from which three other square apartments open, each surrounded by deep loculi. These possess a peculiarity not known in any other tomb about Jerusalem, of having a square apartment either beyond the head of the loculus or on one side; e. g. A A have these inner chambers A' A' within, and B B at B B' on one side. But perhaps the most remarkable peculiarity of the hypogeum is the sarcophagus chamber D, in which two sarcophagi were found. All tends to make it probable that this was really the sepulchre of Herod. There seems no reason for doubting that all the architectural tombs of Jerusalem belong to the age of the Romans, like every thing that has yet been found either at Petra, Ba'albek, Palmyra, or Damascus, or even among the stone cities of the Hauran.—Tomb of Helena of Adiabene. Of the very famous tomb of Queen Helena of Adiabene not one vestige exists. We are told that she and her son Izates were buried at the pyramids which she had erected more than three stadia from Jerusalem (Jos. xx. 4, § 3). These pyramids were situated outside the third wall, near a gate between the Tower Psephinus and the Royal Caverns (Jos. B. J. v. 22, and v. 4, § 2). They remained sufficiently entire in the fourth century to form a conspicuous object in the landscape.—Since the destruction of the city by Titus, none of the native inhabitants of Jerusalem have been in a position to indulge in much sepulchral magnificence, or perhaps had any taste for this class of display; and we in consequence find no rock-cut hypogea, and no structural monuments that arrest attention in modern times. The people, however, still cling to their ancient cemeteries in the Valley of Jehoshaphat (JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF) with a tenacity singularly characteristic of the East. * Tongues (see above), Con-fu-sion of. The unity of the human race is most clearly implied, if not positively asserted, in the Mosaic writings. (ADAM; CREATION; MAN; NOAH.) Unity of language is assumed by the sacred historian apparently as a corollary of the unity of race. No explanation is given of the origin of speech, but its exercise is evidently regarded as coeval with the creation of man. Speech, being inherent in man as a reflecting being, was regarded as handed down from father to son by the same process of imitation by which it is still perpetuated. No notice is taken of any divergences in the antediluvian period, as their effects were obliterated by the Flood. The unity of speech would naturally be retained among Noah's descendants as long as they were held together by social and local bonds (Gen. xi. 1). Disturbing causes were, however, early at work to dissolve this twofold union of community and speech. The human family endeavored to check the tendency to separation by the establishment of a great central edifice, and a city which would serve as the metropolis of the whole world. The project was defeated by the interposition of Jehovah, who determined to "confound their language, that they might not understand one another's speech" (xi. 7; BABEL, TOWER OF). Contemporaneously with, and perhaps as the result of, this confusion of tongues, the people were scattered abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth, and the memory of the great event was preserved in the name BABEL.—Two points demand our attention in reference to this narrative, viz. the degree to which the confusion of tongues may be supposed to have extended, and the connection between the confusion of tongues and the dispersion of nations. (1.) It is unnecessary to assume that the judgment inflicted on the builders of Babel amounted to a loss, or even a suspension, of articulate speech. The desired object would be equally attained by a miraculous forestalment of those dialectical differences of language which are constantly in process of production, and which ordinarily require time and variations of place and habits to reach such maturity that people cannot understand one another's speech. The elements of the one original language may have remained, but so disguised by variations of pronunciation, and by the introduction of new combinations, as to be practically obliterated. (2.) The confusion of tongues and the dispersion of nations are spoken of in the Bible as contemporaneous events. The divergence of the various families into distinct tribes and nations ran parallel with the divergence of speech into dialects and languages, and thus Gen. x. is posterior in historical sequence to the events recorded in Gen. xi. Both passages must be taken into consideration in any disquisition on the early fortunes of the human race.—A. How far do modern researches into the phenomena of language favor the idea that once "the whole earth was of one speech and language?" The advocate of the historical unity of language is met by two classes of opposing arguments, one arising out of the differences, the other out of the resemblances of existing languages. As to the former, no one can doubt that, though linguistic science itself has hardly advanced beyond the stage of infancy, the tendency of all linguistic research is in the direction of unity (so Mr. Bevan, original author of this article). Variety in unity is a general law of nature, and the formal varieties of language present no obstacle to the theory of a common origin. Amid these varieties are manifest tokens of unity in the original material out of which language was formed, in the stages of formation through which it has passed, in the general principle of grammatical expression, and in the spirit and power displayed in the development of these various formations. The lines of discovery, therefore, point in one direction and favor the expectation that the various families may be combined by the discovery of connecting links into one family, comprehending all the languages of the world. But should such a result be obtained, the probability of a common origin would still remain unshaken; for the failure would probably be due to the absence, in many classes and families, of that chain of historical evidence, which in the case of the Indo-European and Shemitic families enables us to trace their progress for above 3,000 years.—As to the second class of opposing arguments—that the resemblances of existing languages do not necessitate the theory of historical or gentile unity, but may be satisfactorily accounted for on psychological principles—the whole question of the origin of language lies beyond the pale of historical proof, and no argument against its common origin can be derived from analogies drawn from the animal world, since language is not identical with sound, but is intimately connected with reason, and is perpetuated in a manner wholly distinct from that whereby animals learn to utter their cries. Besides, the theory that the language of the one protoplast was founded on strictly psychological principles, is certainly as consistent with psychological unity as is the theory of a plurality of protoplasts arriving at similar independent results under the influence of the same psychological laws.—The present position of the linguistic science in respect to direct proof of the radical identity of languages may be thus stated: All languages being classified according to their ideal forms as (I.) isolating, also called monosyllabic or radical, (II.) agglutinative, or (III.) inflecting, the Indo-European languages and the (so-called) Shemitic being included under the last head. The Indo-European languages have an acknowledged and well-defined relationship as one family; but under the Shemitic family some include the sub-Shemitic languages, as the Egyptian or Coptic, while others make these intermediate between the Shemitic and Indo-European families (see B. II., below). The agglutinative families of Europe and Asia are combined by Prof. Max Müller in one family, named Turanian, but divided by Pott and other eminent philologists into a great number of families, as the Ural-Altaian, &c. The monosyllabic languages of S. E. Asia are not included in the Turanian family by Müller, apparently as not agglutinative; but as the Chinese appears to be connected radically with the Burmese, Tibetan, and Ural-Altaian languages, it seems entitled to a place in the Turanian family. The American languages are referred by eminent writers to an Asiatic or Turanian origin (Bunsen, Latham); the bulk of the African languages to the Shemitic family (Latham); yet they may stand by themselves as distinct families. The problem that awaits solution is, whether the several families above specified can be reduced to a single family by demonstrating their radical identity. Here, though there is a considerable amount of radical identity which appears to be above suspicion, yet the absence of materials and other causes afford abundance of room for difference of opinion.—B. Do the ethnological views exhibited in the Mosaic table (Gen. x.) accord with the evidence furnished by history and language, both in regard to the special facts recorded in it, and in the general Scriptural view of an historical or, more properly, a gentile unity of the human race? We notice—I. The Mosaic table does not profess to describe the process of the dispersion: but, assuming that dispersion as an accomplished fact, it records the ethnic relations existing between the various nations affected by it. These relations are expressed under the form of a genealogy; the ethnological character of the document is, however, clear both from the names, some of which are gentile in form, as Ludim, Jebusite, &c., others geographical or local, as Mizraim, Sidon, &c.; and again from the formula which concludes each section of the subject, "after their families, after their tongues, in their countries, and in their nations" (x. 5, 20, 31). Incidentally, the table is geographical as well as ethnological; but this arises out of the practice of designating nations by the countries they occupy. The general arrangement of the table is as follows:—The whole human race is referred back to Noah's three sons, SHAM, HAM, and JAPHETH. The Shemites are described last, apparently that the continuity of the narrative may not be further disturbed; and the Hamites stand next to the Shemites, in order to show that these were more closely related to each other than to the Japhetites. The identification of the Biblical with the historical or classical names of nations, is by no means easy, particularly where the names are not subsequently noticed in the Bible. Equal doubt arises where names admit of being treated as appellatives, and so of being transferred from one district to another. (I.) The Japhetite list contains fourteen names, of which seven represent independent, and the remainder affiliated nations, as follows:—(i.) GOMER, connected ethnically with the Cimmerii, Cimbri (?), and Cymry; and geographically with Crimæa. Associated with Gomer are—(1.) ASHKENAZ; (2.) RIPHATH; (3.) TORGAMAIL. (ii.) MAGOG, the Scythians. (iii.) MADAI, Media. (iv.) JAVAN, the Ionians, as a general appellation for the Hellenic race, with whom are associated—(1.) ELISHAH; (2.) TARSHISH; (3.) KITTIM; (4.) DODANIM. (v.) TUBAL, the Tibareni in Pontus. (vi.) MESHECH, the Moschi in northwestern Armenia. (vii.) TIRAS, perhaps Thracia.—(II.) The Hamitic list contains thirty names, of which four represent independent, and the remainder affiliated nations, as follows:—(i.) CUSH, in two branches, the western or African representing Æthiopia, the Kenah of the old Egyptian, and the eastern or Asiatic being connected with the names of the tribe Cossæi, the district Cissia, and the province Susiana or Khuzistan. With Cush are associated—(1.) SEBA; (2.) HAVILAH; (3.) SABTAN; (4.) RAAMAH, with whom are associated—(a) SHEBA, and (b) DEDAN; (5.) SABTECHAH; (6.) NIMRON, a personal and not a geographical name, the representative of the eastern Cushites. (ii.) MIZRAIM, the two Misra, i. e. Upper and Lower Egypt, with whom are connected—(1.) LUDIM; (2.) ANAMIM; (3.) NAPHTCHIM; (4.) PATHRUSIM; (5.) CASLCHIM; (6.) CAPHTORIM; (7.) PHUT. (iii.) CANAAN, to whom belong—(1.) SIDON, the well-known town in Phenicia; (2.) NETH, or the Hittites; (3.) the Jebusite, of Jebus or Jerusalem; (4.) the Amorite; (5.) the Girgasite; (6.) the Hivite; (7.) the Arkite; (8.) the Sinite; (9.) the Arvadite; (10.) the Zemarite; (11.) the Hamathite.—(III.) The Shemitic list contains twenty-five names, of which five refer to independent, and the remainder to affiliated tribes, as follows:—(i.) ELAM. (ii.) ASSHUR. (iii.) ARPHAXAD, with whom are associated—(1.) SALAH; Salah's son (a) EBER; and Eber's two sons (a') PELEG and (b') JOKTAN, with thirteen sons of Joktan, viz.:—(a'') ALMODAD, (b'') SHELEPH, (c'') HAZARMAVETH, (d'') JERAH, (e'') HADORAM, (f'') UZAL, (g'') DIKLATH, (h'') ORAL or EBAL, (i'') ABIMAEEL, (j'') SHEBA, (k'') OTHUR, (l'') HAVILAH, (m'') JOBAH. (iv.) LUD. (v.) ARAM, with whom are associated—

(1.) UZ; (2.) HUL; (3.) GETHER; (4.) MASH. One name noticed in the table, viz. PHILISTIM, occurs in the Hamitic division (Gen. x. 14), but without any direct assertion of Hamitic descent. The total number of names noticed in the table, including Philistim, would thus amount to seventy, which was raised by patristic writers to seventy-two. Before proceeding further, it would be well to discuss a question materially affecting the historical value of the Mosaic table, viz. the period to which it refers. On this point very various opinions are entertained. Knobel, conceiving it to represent the commercial geography of the Phenicians, assigns it to about 1200 B. C., while others allow it no higher antiquity than the Babylonish Captivity. Internal evidence leads us to refer it to the age of Abraham, because—(a.) the Canaanites were as yet in undisputed possession of Palestine; (b.) the Philistines had not concluded their migration; (c.) Tyre is unnoticed; (d.) various places such as Simyra (Zemarite), Sinna (Sinite), and Arca (Arkite), are noticed, which had fallen into insignificance in later times; (e.) Kittim, which in Solomon's age was under Phenician dominion, is assigned to Japheth, and so Tarshish, which in that age undoubtedly referred to the Phenicianemporium of Tartessus, whatever may have been its earlier significance. The chief objection to so early a date as Abraham's time is the notice of the Medes under the name Madai. The Aryan nation, which bears this name in history, appears not to have reached its final settlement until about 900 B. C.; but the name Media may have belonged to the district before the arrival of the Aryan Medes.—The Mosaic table is supplemented by ethnological notices relating to the various divisions of the Terabite family (NAHOR 2, ABRAHAM, ISHMAEL, KETURAH, ENOM, MIDIAN, HARAN 3, LOT, MOAB, AMMON, &c.).—Besides the nations whose origin is accounted for in the Bible, we find other early populations mentioned in the history without any notice of their ethnology (Amalekites, Anakims, Avims, Emims, Hittims, Rephaims, Zamzumims, and Zuzims). As these fragmentary populations intermingled with the Canaanites, they probably belonged to the same stock (compare Num. xiii. 22; Judg. i. 10). They may have belonged to an earlier migration than the Canaanitish, and may have been subdued by the later comers; but this would not necessitate a different origin.—Having thus surveyed the ethnological statements in the Bible, it remains to inquire how far they are based on, or accord with, physiological or linguistic principles. Knobel maintains that the three-fold division of the Mosaic table is founded on the physiological principle of color, SHAM, HAM, and JAPHETH representing respectively the red, black, and white complexions prevalent in the different regions of the then known world; but the etymological argument weakens rather than sustains his view, and, while it is quite consistent with the physical character of the districts that the Hamites of the south should be dark, the Japhetites of the north fair, and the Shemites intermediate in color as in geographical position, we have no evidence that this distinction was strongly marked.—The linguistic difficulties connected with the Mosaic table are very considerable, and there are many conflicting opinions on the subject. The primary difficulty is that of accounting for the evident identity of language spoken by the Shemitic Terabites and the Hamitic Canaanites. The alternatives hitherto offered as satisfactory solutions, viz. that the Terabites adopted the language of the Canaanites, or the Canaanites that of the Terahites, are both inconsistent with the enlarged area which the language covers on each side. The real question at issue concerns the language not of the whole Hamitic family, but of the Canaanites and Cushites. Knobel supposes that the Canaanites acquired a Shemitic language from a prior population, represented by the Rephaites, Zuzim, Zamzumim, &c.; Bunsen, that they were a Shemitic race who had long sojourned in Egypt: but neither of these explanations is satisfactory. With regard to the Cushites, the only explanation is that a Joktanid immigration supervened on the original Hamitic population, the result being a combination of Cushitic civilization with a Shemitic language; but time and research may clear up much of the mystery on this subject. That the Egyptian language exhibits many striking and valuable points of resemblance to the Shemitic type is acknowledged on all sides; but there is not an equal degree of agreement among scholars as to the deductions to be drawn from these resemblances. Turning eastward to the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates, and the adjacent countries, the examination of the inscriptions recently discovered has not yet yielded undisputed results. The Mosaic table places a Shemitic population in Assyria and Elam, and a Cushitic one in Babylon. Sufficient evidence is afforded by language that the basis of the population in Assyria was Shemitic; and the inscriptions especially of the neighborhood of Susa may ultimately establish the fact of a Shemitic population in Elam. The presence of a Cushitic population in Babylon is very generally held on linguistic grounds; and a close identity is said to exist between the old Babylonian and the Mahri language, a Shemitic tongue of an ancient type still living in a district of Hadramaut, in southern Arabia. With regard to ARABIA, the Mosaic table is confirmed by modern research. The Cushitic element has left memorials of its presence in the south in the vast ruins of Mareh and Sana, as well as in its influence on the Himyaritic and Mahri languages, as compared with the Hebrew. The Joktanid element forms the basis of the Arabian population, the Shemitic character of whose language needs no proof. (SHEMITIC LANGUAGES.)—It remains to be inquired how far the Japhetic stock represents the linguistic characteristics of the Indo-European and Turanian families. Dividing the Indo-European, as suggested by the name itself, into the eastern and western; and subdividing the eastern into the Indian and Iranian, and the western into the Celtic, Hellenic, Illyrian, Italian, Teutonic, Slavonian, and Lithuanian classes, we are able to assign Madai (Media) and Togarmah (Armenia) to the Iranian class; Javan (Ionian) and Elishah (Eolian) to the Hellenic; Gomer conjecturally to the Celtic; and Dodanim, also conjecturally, to the Illyrian. According to the old interpreters, Ashkenaz represents the Teutonic class, while, according to Knobel, the Italian would be represented by Tarshish, whom he identifies with the Etruscans; the Slavonian by Magog; and the Lithuanian possibly by Tiras. Knobel also identifies Riphath with the Gauls, as distinct from the Cymry or Gomer; and Kittim (not improbably) with the Carians, at one period predominant on the islands adjacent to Asia Minor. The evidence for these identifications varies in strength, but in no instance approaches to demonstration. Whether the Turanian family is fairly represented in the Mosaic table may be doubted. Those who advocate the Mongolian origin of the Scythians would naturally regard Magog as the representative of this family; and those who dissent from this theory might still regard Magog as applied broadly to all the nomad tribes of northern Asia, whether Indo-European or Turanian. Tubal and Meshech Knobel identifies respectively with the Iberians and the Ligurians, both perhaps Turanians.—II. The question now comes, How far do the present results of ethnological science support the general idea of the unity of the human race, which underlies the Mosaic system? The chief and often only instrument at our command for ascertaining the relationship of nations is language. The nomenclature of modern ethnology is not identical with that of the Bible, partly from the enlargement of the area, and partly from the general adoption of language as the basis of classification. The term Shemitic is retained, not, however, to indicate a descent from Shem, but the use of languages allied to the Hebrew. Hamitic, also, is used as subordinate to, or coördinate with, Shemitic (see A, III., above). Japhetic is superseded mainly by Indo-European or Aryan. The various nations or families of nations which find no place under the Biblical titles are classed by some ethnologists as Turanian, by others broken up into divisions more or less numerous. (1.) A marked characteristic of the Shemitic family is its inelasticity. It has expanded only about the Mediterranean through the commercial colonies of the PHENICIANS. (SHEMITIC LANGUAGES.) The bulk of the North African languages, both ancient and modern, though not properly Shemitic, so far resemble that type as to be called sub-Shemitic. South of Egypt the Shemitic type is reproduced in the majority of the Abyssinian languages, and Shemitic influence may be traced along the eastern coast of Africa as far as Mozambique. As to the languages of the interior and south, Rénan denies any resemblance to the Shemitic type, while Latham asserts that connecting links exist between the sub-Shemitic languages of the north, the Negro languages in the centre, and the Caffre languages of the south, and that the Hottentot language is not so isolated as has been generally supposed. Bunsen supports this view as to the languages N. of the equator, but regards the Southern as rather of the Turanian type. The Indo-European family of languages consists now of nine classes, viz. two Eastern or Aryan (Indian and Iranian) and seven Western (Celtic, Italian, Albanian, Greek, Teutonic, Lithuanian, and Slavonian). Language and race are, indeed, by no means coextensive (e.g. Celtic, Italian, &c.). But, while the races have so intermingled as often to lose all trace of their original individuality, the broad fact of their descent from one or other of the branches of the Indo-European family remains unaffected. In Asia the languages fall into two large classes—the monosyllabic, represented by the Chinese—and the agglutinative, represented by the various nations classed by Müller as Turanian, and falling geographically into two divisions, viz. the Northern or Ural-Altaian, a well-defined group with five branches (Tungusian, Mongolian, Turkish, Samoidic, and Finnish), and the Southern with four classes (Tamulian, Bhotiya and Lotihic languages, Tai, Malay). The languages of Oceania are generally supposed to be connected with the Malay class; but the linguistic and ethnological relations between the Malay and the black or Negrito population found on many of the groups of islands are not well defined. The polysynthetic languages of North America are regarded as of the Mongolian stock, and a close affinity is said to exist between the North American and the Kamtchadale and Korean languages on the opposite coast of Asia. The tendency of all linguistic and ethnological research is to discover the elements of unity amidst the most striking external varieties. Already the myriads of the human race are massed together into a few large groups, and we are firmly persuaded that in their broad results these sciences will yield an increasing testimony to the truth of the BIBLE. INSPIRATION; MAN.

Tongues, Gift of.—I. The Gr. glôssa, or glôssa, uniformly translated "TONGUE," and employed throughout the N. T. in designating the gift now under consideration, is used—(1.) for the bodily organ of speech; (2.) in Aristotle, for a foreign word, imported and half naturalized in Greek, and hence needing explanation; (3.) in Hellenistic Greek, for "speech" or "language." (A) Eichhorn and Bardili, and to some extent Bunsen, starting from the first, see in the so-called gift an inarticulate utterance. (B) Bleek adopts the second meaning, and infers that to speak in tongues was to use unusual, poetic language. (C) The received traditional view, which starts from the third meaning, and sees in the gift of tongues a distinctly linguistic power, commends itself most (so Prof. Plumptre).—II. The chief passages from which we have to draw our conclusion as to the nature and purpose of the gift in question are—(1.) Mk. xvi. 17; (2.) Acts ii. 1–13, x. 46, xix. 6; (3.) 1 Cor. xii., xiv.—III. The promise of a new power coming from the Divine Spirit, giving not only comfort and insight into truth, but fresh powers of utterance of some kind, appears once and again in our Lord's teaching. The disciples are to take no thought what they shall speak, for the Spirit of their Father shall speak in them (Mat. x. 19, 20; Mk. xiii. 11). Galilean peasants are to speak freely and boldly before kings. In Mk. xvi. 17 a more definite term is employed: "They shall speak with new tongues." The obvious meaning of the promise is that the disciples should speak in new languages which they had not learned as other men learn them.—IV. The wonder of the day of PENTECOST (Acts ii.) is, in its broad features, familiar. Suddenly there swept over them "the sound as of a rushing mighty wind" (compare Ez. i. 24, xliii. 2). "There appeared unto them tongues like as of fire." The tongues were distributed (A. V. "cloven"), lighting upon each of them. "And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." The narrative that follows conveys the impression that the disciples were heard to speak in languages of which they had no colloquial knowledge previously (6–12). What view are we to take of a phenomenon so marvellous and exceptional? What views have men actually taken? (1.) The prevalent belief of the Church has been that in the Pentecostal gift the disciples received a supernatural knowledge of all such languages as they needed for their work as Evangelists. The knowledge was permanent, and could be used at their own will. This belief goes beyond the data with which the N. T. supplies us. Each instance of the gift recorded in the Acts connects it, not with teaching, but with praise and adoration; not with the normal order of men's lives, but with exceptional epochs in them. The speech of St. Peter which follows (Acts ii. 14 ff.), like most other speeches addressed to a Jerusalem audience, was spoken apparently in Aramaic. When St. Paul, who "spoke with tongues more than all," was at Lystra, no mention is made of his using the language of Lycaonia. It is almost implied that he did not understand it (xiv. 11). Not one word in the discussion of spiritual gifts in 1 Cor. xii.–xiv. implies that the gift was of this nature, or given for this purpose. Nor, it may be added, within the limits assigned by the providence of God to the working of the Apostolic Church, was such a gift necessary. Aramaic (SEMITIC LANGUAGES), GREEK, LATIN, the three languages of the inscription on the cross, were media of intercourse throughout the empire. (2.) Some interpreters have seen their way to another solution of the difficulty by changing the character of the miracle, making it consist not in any new power bestowed on the speakers, but in the impression produced on the hearers. Thus, words which the Galilean disciples uttered in their own tongue were heard, or seemed to be heard, by those who listened as if uttered in their native speech. Weighty reasons against this hypothesis are—(a.) It is at variance with the distinct statement of Acts ii. 4, "They began to speak with other tongues." (b.) It at once multiplies the miracle, and degrades its character. Not the 120 disciples, but the whole multitude of many thousands, are in this case the subjects of it. (c.) It involves an element of falsehood. The miracle, on this view, was wrought to make men believe what was not actually the fact. (d.) It is altogether inapplicable to the phenomena of 1 Cor. xiv. (3.) Critics of a negative school have rejected the narrative either altogether or in part. (INSPIRATION; MIRACLES).—V. What, then, are the facts actually brought before us? What inferences may be legitimately drawn from them? (1.) The utterance of words by the disciples in other languages than their own Galilean Aramaic is distinctly asserted. (2.) The words spoken appear to have been determined, not by the will of the speakers, but by the Spirit which "gave them utterance." (3.) The word translated "utterance" in Acts ii. 4 (the Gr. verb apophthengomai = to utter forth, speak out, declare, kbn. N. T. Lex.; translated "said" in ver. 14, and "speak forth" in xvi. 25) has in the LXX. a special association with the oracular speech of true or false prophets, and appears to imply some peculiar, perhaps musical, solemn intonation (compare 1 Chr. xxv. 1, A. V. "prophecy," Ez. xiii. 9, A. V. "divine"). (4.) The "tongues" were used as an instrument not of teaching but of praise. (5.) Those who spoke them seemed to others to be under the influence of some strong excitement, "full of new wine" (Acts ii. 13). (6.) Questions as to the mode of operation of a power above the common laws of bodily or mental life lead us to a region where our words should be "wary and few." In all likelihood such words as they then uttered had been heard by the disciples before. At previous Jewish feasts they must have met a varied crowd, the pilgrims of each nation uttering their praises and doxologies; but before, the Galilean peasants had stood in that crowd, neither heeding, nor understanding, nor remembering what they heard, still less able to reproduce it; now they had the power of speaking it clearly and freely. The Divine work would in this case take the form of a supernatural exaltation of the memory, not of imparting a miraculous knowledge of words never heard before. (7.) The gift of tongues, the ecstatic burst of praise, is definitely asserted to be a fulfilment of Joel ii. 28. We are led, therefore, to look for that which answers to the Gift of Tongues in the other element of prophecy included with teaching in the O. T. use of the word (PROPHET), viz. the ecstatic praise, the burst of song (1 Sam. x. 5-13, xix. 20-24; 1 Chr. xxv. 3; compare 1 Cor. xiv.). (8.) The other instances in the Acts offer essentially the same phenomena. By implication in xiv. 15-19, by express statement in x. 47, xi. 15, 17, xix. 6, it belongs to special critical epochs, the exercise of the gift being at once connected with and distinguished from "prophecy" in its N. T. sense.—VI. The First Epistle to the Corinthians supplies fuller data. The spiritual gifts are classified and compared, arranged, apparently, according to their worth, placed under regulation. The facts which may be gathered are briefly these:—(1.) The phenomena of the gift of tongues were not confined to one Church or section of a Church. (2.) The comparison of gifts, in both the lists given by St. Paul (1 Cor. xii. 8-10, 28-30; comp. 31, xiv. 5, 13, 20, 23, 39), places that of tongues, and the interpretation of tongues, lowest in the scale. (3.) The main characteristic of the "tongue" is that it is unintelligible. The man "speaks mysteries," prays, blesses, gives thanks, in the tongue (xiv. 15, 16), but no one understands him. He can hardly be said, indeed, to understand himself (ver. 14). (4.) The peculiar nature of the gift leads the apostle into what appears at first a contradiction. "Tongues are for a sign," not to believers, but to those who do not believe; yet the effect on unbelievers is not that of attracting, but repelling. They disturb, startle, awaken, are given for astonishing, but are not and cannot be the grounds of conviction and belief. Therefore it is that, for those who believe already, prophecy is the greater gift. (5.) There remains the question whether these also were "tongues" in the sense of being languages. It must have been from the phenomena of Pentecost that the word tongue derived its new and special meaning. The companion of St. Paul, and St. Paul himself, were likely to use the same word in the same sense. The "divers kinds of tongues" (1 Cor. xii. 28), the "tongues of men" (xiii. 1), point to differences of some kind, and it is easier to conceive of these as differences of language than as belonging to utterances all equally wild and inarticulate. The utterances of the tongues may have been in whole or in part Hebrew and Aramaic words (compare xvi. 22 with xii. 3; Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6). "Tongues of angels" in 1 Cor. xiii. 1 may be connected with the words surpassing human utterance, which St. Paul heard as in Paradise (2 Cor. xii. 4), and these again with the great Hallelujah hymns of Rev. xix. 1-6. (6.) Here also, as in Acts ii., we have to think of some peculiar intonation as frequently characterizing the exercise of the "tongues." The analogies which suggest themselves to St. Paul's mind are those of the pipe, the harp, the trumpet (1 Cor. xiv. 7, 8). In the case of one "singing in the spirit" (xiv. 15), but not with the understanding also, the strain of ecstatic melody must have been all that the listeners could perceive (compare Eph. v. 19). (7.) Connected with the "tongues," was the corresponding power of interpretation (1 Cor. xiv. 13, 27). Its function must have been twofold. The interpreter had first to catch the foreign words, Aramaic or others, which had mingled more or less largely with what was uttered, and then to find a meaning and an order in what seemed at first to be without either. Under the action of one with this insight the wild utterances of the "tongues" might become a treasure-house of deep truths. Sometimes the tongues appear to have passed beyond the limits of interpretation (xiv. 7-11).—VII. (1.) Traces of the gift are found in Romans, Galatians, and Ephesians. From the Pastoral Epistles, from those of St. Peter and St. John, they are altogether absent, and this is in itself significant of a calmer, more normal state. (2.) Probably, however, the disappearance of the "tongues" was gradual. Irenæus testifies that there were brethren in his time "who had prophetic gifts, and spoke through the Spirit in all kinds of tongues." For the most part, however, the part which they had filled in the worship of the Church was supplied by the "hymns and spiritual songs" of the succeeding age. After this, within the Church we lose nearly all traces of them.—VIII. (i.) A wider question of deep interest presents itself. Can we find in the religious history of mankind any facts analogous to the manifestation of the "tongues?" The three characteristic phenomena are, as has been seen, (1.) an ecstatic state of partial or entire unconsciousness; (2.) the utterance of words in tones startling and impressive, but often conveying no distinct meaning; (3.) the use of languages which the speaker at other times was unable to converse in. (ii.) The O. T. presents us with some instances in which the gift of prophecy has accompaniments of this nature (1 Sam. xix. 24). (iii.) We cannot exclude the false prophets and diviners of Israel from the range of our inquiry. We have distinct records of strange, mysterious intonations. The ventriloquist wizards "peep and mutter" (Is. viii. 19); the "voice of one who has a familiar spirit" comes low out of the ground (xxix. 4; DIVINATION; MAGIC). (iv.) The quotation by St. Paul (1 Cor. xiv. 21) from Is. xxviii. 11 is significant. With the phenomena of the "tongues" present to his mind, he saw in them the fulfilment of the prophet's words. A remarkable parallel to the text thus interpreted is found in Hos. ix. 7. (v.) The history of heathen oracles presents examples of the orgiastic state, in which the wisest of Greek thinkers recognized the lower type of inspiration. (DIVINATION; ORACLE; PYTHON.) (vi.) More distinct parallels are found in the accounts of the wilder, more excited sects (Montanists, &c.) which have, from time to time, appeared in the history of Christendom. (vii.) The French prophets at the commencement of the eighteenth century claimed the gift of tongues. (viii.) The so-called "Unknown Tongues" manifested themselves first in the W. of Scotland, and afterward (1830) in the Caledonian Church in Regent Square, London, among the followers of the late Edward Irving. Here, more than in most other cases, were the conditions of long, eager expectation, fixed brooding over one central thought, the mind strained to a preternatural tension. Suddenly, now from one, now from another, chiefly from women, devout but illiterate, mysterious sounds were heard. Irving himself has left on record his testimony, that to him they seemed to embody a more than earthly music, leading to the belief that the "tongues" of the Apostolic age had been as the archetypal melody of which all the Church's chants and hymns were but faint, poor echoes. To those who were without, on the other hand, they seemed but an unintelligible gibberish, the yells and groans of madmen. The speaker was commonly unable to interpret what he uttered. (ix.) In certain exceptional states of mind and body the powers of memory receive a wonderful and abnormal strength. In the delirium of fever, in the ecstasy of a trance, men speak in their old age languages which they have never heard or spoken since their earliest youth. In all such cases the marvelous power is the accompaniment of disease.—IX. The phenomena which have been described (VIII. above) are, with hardly an exception, morbid; the precursors or the consequences of clearly-recognizable disease. The Gift of Tongues was bestowed on men in full vigor and activity, preceded by no frenzy, followed by no exhaustion. The gift of the day of Pentecost was the starting-point of the long history of the Church of Christ, the witness, in its very form, of a universal family gathered out of all nations. It belonged, however, to a critical epoch, not to the continuous life of the Church. It implied a disturbance of the equilibrium of man's normal state. It was a sign, but not the instrument for building up the Church (1 Cor. xiii. 8). SPIRIT; SPIRIT, THE HOLY.

* Tooth, pl. TEETH (Heb. and Chal. usually shên; Gr. odous), used mostly in a literal sense in respect to men and animals (Gen. xlix. 12; Ex. xxi. 24, 27; Deut. xxxii. 24; Mat. v. 38, &c.), sometimes denoting that which resembles a tooth, as the tine or prong of a fork or flesh-hook (1 Sam. ii. 13), a sharp rock, peak of a hill (xiv. 5 margin, text "fore-front"), &c. The Hebrew word is frequently rendered "ivory." "Cleanness of teeth" indicates hunger or famine (Am. iv. 6); "gnashing of teeth," i. e. striking or grinding the teeth together, indicates violent passion, as rage, anguish, or desperation (Ps. xxxv. 16; Mat. viii. 12, &c.); "to cast in one's teeth" (xxvii. 44) = to revile or reproach. "I am escaped with the skin of my teeth" (Job xix. 20), Gesenius explains "scarcely do my gums remain from disease and wasting;" Fürst says, "i. e. my gums being almost taken away;" others have referred "the skin of the teeth" to the lips, enamel, &c. "Tooth for tooth" was an instance of compensation in PUNISHMENTS (Ex. xxi. 24, &c.).

To-parch-y, or Top-arch-y [ch pronounced as k], an Anglicized form of the Gr. toparchia, once (1 Mc. xi. 28) applied in the LXX. to the three districts (APHEREMA, LYDDA, and RAMATHEN) to which elsewhere (x. 30, xi. 34) the Greek name nomos is given. In all these passages the A. V. has "governments." The "toparchies" or governments seem to have been of the nature of agalties, and the passages in which the Gr. word toparchês, i. e. a toparch or ruler of a toparchy, occurs (Gen. xli. 34, A. V. "officer;" 2 K. xviii. 24, A. V. "captain;" Dan. iii. 2, 3, A. V. "governor"), all harmonize with the view of that functionary as the aga, whose duty would be to collect the taxes and administer justice in all cases affecting the revenue, and who, for the purpose of enforcing payment, would have the command of a small military force.

To-paz (Heb. piddik; Gr. topazion), a precious stone, the second in the first row of the high-priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 17. xxxix. 10), an Ethiopian gem (Job xxviii. 19), one of the jewels of the Tyrian king (Ez. xxviii. 13), the ninth foundation of the wall of New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20). The ancient "topaz" was probably the modern CHRYSOLITE, which is a green mineral, a silicate of magnesia and iron. For the modern Oriental topaz (= ancient chrysolite), see ADAMANT and SAPPHIRE.

To'phel (Heb. limc, Ges.), a place mentioned in Deut. i. 1 only; probably (so Mr. Hayman, after Robinson, Winer, Gesenius, &c.) at Tufileh or Wady

Tufileh, fifteen or twenty miles S. E. of the Dead Sea. SEA, THE SALT.

To'phet (L. form), and To'pheth (Heb. place to be spit upon, to be abhorred, Ges.; see below), a place which lay somewhere E. or S. E. of JERUSALEM, in "the Valley of the Son of Hinnom," which is "by the entry of the east gate" (2 K. xxiii. 10; Is. xxx. 33; Jer. vii. 31, 32, xix. 6, 11-14). It was not identical with Hinnom, but was in it, and seems also to have been part of the king's gardens, and watered by SILOAM, perhaps a little to the S. of the present Birket el-Hamra (so Dr. Bonar, original author of this article). The N. T. does not refer to it, nor the Apocrypha, nor Josephus. Jerome is the first who notices it; but we can see that by his time the name had disappeared. Hinnom by old writers, western and eastern, is always placed east of the city, and corresponds to what we call the "Mouth of the Tyropæon." Tophet has been variously translated. Jerome says breath or width; others garden, drum, place of burning or burying, abomination, &c. The most natural seems that suggested by the occurrence in two consecutive verses of the two nearly identical Hebrew words, for which the A. V. has "TABLET" and "TOPHET" (Is. xxx. 32, 33). Tophet was probably the king's tabret-grove, or valley, or garden, denoting originally nothing evil or hateful. Certainly there is no proof that it took its name from the drums beaten to drown the cries of the burning victims that passed through the fire to MOLECH. Afterward, defiled by idols, and polluted by the sacrifices of Baal and the fires of Molech, it became the place of abomination, the very gate or pit of HELL. The pious kings defiled it, and threw down its altars and high places, pouring into it all the filth of the city, till it became the "abhorrence" of Jerusalem.

* Torch. LAMP; LANTERN.

Tormah (Heb., see below) occurs only in the margin of Judg. ix. 31. The Heb. b'tormâh, translated "craftily," or "to Tormah" in the margin, is translated "privily" in the text, and in fraud or in deceit by Gesenius, Bush, &c. A few commentators have conjectured that the word was originally the same with ARUMAH in ver. 41.

* Tor-ment'or, the A. V. translation of Gr. bassanistês, properly a torturer, examiner, inquisitor; but in the N. T. (so Grotius, Robinson, L. & S.) a jailer or prison-keeper (Mat. xviii. 34 only). Meyer and Lange sustain the literal rendering of the A. V., "tormentor." Among the ancient Romans a creditor might use certain legal tortures, as a heavy chain and a system of half-starvation, to extort from the debtor a confession of any concealed treasures, or bring him to terms (Dr. Schaff, in Lange's Comm. on Mat., l. c.).

Tor'toise [-is], the A. V. translation of Heb. tsib,

Tortoise (Emys Caspica).—Fla.)

which occurs only in Lev. xi. 29, as the name of some unclean animal. Bochart with much reason (so Mr. Houghton, with Gesenius, Fürst, W. L. Alexander [in Kitto], &c.) refers the Hebrew term to the kindred Arabic dhab, "a large kind of LIZARD," apparently the terrestrial monitor or skink of Egypt (Psammisaurus Scincus or Monitor terrestris of Cuvier), which is three or four feet long, and common in the deserts of Palestine and N. Africa. Mr. Gosse (in Fairbairn) favors the rendering "tortoise," in which the A. V. follows Elias Levita. Various fresh-water tortoises, land-tortoises, and sea-tortoises are found in Palestine and its neighborhood. The Emys Caspica is a marsh tortoise, found in Europe, Palestine, &c. PALESTINE, Zoology.

Terrestrial Monitor or Skink of Egypt (Psammisaurus Scincus).

To'a (Heb.) = TOI (1 Chr. xviii. 9, 10).

*Tow [to], the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. ne'oreth = tow, as shaken or beaten off from flax, Gesenius, Fürst (Judg. xvi. 9; Is. i. 31).—2. Heb. pishlûh = a wick, as made of LINEN, Ges. (xliii. 17); elsewhere = "FLAX," A. V., Gesenius, Fürst.

Tower (Heb. migdâl, mgdôl, &c.; Gr. purgos). For towers as parts of city-walls, or as strongholds of refuge in villages, see ANTONIA; FENCED CITY; HANANEL; JERUSALEM; LACHISH; MEAH; MIGDOL; OPHEL; SIOAM; WAR, &c. Watch-towers or fortified posts in frontier or exposed situations are mentioned in Scripture, as the tower of EDAR, LEBANON, &c. (Gen. xxxv. 21; Mic. iv. 8; Is. xxi. 5, 8, 11, &c.; SHEPHERD). Remains of such fortifications may still be seen, which probably have succeeded to more ancient structures built in the same places for like purposes. Towers were also built in vineyards as an almost necessary appendage to them (Is. v. 2; Mat. xxi. 33; Mk. xii. 1). Such towers are still in use in Palestine in vineyards, especially near Hebron, and are used as lodges for the keepers of the vineyards. God is figuratively spoken of as a "tower" (Ps. lxi. 3); likewise (so Gesenius) proud and powerful men (Is. ii. 15, xxx. 25).

*Town, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. bath, literally "daughter," in specifying small dependent "towns" and "villages" (Josh. xv. 45, 47 twice, xvii. 11 six times, 16, &c.; DAUGHTER 5).—2. Heb. plural havvôth or chavvôth = villages, nomadic encampments, properly places of living or dwelling, Ges.: used only of "the towns of Jair" (Josh. xiii. 30; 1 K. iv. 13; 1 Chr. ii. 23) = "HAVOTH-JAIR," in Num. xxxii. 41 also translated "small towns."

—3. Heb. hâtsér or châtsér (Gen. xxv. 16), usually translated "court" or "VILLAGE." (HAZER.)—4. Heb. 'ir (Deut. iii. 5; 1 Sam. xvi. 4, xxiii. 7), translated "city" more than 1,000 times.—5. Heb. kîr (Josh. ii. 15), elsewhere usually translated "WALL."—6. Heb. plural perdôth (in part) = country regions, open country, Ges. (Ezth. ix. 19, A. V. "unwalled towns"; Zech. ii. 4, Heb. 8, A. V. "towns without walls"); in Ez. xxxviii. 11 translated "unwalled villages."—7. Gr. kômê = a village, hamlet, country-town, without walls, Rbn. N. T. Lxx., L. & S. (Mat. x. 11; Mk. viii. 23, 26 twice, 27; Lk. v. 17, ix. 6, 12; Jn. vii. 42, xi. 1, 30), oftener translated "VILLAGE" (Mat. ix. 35, &c.).—8. Gr. kômopolis = a village-city, i. e. a large village or town like a city, but without walls, Rbn. N. T. Lxx. (Mk. i. 38 only).

Town-clerk, the A. V. translation of the Gr. grammateus (= a writer, scribe, secretary, clerk), the title of the magistrate at EPHESUS who appeased the mob in the theatre at the time of the tumult excited by Demetrius and his fellow-craftsmen (Acts xix. 35). The original service of this class of men was, to record the laws and decrees of the state, and to read them in public (so Prof. Hackett, original author of this article). "On the subjugation of Asia by the Romans," says Baumstark, "grammateis (Gr. plural = scribes, or secretaries) were appointed there in the character of governors of single cities and districts, who even placed their names on the coins of their cities, caused the year to be named from them, and sometimes were allowed to assume the dignity, or at least the name, of high-priest."

Trach-o-ni'tis (Gr. a rugged or stony tract), in Lk. iii. 1 only, probably = ARGOB. From Josephus we gather that it lay S. of Damascus, and E. of Gaulanitis, and bordered on Auranitis and Batanæa. From Ptolemy we learn that it bordered on Batanæa, near the town of Saccæa. In the Jerusalem Gemara it is made to extend as far S. as Bostra. Trachonitis (so Prof. Porter, original author of this article) included the whole of the modern province called el-Lejah, with a section of the plain southward, and also a part of the western declivities of Jebel Haurân. The Lejah is bounded on the E. by the mountains of Batanæa (now Jebel Haurân), on whose slopes are the ruins of Saccæa and KENATH; on the S. by Auranitis (now Haurân), in which are the extensive ruins of Bostra (BOZRAH?); on the W. by Gaulanitis (now Jaldân); and on the N. by Iturea (now Jedûr) and Damascus.

*Trade. ARABIA; COMMERCE; DISPERSION; SOLOMON, &c.

*Tra-di'tion (fr. L.), the A. V. translation of Gr. paradoxis, which, in N. T., = (so Rbn. N. T. Lxx.) anything orally delivered, a precept, ordinance, instruction; applied particularly to the Oral Law of the Jews (PHARISEES; SCRIBES), or their precepts and doctrines handed down from age to age (Mat. xv. 2, 3, 6; Mk. vii. 3, 5, 8, 9, 13; Gal. i. 14; Col. ii. 8); thrice used in a more general sense to denote the precepts and doctrines which the apostles taught (1 Cor. xi. 2, A. V. "ordinances"; 2 Th. ii. 15, iii. 6). The apostles taught first by word of mouth or PREACHING; afterward their instructions were committed to writing, and appear in the GOSPELS, EPISTLES, &c., of the NEW TESTAMENT.

Trance (fr. L. transitus; Gr. ekstasis). (1.) In Num. xxiv. 4, 16, where only in the A. V. of the O. T. this word occurs, there is, as the Italics show, no corresponding word in Hebrew. In the N. T. the word occurs three times (Acts x. 10, xi. 5, xxii. 17), and denotes the condition of seeming death to the outer world, or the state in which a man has passed out of the usual order of his life, beyond the usual limits of consciousness and volition (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article). (2.) From the time of Hippocrates, who uses it to describe the loss of conscious perception, the Greek word (used in the N. T., in this special sense, only by Luke "the physician") had probably borne the medical signification which it has had, with shades of meaning for good or evil, ever since. (3.) In the more precise definitions of modern medical science the ecstatic state appears as one form of catalepsy. In catalepsy pure and simple, there is "a sudden suspension of thought, of sensibility, of voluntary motion." In the ecstatic form of catalepsy, "the patient is lost to all external impressions, but wrapt and absorbed in some object of the imagination." There is, for the most part, a high degree of mental excitement. The patient utters the most enthusiastic and fervid expressions or the most earnest warnings. The character of the whole frame is that of intense contemplative excitement. The causes of this state are to be traced commonly to strong religious impressions. (4.) Whatever explanation may be given of it, it is true of many, if not of most, of those who have left the stamp of their own character on the religious history of mankind, that they have been liable to pass at times into this abnormal state. The union of intense feeling, strong volition, long-continued thought (the conditions of all wide and lasting influence), aided in many cases by the withdrawal from the lower life of the support which is needed to maintain a healthy equilibrium, appears to have been more than the "earthen vessel" will bear. The words which speak of "an ecstasy of adoration" are often literally true. (5.) We are now able to take a true estimate of the trances of Biblical history. As in other things, so also here, the phenomena are common to higher and lower, to true and false systems. We may not point to trances and ecstasies as proofs of a true revelation, still less think of them as at all inconsistent with it. Thus, we have the thing, though not the word, in the "deep sleep," the "horror of great darkness," that fell on Abraham (Gen. xv. 12). Balaam, as if overcome by the constraining power of a Spirit mightier than his own, "sees the vision of God, falling, but with opened eyes" (Num. xxiv. 4). Saul, in like manner, when the wild chant of the prophets stirred the old depths of feeling, himself also "prophesied" and "fell down" (most, if not all, of his kingly clothing being thrown off in the ecstasy of the moment) "all that day and all that night" (1 Sam. xix. 24). Something in Jeremiah made men say of him that he was as one that "is mad and maketh himself a prophet" (Jer. xxix. 26). In Ezekiel the phenomena appear in more wonderful and awful forms (Ez. iii. 15, viii. 3). (6.) As other elements and forms of the prophetic work were revived in "the Apostles and Prophets" of the N. T., so also was this. Though different in form, it belongs to the same class of phenomena as the gift of tongues (TONGUES, GIFT OF), and is connected with "visions and revelations of the Lord." In some cases, indeed, it is the chosen channel for such revelations (Acts x., xi., xxii. 17-21). Wisely for the most part did the apostle draw a veil over these more mysterious experiences (2 Cor. xii. 1-4). PAUL; PETER; PROPHET.

* Trans-fig-ur-a-tion. CESAREA PHILIPPI; HERMON; JESUS CHRIST; TABOR.

* Trans-gres-sion. SIN.

* Treasure [trezh-] (Heb. ôlaiz, hōsen or chōsen, matmôn, plural miacēnth, &c.; Chal. pl. gimār; Gr. thēsaurus, once [Acts viii. 27] gaza), in A. V. = whatever is laid up in store, as provisions, gold and silver, &c.; also the store, repository, or magazine itself; hence, whatever is esteemed precious or highly valued (Gen. xliii. 28; Ex. xix. 5; 1 K. vii. 51; Neh. xii. 44; Job xxxviii. 22 twice; Mat. vi. 21, xiii. 44, 52, &c.). Treasure-cities (Ex. i. 11; RAMESSES) = store-cities, i. e. cities where were magazines or depots of provisions, &c. Treasure-house (Ezr. v. 17; Neh. x. 38, &c.) = storehouse or treasury.

* Treas-ur-er (Heb. and Chal. gizbār; Chal. pl. gedūberin, &c.) = one who has charge of royal treasures or of a TREASURY (Ezr. i. 8, vii. 21; Neh. xiii. 13; Dan. iii. 2, 3, &c.). CHAMBERLAIN; KING; MITHREDATH 1; SHEENA.

* Treas-ur-y, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. ôlaiz = what is laid up, a store or stock of fruit, produce, provision, gold, silver, &c., treasure, a storehouse, garner, Ges. (Josh. vi. 19, 24; 1 Chr. ix. 26, xxviii. 12 twice; 2 Chr. xxxii. 27; Neh. xiii. 12, 13; Ps. cxxiv. 7; Jer. xxxviii. 11), also translated "treasure" (Deut. xxviii. 12, xxxii. 34, &c., often, "storehouse" (1 Chr. xxvii. 25; Ps. xxxiii. 7), "garner" (Joel i. 17), "store" (2 Chr. xi. 11; Mal. iii. 10), &c.—2. Heb. pl. gēndzim = treasures, treasure-chests, Ges. (Esth. iii. 9, iv. 7). (CHEST 2.)—3. Heb. ganzach = treasury of the Temple, Ges. (1 Chr. xxviii. 11 only; see No. 4 below).—4. Gr. gazophylakion = (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) the treasury of the Temple, which, according to the Rabbins, was in the court of the women, where stood thirteen chests (called trumpets from their form) into which the Jews cast their offerings (Mat. xii. 41 twice, 43; Lk. xxi. 1), also, by metonymy, the court itself (Jn. viii. 20).—5. Gr. korbanas = (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) CORBAN; by metonymy, the treasury in the Temple = No. 4 (Mat. xxvii. 6). BARN; FOOD; MONEY; TRIBUTE.

Tres-pas-s-of-fer-ing. SIN-OFFERING.

Tri'al. Information on the subject of trials under the Jewish law will be found in other articles. (APPEAL; BRIBE; CHAIN; COUNCIL; DEPUTY; EXCOMMUNICATION; FETTERS; GOVERNOR; JESUS CHRIST; JUDGE; JUDGMENT; KING; LAWYER; LOT; OATH; OFFICER; ORATOR; PRISON; PROCURATOR; PUNISHMENTS; SANHEDRIM; TORMENTOR; WITNESS.) A few remarks may here be added on judicial proceedings mentioned in Scripture, especially as conducted before foreigners. 1. The trial of our Lord before Pilate was, in a legal sense, a trial for the offence of leze-majesty, punishable, under Roman law, with death (Lk. xxiii. 2, 38; Jn. xii. 12, 15). 2. The trials of the apostles, of St. Stephen, and of St. Paul before the high-priest, were conducted according to Jewish rules (Acts iv., v. 27, vi. 12, xxii. 30, xxiii. 1). 3. The trial (?) of St. PAUL and Silas at PHILIPPI was held before the dunamviri (A. V. "magistrates;" Gr. stratēgoi = pretors), on the charge of innovation in religion—a crime punishable with banishment or death (xvi. 19, 22). 4. The interrupted trial of St. Paul, before the procurator Gallio, was an attempt by the Jews to establish a charge of the same kind (xviii. 19-21). 5. The trials of St. Paul at Cesarea (xxiv., xxv., xxvi.) were conducted according to Roman rules of judicature. In the first of these, before Felix, we observe (a.) the employment by the plaintiffs of a Roman advocate to plead, probably in Latin. (ORATOR; TER-TULLUS.) (b.) The postponement of the trial after St. Paul's reply. (c.) The free custody in which the accused was kept, pending the decision of the judge (xxiv. 23-26). The second formal trial (xxv. 7, 8) presents two new features: (d.) the APPEAL to Cesar, by St. PAUL as a Roman citizen, thus removing the case at once to the jurisdiction of the emperor. (e.) The conference of the procurator with "the council" (xxv. 12), i. e. the assessors, who sat on the bench with him as advisers or assistant judges (so most), or (so Mr. Phillott suggests) the deputies from the Sanhedrim. 6. A judicial assembly, composed of the procurator and his assessors, held its session at Ephesus (xix. 38).

* Tribe (Heb. matteh, shébet; Gr. phulê), sometimes = a race, people, or nation (Ps. lxxiv. 2 marg.; Mat. xxiv. 30); usually a division or branch of a people, especially one of the great divisions of the Israelites (Ex. xxxi. 2, 6; Num. i. ii.; Mat. xix. 28; Rev. vii. &c.). The twelve sons of JACOB became each the head of a tribe, and the two sons of JOSEPH likewise, making thirteen tribes in all; but the tribe of LEVI received no territorial inheritance, so that Israel was usually reckoned as consisting of twelve tribes. CONGREGATION; ELDER; NUMBER, &c.

Tribute (fr. L.; Heb. meches, mas, &c.; Chal. bêlô; Gr. phoros [Lk. xx. 22; xxiii. 2; Rom. xiii. 6, 7], ta didrachma [Mat. xvii. 24 twice], kénos [25, xxii. 17, 19; Mk. xii. 14]). (1.) The chief Biblical facts connected with the payment of tribute are given under TAXES. A few remain to be added in connection with Mat. xvii. 24, 25. The payment of the half-shekel (= half STATER = two drachmæ; see PIECK of SILVER 2), as a fixed annual rate, was of late origin<sup>1</sup> (so Prof. Plumptre), though resting on an ancient precedent (Ex. xxx. 13). It was proclaimed according to Rabbinic rules, on the first of Adar, began to be collected on the 15th, and was due, at least, on the first of Nisan. It was applied to defray the general expenses of the Temple. After the destruction of the Temple it was sequestrated by Vespasian and his successors, and transferred to the Temple of the Capitoline Jupiter. (2.) The explanation thus given of the "tribute" of Mat. xvii. 24 is adopted by Prof. Plumptre, Robinson, Lange, and most commentators. To suppose with Chrysostom, Augustine, Maldonatus, &c., that it was the same as the tribute paid to the Roman emperor (Mat. xxii. 17), is at variance with the distinct statements of Josephus and the Mishna, and takes away the whole significance of our Lord's words. As explained by most commentators, they are an assertion by our Lord of His divine Sonship, an implied rebuke of Peter for forgetting the truth which he had so recently confessed (comp. xvi. 16). Lange (on Mat. xvii. 26, Schaff's ed.) says, "God is king of the Temple-city; hence His Son is free from any ecclesiastical tribute. . . . Meyer reminds us, that although as Messiah Jesus was above the Law, yet in His infinite condescension, He submitted to its demands. . . . But it was inconsistent to reject, and virtually (though perhaps not formally) to excommunicate Jesus, and yet at the same time to demand from him the Temple tribute. And in this sense the apostles themselves were included among the sons ('children'). They were to share in the suffering and in the excommunication of their Master." (3.) But Prof. Plumptre thinks that a higher and broader truth is implied in our Lord's teaching, which he presents as follows. The question whether the cost of the morning and evening sacrifice ought to be defrayed by such a fixed compulsory payment, or left to the free-will offerings of the people, had been contested between the PHARISEES and SADDUCEES, and the former had carried the day after a long struggle and debate. In a hundred different ways, the teaching of our Lord had been in direct antagonism to that of the Pharisees. The collectors of the rate come, half-expecting opposition on this point also. Our Lord, in His answer to Peter, teaches that the offerings of the children of the kingdom should be free, and not compulsory (comp. 2 Cor. ix. 7). The Sanhedrim, by making the Temple-offering a fixed annual tax, collecting it as men collected tribute to Cesar, were placing every Israelite on the footing of a "stranger," not on that of a "son." In proportion to the degree in which any man could claim the title of a Son of God, in that proportion was he "free" from this forced exaction. Yet our Lord adds, "Notwithstanding, lest we should offend them, . . . give unto them for Me and thee" (xvii. 27).

Tribute-money. TAXES; TRIBUTE.

Tripolis (Gr. a union of three cities, L. & S.), an important commercial city of PHENICIA, at one time a point of federal union for ARADUS (ARAD), SIDON, and TYRE. At Tripolis B. C. 351 was planned the simultaneous revolt of the Phœnician cities and the Persian dependencies in Cyprus against the Persian king Ochus. (ZIDON.) The subsequent destruction of Tyre and of Sidon would naturally tend rather to increase than diminish the importance of Tripolis as a commercial port. When DEMETRIUS SOTER succeeded in wresting Syria from the young son of Antiochus (B. C. 161), he landed there and made the place the base of his operations (2 Mc. xiv. 1). The prosperity of the city, so far as appears, continued down to the middle of the sixth century A. C. The possession of a good harbor in so important a point for land-traffic, doubtless combined with the richness of the neighboring mountains in determining the original choice of the site, which seems to have been a factory for the purposes of trade established by the three great Phœnician cities. Each of these held a portion of Tripolis surrounded by a fortified wall. It was laid in ruins by the earthquake of July, A. D. 543. The ancient Tripolis was destroyed by the Sultan El Mansour A. D. 1289; and the modern Tarâbulus or Tripoli is situated a couple of miles to the E., and is no longer a port. El Mina, perhaps on the site of the ancient Tripolis, is a small fishing village. Tarâbulus has 15,000 or 16,000 inhabitants and is the centre of one of the four pashalics of SYRIA.

Troas (Gr. and L. = of Troy, Trojan, Freund), the city from which St. PAUL sailed, in consequence of a divine intimation, to carry the Gospel from ASIA to Europe (Acts xvi. 8, 11). In the next missionary journey, he visited Troas twice (2 Cor. ii. 12, 13; Acts xx. 5, 6), and there restored EUTYCHUS to life. There, after many years, the apostle left (during a journey the details of which are unknown) a cloak and some books and parchments in the house of CARPUS (2 Tim. iv. 18). The full name of the city was Alexandria Troas, and sometimes it was called simply Alexandria, sometimes simply Troas. It was first built by Antigonos (after the death of Alexander the Great), named Antigonía Troas, and peopled with the inhabitants of some neighboring cities; afterward it was embellished by Lysimachus, and named Alexandria Troas. It was on the coast of MYRIA, opposite the southeastern extremity of the island of Tenedos, and a little S. of the ruins of ancient Troy. Under the Romans it was one of the most important towns of the province of ASIA. In St. Paul's time, it was a Roman colony. The ruins, now called Eski-Stamboul (= old Constantinople), are considerable. The walls, which may represent the extent of the city in the apostle's time, enclose a rectangular space, above a mile from E. to W., and nearly a mile from N. to S. The harbor is still distinctly traceable in a basin about 400 feet long and 200 broad.

<sup>1</sup> "There is the clearest proof of its having been collected both before and after the Captivity; allusion is made to it in 2 K. xii. 4 and 2 Chr. xxiv. 9; and both Josephus and Philo testify to its being regularly contributed by all Jews, wherever they were sojourning, and to a regular organization of persons and places for its proper collection and safe transmission to Jerusalem" (Fairbairn).

Tro-gyl'l-nm [-jil-] (fr. Gr.). Samos is exactly opposite the rocky extremity of the ridge of Mycale, called Trogyl'ium in Acts xx. 15 and by Ptolemy. St. PAUL sailed through the narrow channel here at the close of his third missionary journey, and spent the night at Trogyl'ium. It was the time of dark moon, and the navigation of this coast is intricate (so Dr. Howson). A little E. of the extreme point is an anchorage, still called St. Paul's Port.

Troop often in the O. T. represents the Heb. gid'dai, which (so Gesenius) is used mostly of light-armed troops engaged in plundering and predatory excursions (Gen. xli. 19; 1 Sam. xxx. 8, 15 twice [A. V. "company" here and in 28]; 2 Sam. iii. 22; 1 K. xi. 24 [A. V. "band"]; 2 K. v. 2 [A. V. "company"]; 1 Chr. xii. 21 [A. V. "band of the rovers"]; Hos. vi. 9, vii. 1 [A. V. "troop of robbers" in both], &c.). ARMY; MOAB, p. 665; RECHAB 2, &c.

Troph'i-mus (L. fr. Gr. = nourishing, nourished, L. & S.), one of St. Paul's companions. From Acts xx. 4 we learn that Tychicus and Trophimus were natives of ASIA, and travelled with the apostle, in the third missionary journey, from Macedonia as far as Asia, where Tychicus seems to have remained, while Trophimus proceeded with the apostle to Jerusalem. There, as a Gentile and an Ephesian, he was the innocent cause of the tumult in which St. PAUL was apprehended (Acts xxi. 27-29). For a considerable interval now we have no trace of either Tychicus or Trophimus; but in the last letter written by St. Paul, shortly before his martyrdom, from Rome, he mentions both (2 Tim. iv. 12, 20), the latter passage showing that no long time before Trophimus had been with the apostle in the Levant, and had been left in infirm health at Miletus. Trophimus was probably (so Dr. Howson, with Stanley, &c.) one of the two brethren who, with Titus, conveyed the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (2 Cor. viii. 16-24). The story in the Greek Menology that Trophimus was one of the seventy disciples is evidently wrong; the legend that he was beheaded by Nero's orders is possibly true (so Dr. Howson).

Trum'pel. CORNET; JUBILEE; TRUMPETS, FEAST OF.

Trum'p'ets, Feast of (Num. xxix. 1; Lev. xxiii. 24), the feast of the new moon on the first of Tisri. It differed from the ordinary FESTIVALS OF THE NEW MOON in several important particulars. It was one of the seven days of Holy CONVOCATION. Instead of the mere blowing of the trumpets of the Temple at the time of the offering of the sacrifices, it was

"a day of blowing of trumpets." In addition to the daily sacrifices and the eleven victims offered on the first of every month, there were offered a young bullock, a ram, and seven lambs of the first year, with the accustomed meat-offerings, and a kid for a sin-offering (Num. xxix. 1-6). The regular monthly offering was thus repeated, with the exception of one young bullock. It has been conjectured that Ps. lxxxi., one of the songs of Asaph, was composed expressly for the Feast of Trumpets. The psalm is used in the service for the day by the modern Jews. Maimonides considered the Feast of Trumpets a preparation for the solemn humiliation of the Day of Atonement, which followed it within ten days (compare Joel ii. 15). Some have supposed it intended to introduce the seventh or Sabbatical month of the year. Philo and some early Christian writers regarded it as a memorial of the giving of the Law on Sinai. But the common opinion of Jews and Christians is, that it was the festival of the New Year's Day of the civil year, the first of Tisri, the month which commenced the SABBATICAL YEAR and the year of JUBILEE. Some regarded it as the anniversary of the world's birthday.

Try-ph'e-na (fr. Gr. = delicious, delicate, Schl.) and Try-ph'e-sa (L. fr. Gr. = living delicately, Schl.), two Christian women at Rome, saluted by St. Paul as "laboring in the Lord" (Rom. xvi. 12). They may have been sisters, but Dr. Howson supposes them fellow-deaconesses. An improbable tradition makes Tryphena a rich and benevolent Christian widow of Antioch. The columbaria of "Cesar's household" in the Vigna Codini, near Porta San Sebastiana, at Rome, contain the names Tryphena, Philologus, and Julia (15), and Amplias (8).

Try'phon (L. fr. Gr. = reveller, gormandiser, debauchee, Pape), a usurper of the Syrian throne. His proper name was Diodotus, and the surname Tryphon was given to him, or, according to Appian, adopted by him, after his accession to power. He was a native of Cariana, in the district of Apamea (Syria). In the time of ALEXANDER BALAS he was attached to the court; but toward the close of his reign he seems to have joined in the conspiracy to transfer the crown of SYRIA to PTOLEMY PHILOMETOR (1 Mc. xi. 18). After the death of Alexander Balas he took advantage of the unpopularity of DEMETRIUS II. to put forward the claims of ANTIOCHUS VI., the young son of Alexander (xi. 39; a. c. 145). After a time he obtained the support of JONATHAN, and the young king was crowned (a. c. 144). Tryphon, however, soon revealed his real designs on the kingdom, and, fearing the opposition of Jonathan, gained possession of his person by treachery (xii. 39-50), and after a short time put him to death (xiii. 28). He now murdered Antiochus and seized the supreme power (xiii. 31, 32). Demetrius was preparing an expedition against him (a. c. 141), when he was taken prisoner (xiv. 1-3), and Tryphon retained the throne till ANTIOCHUS VII., the brother of Demetrius, drove him to Dora, from which he escaped to Orthosia (xv. 10-14, 37-39; a. c. 139). Not long afterward, being hard pressed by Antiochus, he committed suicide, or, according to other accounts, was put to death by Antiochus. Josephus adds that he was killed at Apamea, the place which he made his headquarters.

Tu'bal (Heb. a flowing forth or going forth, Sim.). Tubal is reckoned with JAVAN and MESHECH among the sons of JAPHETH (Gen. x. 2; 1 Chr. i. 5). The three are associated as trading "the persons of men (SLAVE) and vessels of BRASS" (COPPER) in the market of Tyre (Ez. xxvii. 13). Tubal and Javan (Is. lvi. 19), Meshech and Tubal (Ez. xxxii. 26, xxxviii. 2, 3, xxxix. 1), are nations of the north (xxxviii. 15, xxxix. 2). Josephus identifies the descendants of Tubal with the Iberians, i. e.—not, as Jerome would understand it, Spaniards, but—the inhabitants of a tract of country, between the Caspian and Euxine Seas, which nearly corresponded to the modern Georgia (so Mr. Wright). This approximates to the view of Bchart, who makes the Moschi and Tibareni represent Meshech and Tubal. The Moschi and Tibareni are constantly associated, under the names of Muskai and Tupai, in the Assyrian inscriptions. In the time of Sargon, according to the inscriptions, Ambris, the son of Khuliya, was hereditary chief of Tubal (the southern slopes of Taurus). In former times the Tibareni were probably more important, and the Moschi and Tibareni, Meshech and Tubal, may have been names by which powerful hordes of Scythians were known to the Hebrews. But in history we only hear of them as occupying a small strip of country along the S. E. coast of the Euxine or Black Sea, between Trapezus (Trebizond) and Sinope. Professor Rawlinson conjectures that the Tibareni occupied the coast between Cape Yasoun (Jasonium) and the River Melanthius (Melet Irnak), but if we follow Xenophon, we must place Boon (about ten miles E. of the promontory of Jasonium) as their western boundary, and their eastern limit must be some ten miles E. of the Melet Irnak, perhaps not far from the modern Aptar. In the time of Xenophon the Tibareni were an independent tribe. Long before this they were subject to a number of petty chiefs, which rendered their subjugation by Assyria more easy. The Arabic Version of Gen. x. 2 gives Chormasan and China for Meshech and Tubal; in Eusebius (see Bchart) they are Illyria and Thessaly.

TU BAL-CAIN, or TU BAL-CAIN (Heb., see below), son of LAMECH 1 by his wife Zillah (Gen. iv. 22). He is called "a furberisher of every cutting instrument of copper and iron" (so Mr. Wright; A. V. "an instructor [margin 'whetter'] of every artificer in brass and iron"). A Jewish legend associates him with his father's song. "Lamech was blind," says the story as told by Rashi, "and Tubal-cain was leading him; and he saw Cain, and he appeared to him like a wild beast, so he told his father to draw his bow, and he slew him. And when he knew that it was Cain his ancestor he smote his hands together and struck his son between them. So he slew him, and his wives withdraw from him, and he conciliates them." In this story Tubal-cain is the "young man" of the song. The derivation of the name is extremely obscure. Hasse identifies Tubal-cain with Vulcan. Gesenius supposed it might be compounded of Pers. tupal, iron slag, or scoria, and Ar. kain, a smith; but this etymology Mr. Wright regards as more than doubtful.

TU-BI-EL (fr. Gr. Toubiënoi). The "Jews called Tubieni" (2 Mc. xii. 17) were doubtless those elsewhere mentioned as living in the towns of Toubion (A. V. "TOBIE"), probably = Tob.

TURPEN-TREE occurs only once (Ecclus. xxiv. 16), as the A. V. translation of the Gr. tereminthos or terebinthos, i. e. the Pistacia Terebinthus, terebinth-tree, common in Palestine and the East, supposed by some writers to represent the Heb. elāh = "oak." The terebinth (Ar. butm) occasionally grows to a large size. (ELAH, VALLEY OF; PALESTINE, Botany.) Its small lancet-shaped leaves (so Robinson) fall in the autumn and are renewed in the spring. Its small flowers are followed by small oval berries in clusters. From incisions in the trunk a sort of transparent balsam is said to flow, which constitutes a very pure and fragrant species of turpentine.

TUR'TLE, TUR'TLE-DOVE (Heb. tôr; Gr. trugôn). The name is phonetic, evidently derived from the plaintive cooing of the bird. The turtle-dove occurs first in Scripture in Gen. xv. 9. In the Law of Moses, a pair of turtle-doves, or of young pigeons (DOVE), are constantly prescribed for those too poor to provide a lamb or a kid for SACRIFICE. (NAZARITE; PURIFICATION.) During the early period of Jewish history, there is no evidence of any other bird except the pigeon having been domesticated; and up to the time of Solomon, who may, with the peacock, have introduced other gallinaceous birds from India, it was probably the only poultry known to the Israelites (so Mr. Tristram, original author of this article). Not improbably the palm-dove (Turtur Egyptiacus, Temminck) may in some measure have supplied the sacrifices in the wilderness, for it is found in amazing numbers wherever the palm-tree occurs, whether wild or cultivated. From its habit of pairing for life, and its fidelity for its mate, it was a symbol of purity and an appropriate offering. The regular migration of the turtle-dove and its return in spring are alluded to in Jer. viii. 7, and Cant. ii. 11, 12. It is from its plaintive note doubtless that David in Ps. lxxiv. 19, pouring forth his lament to God, compares himself to a turtle-dove. In Palestine, the rock-dove (Columba livia, Linn.) is very common on all the rocky parts of the coast and in the inland ravines, and from it all the varieties of the domestic pigeon are derived; the ring-dove (Columba Palumbus, Linn.) frequents all the wooded districts of the country; the stock-dove or wild pigeon of Europe (Columba Lænas, Linn.) is as generally but more sparingly distributed. Another species has been observed in the valley of the Jordan, perhaps Columba leuconota, Vigors. The turtledove (Turtur auritus, Linn.) is most abundant, and in the valley of the Jordan, an allied species, the palm-dove, or Egyptian turtle (Turtur Egyptianus, Temminck), is by no means uncommon. CLEAN AND UNCLEAN; FOOD; PALESTINE, Zoology.

Egyptian Turtle or Palm-dove (Turtur Egyptianus).

* Twelve, the = the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ, originally twelve in number (Mat. xxvi. 20, 47; Mk. xiv. 10, 14, 20, 43; Lk. xxii. 47; Jn. vi. 71, xx. 24; 1 Cor. xv. 5; compare Mat. x. 1 ff.; Lk. xxii. 14; Jn. vi. 70, &c.). APOSTLE; NUMBER; TRIBE.

Tych'i-cus [tik'e-kus] (L. fr. Gr. = fortuitous, fortunate, L. & S.), a companion of St. PAUL on some of his journeys, and one of his fellow-laborers in the work of the Gospel. (1.) In Acts xx. 4 he is expressly called (with TROPHIMUS) "of ASIA;" but while Trophimus went with St. Paul to Jerusalem (xxi. 29), Tychicus was left behind in Asia, probably at Miletus (xx. 15, 38). (2.) In St. Paul's first imprisonment he was with the apostle again—"a beloved brother, and a faithful minister and fellow-servant in the Lord" (Col. iv. 7, 8). Together with Onesimus, he was doubtless the bearer of the epistles to the Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon. (3.) The language concerning Tychicus in Eph. vi. 21, 22, is very similar, though not exactly in the same words. (4.) The next references are in the Pastoral Epistles, the first in chronological order being Tit. iii. 12. Here St. Paul (writing possibly from Ephesus; so Dr. Howson, original author of this article; TRUS, EPISTLE 70) says that it is probable he may send Tychicus to Crete, about the time when he himself goes to Nicopolis. (6.) In 2 Tim. iv. 12 (written at Rome during the second imprisonment) he says, "I am herewith sending Tychicus to Ephesus" (so Dr. Howson and Wordsworth; but A.V., Conybeare & Howson, and most render "I have sent"). Bishop Ellicott suggests that this mission may have been connected with the carrying of the first Epistle. The tradition which places him afterward as bishop of Chalcedon, in Bithynia, is apparently of no value. But there is much probability in the conjecture that Tychicus was one of the two "brethren" (Trophimus being the other) who were associated with TITUS (2 Cor. viii. 16-24) in

* Types (Gr. typos, pl. of typos) occurs in A. V. only in 1 Cor. x. 11 margin, where the text has the better rendering "examples," i. e. examples. The Gr. typos (= type) is translated "print" (Jn. xx. 25 twice), "figure" (Acts vii. 43; Rom. v. 14), "fashion" (Acts vii. 44), "manner" (xxiii. 25), "form" (Rom. vi. 17), "example" (1 Cor. x. 6; 1 Tim. iv. 12), "ensample" (1 Cor. x. 11; Phil. iii. 17; 1 Th. i. 7; 2 Th. iii. 9; 1 Pet. v. 3), "pattern" (Tit. ii. 7; Heb. viii. 5). FIRE; INCENSE; LAW OF MOSES III.; MESSIAH; OLD TESTAMENT B; PASSOVER IV.; PROPHECY V. ff. and note; SACRIFICE III.; SERPENT, BRAZEN; SHECHINAH; TABERNACLE, &c.

Tyrannus (L. fr. Gr. = a sovereign, tyrant, L. & S.), a man in whose SCHOOL or place of audience PAUL taught the Gospel for two years, during his sojourn at EPHESUS (Acts xix. 9); probably (so Prof. Hackett, with most commentators) a Greek, and a public teacher of PHILOSOPHY or rhetoric. Meyer, Lightfoot, Vitringa, Doddridge, &c., consider Tyrannus a Jewish RABBI.

Tyre (fr. L. TYRUS; Gr. Tyros; all fr. Heb.; see below), a celebrated commercial city of antiquity, situated in PHENICIA, on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, in latitude 33° 17' N. Its Heb. name Tzor = a rock; which well agrees with the site of Sûr, the modern town, on a rocky peninsula, formerly an island. — Palatyrus (L. fr. Gr. Palatyrus) = Old Tyre. There is no doubt that, previous to the siege of the city by ALEXANDER THE GREAT, Tyre was situated on an island (so Mr. Twissleton, original author of this article); but, according to the tradition of the inhabitants, if we may believe Justin, there was a city on the mainland before there was a city on the island; and the tradition receives some color from the name Palatyrus, or Old Tyre, borne in Greek times by a city on the continent, 30 stadia (nearly 3½ English miles) to the south. But a difficulty arises in supposing that Palatyrus was built before Tyre, as Tyre evidently means a rock, and few persons who have visited the site of Palatyrus can seriously suppose that any rock on the surface there can have given rise to the name. To escape this difficulty, Hengstenberg (improbably) suggests that Palatyrus meant Tyre that formerly existed, and was so named after the destruction of the greater part of it by NEBUCHADNEZZAR to distinguish it from that part of Tyre which continued to exist. Movers suggests that the original inhabitants of the city on the mainland possessed the island as part of their territory, and named their city from the characteristic features of the island, though the island itself was then not inhabited. This explanation and others are equally possible; but this question regarding Palatyrus is merely archaeological, and nothing in Biblical history is affected by it. Nebuchadnezzar necessarily besieged the portion of the city on the mainland, as he had no vessels with which to attack the island, but it is reasonably certain that, in the time of Isaiah and Ezekiel, the heart or core of the city was on the island. The city of Tyre was consecrated to HEBELUS (Melcart; compare SAMSON), who was the principal object of worship to the inhabitants; and Arrian says the temple on the island was the most ancient of all temples within the memory of mankind. It cannot be doubted, therefore, that the island had long been inhabited<sup>1</sup> (compare Isa. xlii. 7), though it is not mentioned either in the Iliad or in the Odyssey.—The tribe of Canaanites inhabiting PHENICIA Proper was known by the generic name of Sidonians (Judg. xviii. 7; Is. xxiii. 2, 4, 12; Josh. xiii. 6; Ez. xxxii. 30); and this name undoubtedly included Tyrians (1 K. v. 8), the inhabitants being of the same race, and the two cities less than 20 English miles apart. (Zidon.) In the Bible, Tyre is first named in Josh. xix. 29, as a fortified city (A. V. "the strong city"), in giving the boundaries of the tribe of Asher. The Israelites dwelt among the Sidonians or Phœnicians who were inhabitants of the land (Judg. i. 31, 32), and never seem to have had any war with that intelligent race. In 2 Sam. xxiv. 7 it is stated that the enumerators of the census in the reign of David went in pursuance of their mission to Tyre, among other cities, implying, not that Tyre was subject to David's authority, but merely that a census was thus taken of the Jews resident there. But the first passages in the Hebrew historical writings or in ancient history generally, which afford glimpses of the actual condition of Tyre, are in 2 Sam. v. 11, in connection with HIRAM king of Tyre sending cedar-wood and workmen to David, for building him a palace; and subsequently in the Book of Kings, in connection with the building of Solomon's Temple. One point at this period is particularly worthy of attention. In contradistinction from all the other most celebrated independent commercial cities out of Phœnicia in the ancient and modern world, Tyre was a monarchy, and not a republic. Another point is the skill in the mechanical arts which seems to have been already attained by the Tyrians. (ARCHITECTURE; COLORS; COPPER; HANDICRAFT; HIRAM 2, &c.) It is evident that under Solomon there was a close alliance between the Hebrews and the Tyrians. Hiram supplied Solomon with cedar-wood, precious metals, and workmen, and sailors for the voyage to OPHIR and India (TARSHISH 2), while Solomon gave Hiram supplies of corn and oil, ceded to him some cities, and permitted him to make use of some havens on the Red Sea (1 K. ix. 11-14, 26-28, x. 22). These friendly relations survived for a time the secession of the Ten Tribes, and a century later Ahab married JEZEBEL, a daughter of ETIBBAAL, king of the Sidonians (1 K. xvi. 31), who, according to Menander, was daughter of Ithobaal, king of Tyre. When mercantile cupidity induced the Tyrians and the neighboring PHENICIANS to buy Hebrew captives from their enemies and to sell them as slaves (SLAVE) to the Greeks and Edomites, there commenced prophetic denunciations, and threats (Joel ii. 4-8; Am. i. 9, 10). Accordingly, when SHALMANESER, king of Assyria, had taken Samaria, conquered the kingdom of Israel and carried its inhabitants into captivity, he turned his arms against the Phœnician cities. At this time Tyre had reached a high point of prosperity. It had planted the splendid colony of Carthage (ROME); it possessed CYPRUS; and, apparently, Sidon was subject to it. Shalmaneser seems to have taken advantage of a revolt of the Cyprians; and what ensued is thus related by Menander, who translated the archives of Tyre into Greek (in Jos. ix. 14, § 2): "Eluleus reigned thirty-six years (over Tyre). This king, upon the revolt of the Citteans (Cyprians), sailed with a fleet against them, and reduced them to submission. On the other hand, the king of the Assyrians attacked in war the whole of Phœnicia, but soon made peace with all, and turned back. On this, Sidon and Ace (i. e. ACCUO or Acre) and Palætyrus revolted from the Tyrians, with many other cities which delivered themselves up to the king of Assyria. Accordingly, when the Tyrians would not submit to him, the king returned and fell upon them again, the Phœnicians having furnished him with 60 ships and 800 rowers. Against these the Tyrians sailed with 12 ships, and, dispersing the fleet opposed to them, they took 500 men prisoners. The reputation of all the citizens in Tyre was hence increased. Upon this the king of the Assyrians, moving off his army, placed guards at their river and aqueducts to prevent the Tyrians from drawing water. This continued for five years, and still the Tyrians held out, supplying themselves with water from wells." In reference to this siege the prophecy against Tyre in Is. xxiii. was uttered. After the siege of Tyre by Shalmaneser (not long after 721 B. C.), Tyre remained a powerful state with its own kings (Jer. xxv. 22. xxvii. 3; Ez. xxviii. 2-12), remarkable for its wealth, with territory on the mainland, and protected by strong fortifications (xxviii. 5, xxvi. 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, xxvii. 11; Zech. ix. 3). Our knowledge of its condition thenceforward until the siege by Nebuchadnezzar depends entirely on notices of it by the Hebrew prophets; but some of these notices are singularly full, and especially Ez. xxvii. furnishes us on some points with details such as have scarcely come down to us respecting any one city of antiquity, except Rome and Athens. Tyre, like Carthage, employed mercenary soldiers (Ez. xxvii. 10, 11). Ezekiel gives interesting details respecting the trade of Tyre. It appears that its gold came from ARABIA by the Persian Gulf (ver. 22), just as in the time of Solomon it came from Arabia by the Red Sea. Its silver, iron, lead, and tin came from the S. of Spain, where the Phœnicians had established their settlement of TARSHISH, or Tartessus. Copper, we should have presumed, was obtained from the valuable mines in Cyprus; but it is mentioned here (A. V. "BRASS") in conjunction with JAVAN, TUBAL, and MESIECH, which points to the districts on the S. of the Black Sea, in the neighborhood of Armenia, in the southern line of the Caucasus, between the Black Sea and the Caspian. Tyre obtained from Palestine wheat, oil, honey, and balm, but not wine apparently, notwithstanding the abundance of grapes and wine in Judah (Gen. xlix. 11). The wine was imported from Damascus, and was called wine of HELBON. The Bedawin Arabs supplied Tyre with lambs and rams and goats. Egypt furnished linen for sails, and the dyes from shell-fish were imported from the Peloponnesus. (COLORS; GREECE.) Lastly, from DEDAN in the Persian Gulf, horns of ivory and ebony were imported, which must originally have been obtained from India (Ez. xxvii. 10, 11, 22, 12, 13, 17, 18, 21, 7, 15). In the midst of great prosperity and wealth, the natural result of such an extensive trade (xxviii. 4), NEBUCHADNEZZAR, at the head of an army of the Chaldees, invaded Judea and captured Jerusalem. As Tyre was so near to Jerusalem, and as the conquerors were a fierce and formidable race (Hab. i. 6), it would naturally be supposed that this event excited alarm and terror among the Tyrians. Instead of this, we may infer from Ez. xxvi. 2, that their predominant feeling was one of exultation. At first sight this appears strange and almost inconceivable; but it is rendered intelligible by some previous events in Jewish history. Only thirty-four years before the destruction of Jerusalem, com-their city was founded 2,900 years before his visit, i. e. about B. C. 2750. Josephus dates its foundation 230 years before Solomon began to build the Temple, i. e. about B. C. 1342. CHRONOLOGY.

menced the celebrated Reformation of JOSIAH, B. C. 622. In that reformation (2 K. xxii., xxiii.), Josiah had heaped insults on the gods who were the objects of Tyrian veneration and love (ASHERAH; ASHTORETH; BAAL; IDOLATRY), and seemed to have endeavored to exterminate their religion (xxiii. 20); and we can scarcely doubt that the death in battle of Josiah at Megiddo, and the subsequent destruction of the city and Temple of Jerusalem were hailed by them with triumphant joy as instances of divine retribution in human affairs. This joy, however, must soon have given way to other feelings, when Nebuchadnezzar invaded Phenicia, and laid siege to Tyre. That siege lasted thirteen years, and it is still a disputed point whether Tyre was actually taken by Nebuchadnezzar on this occasion (see below). However this may be, it is probable that, on some terms or other, Tyre submitted to the Chaldees. This would explain an expedition of Apries, the Pharaoh-hophra of Scripture, probably not long after, in which he besieged Sidon, fought a naval battle with Tyre, and reduced the whole coast of Phenicia, though this could not have had lasting effects. The rule of Nebuchadnezzar over Tyre, though real, may have been light, and in the nature of an alliance. During the Persian domination the Tyrians were subject in name to the Persian king, and may have given him tribute. With the rest of Phenicia, they had submitted to the Persians, without striking a blow. But their connection with the Persian king was not slavish. They refused to join Cambyzes in an expedition against Carthage. They fought with Persia against Greece, and furnished vessels of war in the expedition of Xerxes. At this time Tyre seems to have been inferior in power to Sidon. Under the Persian dominion, Tyre and Sidon supplied cedar-wood again to the Jews for building the second Temple (Ezr. iii. 7). B. C. 332 ALEXANDER THE GREAT, having summoned the Phœnician cities to submit to his rule, and received the submission of all but Tyre, commenced the memorable siege which lasted seven months, and the success of which was the greatest of all Alexander's achievements up to that time. Tyre was then situated on an island nearly half a mile from the mainland; it was completely surrounded by prodigious walls, the loftiest portion of which on the side fronting the mainland was not less than 150 feet high, and notwithstanding his persevering efforts, he could not have succeeded in his attempt, if the harbor of Tyre to the N. had not been blockaded by the Cyprians, and that to the S. by the Phœnicians, thus affording an opportunity to Alexander for uniting the island to the mainland by an enormous artificial mole. The immediate results of the capture by Alexander were most disastrous to it, as its brave defenders were put to death, and 30,000 of its inhabitants, including slaves, free females and free children, were sold as slaves. (WAR.) It gradually, however, recovered its prosperity through the immigration of fresh settlers, though its trade is said to have suffered by the vicinity and rivalry of ALEXANDRIA. The Seleucidæ (SYRIA) bestowed on it many privileges. Under the Romans (ROMAN EMPIRE), at first it continued to enjoy a kind of freedom. Subsequently, however, on the arrival of Augustus in the East, he is said to have deprived both Tyre and Sidon of their liberties for seditious conduct. Still the prosperity of Tyre in the time of Augustus was undeniably great. Strabo speaks of the wealth which it derived from the dyes of the celebrated Tyrian purple (COLORS II.), and of the houses

as consisting of many stories. Pliny gives the circumference of the city proper (i. e. on the peninsula) as twenty-two stadia (about two and a half English miles), and that of the whole city, including Palætyrus, as nineteen Roman (about seventeen English) miles. The accounts of Strabo and Pliny tend to convey an idea of what the city must have been, when visited by Christ (Mat. xv. 21; Mk. vii. 24). It was perhaps more populous than Jerusalem, and if so, it was undoubtedly the largest city which He is known to have visited. From the time of Christ to the beginning of the fifth century, there is no reason to doubt that, as far as was compatible with the irreparable loss of independence, Tyre continued in uninterrupted prosperity. Jerome, in his Commentaries on Ezekiel, speaks of Tyre as being in his day the most noble and beautiful city of Phenicia. He also, in his remarks on Ez. xxvii. 3, in which Tyre is called "a merchant of the people for many isles," says that this continues down to his time, so that commercial dealings of almost all nations are carried on in that city. Jerome's Commentaries on Ezekiel are supposed to have been written about A. D. 411-414, so that his testimony respecting the prosperity of Tyre bears date almost precisely a thousand years after the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, B. C. 588. As to the passage (Ez. xxvii. 7) in which Ezekiel states that Tyre shall be built no more, Jerome says the meaning is, that "Tyre will be no more the Queen of Nations, having its own king, as was the case under Hiram and other kings, but that it was destined to be always subject, either to the Chaldeans, or to the Macedonians, or to the Ptolemies, or at last to the Romans."<sup>2</sup> Tyre had then been subject to the Romans more than 400 years. In A. D. 633-638 all Syria and Palestine was conquered by the Khalif Omar. (ARABIA.) But Tyre was still a flourishing city when it surrendered to the Christians on the 27th of June, 1144. It had early been the seat of a Christian bishopric; and in 1125 William, a Frenchman (the chronicler of the Crusades), was made its archbishop. At length, however, the evil day of Tyre undoubtedly arrived. It had been more than a century and a half in the hands of Christians, when in March, A. D. 1291, the Sultan of Egypt and Damascus invested Acre (ACCŒ), then known to Europe as Ptolemais, and took it by storm after a siege of two months. The result was thus told in the beginning of the next century by Marinus Sanutus, a Venetian: "On the same day on which Ptolemais was taken, the Tyrians, at vespers, leaving the city empty, without the stroke of a sword, without the tumult of war, embarked on board their vessels, and abandoned the city to be occupied freely by their conquerors. On the morrow the Saracens entered, no one attempting to prevent them, and they did what they pleased." This was the turning-point in the history of Tyre, 1,879 years after the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; and Tyre has not yet recovered from the blow. In May, 1751, Hasselquist found there about ten inhabitants, Turks and Christians, who lived by fishing. Since the beginning of the present century there has been a partial revival of prosperity. But it has been visited at different times during the last thirty years by Biblical scholars, Robinson, Stanley, Rénan, &c., who all concur in the account of its general aspect of desolation.<sup>3</sup> Its great inferiority to Beirût for receiving vessels suited to the requirements of modern navigation will always prevent Tyre from becoming again the most important commercial city on the Syrian coast.—The question whether Tyre was actually taken by Nebuchadnezzar after his thirteen years' siege has been keenly discussed. Gesenius, Winer, and Hitzig decide it in the negative, while Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Fairbairn, &c., support the other side. Assuming, with Movers, that Tyre, as well as the rest of Phœnicia, submitted at last to Nebuchadnezzar, the following points may be observed respecting the supposed capture:—(1.) The evidence of Ezekiel, a contemporary, seems to be against it. The obvious inference from Ez. xxix. 18 is that, however great the exertions of the army may have been in digging intrenchments or in casting up earthworks, the siege was unsuccessful. This is confirmed by the following verses (19, 20). (2.) Josephus, who had access to historical writings on this subject which have not reached our times, neither states on his own authority, nor quotes any one else as stating, that Nebuchadnezzar took it. (3.) The capture of Tyre on this occasion is not mentioned by any Greek or Roman author whose writings are now in existence. (4.) In the time of Jerome it was distinctly stated by some of his contemporaries that they had read, amongst other histories on this point, histories of Greeks and Phe-nicians, and especially of Nicolaus Damascenus, in which nothing was said of the siege of Tyre by the Chaldees: and Jerome, in noticing this fact, does not quote any authority for a counter-statement, but alleges in general that many facts are related in the Scriptures which are not found in Greek works, and that we ought not to acquiesce in the authority of those whose perfidy and falsehood we detest. But in Jerome's Commentary on Ez. xxix. 18 he explains that the meaning of Nebuchadnezzar's having received no wages for his warfare against Tyre is, not that he failed to take the city, but that the Tyrians had previously removed every thing precious from it in ships, so that when Nebuchadnezzar entered the city he found nothing there.

<sup>2</sup> "The whole that the prophet can in fairness be understood to declare is, that Nebuchadnezzar should by violent means become master of Tyre, and thus commence the process of her downfall—a process which might be delayed, but would never altogether cease till the period of her complete destruction. . . . In plain terms, Tyre (like the king of Babylon, in Is. xiv.) was to take rank with the dead, and be no more numbered with the living. But, of course, it is the Tyre that then was, which is meant—the proud imperial mistress of the seas; as even, she was to cease to have a local habitation and a name in the earth; she was to be found only among the departed. That there should still be a Tyre on the same spot where the ancient city stood, is nothing against the description; for this poor and shrivelled thing is no longer the Tyre of the prophet—that is gone, never to return again" (Flem. on Ez. xxvi.).

'Dim is her glory, gone her fame,
Her boasted wealth has fled;
O'er her proud rock, alas! her shame,
The fisher's net is spread.

'The Tyrian harp has slumbered long,
And Tyria's mirth is low,
The timbrel, dulcimer, and song
Are hushed, or wake to woe."

U'cal (Heb. eatn up, consumed? Ges.; one that has pined away, sorrowful? Fii.; see below). According to the received text of Prov. xxx. 1, ITHIEL and Ucal must be regarded as proper names, and if so, they must be the names of disciples or sons of AGUR the son of JAKEH, an unknown sage among the Hebrews (so Mr. Wright). But there is great obscurity about the passage. Most translators and commentators regard them as proper names. J. D. Michælis renders the words, which are translated in the A.V., "unto Ithiel and Ucal," thus: "I have wearied myself for God, and have given up the investigation," applying the words to a man who had bewildered himself with philosophical speculations about the Deity, and had been compelled to give up the search. So Prof. Stuart (Commentary on Proverbs), following Hitzig and Bertheau, alters the Hebrew vowel-pointing, forms a proper name out of a part of the word translated "the prophecy" in the A. V., makes the Hebrew answering to "Ucal" = I have failed or ceased, that translated "unto Ithiel" = I have toiled for God (i. e. for the acquisition of a knowledge of God), and translates the whole verse thus: "The words of Agur, the son of her who was obeyed in Massa. Thus spake the man: I have toiled for God, I have toiled for God, and have ceased." Ewald considers both Ithiel and Ucal as symbolical names, employed by the poet to designate two classes of thinkers to whom he addresses himself.

U'el (Heb., probably = will of God, Ges.), a "son" of Bani, and husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 34).

Uk'naz (Heb. = and Kenaz). In the margin of 1 Chr. iv. 15 the words "even Kenaz" in the text are rendered "Uknaz," as a proper name. Some name may have been omitted before Kenaz.

U'lai, or U'la-4 (Heb. fr. Pehlvi or ancient Pers. = the pure water, Fū.) is mentioned by Daniel (viii. 2, 16) as a river near to Susa (SHUSHAN), where he saw his vision of the ram and the he-goat. It has been generally identified with the Eulæus of the Greek and Roman geographers, a large stream in the immediate neighborhood of that city. The Eulæus has been by many identified with the Choaspes, which is undoubtedly the modern Kerkhah, an affluent of the Tigris, flowing into it a little below Kurnah. By others it has been regarded as the Kuran, a large river, considerably further E., entering the Khor Bamishir near Mohammerah. Some have suggested that it may have been the Shapur or Sha'ur, a small stream which rises a few miles N. W. of Susa, and flows by the ruins into the Dizful stream, an affluent of the Kuran. The various notices of ancient writers appear to identify the upper Eulæus with the upper Kerkhah, and the lower Eulæus with the lower Kuran. A recent survey of the ground has shown that the Kerkhah once bifurcated at Pai Pul, about twenty miles N. W. of Susa, sending out a branch which passed E. of the ruins, absorbing into it the Shapur, and flowing on across the plain in a S. S. E. direction till it fell into the Kuran at Ahwaz. Thus the upper Kerkhah and the lower Kuran were in old times united, and might be viewed as forming a single stream. The name Eulæus ("Ulai") seems to have applied most properly to the eastern branch-stream from Pai Pul to Ahwaz (so Prof. Rawlinson).

U'lam (Heb. front, vestibule, Ges.). 1. A descendant of Gilead the grandson of Manasseh; father of Bedan (1 Chr. vii. 17).—2. A Benjamite, the first-born of Eshek, a descendant of Saul (viii. 39, 40). His sons were valiant archers.

U'la (Heb. yoke, Ges.), an Asherite chief (1 Chr. vii. 39).

U'mah (Heb. gathering, Ges.) a city of Asher (Josh. xix. 30 only). Dr. Thomson conjectures that a place called Alma in the highlands on the coast, about five miles E. N. E. of Ras en-Nakhura (LADDER OF TRUSS), may be identical with Ummah.

* Un-circum-cis-ion. CIRCUMCISION.

Un-clean' Meats (see CLEAN' and MEAT). These were things strangled, or dead of themselves, or through beasts or birds of prey; whatever beast did not both part the hoof and chew the cud; and certain other smaller animals rated as "creeping things;" certain classes of birds mentioned in Lev. xi. and Deut. xiv., twenty or twenty-one in all; whatever in the waters had not both fins and scales; whatever winged insect had not besides four legs the two hind legs for leaping; besides things offered in sacrifice to idols; and all BLOOD or whatever contained it (save perhaps the blood of fish, as would appear from that only of beast and bird being forbidden, Lev. vii. 26), and therefore flesh cut from the live animal; also all FAT, at any rate that disposed in masses among the intestines, and probably wherever discernible and separable among the flesh (Lev. iii. 14-17, vii. 23). The eating of blood was prohibited even to "the STRANGER that sojourneth among you" (xvii. 10, 12-14). The prohibition of blood indeed dates from the declaration to NOAH against "flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof," in Gen. ix. 4, which was perhaps regarded by Moses as still binding upon all Noah's descendants. Besides these, "sucking a kid in its mother's MILK is twice prohibited." The general distinction of clean and unclean is rightly observed by Michaelis to have its parallel among all nations, there being universally certain creatures regarded as clean, i. e. fit for food, and the rest as the opposite (comp. Lev. xi. 47). With most nations, however, this is only a traditional usage based merely perhaps on an instinct relating to health, or on a repugnance of which no further account is to be given. The same personal interest taken by Jehovah in His subjects, which is expressed by the demand for a ceremonially pure state on the part of every Israelite as in covenant with Him, regarded also this particular detail of that purity, viz. diet. It remained for a higher Lawgiver to announce that "there is nothing from without a man that entering into him can defile him" (Mk. vii. 15).—It is noteworthy that the practical effect of the rule laid down is to exclude all carnivorous quadrupeds, and birds of prey. This suggests the question whether they were excluded as being not averse to human carcases, and in most Eastern countries acting as the servitors of the battle-field and the gibbet. Even SWINE have been known so to feed; and, further, by their constant rooting among whatever lies on the ground, suggest impurity, even if they were not generally foul feeders. Of fish those which were allowed contain unquestionably the most wholesome varieties, save that they exclude the oyster. The exclusion of the CAMEL and the hare from allowable meats is less easy to account for, save that the former never was in common use, and to eat him, especially where so many other creatures give meat so much preferable, would be the worst economy possible in an Eastern commissariat—destroying the best, or rather the only conveyance, to obtain the most indifferent food. The HARE was long supposed, even by eminent naturalists, to ruminate, and certainly was eaten by the Egyptians. The horse and ass would be generally spared from similar reasons to those which exempted the camel. Practically the law left among the allowed meats an ample variety, and no inconvenience was likely to arise from a prohibition to eat camels, horses, and asses.—But as Orientals have minds sensitive to teaching by types, there can be little doubt that such ceremonial distinctions not only tended to keep Jew and Gentile apart, but were a perpetual reminder to the former that he and the latter were not on one level before God. Hence, when that ceremony was changed, this was the very symbol selected to instruct St. PETER in the truth that God was not a "respector of persons" (Acts x. 10 ff.). It was no mere question of which among several means of supporting life a man chose to adopt, when the persecutor dictated the alternative of swine's flesh or the loss of life itself (MACCABEES), but whether he should surrender the badge and type of that privilege by which Israel stood as the favored nation before God (1 Mc. i. 63, 64; 2 Mc. vi. 18, vii. 1). The same feeling led to the exaggeration of the Mosaic regulations, until it was "unlawful for a man that was a Jew to keep company with or come unto one of another nation" (Acts x. 28); and with such intensity were badges of distinction cherished, that the wine, bread, oil, cheese, or any thing cooked by a heathen, were declared unlawful for a Jew to eat. As regards things offered to idols, all who own one God meet on common ground; but the Jew viewed the precept as demanding a literal objective obedience, and had a holy horror of even an unconscious infraction of the law: hence, as he could never know what had received idolatrous consecration, his only safety lay in total abstinence (comp. 1 Cor. x. 25-29; SHAMBLES). Michaelis thought that the prohibition to "seethe a kid in his mother's MILK" was meant merely to encourage the use of olive-oil instead of the milk or butter of an animal, which we commonly use in cookery, where the Orientals use the former. This will not satisfy any mind by which the clew of symbolism has been once duly seized (so Mr. Hayman, original author of this article). Mercy to the beast is one of the under-currents which permeate that law. To soften the feelings and humanize the character was the higher and more general aim. The milk was the destined support of the young creature: viewed in reference to it, the milk was its "life," and had a relative sanctity resembling that of the forbidden blood. The Talmudists took an extreme view of the precept, as forbidding generally the cooking of flesh in milk.—It remains to mention the sanitary aspect of the case. Swine are said to be peculiarly liable to disease in their own bodies. This probably means that they are more easily led than other creatures to the foul feeding which produces it; and where the average heat is great, decomposition rapid, and malaria easily excited, this tendency in the animal is more mischievous than elsewhere. The prohibition on eating fat was salubrious in a region where skin diseases (LEPROSY) are frequent and virulent, and that on blood had, no doubt, a similar tendency. Yet the beneficial tendency is veiled under a ceremonial difference, for the "stranger" dwelling by the Israelite was allowed it, although the latter was forbidden. If we compare the animals allowed for food with those forbidden, there can be no doubt on which side the balance of wholesomeness lies. CLEAN; FOOD; IDOLATRY; LAW OF MOSES; PURIFICATION; SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH IV.; UNCLEANNESS.

Un-clean-ness. The distinctive idea attached to ceremonial uncleanness among the Hebrews was, that it cut a person off for the time from social privileges, and left his citizenship among God's people for the while in abeyance. (CITIZEN; COVENANT.) It did not merely require by law a certain ritual of purification in order to enhance the importance of the priesthood, but it placed the unclean person in a position of disadvantage, from which certain ritualistic acts alone could free him. There is an intense reality in the Divine Law taking hold of a man by the ordinary infirmities of flesh, and setting its stamp, as it were, in the lowest clay of which he is moulded. The sacredness attached to the human body is parallel to that which invested the ARK OF THE COVENANT itself. It is as though JEHOVAH thereby would teach them that the "very hairs of their head were all numbered" before Him, and that "in His book were all their members written." Thus was inculcated, so to speak, a bodily holiness (Lev. xi. 44, 45, xix. 2, 28, 32). Nor were the Israelites to be only "separated from other people," but they were to be "holy unto God" (xx. 24, 26), "a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation." Hence a number of ordinances regarding outward purity, used in Egypt only by the priests, were made publicly obligatory on the Hebrew nation. The importance to physical well-being of the injunctions which required frequent ablution (BAPTISM; BATH; LAVER; WASHING THE HANDS AND FEET) can be but feebly appreciated in our cooler and damper climate. Hence the obvious utility of reinforcing, by the sanction of religion, observances tending in the main to that healthy state which is the only solid basis of comfort, even though in certain points of detail they were burdensome. Uncleanness, as referred to man, may be—(1.) that which defiled merely "until even," and was removed by bathing and washing the clothes at the end of it—such were all contacts with dead animals; (2.) that graver sort which defiled for seven days, and was removed by the use of the "water of separation" (PURIFICATION)—such were all defilements connected with the human corpse; (3.) uncleanness from the morbid, puerperal, or menstrual state, lasting as long as that morbid state lasted (BLOOD, ISSUES OF; CHILD; ISSUES, RUNNING; MEDICINE); and in the case of LEPROSY lasting often for life. As the human person was itself the seat of a covenant-token (CIRCUMCISION), so male and female had each their ceremonial obligations in proportion to their sexual differences (Lev. xii., xv.). Further than this the increase of the nation was a special point of the promise to ABRAHAM and Jacob (Gen. xlix. 25), and, therefore, their fecundity as parents was under the Divine tutelage, beyond the general notion of a curse, or at least of God's disfavor, as implied in barrenness. There is an emphatic reminder of human weakness in the fact of birth and death—man's passage alike into and out of his mortal state—being marked with a stated pollution. Thus the birth of the infant brought defilement on its mother, which she, except so far as necessarily isolated by the nature of the circumstances, propagated around her. Nay, the conjugal act itself, or any act resembling it (Lev. xv. 16-18), entailed uncleanness for a day. The corpse, on the other hand, bequeathed a defilement of seven days to all who handled it, to the "tent" or chamber of death, and to sundry things within it. Nay, contact with one slain in the field of battle, or with even a human bone or grave, was no less effectual to pollute, than that with a corpse dead by the course of nature (Num. xix. 11-18). This shows that the source of pollution lay in the mere fact of death. The duration of defilement caused by the birth of a female infant—eighty days in all, double that due to a male (Lev. xii. 2-5)—may perhaps represent the woman's heavier share in the first sin and first curse (Gen. iii. 16; 1 Tim. ii. 14). For a man's "issue," besides the uncleanness while it lasted, a probation of seven days, including a washing on the third day, is prescribed. Similar was the period in the case of the woman, and in that of intercourse with a woman so affected (Lev. xv. 13, 28, 24; comp. xx. 18). The propagation of uncleanness from the person to the bed, saddle, clothes, &c., and through them to other persons, tends to impress an idea of the loathsomeness of such a state, or the heinousness of such acts, more forcibly by far than if the defilement clove to the first person merely (xv. 6, 9, 12, 17, 20, 22-24, 26, 27). Uncleanness from contact with a corpse, grave, &c., was communicated to other persons, apparently for the day only, by the unclean person's contact with them (Num. xix. 22); but this minor pollution for one day only, whether engendered by the major pollution or arising directly, Mr. Hayman, original author of this article, regards as not communicable (compare v. 2-4; Lev. xv. 5-11). With regard to uncleanness arising from the lower animals, Lightfoot remarks, that all which were unclean to touch when dead were unclean to eat, but not conversely; and that all which were unclean to eat were unclean to sacrifice, but not conversely. (UNCLEAN MEATS.) All animals, however, if dying of themselves, or eaten with the blood, were unclean to eat. The carcass also of any animal unclean as regards diet, however dying, defiled whatever person, garment, sack, skin, vessel, &c., it, or any part of it, touched. All these defilements were "until even" only, save the eating "with the blood," the offender in which respect was to "be cut off" (xi, xvii. 14). The same sentence of "cutting off" was also denounced against all who should "do presumptuously" in respect even of minor defilements; by which we may understand all contempt of the legal provisions regarding them. (PUNISHMENTS; SIX.) The term "defilement" also includes the contraction of unlawful marriages and the indulgence of unlawful lusts, as denounced in Lev. xviii. (MARRIAGE.) The fruit of trees was counted as "uncircumcised," i. e. unclean for the first three years. (FIRST-FRUIT; FOOD.) The directions in Deut. xxiii. 10-13, relate to the avoidance of impurities in the case of a host encamped, and are based on the scrupulous ceremonial purity demanded by the God whose presence was in the midst of them. The ashes of the red heifer, burned whole, which were mixed with water, and became the standing resource for purifying uncleanness in the second degree, themselves became a source of defilement to all who were clean, even as of PURIFICATION to the unclean, and so the water. Somewhat similarly the scape-goat, who bore away the sins of the people, defiled him who led him into the wilderness, and the bringing forth and burning the sacrifice on the Great Day of Atonement had a similar power. (ATONEMENT, DAY OF.) This lightest form of uncleanness was expiated by bathing the body and washing the clothes. Besides the water of purification made as aforesaid, men and women in their "issues" were, after seven days, reckoned from the cessation of the disorder, to bring two turtle-doves or young pigeons to be killed by the priests. The purification after childbirth is well known from the N. T. (Lk. ii. 22-24); for that of the LEPER, see PURIFICATION. (MOURNING V.) All these kinds of uncleanness disqualified for holy functions: as the layman so affected might not approach the congregation and the sanctuary, so any priest who incurred defilement must abstain from holy things (Lev. xxii. 2-8). But the priests, in their contact with the leper to be adjudged, were exempted from the law of defilement; and the garb and treatment of the leper seem to be that of one dead in the eye of the Law or rather a perpetual mourner for his own estate of death with "clothes rent and head bare."—It may be mentioned that among the Arabs the touching a corpse still defiles, and that the religion of the Persians, according to Chardin, shows a singularly close correspondence with the Levitical code in regard to purification and uncleanness.

* Un'etion (1 Jn. ii. 20) = AXOINTING.

* Un'icorn, the A. V. rendering, after the LXX. and Vulgate, of the Heb. re'em, re'eyim, re'im, the name of some large wild animal (Num. xxiii. 22, xxiv. 8; Deut. xxxiii. 17; Job xxxix. 9, 10; Ps. xxi. 21 [Heb. 22], xxix. 6, xcii. 10 [Heb. 11]; Is. xxxiv. 7 [margin "rhinoceros"]). The Re'em of the Hebrew Bible, however, has nothing at all to do with the one-horned animal<sup>1</sup> mentioned by Aristotle, Pliny, and other Greek and Roman writers, as is evident from Deut. xxxiii. 17, where, in the blessing of Joseph, it is said, "His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of a unicorn," not, as the text of the A. V. renders it, "the horns of unicorns." The two horns of the Re'em are "the ten thousands of Ephraim and the thousands of Manasseh." This text puts a one-horned animal entirely out of the question, and disposes of the opinion of Bruce, &c., that some species of rhinoceros is denoted, and of other writers that the re'im and the "unicorn" = some one-horned animal scid to have been seen by travellers in South Africa and in Thibet (so Mr. Houghton, original author of this article). Bochart, followed by Rosenmüller, Winer, &c., contends that the Heb. Re'em = the Ar. Rim, which is usually referred to the Oryx leucoryx, the white antelope of North Africa, and at one time perhaps an inhabitant of Palestine. Arnold Boot, with much better reason, conjectures that the Re'em = some species of Urus or wild-ox. Robinson and Gesenius, with A. Schultens, De Wette, &c., have little doubt that the buffalo (Bubalus Buffalus) is the Re'em of the Bible.—Little can be urged in favor of the rhinoceros, for it would have been forbidden to be sacrificed by the Law of Moses, whereas the Re'em is mentioned by Isaiah as coming down with bullocks and rams to the Lord's sacrifice. Again, the skipping of the young Re'em (Ps. xxix. 6) is scarcely compatible with the habits of a rhinoceros. The white antelope (Oryx leucoryx), like the rest of the family, is harmless unless wounded or hard pressed by the hunter, nor is it remarkable for any extraordinary strength. Considering, therefore, that the Re'em is spoken of as a two-horned animal of great strength and ferocity, was evidently well known and often seen by the Jews, is mentioned as an animal fit for sacrificial purposes, and is frequently associated with bulls and oxen, we think there can be no doubt that some species of wild-ox is intended. The allusion in Ps. xcii. 10, "But thou shalt lift up, as a Re'eyim, my horn," seems to point to the mode in which the ox family use their horns, lowering the head, and then tossing it up. But it is impossible to determine what particular species of wild-ox is signified. Some have conjectured that the Re'em denotes the wild buffalo. Possibly some wild species of buffalo (Bubalus Arner, or Bubalus brachycerus) may have existed formerly in Palestine. We are, however, more in favor of some gigantic Urus.

* Un-leavened Bread. BREAD; LEAVEN; PASS-OVER.

* U-phar'sin (Chal.). MENE, &c.

Uphaz (Heb., see below), a GOLD country (Jer. x. 9; Dan. x. 5); regarded by Gesenius, Henderson, &c., as a corruption of OPHRA, which the Chaldee, Syriac, and Theodotion put for it in Jer. l. c.; considered by Hitzig of Sanscrit origin, and placed by him in Yemen, in South Arabia; supposed by Bochart to be Ceylon, &c.

Ur (Heb. light; as an appellative [comp. Pers.] = fortress, castle? Ges.), the land of Haran's nativity (Gen. xi. 28), the place from which Terah and ABRAHAM started "to go into the land of Canaan" (ver. 31); uniformly called in the O. T. "Ur of the CHALDEES" (xi. 28, 31, xv. 7; Neh. ix. 7), but, in Acts vii. 2, 4, impliedly placed by Stephen in MESOPOTAMIA. These are all the indications which Scripture furnishes as to its locality. (a.) One tradition identifies Ur with the modern Orfah. There is some ground for believing that this city, called by the Greeks Edessa, had also the name of Orrha as early as about B. C. 150. According to Pocock that Ur is Edessa or Orfah is "the universal opinion of the Jews;" and it is also the local belief. (b.) A tradition in the Talmud and in some of the early Arabian writers finds Ur in Warka, the Orchoë of the Greeks, and probably the Erech of Holy Scripture. (c.) A third tradition distinguishes Ur from Warka, while still placing it in the same region. There can be little doubt that this tradition points to the city which appears by its bricks to have been called Hur by the natives, and is now represented by the ruins at Mugheir or Umgheir. (d.) Bochart, Calmet, Bunsen, Michaelis, Gesenius, &c., unsupported by any tradition, identify "Ur of the Chaldees" with a place of the name, mentioned by Am-mianus Marcellinus (fourth century A. C.) as "a castle" existing in his day in Eastern Mesopotamia, between Hatra and Nisibis. Of these four localities two (a, d) are in Upper Mesopotamia, between the Mons Masius and the Sinjar range, while the other two (b, c) are in the alluvial tract near the sea, at least 400 miles further S. That CHALDEA was, properly speaking, the southern part of Babylonia, the region bordering upon the Gulf, will be admitted by all. Those who maintain the northern emplacement of Ur argue, that with the extension of Chaldean power the name travelled northward, and became coextensive with Mesopotamia; but Prof. Rawlinson, original author of this article, claims that—(1.) there is no proof that the name Chaldeia was ever extended to the region above the Sinjar; (2.) if it was, the Jews at any rate mean by Chaldeia exclusively the lower country, and call the upper, Mesopotamia or Padan-aram (Job i. 17; Is. xlii. 19, xliii. 14, &c.); (3.) there is no reason to believe that Babylonian power was established beyond the Sinjar in these early times; (4.) it is in the lower country only that a name closely corresponding to the Heb. Ur (אֹר) is found, the cuneiform Hur representing the Hebrew letter for letter, and only differing from it in the greater strength of the aspirate or initial letter. The argument that Ur should be sought in the neighborhood of Arrapachitis and Seruj, because the names ARPHAXAD and SERUG occur in the genealogy of Abraham, has no weight till it is shown that the human names in question are really connected with the places, which is at present assumed somewhat boldly. On the whole we may regard it as tolerably certain that "Ur of the Chaldees" was a place situated in the real Chaldeia—the low country near the Persian Gulf. The only question that remains in any degree

doubtful is, whether Warka or Mugheir is the true locality. They are not far apart; traditions attached to both, but perhaps more distinctly to Warka. But it seems certain that Warka, the native name of which was Huruk, represents the Erech of Genesis, which cannot possibly be the Ur of the same Book. Mugheir, therefore, which bore the exact name of Ur or Hur, remains with the best claim, and is entitled to be (at least provisionally) regarded as the city of Abraham (so Prof. Rawlinson, Porter [in Kitto], Eadie [in Fbn.], Loftus, Ayre, &c., after Sir Henry Rawlinson). Ur or Hur, now

Mugheir, or Um-Mugheir (= the bitumened, or the mother of bitumen), is one of the most ancient, if not the most ancient, of the Chaldean sites hitherto discovered. It lies on the right bank of the Euphrates, about six miles from the present course of the stream, nearly opposite the point where the EUPHRATES receives the Shat-el-Hie from the Tigris. It is now not less than 125 miles from the sea; but there are grounds for believing that it was anciently a maritime town, but now inland from the rapid growth of the alluvium. The remains of buildings cover an oval space, 1,000 yards long by 800 broad. The most remarkable building near the northern end of the ruins is a temple of the true Chaldean type, built in stages of bricks, laid chiefly in bitumen (BABEL, TOWER OF), and bearing the name of Uruk, who is regarded as the earliest of the Chaldean monumental kings, B. C. 2000, or a little earlier. Ur, the capital of this monarch, retained its metropolitan character for above two centuries, and, even after it became second to Babylon, was a great city, with an especially sacred character. It is in the main a city of tombs. It probably fell into decay under the Persians, and was a mere ruin at Alexander's conquests, B. C. 330.

Ur'bane [a as in cane] (fr. L. Urbanus = of a city, refused, urbane, Freund; as a proper name better written Urban), a Christian man among those whom St. Paul salutes in writing to Rome (Rom. xvi. 9); probably at some time in active religious coöperation with the apostle.

Uri (Heb. fiery, or perhaps = URIAH, URIJAH, Ges.). 1. A man of the tribe of Judah; grandson of CALEB 1, and father of BEZALKEEL 1, the architect of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxxi. 2, xxxv. 30, xxxviii. 22; 1 Chr. ii. 20; 2 Chr. i. 5).—2. Father of Geber, Solomon's commissary in Gilead (1 K. iv. 19).—3. A Levite porter or doorkeeper, husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 24).

Ur'iah (fr. Heb. = light of Jehovah = URIAH and URIAS). 1. One of the thirty commanders of the thirty bands into which the Israelite army of David was divided (1 Chr. xi. 41; 2 Sam. xxiii. 39); called URIAS in N. T. Like others of David's officers he was a foreigner—a HITTITE. His name, however, and his manner of speech (xi. 11) indicate that he had adopted the Jewish religion. He married BATH-SHEBA, a woman of extraordinary beauty, the daughter of ELIAM. It may be inferred from Nathan's parable (xii. 8) that he was passionately devoted to his wife, and that their union was celebrated in Jerusalem as one of peculiar tenderness. In the first war with Ammon he followed Joab to the siege, and with him remained encamped in the open field (xi. 11). He returned to Jerusalem, at an order from the king (DAVID), on the pretext of asking news of the war,—really in the hope that his return to his wife might cover the shame of his own crime. The king met with an unexpected obstacle in the austere, soldier-like spirit which guided all Uriah's conduct, and which gives us a high notion of the character and discipline of David's officers. On the morning of the third day, David sent him back to the camp with a letter containing the command to Joab to cause his destruction in the battle. The device of Joab was, to observe the part of the wall of Rabbath-Ammon (RABBAH 1) where the greatest force of the besieged was congregated, and thither, as a kind of forlorn hope, to send Uriah. A sally took place. Uriah and the officers with him advanced as far as the gate of the city, and were there shot down by the archers on the wall. Just as Joab had forewarned the messenger, the king broke into a furious passion on hearing of the loss. The messenger, as instructed by Joab, calmly continued, and ended the story with the words: "Thy servant also, Uriah the Hittite, is dead." In a moment David's anger is appeased. It is one of the touching parts of the story that Uriah falls unconscious of his wife's dishonor. Uriah remains to us an example of the chivalrous and devoted characters found among the Canaanites serving in the Hebrew army (so Dean Stanley).—2. A priest in the reign of Ahaz, a witness to Isaiah's prophecy concerning MAHER-SHALAL-HASHBAZ (Is. viii. 2); probably = "URIAH the priest," who built the idolatrous altar for AHAZ (2 K. xvi. 10-16), and perhaps (so Lord A. C. Hervey) summoned as a witness on account of his position as HIGH-PRIEST, not on account of his personal qualities; though, as the incident occurred at the beginning of the reign of Ahaz, Uriah's irreligious subterfuge may not yet have manifested itself. He probably succeeded AZARIAH 14, who was high-priest in the reign of Uzziah, and was succeeded by that AZARIAH 18 who was high-priest in the reign of Hezekiah. Hence he was probably son of the former and father of the latter.—3. A priest, father or ancestor of MEREMOTH 1 (Ezr. viii. 38); = URIAH 2.

Ur'ias (L. = URIAH or URIJAH). 1. URIAH 1, husband of Bath-sheba (Mat. i. 6).—2. URIAH 3 (1 Esd. ix. 43).

Ur'iel (Heb. the fire of God). 1. A Kohathite Levite, son of Tahath (1 Chr. vi. 24, Heb. 9).—2. Chief of the Kohathites in David's reign (xv. 5, 11).—3. "Uriel of Gibeath" was the father of MAACHAH 3, or Michaiah, the favorite wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijah (2 Chr. xiii. 2). In 2 Chr. xi. 20 she is called "Maachah the daughter of Absalom." Uriel was probably husband of TAMAR 3, though Rashi makes his name Uriel ABISHALOM.—4. An angel, or archangel, named only in 2 Esd. iv. 1, 36, v. 20, x. 28.

Ur'ijah (fr. Heb. Uriydh = name of Jehovah, Ges.; = URIAH and URIAS). 1. Urijah the priest in the reign of Ahaz (2 K. xvi. 10) probably = URIAH 2.—2. A priest (Neh. iii. 4, 21); = URIAH 3.—3. One (probably a priest) who stood at Ezra's right hand when he read the Law to the people (Neh. viii. 4).—4. A prophet, son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim. He prophesied in the days of Jehoiakim concerning the land and the city, just as Jeremiah had done, and the king sought to put him to death; but he escaped into Egypt. His retreat was soon discovered: Elnathan and his men brought him up out of Egypt, and Jehoiakim slew him with the sword, and cast his body forth among the graves of the common people (Jer. xxvi. 20-23).

Urim and Thummim (Heb. plurals, see below). 1. (1.) When the Jewish exiles were met on their return from Babylon by a question which they had no data for answering, they agreed to postpone the settlement of the difficulty till there should rise up "a Priest with Urim and Thummim" (Ezr. ii. 63; Neh. vii. 65). The inquiry, what those Urim and Thummim themselves were, seems likely to wait long for a final and satisfying answer. (2.) The starting-point of such an inquiry must be from the words themselves, which the A. V. has left untranslated. (a.) Hebrew scholars, with hardly an exception, make Urim (urim) the plural of ur (= light, or fire). The LXX. render it manifestation, manifest, enlightening; the Vulgate teaching, judgment, &c. The literal English equivalent would of course be "lights;" but the renderings in the LXX. and Vulgate indicate, at least, a traditional belief among the Jews that the plural form did not involve numerical plurality. (b.) Thummim is almost unanimously derived from tām (= perfection, completeness). The LXX. and Vulgate render it PERFECT once (Ezr. ii. 63), elsewhere truth. What has been said as to the plural of Urim applies here also. "Light and perfection" would probably be the best English equivalent of "Urim and Thummim." The mere phrase, as such, leaves it uncertain whether each word by itself denoted many things of a given kind, or whether the two taken together might be referred to two distinct objects, or to one and the same object (so Prof. Plumptre, original author of this article). In Deut. xxxiii. 8, we have separately, "Thy Thummim and thy Urim," the first order being inverted. "Urim" is found alone in Num. xxvii. 21 and 1 Sam. xxviii. 6.—II. Scriptural Statements. (1.) The mysterious words meet us first, as if they needed no explanation, in the description of the high-priest's apparel (Ex. xxviii. 30; HIGH-PRIEST, p. 382). Over the Ephod is to be a "breastplate of judgment," of gold, scarlet, purple, and fine linen, folded square and doubled, a "span" in length and width. In it are to be set four rows of precious stones, each stone with the name of a tribe of Israel engraved on it, that Aaron may "bear them upon his heart." Inside the breastplate, as the Tables of the Covenant were placed inside the Ark (Heb. cf. Ex. xxv. 16 [A. V. "into"], and xxviii. 30 [A. V. "in"]), are to be placed "the Urim and the Thummim," the light and the perfection; and they, too, are to be on Aaron's heart, when he goes in before the Lord (xxviii. 15-30). Not a word describes them. They are mentioned as things already familiar both to Moses and the people, connected naturally with the functions of the high-priest, as mediating between JEHOVAH and His people. The command is fulfilled (Lev. viii. 8). They pass from Aaron to Eleazar with the sacred Ephod; and other pontificals (Num. xx. 28, compare xxvii. 21; Deut. xxxiii. 8, 9; see above, I. 2, b). Once only are the "Urim" mentioned by name in the history of the Judges and the monarchy (1 Sam. xxviii. 6). At the close of the Captivity there is no longer "a priest with Urim and Thummim" (Ezr. ii. 63; Neh. vii. 65) to answer hard questions. (2.) Besides these direct statements, there are others in which we may, without violence, trace a reference, if not to both, at least to the "Urim." When questions precisely of the nature of those described in Num. xxvii. 21 are asked by the leader of the people, and answered by Jehovah (Judg. i. 1, xx. 18)—when like questions are asked by Saul of the high-priest Ahiah, "wearing an ephod" (1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18)—by David, as soon as he has with him the presence of a high-priest with his ephod (xxiii. 2, 12, xxx. 7, 8)—we may legitimately infer that the treasures which the ephod contained were the conditions and media of his answer. (3.) In some cases of defection from the established religious order, we find the ephod connected not with the Urim, but with the TERAPHIM (Judg. xvii. 5, xviii. 14, 20; Hos. iii. 4).—III. Theories. Of the numerous theories upon the subject the favorite view of Jewish and of some Christian writers has been, that the Urim and Thummim were identical with the twelve stones on which the names of the tribes of Israel were engraved, and the mode in which an oracle was given was by the illumination, simultaneous or successive, of the letters which were to make up the answer (Maimonides, Chrysostom, Drusius, Grotius, &c.). Another theory is, that in the middle of the ephod, or within its folds, was a stone engraved with the name JEHOVAH, and that by gazing on this, or reading an invocation engraved with it, or standing in his ephod before the mercy-seat, the high-priest became capable of prophesying, or hearing the Divine voice (Buxtorf, Lightfoot, &c.). Spencer supposed the Urim = TERAPHIM. Michaelis regarded the Urim and Thummim as three stones (Yes, No, and blank) used as lots. Züllig (and so Winer) regards the Urim as bright (i. e. cut and polished) diamonds, the Thummim as perfect (i. e. whole, uncut) ones, each class with inscriptions, and a handful of them carried in the high-priest's breastplate, and, on being taken out and thrown, indicating an answer by their position in falling. Prof. Plumptre would trace the Urim and Thummim to the symbolism of Egypt, where priestly judges each wore suspended from his neck by a gold chain an image of Truth, often with closed eyes and made sometimes of a sapphire or other precious stone, and where members of the priestly caste wore in the centre of a pectoral plate or over the heart a known symbol of Light, viz. the sacred beetle or scarabæus. Another theory is, that the answer was given simply by the Word of the Lord to the high-priest (compare Jn. xi. 51), when he had inquired of the Lord clothed with the ephod and breastplate. But all the theories are conjectures without knowledge. DIVINATION; IDOLATRY; INSPIRATION; MAGIC; ORACLE; PROPHET.

U'su-ry [yu zhu-re] (fr. L. usura = a using, hence interest; Heb. usually neshech; Gr. tokos), now usually = exorbitant interest, in the A. V. = interest of money at any rate. The practice of mortgaging land, sometimes at exorbitant interest, grew up among the Jews during the Captivity, in direct violation of the law (Lev. xxv. 36, 37; Ez. xviii. 8, 13, 17). We find the rate among the ancient Romans, at the East now, &c., reaching 1 in 100 a month, or 12 per cent. per annum. The law of the Koran, like the Jewish, forbids all exaction of interest. The laws of Menu (Hindoo) allow 18 and even 24 per cent. as an interest rate; but, as was the law in Egypt, accumulated interest was not to exceed twice the original sum lent. This Jewish practice was annulled by Nehemiah (Neh. v. 3-13). LOAN.

U'ta (fr. Gr.), ancestor of certain Nethinim (1 Esd. v. 30); not in Ezra and Nehemiah.

U'thal, or U'tha-i (Heb. whom Jehovah succors, Ges.). 1. Son of Ammihud, and descendant of Judah (1 Chr. ix. 4); = ATHATHAH.—2. One of the sons of Bigvai, who returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 14).

U'thi (fr. Gr.) = UTHAI 2 (1 Esd. viii. 40).

Uz (fr. Heb. ûts = light sandy soil and fertile? Ges.). 1. A son of ARAM and grandson of SHEM (Gen. x. 23; 1 Chr. i. 17).—2. A son of NAHOR 2 by Milcah (Gen. xxii. 21; A. V. "Huz").—3. A son of Dishan, and grandson of Seir (xxxvi. 28).—4. The country in which Job lived (Job i. 1). Mr. Bevan, original author of this article, regards the genealogical statements of the Book of Genesis as ethnological, and in many instances also geographical (TONGUES, CONFUSION OF), and considers the coincidence of names in the above cases as pointing to a fusion of various branches of the Shemitic race in a certain locality (compare DEDAN, SEBA, SHEBA, &c.). In his view the coincidences of names imply that certain branches of the Aramaic family, being both more ancient and occupying a more northerly position than the others, coalesced with branches of the later Abrahamids, holding a somewhat central position in Mesopotamia and Palestine, and again with branches of the still later Edomites of the south, after they had become a distinct race from the Abrahamids. This conclusion he confirms by the geographical position of Uz, as described in the Book of Job. As far as we can gather, it lay either E. or S. E. of Palestine (Job i. 3); adjacent to the Sabaeans and the Chaldeans (15, 17), consequently northward of the southern Arabians, and westward of the Euphrates; and, lastly, adjacent to the Edomites of Mount Seir, who at one period occupied Uz, probably as conquerors (Lam. iv. 21), and whose troglodyte habits are probably described in Job xxx. 6, 7. Hence Mr. Bevan and others infer that the land of Uz corresponds to the Arabia Deserta of classical geography, at all events to so much of it as lies N. of latitude 30°. (ARABIA.) Whether the name of Uz survived to classical times is uncertain: a tribe named Asitæ (Gr. Asilai) is mentioned by Ptolemy: this Bochart identifies with the Uz of Scripture. East.

Uzal, or Uza-l (Heb., probably = strong, robust, Ges.), father of Palai, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the city-wall (Neh. iii. 25).

Uzal (Heb. a continual going forth, Sim.; a wanderer? Ayre), sixth son of JOKAN (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chr. i. 21), whose settlements are clearly traced in the ancient name of San'd, the capital city of the Yemen, which was originally Auzal (so Mr. E. S. Poole, and scholars generally). It has disputed the right to be the chief city of the kingdom of SHEBA from the earliest ages of which any traditions have come down to us. From its position in the centre of the best portion of that kingdom, it must always have been an important city, though probably of less importance than Sabâ itself. Niebuhr says that it is a walled town, in an elevated country, in lat. 15° 2', and with a stream (after heavy rains) running through it, and another larger stream a little to the W. It has a citadel on the site of a famous temple. The houses and palaces of San'd are finer than those of any other town of Arabia; and it possesses many mosques, public baths, and caravanserais. Its present population is estimated at 70,000 (New Amer. Cyc.). Uzal, or Auzal, most probably = the Auzara, or Ausara, of the classics. It is perhaps referred to in Ez. xxvii. 19, translated in the A. V. "Javan, going to and fro," margin "Meuzal;" which might be translated from Uzal; but Gesenius, &c., translate something spun, i. e. thread, yarn.

Uzza (Heb. strength, Ges.). 1. A Benjamite of the sons of Ehud (1 Chr. viii. 7).—2. UZZAH (xiii. 7, 9-11).—3. Ancestor of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. ii. 49; Neh. vii. 51).—4. A Levite, son of Shimei and descendant of Merari (1 Chr. vi. 29 [Heb. 14]). Some suppose a gap in the verse, and conjecture that this Uzza may be a Gershonite, = Zina, or Zizah, the son of Shimei (xxiii. 10, 11; SHIMEI 17).

Uzza (see above), the garden of; the spot in which Manasseh and his son Amon, kings of Judah, were both buried (2 K. xxi. 18, 26). It was the garden attached to Manasseh's palace (ver. 18). The fact of its mention shows that it was not where the usual sepulchres of the kings were. (TOMB.) It is ingeniously suggested by Cornelius a Lapide, that the garden was so called from being on the spot where UZZA 2 or UZZAH died.

Uzzah (Heb. = UZZA, Ges.), one of the sons of ABINADAB 1, in whose house at KIRJATH-JEARIM the ark rested for twenty years; = UZZA 2. Uzzah probably was the second, and AHIO 1 the third son. (ELEAZAR 2.) They both accompanied its removal, when David first undertook to carry it to Jerusalem. Ahio apparently went before the new cart (1 Chr. xiii. 7) on which it was placed, and Uzzah walked by the side. "At the threshing-floor of NACHON" (2 Sam. vi. 8), or CHIDON (1 Chr. xiii. 9), the oxen stumbled. Uzzah caught the ark to prevent its falling. He died immediately by its side. His death, so sudden and awful, is ascribed directly to the Divine anger. The narrative seems to imply that his "error" or sin was the rough, hasty handling of the sacred coffer (so Dean Stanley). PEREZ-UZZAH.

Uzzan-she'rah (Heb. ear of Sherah, or Sherah's corner, Ges.), a town founded or rebuilt by SHERAH; named only in 1 Chr. vii. 24, in connection with the two Beth-horons. No trace of it appears to have been yet discovered, unless in B it Sira, on the N. side of the Wady Suliman, about three miles S. W. of Beitûr et-tahla (lower BETH-HOROS).

Uzzi (Heb. = UZZIAH, Ges.). 1. Son of Bukki, and father of Zerariah, in the line of the high-priests (1 Chr. vi. 5, 51; Ezr. vii. 4). He must have been contemporary with, but rather earlier than, ELI. (HIGH-PRIEST).—2. Son of Tola the son of Issachar (1 Chr. vii. 2, 3).—3. A Benjamite chief, son of Bela (vii. 7).—4. A Benjamite, father or ancestor of the Elah settled at Jerusalem after the Captivity (ix. 8).—5. A Levite, son of Bani, and overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem, in Nehemiah's time (Neh. xi. 22).—6. A priest, chief of the house of Jedaiiah, in the time of high-priest Joiakim (xii. 19).—7. One of the priests who assisted Ezra in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (xii. 42); perhaps = No. 6.

Uz-z'â (fr. Heb. = UZZIK, Fû.), "the ASHTERATHITE," one of David's valiant men (1 Chr. xi. 44).

Uz-z'âh (fr. Heb. = might of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. A king of Judah. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) In some passages his name appears as AZARIAH, which Gesenius attributes to an error of the copyists. This is possible, but there are other instances of the princes of Judah changing their names on succeeding to the throne (so Bishop Cotton, original author of this article). After the murder of ANAZIAH, his son Uzziah was chosen by the people to occupy the vacant throne at the age of sixteen; and for the greater part of his long reign of fifty-two years he lived in the fear of God, and showed himself a wise, active, and pious ruler. He began his reign by a successful expedition against his father's enemies, the Edomites, who had revolted from Judah in Jehoram's time, eighty years before, and penetrated as far as the head of the Gulf of Akabah, where he took ELATH (2 K. xiv. 22; 2 Chr. xxvi. 1, &c.). Uzziah waged other victorious wars in the S., especially against the MEXCHIM, and the Arabs of GER-BAAH. Toward the W., Uzziah fought with equal success against the Philistines, levelled to the ground the walls of Gath, Jabneh, and Ashdod, and founded new fortified cities in the Philistine territory. He strengthened the walls of Jerusalem, and equipped an army of 807,500 men. He was also a great patron of agriculture. He never deserted the worship of the true God, and was much influenced by ZECHARIAH 24, a prophet mentioned only in connection with him. So the southern kingdom was raised to a condition of prosperity which it had not known since the death of Solomon. Uz-

ziah, elated with his splendid career, determined to burn incense on the altar of God, but was opposed by the high-priest AZARIAH 14 and eighty others (see Ex. xxx. 7, 8; Num. xvi. 40, xviii. 7; PRIEST). The king was enraged at their resistance, and, as he pressed forward with his censor, was suddenly smitten with leprosy. Uzziah was buried "with his fathers" (TOUB), yet apparently not actually in the royal sepulchres (2 Chr. xxvi. 23). During his reign an EARTHQUAKE occurred, apparently very serious in its consequences (Am. i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5). The prophets Isaiah, Amos, and Hosea were contemporary with Uzziah.—2. A Kohathite Levite, ancestor of Samuel (1 Chr. vi. 24 [Heb. 9]).—3. A priest of the sons of Harim; husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 21).—4. Father of Athaiah, or Uthai (Neh. xi. 4).—5. Father of Jehonathan, one of David's overseers (1 Chr. xxvii. 25).

Uzz-el, or Uz-z'el (Heb. might of God, Ges.; God is my strength, Lord A. C. Hervey). 1. A Levite, fourth son of Kohath, and ancestor of the UZZIELITES; father of Mishaël, Elzaphan or Elizaphan, and Zithri, and uncle to Aaron (Ex. vi. 18, 22; Lev. x. 4; Num. iii. 19, 30; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 18, xv. 10, xxiii. 12, 20, xxiv. 24).—2. A Simeonite captain, son of Ishi, and participant in the expedition against the Amalekites of Seir in Hezekiah's time (iv. 42).—3. A Benjaminite chief, son of Bela (vii. 7).—4. A Levite musician, son of Heman (xxv. 4); = AZAREEL 2.—5. A Levite, of the sons of Jeduthun, active in purifying the Temple in Hezekiah's time (2 Chr. xxix. 14, 19).—6. Son of Hariaiah, probably a priest, in the days of Nehemiah, who took part in repairing the wall (Neh. iii. 8). He is described as "of the goldsmiths," i. e. of those priests whose hereditary office it was to repair or make the sacred vessels (so Lord A. C. Hervey).

Uzz-el-lites, or Uz-z'el-lites, the = the descendants of UZZIEL 1, and one of the four great families of the Kohathites (Num. iii. 27; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23).

* Va'heb (Heb. a gift?), a doubtful word found only in Num. xxi. 14 margin, translated "what he did" in the text; perhaps the proper name of a place in the territory of Moab on the Arnon; according to Le Clerc, = MATTANAH in ver. 18 (Ges.). NUMBERS, p. 745.

* Vail = VEIL.

Va-jez-a-tha, or Vaj-e-za'tha (Heb. fr. Pers. = white, pure, Ges.), one of Haman's ten sons whom the Jews slew in Shushan (Esth. ix. 9).

Vale, and Valley = a hollow sweep of ground between two more or less parallel ridges of high land. "Vale" is the poetical or provincial form. The structure of the greater part of the Holy Land does not lend itself to the formation of valleys in our sense of the word. The abrupt transitions of its crowded rocky hills preclude the existence of any extended sweep of valley. The nearest approach is found in the space (not mentioned in the Bible) between the mountains of Gerizim and Ebal, which contains the town of Nābulus, the ancient SHECHEM. Another is the "Valley of Jezreel." Valley is employed in the A. V. to render six different words, Hebrew and Greek, two of which (No. 1 and 5) are also translated "vale."—1. Heb. 'emek (so Mr. Grove) appears to approach more nearly to the general sense of the English word than any other. Gesenius makes the Hebrew word = "a valley, properly a long low plain." (PLAIN 8.) It is connected with ACHOR, AJALON, BACA, BERACHAH, BETH-REHOB, DECISION, ELAH, GIBEON, HEBRON, JEHOSHAPHAT, KEZIZ, REPHAIM, SHAVEH, SIDDIM, SUCCOTH; but the only one which can be identified with any certainty is that of JEZREEL.—2. Heb. gay and gēy = a valley, so called as the place where waters flow together; then a level region, low plain, Ges. One example remaining can be identified with certainty—the deep hollow which encompasses the S. W. and S. of Jerusalem, and without doubt = "the Valley of HINNOM" (Heb. gēy-Hinnôm) or "the valley of the son of Hinnom" (Heb. gēy ben-Hinnôm) of the O. T. This identification appears to establish the gēy as a deep and abrupt ravine, with steep sides and narrow bottom (so Mr. Grove). Other "valleys" of this kind, or ravines, are those of GEDOR, JIPHTHAH-EL, ZEBOIM, ZEPHTAH, of SALT, of CHARASHIM or "craftsmen," on the N. of A1, and opposite BETH-PEOR.—3. Heb. nahal or nachal = Ar. wady = "BROOK" 4, and "RIVER" 2.—4. Heb. bik'ah (PLAIN 2) is rendered by "valley" in Deut. viii. 7, xi. 11, xxxiv. 3; Josh. xi. 8, 17, xii. 7; 2 Chr. xxxv. 22; Ps. civ. 8; Is. xli. 18, lxiii. 14; Ez. xxxvii. 1, 2; Zech. xii. 11.—5. Heb. hash-Shephēlāh (JUDAH 1 [II.]; LOW COUNTRY; PALESTINE; PLAIN 6; SEPHELA) is rendered "the vale" in Deut. i. 7; Josh. x. 40; 1 K. x. 27; 2 Chr. i. 15; Jer. xxxiii. 13; and "the valley" or "valleys" in Josh. ix. 1, xi. 2, 16 twice, xii. 8, xv. 33; Judg. i. 9; Jer. xxxii. 44.—6. Gr. pharagx = (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) a ravine, chasm, a narrow and deep pass or valley with precipitous rocky sides (Lk. iii. 5 only, quoted from Is. xl. 4, where the LXX. has it for No. 2 above).

* Valley-gate (2 Chr. xxvi. 9; Neh. iii. 13), or Gate of the Valley (ii. 13, 15), a gate of JERUSALEM, leading out into the upper part of the Valley of Hinnom, where now is the Jaffa gate (Ges.).

* Va'por, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. éd. (Mist).—2. Heb. nāsi (in pl. literally risings, i. e. vapors rising from the earth, Ges.) (Ps. cxxxv. 7; Jer. x. 13, li. 16), also translated in A. V. and by Gesenius once "clouds" (Prov. xxv. 14). (CAPTAIN, &c.).—3. Heb. kūḏr once (Ps. cxlviii. 8), elsewhere translated in A. V. and by Gesenius "smoke" (Gen. xix. 28; Ps. cxix. 83).—4. Heb. 'doleh once (Job xxxvi. 33, marg. "that which goeth up;") Gesenius translates Him who goeth up on high, i. e. God ascending in the tempest). 5. Gr. atmis (Acts ii. 19; Jas. iv. 14). CLOUD; DREW, &c.

Vash'ni (Heb., see below), the firstborn of SAMUEL as the text now stands (1 Chr. vi. 28 [Heb. 13]); = JOEL 1. Many suppose that in the Chronicles the name "Joel" has dropped out, and "Vashni" is a corruption of Heb. vishni, "and (the) second." But Fürst makes "Vashni" = Jah is strong, and says, "Joel," which stands for it in 1 Sam. viii. 2, may have the same signification.

Vash'ti (Heb. fr. Pers. = a beauty, Ges.), the "queen" of AHAZERUS 3, who, for refusing to show herself to the king's guests at the royal banquet, when sent for by the king, was repudiated and deposed (Esth. i.). Lord A. C. Hervey supposes that she was only one of the inferior wives, with the title of "queen," whose name has disappeared from history. ESTHER.

* Vat. FAT; OLIVE; WINE-PRESS.

* Van (Heb. vau = a peg, nail, hook, Ges.), the

* Ve'dan. DAN 3.

Veil. Under DRESS, p. 235, are noticed three Hebrew terms (mīpakhath or mīpachath, tsū'iph, and rāddid), rendered "vail" or "veil" in the A. V., but regarded as denoting rather shawls, or mantles, which might at pleasure be drawn over the face, but were not designed for the special purpose of veils. The following terms (so Mr. Bevan) describe the veil proper:—1. Heb. masveh, used of the "veil" which Moses assumed when he came down from the mount (Ex. xxxiv. 33–35), for which the LXX. (l. c.) and N. T. (2 Cor. iii. 13) have Gr. kalumma. It was probably an ample outer robe which might be drawn over the face when required.—2. Heb. pl. mispākhōth, or mispāchōth, used of the veils which the false prophets placed upon their heads (Ez. xiii. 18, 21; A. V. "KECHIEFS").—3. Heb. pl. re'dōth, used of the light veils worn by females (Is. lii. 19, A. V. "MURFLERS").—4. Heb. tsanmāh, understood by the A. V. (with Rashi, and Kimchi, and Winer) of "locks" of hair (Cant. iv. 1, 3, vi. 7; Is. xlvi. 2); but the contents of the passages in which it is used favor the sense of veil (Gesenius, Fürst, &c.). The use of the veil was by no means so general in ancient as in modern times (Gen. xii. 14, xxiv. 16, xxix. 10; 1 Sam. i. 12). At present females are rarely seen without it in Oriental countries. Much of the scrupulousness in this respect dates from the promulgation of the Koran, which forbade women appearing unveiled except in the presence of their nearest relatives. In ancient times, the veil was adopted only in exceptional cases, as an article of ornamental dress (Cant. iv. 1, 3, vi. 7), or by betrothed maidens in the presence of their future husbands, especially at the time of the wedding (Gen. xxiv. 65, xxix. 25), or by women of loose character for purposes of concealment (xxxviii. 14). Among the Jews of the N. T. ago it appears to have been customary for the women to cover their heads (not necessarily their faces) when engaged in public worship (1 Cor. xi. 5–15). MARRIAGE; WOMEN.

Versions, Ancient, of the Old and New Testaments. The ancient versions that have come down to us, in whole or in part, will be described in the alphabetical order of the languages. In most of them the O. T. is not a version from the Hebrew, but merely a secondary translation from the Septuagint in some one of its early forms. It may be added that during the present century, more than 200 different versions of the Bible, or of parts of the Bible, in more than 150 different languages or dialects, ancient or modern, have been published and circulated, in great part through the efforts of Christian missionaries and Bible societies. Of the articles here grouped under the general title of ancient versions, eight (A, B, D, E, F, G, J, K) are abridged from the originals by Dr. Tregelles, and one (L) from that by Mr. Deutsch. These are followed by a separate article (VERSION, AUTHORIZED) on the English version. The SAMARITAN VERSION, SEPTUAGINT, and VULGATE, are treated of elsewhere under their respective titles. BIBLE; CANON; NEW TESTAMENT; OLD TESTAMENT, &c.

A. Arabic Versions.—I. Arabic Versions of the O. T.—(A.) From the Hebrew. Rabbi Saadiah (in L. Saadiah) Haggan, the Hebrew commentator of the tenth century, translated portions (some think the whole) of the O. T. into Arabic. His version of the Pentateuch was printed at Constantinople, in 1546. The Paris Polyglott contains the same version from a MS. differing in many of its readings: this was reprinted by Walton. It seems as if copyists had in parts altered the version considerably. The version of Isaiah by Saadiah was printed by Paulus, at Jena, in 1791, from a Bodleian MS.; the same library contains a MS. of his version of Job and of the Psalms. Kimchi quotes his version of Hosea.—The Book of Joshua in the Paris and Walton's Polyglotts is also from the Hebrew; and this (so Rüdiger) is the case with the Polyglott text of 1 K. xii.—2 K. xii. 16, and of Neh. i.—ix. 27.<sup>1</sup> (SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, II. 3.) (B.) From the Peshito-Syriac. This is the base of the Arabic text in the Polyglotts of the Books of Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, and Nehemiah. (C.) From the LXX. The version in the Polyglotts of the books not specified above. Another text of the Psalter in Justinian's Octuple Psalter, Genoa, 1516.—II. Arabic Versions of the N. T. The printed editions are—1. The Roman first edition of the four Gospels, 1590–91. 2. The Erpenian Arabic. The whole N. T. edited by Erpenius, 1616, at Leyden, from a MS. of the thirteenth or fourteenth century. 3. The Arabic of the Paris Polyglott, 1645. In the Gospels this follows mostly the Roman text; in the Epistles a MS. from Aleppo was used. The Arabic in Walton's Polyglott appears to be simply taken from the Paris text. 4. The Carshuni Arabic text (i. e. in Syriac letters), the Syriac and Arabic N. T., published at Rome, in 1708. For this a MS. brought from Cyprus was used.—Storr proved that in all these editions the Gospels are really the same translation. Juynboll proves that an Arabic MS. at Franeker coincides in its general text with the Roman first edition, that both follow the Latin Vulgate. The greater agreement of the Polyglott text with the Greek he ascribes to the influence of the Aleppo MS. Juynboll identifies the text of the Franeker MS. (and of the Roman edition) with the version made in the eighth century by John, Bishop of Seville. In the Erpenian Arabic the latter part is a translation from the Peshito-Syriac; the Epistles not found in that version and the Apocalypse are said to be from the Memphitic. The latter part of the text in the Polyglott is from the Greek (see note<sup>1</sup>, below).

B. Ar-me'ni-an Version. Before the fifth century the Armenians are said to have used the Syriac alphabet; but at that time Miesrob is stated to have invented the Armenian letters. Soon after this it is said that Miesrob, with his companions, Joseph and Eznak, began a version of the Scriptures from the Syriac, and completed all the O. T.; and in the New, they used the Syriac as their basis, from their inability to obtain any Greek books. But when, in 431, Joseph and Eznak returned from the council of Ephesus with a Greek copy of the Scriptures, Isaac, the Armenian patriarch, and Miesrob, threw aside what they had done, that they might execute a version from the Greek. But now arose the difficulty of their want of a competent acquaintance with that language: to remedy this, Eznak and Joseph were sent with Moses of Chorene (the narrator of these details) to study Greek at Alexandria. There they made what Moses calls their third translation, the first being that from the Syriac, and the second that attempted without sufficient acquaintance with the Greek. The first printed edition of the O. and N. T. in Armenian appeared at Amsterdam in 1686, under the care of a person commonly termed Oscan, or Uscan, and described as an Armenian bishop. Zohrab, in 1789, published at Venice an improved text of the Armenian N. T.; and in 1805 he and his coadjutors completed an edition of the entire Armenian Scriptures. The basis was a MS. written in the fourteenth century. The Armenian version in its general texture is a valuable aid to the criticism of the text of the N. T.<sup>3</sup> ARMENIA.

D. Egyptian Versions.—I. The Memphitic Version, formerly called (from the ancient Coptos in Upper Egypt) the Coptic Version, was for a considerable time the only Egyptian translation known to scholars; but when the fact was established that there were at least two Egyptian versions, the name Coptic was found to be indefinite, and even unsuitable for the translation then so termed; and Copto-Memphitic, or more simply Memphitic (MEMPHIS), is the better name for the version in the dialect of Lower Egypt. When Egyptian translations were made we do not know; probably before the middle of the fourth century. When the attention of European scholars was directed to the language and races of modern Egypt, it was found that while the native Christians use only Arabic vernacularly, yet in their services and in their public reading of the Scriptures they employ a dialect of the Coptic. This is the version now termed Memphitic. Wilkins in 1716 published at Oxford, England, the first Memphitic N. T., founded on MSS. in the Bodleian, and compared with some at Rome and Paris. In 1846-8 Schwartze published at Berlin an edition of the Memphitic Gospels, in which he employed MSS. in the Royal Library there. He produced a far more satisfactory work than that of Wilkins; but death prevented the continuation of his labors. Since then Boetticher's editions, first of the Acts and then of the Epistles, have appeared. In 1848-52 a magnificent edition of the Memphitic N. T. was published by the (English) Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, under the editorial care of the Rev. R. T. Lieler of Cairo. This edition, intended solely for the use of the Coptic Churches, has at the side a small column in Arabic. The O. T. of this version was made from the LXX. Of this various portions have been published at different times.—II. The Thebaic Version. The examination of Egyptian MSS. in the last century showed besides the Memphitic another version in a cognate Egyptian dialect. To this the name Sahidic was applied by some, from an Arabic designation for Upper Egypt and its ancient language; but Copto-Thebaic (as styled by Giorgi), or simply Thebaic (THEBES), is far preferable. In 1785 Mingarelli published a few portions of this version of the N. T. from MSS. In 1789 Giorgi edited very valuable Greek and Thebaic fragments of St. John's Gospel, which appear to belong to the fifth century. Münster, in 1787, published a fragment of Daniel in this version; and in 1789 portions of the Epistles to Timothy, with readings from MSS. in other parts of the N. T. In the following year Mingarelli printed, but died without, properly speaking, publishing, Mk. xi. 29-xv. 22, from MSS. Woide's edition appeared after his death, under the editorial care of Ford, in 1799, and contains the greater part of the Thebaic N. T.—III. A Third Egyptian Version. Some Egyptian fragments, noticed by Münster and Giorgi amongst the Borgian MSS., and differing in dialect both from the Memphitic and Thebaic, were edited by both these scholars independently in 1789. Other portions, transcribed independently by Zoega and Engelbreth, appeared in 1810 and 1811. Arabian writers mention a third Egyptian dialect named Bashmuric, and this has by some been assumed as the appellation for this version. Giorgi supposed this the dialect of the Ammonian Oasis; in this Münster agreed with him; and thus they called the version the Ammonian. The dialect is, however, closely allied to the Thebaic, if really different from it.—Character of the Egyptian Versions. The Thebaic and Memphitic translations are independent of each other, and both spring from Greek copies. It is probable that the Thebaic version was made in the early part of the third century, for the common people among the Christians in Upper Egypt; that it was formed from MSS. such as were then current in the regions of Egypt distant from Alexandria; that afterward the Memphitic version was executed in the more polished dialect, from the Greek copies of Alexandria; and that thus in process of time the Memphitic remained alone in ecclesiastical use. In textual criticism, the value of these versions, though known only through defective channels, is very high. (NEW TESTAMENT, III. 3.) The fragments of the third Egyptian version follow the Thebaic so closely as to have no independent character. This version does, however, possess critical value, as furnishing evidence in a small portion not known in the Thebaic.

E. Ethiopic Version. Christianity was introduced into ETHIOPIA in the fourth century, through the labors of Frumentius and Edesius of Tyre, who had been made slaves and sent to the king. Hence arose the episcopal see of Axum, to which Frumentius was appointed by Athanasius. The Ethiopic version which we possess is in the ancient dialect of Axum; hence some have ascribed it to the age of the earliest missionaries; but, from the general character of the version itself, this is improbable; and the Abyssinians themselves attribute it to a later period. The O. T., as well as the N. T., was executed from the GREEK. (NEW TESTAMENT; SEPTUAGINT.) In 1513 Potken published the Ethiopic Psalter at Rome. In 1648-9, the Ethiopic N. T. was also printed at Rome, edited by three Abyssinians. The Roman edition was reprinted in Walton's Polyglott; and from this Bode, in 1753, published a careful Latin translation of the Ethiopic text. In 1826-30, a new edition, formed by a collation of MSS., was published in England under the care of Mr. Thomas Pell Platt, whose object was not strictly critical, but rather to give to the Abyssinians their Scriptures for ecclesiastical use in as good a form as he conveniently could, consistently with MS. authority. The probability appears to be that there was originally one version of the Gospels; that this was afterward revised with Greek MSS. of a different complexion of text; that succeeding copyists adopted one or the other form, or a confused combination of readings; and that all the portion of the N. T.

<sup>3</sup> The ancient Armenian being unintelligible to the mass of the people, several translations of the Scriptures into the modern Armenian and Armeno-Turkish (i. e. Turkish in Armenian characters) have been published, the latest and best being those prepared by American missionaries in Turkey (Rev. J. B. Adger, Rev. Elias Riggs, D. D., Rev. Wm. Goodell, D. D., &c.), and published by the American Bible Society.

after the Gospels originated from some of the later revisers of the former part, its paraphrastic tone according with this opinion. An examination of the version proves both that it was executed from the Greek, and also that the translator made such mistakes that he could hardly have been a person to whom Greek was the native tongue. The first portion of a complete edition by Dillmann of the Ethiopic O. T. appeared at Leipsic in 1853.

F. Gothic Version. Ulphilas, born in A. D. 318, succeeded Theophilus as bishop of the Goths (then inhabiting regions on the Danube) in 348, when he subscribed a confession rejecting the Nicene creed; through him it is said that the Goths in general adopted Arianism. The great work of Ulphilas was his version of the Scriptures, the use of which can be traced among the Goths in Italy (ROMAN EMPIRE) and SPAIN. In 1648, amongst the spoils from Prague was sent to Stockholm a copy of the Gothic Gospels, known as the Codex Argenteus (= the Silver MS.), generally supposed to be the same that Morillon had noted as previously in the monastery at Werden in Westphalia. In 1653 it was in the possession of Isaac Vossius in Holland. In 1662 it was repurchased for Sweden by Count Magnus Gabriel de la Gardie, who placed it in the library of the University of Upsal. While the book was in the hands of Vossius a transcript was made of its text, from which Junius, his uncle, edited the first edition of the Gothic Gospels at Dort in 1665. The MS. is written on vellum that was once purple, in silver letters, except those at the beginning of sections, which are golden. The gospels have many lacuna (= gaps): it is calculated that when entire it consisted of 320 folios; there are now but 188. It is pretty certain that this beautiful and elaborate MS. must have been written in the sixth century, probably in Upper Italy when under the Gothic sovereignty. Knittel, in 1762, edited from a Wolfenbützel palimpsest some portions of the Epistle to the Romans in Gothic, in which the Latin stood by the side of the version of Ulphilas. In 1817 Cardinal Mai found among the palimpsests in the Ambrosian Library at Milan five which contained portions of the Gothic Version. Mai and Count Carlo Ottavio Castiglione deciphered these MSS., and their labors resulted in the recovery, besides a few portions of the O. T., of almost the whole of the thirteen Epistles of St. Paul and some parts of the Gospels. The edition of Gabelentz and Loebe (1836-45) contains all that has been discovered of the Gothic Version, with a Latin translation, notes, and a Gothic Dictionary and Grammar. In 1854 Uppström published an excellent edition of the text of the Codex Argenteus, with a beautiful facsimile. In 1855-6 Massmann issued an excellent small edition of all the Gothic portions of the Scriptures known to be extant. As an ancient monument of the Gothic language the version of Ulphilas possesses great interest; as a version the use of which was once extended widely through Europe, it is a monument of the Christianization of the Goths; and as a version known to have been made in the fourth century, and transmitted to us in ancient MSS., it has its value in textual criticism. In certain passages it has been thought that there is some proof of the influence of the Latin; but its Greek origin is not to be mistaken. The Greek from which the version was made must in many respects have been what has been termed the transition text of the fourth century.

G. Greek Versions of the Old Testament.—1. SEPTUAGINT.—2. Aquila. The first of the three

Greek versions of the O. T. made in the second century was by Aquila, a native of Sinope in Pontus, who had become a proselyte to Judaism. The Jerusalem Talmud describes him as a disciple of Rabbi Akiba; and this would place him in the reign of Hadrian (A. D. 117-138). It is supposed that his object was to aid the Jews in their controversies with the Christians. Extreme literality and an occasional polemical bias appear to be its chief characteristics. Aquila put forth a second edition (i. e. revision) of his version, in which the Hebrew was yet more servilely followed, but it is not known if this extended to the whole, or only to Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel.—3. Theodotion. The second version executed in the second century is Theodotion's. He is stated to have been an Ephesian, and an Ebionite: if this is correct, his work was probably intended for those semi-Christians who may have desired to use a version of their own instead of employing the LXX. with the Christians, or that of Aquila with the Jews. But the work of Theodotion is rather a revision of the LXX. with the Hebrew text than a translation. The statement of Epiphanius, that he made his translation in the reign of Commodus, accords well with its having been quoted by Irenæus, but cannot be correct if it is one of the translations referred to by Justin Martyr as giving interpretations contrary to the Christian doctrine of the N. T. In most editions of the LXX. Theodotion's version of Daniel is still substituted for that which really belongs to that translation.—4. Symmachus is stated by Eusebius and Jerome to have been an Ebionite: so too in the Syrian accounts given by Assemani; Epiphanius, however, and others style him a Samaritan. Epiphanius says that he lived under the Emperor Severus. The translation which he produced was probably better than the others as to sense and general phraseology.—5. The Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Versions. Besides the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, the great critical work of Origen comprised, as to portions of the O. T., three other versions, placed for comparison with the LXX. (SEPTUAGINT), which, from their being anonymous, are only known as the fifth, sixth, and seventh; designations taken from their places in Origen's columnar arrangement. Eusebius says that one of these versions was found at Jericho, and another at Nicopolis on the gulf of Actium. Epiphanius says that the fifth was found at Jericho, and the sixth at Nicopolis; while Jerome speaks of the fifth as found at the latter place. The contents of the fifth version appear to have been the Pentateuch, Psalms, Canticles, and the minor prophets; it seems also referred to in the Syro-Hexaplar text of 2 Kings. The translator used the Hebrew original, but was aided by the work of former translators. The sixth version seems to have been just the same in its contents as the fifth (except 2 Kings). Jerome calls the authors of the fifth and sixth "Jewish translators;" but the translator of this must have been a Christian when he executed his work, or else a Christian reviser must have meddled with it before it was employed by Origen. Of the seventh version very few fragments remain. It seems to have contained the Psalms and minor prophets; and the translator was probably a Jew. The existing fragments of these varied versions are mostly to be found in the editions of the relics of Origen's Hexapla, by Montfaucon and by Pajdht.—6. The Venetian-Greek Version. A MS. of the fourteenth century, in the library of St. Mark at Venice, contains a peculiar version of the Pentateuch, Pro-

erbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, and Daniel. All of these books, except the Pentateuch, were published by Villoison at Strasburg in 1784; the Pentateuch was edited by Ammon at Erlangen in 1790-91. The translation was made from the Hebrew, although the present punctuation and accentuation is often not followed, and the translator was no doubt acquainted with some other Greek versions. J. Sla-ven'ic Version. In A. D. 862 there was a desire expressed, or an inquiry made, for Christian teachers in Moravia, and in 863 the labors of missionaries began amongst them. These missionaries were Cyrillus (or Cyril) and Methodius, two brothers from Thessalonica: to Cyrillus is ascribed the invention of the Slavonian alphabet, and the commencement of the translation of the Scriptures. He appears to have died at Rome in 868, while Methodius continued for many years to be the bishop of the Slavonians. He is stated to have continued his brother's translation, although how much they themselves actually executed is uncertain. The O. T. is a version from the LXX., but what revision it may since have received seems by no means certain. As the oldest known Slavonic MS. of the whole Bible is of the year 1499, it may reasonably be questioned whether this version may not in large portions be comparatively modern. The oldest MS. of any part of this version is one of the four Gospels, of the year 1036. The first printed portion was an edition of the Gospels in Wallachia, in 1512; in 1875 the same portion was printed at Wilna; and in 1581 the whole Bible was printed at Ostrog in Volhynia. The general text is such as would have been expected in the ninth century: some readings from the Latin have, it appears, been introduced in places.

K. Syr'i-ac Versions.—I. Of the Old Testament. (A.) From the Hebrew. In the early times of Syrian Christianity there was executed a version of the O. T. from the Hebrew, the use of which must have been as widely extended as was the Christian profession among that people. (SYRIA.) Ephrem the Syrian, in the latter half of the fourth century, calls it our version, not in opposition to any other Syriac translation, but in contrast to the original Hebrew text, or to those in other languages. At a later period—probably after another version had been formed from the Hexaplar Greek text—this Syriac translation was designated Peshito (= Simple). This translation from the Hebrew has always been the ecclesiastical version of the Syrians. It is highly improbable that any part of it is older than the advent of our Lord; those who placed it under Abgarus, king of Edessa, seem to have argued on the account that the Syrian people then received Christianity. All that the account shows clearly is, that it was believed to belong to the earliest period of the Christian faith among them. Ephrem, in his commentaries, gives explanations of terms which were obscure even in the fourth century. This might have been from age: if so, the version was made comparatively long before his days: or it might be from its having been in a dialect different from that to which he was accustomed at Edessa. In this case, then, the translation was made in some other part of Syria. Probably the Old Syriac version differed as much from the polished language of Edessa as did the Old Latin, made in the African province, from the contemporary writers of Rome.

(VULGATE.) The Old Syriac has the peculiar value of being the first version from the Hebrew original made for Christian use. The proof that this version was made from the Hebrew is twofold—from the direct statements of Ephrem, and from the internal examination of the version itself. The first printed edition of this version was that which appeared in the Paris Polyglott of Le Jay in 1645; it is said that the editor, Gabriel Sionita, a Maronite, had only an imperfect MS. In Walton's Polyglott, 1657, the Paris text is reprinted, but with the addition of the Apocryphal books. In the punctuation given in the Polyglotta, a system was introduced which was in part a peculiarity of Gabriel Sionita himself. Dr. Lee collated for the text which he edited for the British and Foreign Bible Society six Syriac MSS. of the O. T. in general, and a very ancient copy of the Pentateuch: he also used in part the commentaries of Ephrem and of Bar-Hebræus. From these various sources he constructed his text, with the aid of that found already in the Polyglotts. But in the MSS. brought to England, from the Nitrian valleys in Egypt, may be found the means of far more accurately editing this version.—It has been much discussed whether this translation was a Jewish or a Christian work; but there need be no reasonable objection to the opinion that it is a Christian work. The Syriac in general supports the Hebrew text that we have. A resemblance has been pointed out between the Syriac and the reading of some of the Chaldee Targums (see L, below); if the Targum is the older, it is not unlikely that the Syriac translator examined the Targums in difficult passages. If existing Targums are more recent than the Syriac, their coincidences may have arisen from the use of a common source—an earlier Targum.—Another point of inquiry of more importance is, how far has this version been affected by the LXX.? and to what are we to attribute this influence? It is possible that the influence of the LXX. is partly to be ascribed to copyists and revisers; while in part this belonged to the version as originally made. When the extensive use of the LXX. is remembered, and how soon it was imagined to have been made by direct inspiration and to be canonically authoritative (CANON; SEPTUAGINT), we cannot wonder that readings from the LXX. should have been from time to time introduced. Some comparison with the Greek is probable even before the time of Ephrem; for, as to the Apocryphal books, while he cites some of them (though not as Scripture), the Apocryphal additions to Daniel and the Books of Maccabees were not yet found in Syriac. Whoever translated any of these books from the Greek may easily have also compared with it in some places the books previously translated from the Hebrew. In the Book of Psalms this version exhibits many peculiarities. Either the translation of the Psalter must be a work independent of the Peshito in general, or else it has been strangely revised and altered, not only from the Greek, but also from liturgical use. It is stated that, after the divisions of the Syrian Church (fifth century), there were revisions of this one version by the Monophysites and by the Nestorians. The Karkaphensian recension mentioned by Bar-Hebræus is found in two MSS. in the Vatican, and was formed for the use of Monophysites. (B.) The Syriac version from the Hexaplar Greek Text. The only Syriac version of the O. T. up to the sixth century was apparently the Peshito. Moses Aghelæus, who lived in the middle of the sixth century, speaks of the versions of the N. T. and the Psalter as made in Syriac by Polycarp

It is said that the Nestorian patriarch, Marabba, A. D. 552, made a version from the Greek. The version by Paul of Tela, a Monophysite, was made in the beginning of the seventh century; for its basis he used the Hexaplar Greek text, i. e. the LXX., with Origen's corrections, marks, and references to the other Greek versions. (SEPTUAGINT.) The Syro-Hexaplar version follows the Greek as exactly as possible, contains Origen's marks and references, and acquaints us most accurately with the results of his critical labors. A MS. of this version in the Ambrosian Library at Milan contains the Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, minor prophets, Jeremiah, Baruch, Daniel, Ezekiel, and Isaiah. Norberg published at Lund, in 1787, the Books of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, from his transcript of the MS. at Milan. In 1788 Bugati published at Milan the Book of Daniel; he also edited the Psalms, the printing of which had been completed before his death in 1816; it was published in 1820. The rest of the contents of the Milan MS. (except the Apocryphal books) was published at Berlin, in 1835, by Middeldorpf from Norberg's transcript; Middeldorpf also added the Fourth (second) Book of Kings from a MS. at Paris. Besides these portions of this Syriac version, the MSS. from the Nitrian monasteries, now in the British Museum, would add a good deal more. Thomas of Harkel (see II. B, below) seems to have made a translation from the Greek into Syriac of some of the Apocryphal books—at least, the subscriptions in certain MSS. state this.—II. Of the New Testament. (A.) The Peshito-Syriac N. T. It may stand as an admitted fact that a version of the N. T. in Syriac existed in the second century, and in the fourth century was as well known as the Syriac version of the O. T. To the translation in common use among the Syrians, orthodox, Monophysite, or Nestorian, from the fifth century and onward, the name of Peshito has been as commonly applied in the N. T. as the Old. Cosmas Indicopleustes, in the former half of the sixth century, incidentally informs us that the Syriac translation does not contain 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Jude. In 1552 Moses of Mardin came to Rome to Pope Julius III., commissioned by Ignatius the Jacobite (Monophysite) patriarch, to state his religious opinions, to effect (it is said) a union with the Roman Catholic Church, and to get the Syriac N. T. printed. Through the influence of Widmanstadt, the chancellor of the Emperor Ferdinand I., the emperor undertook the charge of an edition, which appeared at Vienna, in 1555, through the joint labors of Widmanstadt, Moses, and Postell. In having only three Catholic epistles, this Syriac N. T. agreed with the description of Cosmas; the Apocalypse was also wanting, as well as Jn. viii. 1-11. One of the principal editions is that of Leusden and Schaaf, 1708-9, with a text as full as possible, and a Lexicon of great value. Professor Lee published an edition in 1816, in which he corrected or altered the text on the authority of a few MSS. In 1828 the edition of Mr. William Greenfield was published by Messrs. Bagster.—This Syriac version has been variously estimated: some have thought it a genuine and unaltered monument of the second, or perhaps even of the first century. Others finding in it indubitable marks of a later age, were inclined to deny that it had any claim to a very remote antiquity. The fact is, that this version as transmitted to us contains marks of antiquity, and also traces of a later age. The two things are so blended, that if either class of phenomena alone were regarded, the most opposite opinions might be formed. Griesbach (and so Tregelles) supposed that it had been repeatedly revised at different times by different Greek MSS. Whether the whole of this version proceeded from the same translator has been questioned. Dr. Tregelles thinks that the N. T. of the Peshito is not from the same hand as the O. T., and that not only may Michaelis be right in supposing a peculiar translator of Hebrews, but also other parts may be from different hands. The revisions to which the version was subjected may have succeeded in part, but not wholly, in effacing the indications of a plurality of translators. The Acts and Epistles seem to be either more recent than the Gospels, though far less revised; or else, if coeval, far more corrected by later Greek MSS. The MSS. of the Karkaphensian recension (as it has been termed) of the Peshito O. T. contain also the N. T. with a similar character of text.—The Curetonian Syriac Gospels. Among the MSS. brought from the Nitrian monasteries in 1842, Dr. Cureton noticed a copy of the Gospels, differing greatly from the common text: and to this form of text the name of Curetonian Syriac has been applied. Every criterion which proves the common Peshito not to exhibit a text of extreme antiquity, equally proves the early origin of this. Dr. Cureton considers the MS. of the Gospels to be of the fifth century, a point in which all competent judges are probably agreed. The MS. contains Mat. i.-viii. 22, x. 31-xxiii. 25; Mk., the four last verses only; Jn. i. 1-42, iii. 6-vii. 37, xiv. 11-29; Lk. ii. 48-iii. 16, vii. 33-xv. 21, xvii. 24-xxiv. 41. In examining the Curetonian text with the common printed Peshito, we often find such identity of phrase and rendering as to show that they are not wholly independent translations: then, again, we meet with such variety in the forms of words, &c., as seems to indicate that in the Peshito the phraseology had been revised and refined. But the great (it might be said characteristic) difference between the Curetonian and the Peshito Gospels is in their readings. The Curetonian Syriac presents such a text as we might have concluded would be current in the second century: the Peshito has many features which could not belong to that age. Dr. Cureton and Dr. Tregelles regard the Curetonian Syriac of St. Matthew's Gospel as translated from the apostle's Hebrew (Syro-Chaldaic) original, although injured since by copyists or revisers. (MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF.)—(B.) The Philoxenian Syriac Version and its revision by Thomas of Harkel. Philoxenus, or Xcnaïas, a Monophysite, bishop of Hierapolis or Mabug at the beginning of the sixth century, caused Polycarp, his Chorepiscopus (local or assistant bishop), to make a new translation of the N. T. into Syriac. This was executed in A. D. 508, and it is generally termed Philoxenian from its promoter. This version has been transmitted to us only as revised with Greek MSS. by Thomas of Harkel in the following century (The Gospels, A. D. 616), and therefore called the Harklean text. This was edited by White at different times, from 1778 to 1803, and St. John's Gospel from a Vatican MS. by Bernstein, in 1851. This version differs from the Peshito in containing all the seven Catholic Epistles. The text of this version, as it has come down to us, is characterized by extreme literality: the Syriac idiom is constantly bent to suit the Greek. The kind of Greek text that it represents is just what might have been expected in the sixth century. The work of Thomas in the text itself is seen in the introduction of obeloi, by which passages which he rejected were condemned; and of asterisks, with which his insertions were distinguished. His model in all this was the Hexaplar Greek text. It is probable that the Philoxenian version was very literal, but that the slavish adaptation to the Greek is the work of Thomas.—(C.) Syriac Versions of portions wanting in the Peshito. (a.) 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Jude were published by Pococke in 1690, from a MS. in the Bodleian. The suggestion of Dr. Davidson, that the text of Pococke is that of Philoxenus before it was revised by Thomas, seems most probable. (b.) The Apocalypse. In 1627 De Dieu edited a Syriac version of the Apocalypse from a MS. in the Leyden Library, written by one "Caspar from the land of the Indians," who lived in the latter part of the sixteenth century. A MS. at Florence, also written by this Caspar, has a subscription stating that it was copied in 1582 from a MS. in the writing of Thomas of Harkel, in A. D. 622. A more ancient copy of the version is in the British Museum. It is of small critical value, and the MS. from which it was edited is incorrectly written. This book, from the Paris Polyglott and onward, has been added to the Peshito in this translation.—(c.) The Syriac Version of Jn. viii. 1-11. From the MS. of the Syriac N. T. (of what version is unknown, but probably of Paul of Tela, who translated the Hexaplar Greek text into Syriac [see above, I. B.]) sent by Archbishop Usher to De Dieu, the latter published this section in 1631. From De Dieu it was inserted in the London Polyglott, with a reference to Usher's MS., and hence it has passed with the other editions of the Peshito where it is a mere interpolation.—(D.) The Jerusalem Syriac Lectionary. The MS. in the Vatican containing this version was written in A. D. 1031, in peculiar Syriac writing; the portions are of course those for the different festivals, some parts of the Gospels not being there at all. The dialect was termed the Jerusalem Syriac, from its supposed resemblance to that of the Jerusalem Talmud. The grammar is peculiar; the forms almost Chaldee rather than Syriac; two characters are used for expressing F and P. For critical purposes this Lectionary has a far higher value than for any other: its readings often coincide with the oldest and best authorities. Adler dates the version from the fourth to the sixth century; but more probably this Lectionary was translated at some later period from a Greek Lectionary. An edition of this Lectionary, containing the Syriac text, with a Latin translation, glossary, &c., has been published by Count Miniscalchi Erizzo, 2 vols. 4to, Verona, 1861—64.*

L. Targum, a Chaldee word of uncertain origin; the general term for the Chaldee, or, more accurately, Ar-a-ma'iz Version of the OLD TESTAMENT. The injunction to "read the Book of the Law before all Israel, . . . the men, and women, and children, and the strangers," on the Feast of Tabernacles of every Sabbatical year, as a means of solemn instruction and edification, is first found in Deut. xxxi. 10-13. Among the first acts undertaken by Ezra toward the restoration of the primitive religion and public worship is reported his reading "before the congregation, both of men and women," of the returned exiles, "in the Book in the Law of God" (Neh. viii. 2, 8; SYNAGOGUE). Aided by those men of learning and eminence with whom, according to tradition, he founded the Great Synagogue (SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT), he appears to have so firmly established regular and frequent public readings in the Sacred Records, that later authorities almost unanimously trace this custom to times immemorial—nay, to the times of Moses himself. To these ancient readings in the Pentateuch were added, in the course of time, readings in the Prophets (in some Babylonian cities even in the Hagiographa), which were called Haphtharoth. (BIBLE IV.) Ever long it was found necessary to translate the national books into the Aramaic (HEBREW; SHÉMITIC LANGUAGES), and to add to the translation an explanation, particularly of the more difficult and obscure passages. Both translation and explanation were designated by the term Targum. In the course of time there sprang up a guild, whose special office it was to act as interpreters in both senses (Metúrgeman), while formerly the learned alone volunteered their services. These interpreters were subjected to certain bonds and regulations as to the form and substance of their renderings, their position, voice, relation to those who read the Law in public, &c. They were required to interpret orally; certain passages were specified in the Mishna, which might be read in the synagogue and translated; others, which might be read but not translated; others, again, which might neither be read nor translated. These interpreters, who were paid for their services, do not seem to have been held generally in very high respect. A fair notion of what was considered a proper Targum may be gathered from the maxim preserved in the Talmud: "Whosoever translates [as Metúrgeman] a verse in its closely exact form [without proper regard to its real meaning] is a liar, and whosoever adds to it is impious and a blasphemer, e. g. the literal rendering into Chaldee of the verse, 'They saw the God of Israel' (Ex. xxiv. 10), is as wrong a translation as 'They saw the angel of God;' the proper rendering being 'They saw the glory of the God of Israel.'" (SHÉCHINAH.) The same causes which, in the course of time, led to the writing down of the whole body of the Traditional Law, engendered also, and about the same period, as it would appear, written Targums: for certain portions of the Bible, at least. The gradual growth of the Code of the written Targum, such as now embraces almost the whole of the O. T., and contains, we may presume, but few snatches of the primitive Targums, is shrouded in deep obscurity. (OLD TESTAMENT, B; PHARISES; SCRIBES.) The Targums now extant are as follows:—I. The Targum of Onkelos on the Pentateuch. Onkelos = Aquila, the Greek translator of the O. T. (so Mr. Deutsch, with Graetz, &c.; see above, G, 2); and the name Targum had become expressive of the type and ideal of a Bible-translation; so that, in fact, the Chaldee version was a Targum done in the manner of Aquila:—Aquila Targum (so Mr. Deutsch, with Luzzatto, Geiger, Jost, Frankel, Graetz, and other Jews). The writing of it was begun about the end of the second century A. C.; but it was so far from superseding the oral Targum at once, that it was strictly forbidden to be read in public. We may place the work of collecting the different fragments of translation with their variants, and reducing them into one—finally authorized Version—about the end of the third, or the beginning of the fourth century, and in assigning Babylon as its birthplace.<sup>4</sup> The language of the Targum is Chaldee, closely approaching in purity of idiom to that of Ezra and Daniel. It follows a sober and clear, though not a slavish exegesis, and keeps as closely and minutely to the text as is at all consistent with its purpose, viz. to be chiefly, and above all, a version for the people. Its explanations of difficult and obscure passages bear ample witness to the competence of those who gave it its final shape, and infused into it a rare unity. It is always concise, clear, and dignified. It avoids the legendary character with which all the later Targums entwine the Biblical word, as far as ever circumstances would allow. Only in the poetical passages it was compelled to yield—though reluctantly—to the popular craving for Haggadah; but even here it chooses and selects with rare taste and tact. In spite of its many and important changes of the text in regard to language, or meaning, or both, the Targum never forgets its aim of being a clear, though free, translation for the people, and nothing more. Wherever it deviates from the literalness of the text, such a course, in its case, is fully justified—nay, necessitated—either by the obscurity of the passage, or the wrong construction that naturally would be put upon its wording by the multitude. The explanations given agree either with the real sense, or develop the current tradition supposed to underlie it. As to the Bible Text from which the Targum was prepared, we have no certainty whatever on this head, owing to the extraordinarily corrupt state of our Targum texts. It would appear, however, that, broadly speaking, our present Masoretic text has been the one from which the Onkelos Version was, if not made, yet edited, at all events. The Samaritan version is sometimes identical with it. (SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, II. 1.) The MSS. of Onkelos are extant in great numbers. It was first printed at Bologna in 1482 with the Hebrew text and Rashi. (OLD TESTAMENT, A, II., 3.) Other editions are in Buxtorf's Rabbinical Bible, Walton's Polyglott, &c. A recent and much emended edition dates Wilm, 1852.—II. Targum on the Prophets, viz. Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets—called Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel. We may place this Targum some time, although not long, after Onkelos, or about the middle of the fourth century;—the latter years of Rabbi Joseph, who, it is said, occupied himself chiefly with the Targum when he had become blind. This Targum holds, in point of interpretation and enlargement of the text, the middle place between Onkelos, who only in extreme cases deviates into paraphrase, and the subsequent Targums, whose connection with their texts is frequently of the most flighty character. The interpretation of Jonathan, where it adheres to the text, is mostly very correct in a philosophical and exegetical sense, closely literal even, provided the meaning of the original is easily to be understood by the people. When, however, similes are used, unfamiliar or obscure to the people, it unhesitatingly dissolves them, and makes them easy in their mouths like household words, by adding as much of explanation as seems fit; sometimes, it cannot be denied, less sagaciously, even incorrectly, comprehending the original meaning. The Chemitic fairy and legendary lore is to a very great extent to be found in an embryo state, so to say, in this Targum. The first printed edition was at Leiria in 1494, and later editions are in the Polyglotts. (OLD TESTAMENT, A, II. 3.)—III. and IV. Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel and Jerusalem-Targum on the Pentateuch. Onkelos and Jonathan on the Pentateuch and Prophets, whatever be their exact date, place, authorship, and editorship, are the oldest of existing Targums, and belong, in their present shape, to Babylon and the Babylonian academies flourishing between the third and fourth centuries. But precisely as two parallel and independent developments of the Oral Law have sprung up in the Palestinian and Babylonian Talmuds respectively, so also recent investigation has proved the existence of two distinct cycles of Targums on the Written Law—i. e. the entire body of the O.T. The one first collected, revised, and edited in Babylon, called—more especially that part of it which embraced the Pentateuch (Onkelos)—the Babylonian. The other, continuing its oral life, so to say, down to a much later period, was written and edited—less carefully, or rather with a much more faithful retention of the oldest and youngest fancies of the interpreters and preachers—on the soil of Judea itself. Of this entire cycle, however, the Pentateuch and a few other books and fragmentary pieces only have survived entire, while of most of the other books of the Bible a few detached fragments are all that is known, and this chiefly from quotations. We are in the possession of two Palestinian Targums on the Pentateuch, preserved in their original forms. The one, which extends from the first verse of Genesis to the last of Deuteronomy, is known under the name of Targum Jonathan (ben Uzziel) or Pseudo-Jonathan on the Pentateuch. The other, interpreting single verses, often single words only, is extant in the following proportions: a third on Genesis, a fourth on Deuteronomy, a fifth on Numbers, three-twentieths on Exodus, and about one-fourteenth on Leviticus. The latter is generally called Targum of Jerusalem or of the land of Israel. Not before the first half of this century did the fact become fully established that both Targums were in reality one, known down to the fourteenth century only as the Targum of Jerusalem. Zunz assumes that Pseudo-Jonathan is the original Targum, and that the fragmentary Targum of Jerusalem is a collection of variants to it. Frankel, followed by Traub and Levysohn, concludes that the Jerusalem is a collection of emendations and additions to single portions, phrases, and words of Onkelos, and Pseudo-Jonathan a further emended and completed edition to the whole Pentateuch of Jerusalem Onkelos. The Jerusalem, in both its recensions, is written in the Palestinian dialect. It is older than the Masorah (OLD TESTAMENT) and the conquest of Western Asia by the Arabs. Syria or Palestine must be its birthplace, the second half of the seventh century its date. Its chief aim and purpose is, especially in its second edition, to form an entertaining compendium of all the Halakah and Haggadah (SCRIBES), which refers to the Pentateuch, and takes its stand upon it. And in this lies its chief use to us. There is hardly a single allegory, parable, mystic digression, or tale in it which is not found in the other haggadistic writings—Mishna, Talmud, &c. The Targum of Jerusalem was first printed in Bomberg's Bible, Venice, 1518 f., reprinted in Walton, &c. Jonathan to the Pentateuch was first printed in 1590 as Targum "Jonathan ben Uzziel" at Venice, reprinted in Walton, bat underwent much alteration in the hands of the Babylonian Jews. . . . It has been supposed not without reason that Rabbi Joseph [president of the college at Pumbedita; born in Babylon about A. D. 270; † about 333] and his contemporaries brought it to its final redaction; but it is now impossible to trace the various stages of improvement through which it passed till it appeared complete about the end of the third century."

* The ancient Syriac is still the sacred or ecclesiastical language of the Maronites, Nestorians, &c.; but is no longer intelligible to the people. The Bible, translated into modern Syriac by American missionaries to the Nestorians, has been published at Oroomiah, in Persia.

&c.—V. Targums of "Joseph the Blind" on the Hagiographa. "When Jonathan ben Uzziel began to paraphrase the Cethubim" (Hagiographa; BIBLE, III. 8), says the Talmud, "a mysterious voice was heard saying: It is enough. Thou hast revealed the secrets of the prophets—why wouldst thou also reveal those of the Holy Ghost?"—It would thus appear, that a Targum to these books (Job excepted) was entirely unknown up to a very late period. Those Targums on the Hagiographa which we now possess have been attributed vaguely to different authors, it being assumed in the first instance that they were the work of one man. Popular belief fastened upon Joseph the Blind. Yet, if ever he did translate the Hagiographa, certain it is that those which we possess are not by his or his disciples' hands—i. e. of the time of the fourth century. Between him and our hagiographical Targums, many centuries must have elapsed. Yet we do not venture to assign to them more than an approximate round date, about 1000 A. D.—Besides the Targums to the Pentateuch and the Prophets, those now extant range over Psalms, Proverbs, Job (these three being probably nearly contemporaneous productions of Syria, and the two former mere paraphrases, while the latter, like Onkelos, adheres as closely to the original as possible), the five Milgeloth, i. e. Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Esther, Ecclesiastes ("versions" of the greatest freedom—mere Haggidâh—probably by one author much later than the Talmud); the Chronicles and Daniel. Ezra and Nehemiah alone are left without a Targum at present.—VI. Targum on the Book of Chronicles. This Targum was unknown up to a very recent period. In 1680 it was first edited from an Erfurt MS. by M. F. Beck, and in 1715 from a more complete as well as correct MS. at Cambridge, by D. Wilkins. The name of Hungary occurring in it, and its frequent use of the Jerusalem-Targum to the Pentateuch, amounting sometimes to simple copying, show sufficiently that its author is neither "Jonathan ben Uzziel" nor "Joseph the Blind," as has been suggested. But the language, style, and the Haggidâh, with which it abounds, point to its being written at a late period in Palestine. Its use must be limited to philological, historical, and geographical studies; exegesis will profit little by it.—VII. The Targum to Daniel. Munk found this in a MS. in the Imperial Library at Paris, entitled "History of Daniel," not indeed in the original Aramaic,<sup>6</sup> but in what appears to him to be an extract of it written in Persian. It contains several legends and a long prophecy of Daniel, from which it is shown to have been written after the first crusade.—VIII. There is also a Chaldee translation extant of the apocryphal pieces of Esther, published by De Rossi, Tübingen, 1783.

Version, Author-ized, or English Version. I. Early Translations. Cædmon († A. D. 680) embodied the whole history of the Bible in the alliterative metre of Anglo-Saxon poetry; Aldhelm, bishop of Sherborne, in the seventh century, rendered the Psalter; Bede translated in the last hours of his life (A. D. 735) the Gospel of St. John; King Alfred († 901) set forth in his mother-tongue as the great groundwork of his legislation Ex. xx.—xxiii., and translated for his own and his children's use portions of the Bible, some of the Psalms, and extracts from other books. One Anglo-Saxon version of the four Gospels, interlinear with the Latin of the Vulgate, known as the Durham Book, in the British Museum, and another known as the Rushworth Gloss, in the Bodleian Library, are referred to the ninth or tenth century. The name of Ælfric (archbishop of Canterbury, † 1005 ?) is connected with an Epitome of Scripture History, including a translation of many parts of the historical books of the Bible. Three versions of the Gospels belonging to the eleventh or twelfth century are in the British Museum, &c. The metrical paraphrase of the Gospel history, known as the Ormulum, in alliterative English verse, is ascribed to the latter part of the twelfth century; a prose translation of the Bible into Norman-French to about A. D. 1260. Three English versions of the Psalms were made, one about the close of the thirteenth century; another by Schorham about A. D. 1320; another—with other canticles from the O. T. and N. T. and a devotional exposition—by Richard Rolle of Hampole, about 1349; and a version of the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke and of all St. Paul's Epistles is in a library at Cambridge, England. All these versions were from the VULGATE.—II. Wycliffe or Wickliffe (born 1324; † 1384). The history of the English Bible begins with the work of the first great reformer. 1. The first translation from the Bible connected with the name of John Wycliffe was of part of the Apocalypse. The Last Age of the Church (A. D. 1356) translates and expounds the vision in which the reformer read the signs of his own times, the sins and the destruction of "Antichrist and his meynee" (= multitude). Shortly after this he completed a version of the Gospels, accompanied by a commentary. Another translation and commentary appear to have been made about the same time, in ignorance of Wycliffe's work. These preliminary labors were followed up by a complete translation of the N. T. by Wycliffe himself. The O. T. was undertaken by his coadjutor, Nicholas de Hereford, but was interrupted, probably in 1382, and ends abruptly (following so far the order of the Vulgate) in the middle of Baruch. Many of the MSS. of this version now extant present a different recension of the text, and it is probable that the work of Wycliffe and Hereford was revised by Richard Purvey, about 1388. 2. The version was based entirely upon the Vulgate. Many MSS. were compared, and the true reading ascertained as far as possible. Then the glosses, commentaries, grammars, &c., were consulted as to the meaning of difficult passages. He aimed at making the translation idiomatic rather than literal. As he went on he submitted the work to the judgment of others, and obtained their suggestions. 3. The extent of its circulation may be estimated from the fact that, in spite of all the chances of time and all the systematic efforts for its destruction by Archbishop Arundel, &c., not less than 150 copies are known to be extant. 4. The following characteristics may be noticed: (a.) The general homeliness of its style. (b.) The substitution, in many cases, of English equivalents for quasi-technical words. (c.) The extreme literalness with which, in some instances, even at the cost of being unintelligible, the Vulgate text is followed, as in 2 Cor. i. 17–19.—III. Tyndal. The work of Wycliffe stands by itself. By the reign of Henry VIII. its English was already obsolescent, and men became dissatisfied with a version not made from the original. William Tyndal—who went to Oxford about 1500, and, after some years of study there, to Cambridge—is the patriarch, in no remote ancestry, of the A. V. More than

Cranmer or Ridley he is the true hero of the English Reformation. "Ere many years," he said, at the age of thirty-six (A. D. 1520), he would cause "a boy that driveth the plough" to know more of Scripture than the great body of the clergy then knew. Whether Tyndal had gained any knowledge of Hebrew before he left England in 1524 may be uncertain; but in 1530-31 he published a translation of Genesis, Deuteronomy, and Jonah. The N. T. was, however, the great object of his care. First the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark were published tentatively, then in 1525 the whole of the N. T. was printed in 4to at Cologne and in small 8vo at Worms. The work was received in England with denunciations. Tonsal, bishop of London, preaching at Paul's Cross, asserted that there were at least 2,000 errors in it, and ordered all copies of it to be bought up and burnt. An Act of Parliament forbade the use of all copies of Tyndal's "false translation." The treatment which it received from professed friends was hardly less annoying. Piratical editions were published, often carelessly, at Antwerp. A scholar of his own, George Joye, undertook (in 1534) to improve the version by conforming it more closely to the Vulgate, &c. The most zealous reformers in England encouraged Coverdale in undertaking another version. In the mean time the work went on. Editions were printed one after another. The last appeared in 1535, just before his death. His heroic life was brought to a close in 1538. We may cast one look on its sad end—the treacherous betrayal, the Judas-kiss of the false friend, the imprisonment at Vilvorden, the last prayer as he was fastened to the stake, "Lord, open the king of England's eyes." To Tyndal belongs the honor of having given the first example of a translation based on true principles, and the excellence of later versions has been almost in exact proportion as they followed his. Believing that every part of Scripture had one sense and one only, the sense in the mind of the writer, he made it his work, using all philological helps that were accessible, to attain that sense. Believing that the duty of a translator was to place his readers as nearly as possible on a level with those for whom the books were originally written, he looked on all the later theological associations that had gathered round the words of the N. T. as hindrances rather than helps, and sought, as far as possible, to get rid of them. All the exquisite grace and simplicity which have endeared the A. V. to men of the most opposite tempers and contrasted opinions—is due mainly to his clear-sighted truthfulness. The desire to make the Bible a people's book led him in one edition to something like a provincial rather than a national translation, but on the whole kept him free from the besetting danger of the time, that of writing for scholars, not for the people. And throughout there is the pervading stamp of the most thorough truthfulness.—IV. Coverdale. 1. A complete translation of the Bible, different from Tyndal's, bearing the name of Miles Coverdale, printed probably at Zurich, appeared in 1535. The undertaking itself, and the choice of Coverdale as the translator, were probably due to Cromwell, secretary of King Henry VIII. Tyndal's controversial treatises, and the polemical character of his prefaces and notes, had irritated the leading ecclesiastics and embittered the mind of the king himself against him. There was no hope of obtaining the king's sanction for any thing that bore his name. But the idea of an English translation began to find favor. The bishops even began to think of the thing as possible. Cromwell, it is probable, thought it better to lose no further time, and to strike while the iron was hot. A divine whom he had patronized, though not, like Tyndal, feeling himself called to that special work, was willing to undertake it. To him accordingly it was intrusted. 2. The work thus executed was done, as might be expected, in a very different fashion from Tyndal's. Of the two men, one had made this the great object of his life, the other, in his own language, "sought it not, neither desired it," but accepted it as a task assigned him. One prepared himself for the work by long years of labor in Greek and Hebrew. The other is content to make a translation at second hand "out of the Douche (Luther's German Version) and the Latine." He used Tyndal's version and five others. 3. In Coverdale's version the proper names of the O. T. appear for the most part in their Latin form, Elias, Eliseus, Ochozias; sometimes, as in Esay and Jeremy, in that which was familiar in spoken English. "Cush," which in Wycliffe, Tyndal, and the A. V. is uniformly rendered "Ethiopia," is in Coverdale "Marians' land" (Ps. lxxviii. 31; Acts viii. 27, &c.), after Luther, and appears in this form accordingly in the Prayer-book version of the Psalms. The proper name Rabshakeh passes, as in Luther, into the "chief butler" (2 K. xviii. 17; Is. xxxvi. 11). "Shiloh," in Gen. xlix. 10, becomes "the worthy," after Luther. The singular word "Lamia" is taken from the Vulgate (A. V. "wild beast") in Is. xxxiv. 14. But we have "Congregation," throughout the N. T., for Gr. ekklesia ("church," A. V.); and "love" instead of "charity" in 1 Cor. xiii. Baruch is placed after Lamentations. 4. What has been stated practically disposes of the claim sometimes set up for this version of Coverdale's, as though made from the original text. It is not improbable, however, that as time went on he added to his knowledge. He, at any rate, continued his work as a painstaking editor. Fresh editions of his Bible were published, keeping their ground in spite of rivals, in 1537, 1539, 1550, 1553. He was called in at a still later period to assist in the Geneva version.—V. Matthew. 1. In 1537, a large folio Bible appeared as edited and dedicated to the king, by Thomas Matthew. No one of that name appears at all prominently in the religious history of Henry VIII., and this suggests the inference that the name was adopted to conceal the real translator. The tradition which connects this Matthew with John Rogers, the proto-martyr of the Marian persecution, is all but undisputed. Matthew's Bible reproduces Tyndal's work, in the N. T. entirely, in the O. T. as far as 2 Chr., the rest being taken with occasional modifications from Coverdale. 2. The printing of the book was begun apparently abroad, and was carried on as far as the end of Isaiah. At that point a new pagination begins, and the names of the London printers, Grafton and Whitchurch, appear. A copy was ordered, by royal proclamation, to be set up in every church, the cost being divided between the clergy and the parishioners. This was, therefore, the first Authorized Version. 3. What has been said of Tyndal's Version applies, of course, to this. There are, however, signs of a more advanced knowledge of Hebrew. All the technical words connected with the Psalms, Negnoth, Shiggaion, Sheminit, &c., are elaborately explained. Ps. ii. is printed as a dialogue. The names of the Hebrew letters are prefixed to the verses of Lamentations. Reference is made to the Chaldee

Paraphrase (Job vi.), to Rabbi Abraham (Job xix.), to Kimchi (Ps. iii.). A like range of knowledge is shown in the N. T. Strabo is quoted to show that the Magi were not kings, Macrobius as testifying to Herod's ferocity (Mat. ii.), Erasmus's Paraphrase on Mat. xiii., xv. The popular identification of Mary Magdalene with "the woman that was a sinner" is discussed and rejected (Lk. x.). More noticeable even than in Tyndal is the boldness and fulness of the exegetical notes scattered throughout the book. Strong and earnest in asserting what he looked on as the central truths of the Gospel, there was in Rogers a Luther-like freedom in other things which has not appeared again in any authorized translation or popular commentary. The Preface to the Apocrypha explains the name, and distinctly asserts the inferiority of the books. (4.) In the order of the books of the N. T. Rogers follows Tyndal, agreeing with the A. V. as far as Philemon. This is followed by the Epistles of St. John, then that to the Hebrews, then those of St. Peter, St. James, and St. Jude. Woodcuts, not freely introduced elsewhere, are prefixed to every chapter in the Revelation.—VI. Taverner (1539). 1. The boldness of the pseudo-Matthew had frightened the ecclesiastical world from its propriety. Coverdale's Version was, however, too inaccurate to keep its ground. It was necessary to find another editor, and the printers applied to Richard Taverner. The fact that, though a layman, he had been chosen as one of the canons of the Cardinal's College at Oxford indicates a reputation for scholarship, and this is confirmed by the character of his translation. 2. In most respects this is an expurgated edition of Matthew's. The notes are briefer, less polemical, some entirely omitted; the Epistles follow the same order.—VII. Cranmer. 1. In the same year as Taverner's, and coming from the same press, appeared an English Bible, in a more stately folio, printed with a more costly type, bearing a higher name than any previous edition. The title-page is an elaborate engraving. It declares the book to be "truly translated after the verity of the Hebrew and Greek texts" by "divers excellent learned men, expert in the foresaid tongues." A preface, in April, 1540, with the initials T. C. (i. e. Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury) implies the archbishop's sanction. In a later edition (November, 1540) his name appears on the title-page, and the names of his coadjutors are given, Cuthbert (Tonstal), bishop of Durham, and Nicolas (Heath), bishop of Rochester; but others may have been employed for the first edition. 2. The prologue gives a more complete ideal of what a translation ought to be than we have as yet seen. Words not in the original are to be printed in a different type. The sign * indicates diversity in the Chaldee and Hebrew. The frequent hands (✍) in the margin show an intention to give notes at the end; but Matthew's Bible had made men cautious, and they were omitted, and no help was given to the reader beyond the marginal references. There is a greater display of Hebrew than in any previous edition. But in the edition of 1539 the editors adopted the Preface to the Apocrypha from Matthew's Bible, but (substituting Hagiographa for Apocrypha) said that "the books were called Hagiographa" because "they were read in secret and apart(!)." 3. A later edition in 1541 appears as "authorized" to be "used and frequented" in every church in the kingdom. The introduction, with its elaborate promise of a future perfection, disappears, and, in its place, is a long preface of a neutral character by Cranmer. It was reprinted again and again, and was the Authorized Version of the English Church till 1568—the interval of Mary's reign excepted. From it, accordingly, were taken most, if not all, the portions of Scripture in the Prayer books of 1549 and 1552. The Psalms in the Prayer-book, the quotations from Scripture in the Homilies, the Sentences in the Communion Services, and some phrases elsewhere, still preserve the remembrance of it.—VIII. Geneva. 1. The experimental translation of the Gospel of St. Matthew by Sir John Cheke into a purer English than before had little influence on the versions that followed. The reaction under Mary gave a check to the whole work, as far as England was concerned; but the exiles who fled to Geneva—among them Whittingham, Goodman, Pullain, Sampson, and Coverdale himself—labored "for two years or more, day and night." Their translation of the N. T. was "diligently revised by the most approved Greek examples." The N. T., translated by Whittingham, was printed by Conrad Badius in 1557, the whole Bible in 1560. 2. The Geneva Bible was for sixty years the most popular of all versions. Not less than eighty editions, some of the whole Bible, were printed between 1558 and 1611. It kept its ground for some time even against the A. V., and gave way, as it were, slowly and under protest. The volume was cheaper and more portable than Cranmer's. It was the first Bible which appeared in Roman type, and the first which, following the Hebrew example, recognized the division into verses. It was accompanied, in most editions after 1578, by a Bible Dictionary of considerable merit. The notes were often really helpful, and were looked upon as spiritual and evangelical. It was the version specially adopted by the Puritan party through the reign of Elizabeth, and far into that of James. It was based on Tyndal's Version. 3. Some peculiarities are—(a.) It professes a desire to restore the "true writing" of many Hebrew names, and we meet accordingly with "Izhak" (Isaac), "Jacob," &c. (b.) It omits the name of St. Paul from the title of the Epistle to the Hebrews; and, in a short Preface, leaves the authorship an open question. (c.) It avows the principle of putting all words not in the original in Italics. (d.) Its Calendar, prefixed to the Bible, commemorated Scripture facts, and the deaths of the great Reformers, but ignored saints' days altogether. (e.) It was the first English Bible which entirely omitted the Apocrypha. (f.) The notes were characteristically Swiss, not only in their theology, but in their politics. They made allegiance to kings dependent on the soundness of their faith.—IX. The Bishops' Bible. 1. The facts just stated will account for the wish of Archbishop Parker, to bring out another version which might establish its claims against that of Geneva. Great preparations were made. The correspondence of Parker with his Suffragans shows little agreement as to the true theory of a translation. 2. The bishops thus consulted, eight in number, together with some deans and professors, brought out the fruit of their labors in a magnificent folio (1568 and 1572). Every thing had been done to make it attractive. It had a long erudite preface, many wood engravings, three copperplate portraits (of the Queen, Earl of Leicester, and Lord Burleigh), a map of Palestine (in the edition of 1572), and an elaborate series of genealogical tables. It was avowedly based on Cranmer's translation. Cranmer's Prologue was reprinted. The Geneva division into verses was adopted throughout.

3. Some peculiarities were—(a.) The Books of the Bible were classified as legal, historical, sapiential, and prophetic. (b.) Many passages were marked to be omitted in the public service of the Church. (c.) One edition contained the version of the Psalms from Matthew's Bible, in parallel columns with that now issued. (d.) The initials of the translators were attached to the books, which they had severally undertaken. (e.) Here, as in the Geneva, is the attempt to give the Hebrew names more accurately, e. g. "Heva," "Izahac," "Uziah," &c. 4. Of all the English versions, the Bishops' Bible had probably the least success. It did not command the respect of scholars, and its size and cost were far from meeting the wants of the people. It had, however, some good Hebrew scholars among the translators; and, together with the A. V., received from Selden the praise of being "the best translation in the world."—X. Rheims and Douay. The successive changes in the Protestant versions of the Scriptures were, as might be expected, matter of triumph to Roman Catholic controversialists. Some saw in it an argument against any translation of Scripture into the spoken language of the people. Others pointed derisively to the want of unity which these changes displayed. Some, however, like Sir T. More and Gardiner, under Henry VIII., did not object to the principle of an English translation, but charged all the versions hitherto made with being false, corrupt, heretical. To this there was the ready retort, that they had done nothing; that their bishops in the reign of Henry had promised, but had not performed. It was felt that they must take some steps to turn the edge of this reproach, and the English refugees who were settled at Rheims—Gregory Martin (a graduate of Cambridge), Allen (afterward cardinal), and Bristow—undertook the work. After some years the N. T. was published at Rheims, in 1582. Though Martin was competent to translate from the Greek, it professed to be based on "the authentic text of the VULGATE." Notes were added as strongly dogmatic as those of the Geneva Bible, and often keenly controversial. The work was completed by the publication of the O. T. at Douay, in 1609.<sup>1</sup>—XI. Authorized Version or Common English Version. 1. The position of the English Church in relation to the versions in use at the commencement of the reign of James I. was hardly satisfactory. The Bishops' Bible was sanctioned by authority. That of Geneva had the strongest hold on the affections of the people. Scholars, Hebrew scholars in particular, found grave fault with both. Among the demands of the Puritan representatives at the Hampton Court Conference, in 1604 (Dr. John Rainolds [or Reynolds], President of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, being the spokesman), was one for a new, or, at least, a revised translation. The bishops treated the difficulties which they raised with supercilious scorn. Had it been left to the bishops, we might have waited for the A. V. "till the day after doomsday." But the king declared that there was as yet no good translation. Nothing, however, was settled at the Conference beyond the hope thus held out. 2. But the king was not forgetful of what he thought likely to be the glory of his reign. The work of organizing and superintending the arrangements for a new translation was one specially congenial to him, and in 1606 the task was accordingly commenced. The selection of the fifty-four scholars to whom it was intrusted, seems, on the whole, to have been a wise and fair one. Andrews, Saravia, Overal, Montague, and Barlow, represented the "higher" party in the Church; Rainolds, Chaderton, and Lively that of the Puritans.<sup>2</sup> Scholarship, unconnected with party, was represented by Henry Savile and John Boys. 3. What reward other than that of their own consciences and the judgment of posterity were the men thus chosen to expect for their long and laborious task? The king was not disposed to pay them out of his state revenue. A king's letter, however, was sent to the archbishops and bishops, to be transmitted by them to their chapters, commending all the translators to their favorable notice. They were exhorted to contribute in all 1,000 marks, and the king was to be informed of each man's liberality. If any livings in their gift, or in the gift of private persons, became vacant, the king was to be informed of it, that he might nominate some of the translators to the vacant preferment. Heads of colleges, in like manner, were enjoined to give free board and lodging to such divines as were summoned from the country to labor in the great work. That the king might take his place as the director of the whole, a copy of fifteen instructions was sent to each translator, and apparently circulated freely into both Universities. 4. These fifteen instructions bore thus on the work in hand, and its relation to previous versions: [1.] The Bishops' Bible was to be followed, and as little altered as the original will permit. [2.] The names of prophets and others were to be retained, as nearly as may be, as they are vulgarly used. [3.] The old ecclesiastical words to be kept, e. g. "church" not to be translated "congregation." [4.] When any word hath divers significations, that to be kept which hath been most commonly used by the most eminent Fathers, being agreeable to the propriety of the place and the analogy of faith. [5.] The division of the chapters to be altered either not at all, or as little as possible. [6.] No marginal notes to be affixed but only for the explanation of Hebrew and Greek words. [7.] Such quotations of places to be marginally set down as may serve for fit reference of one Scripture to another. The marginal references of the A. V. of 1611 were somewhat scanty, most of those now printed having been added in later editions. [8. and 9.] State plan of translation. Each company of translators is to take its own books; each person to bring his own corrections. The company to discuss them, and having finished their work, to send it on to another company, and so on. [10.] Differences of opinion between two companies to be referred to a general meeting. [11.] Gives power, in cases of difficulty, to consult any scholars. [12.] Invites suggestions from any quarter. [13.] Names the directors of the work: Andrews, dean of Westminster; Barlow, dean of Chester; and the Regius Professors of

<sup>2</sup> Only forty-seven names appear in the king's list. Seven may have died, or declined to act; or it may have been intended that there should be a final committee of revision. Rainolds and Lively (Hebrew Professor at Cambridge for thirty years) died during the progress of the work.

Hebrew and Greek at both Universities. [14.] Names translations to be followed when they agree more with the original than the Bishops' Bible, sc. Tyndal's, Coverdale's, Matthew's, Whitechurch's (Cranmer's), and Geneva. [15.] Authorizes Universities to appoint three or four overseers of the work. 6. It is not known that any of the correspondence connected with this work, or any minute of the meetings for conference, is still extant. 6. For three years the work went on, the separate companies comparing notes as directed. When the work drew toward its completion, two from each of the three groups* were accordingly selected, and the six met in London, to superintend the publication. Now, for the first time, we find some more definite remuneration than the shadowy promise held out in the king's letter, of a share in the 1,000 marks which Deans and Chapters would not contribute. The Company of Stationers thought it expedient to give the six editors thirty pounds each, in weekly payments, for their nine months' labor. The final correction, and writing the arguments of the several books, was given to Bilson, bishop of Winchester, and Dr. Miles Smith, the latter of whom also wrote the dedication and preface. 7. This version did not all at once supersede those already in possession, though five editions of it were published in three years. But the Bishops' Bible probably remained in many Churches, and of the Geneva Version there were not less than thirteen reprints, in whole, or in part, between 1611 and 1617. It is not easy to ascertain the impression which the A. V. made at the time of its appearance. Selden, a few years later, says it is "the best of all translations as giving the true sense of the original," yet adds that "no book in the world is translated as the Bible is, word for word, with no regard to the difference of idioms." Proposals for another revision, brought forward in the Grand Committee of Religion in the House of Commons in January, 1656, were referred to a sub-committee acting under Whitelock, with power to consult divines and report; but nothing ever came of this. 8. The highest testimony of this period is that of Walton, the editor of the Polyglott, who characterized this version as "eminent among all." With the reign of Anne the tide of glowing panegyric set in. It would be easy to put together a long string of praises stretching from that time to the present. The language of the A. V. has intertwined itself with the controversies, the devotion, the literature of all who speak the English language. The most solemn and tender of individual memories are, for the most part, associated with it. While from time to time scholars and divines have admitted the necessity of a revision, those who have attacked the present version and produced new ones have been, for the most part, men of narrow knowledge and defective taste.—XII. Schemes for a revision. 1. The first half of the eighteenth century was not favorable for such a work. An almost solitary Essay for a new Translation by H. R. (Ross), 1702, attracted little or no notice. A Greek Testament with an English translation, singularly vulgar and offensive, was published in 1729. A folio New and literal translation of the whole Bible by Anthony Purver, a Quaker (1764), in spite of its defective taste, may be contrasted favorably with most of the single-handed translations which have followed. It was far above the depth of degradation and folly reached in Harwood's Literal Translation of the N. T. "with freedom, spirit, and elegance" (1768). 2. Biblical revision was happily not left entirely in such hands as these. A translation by Worsley "according to the present idiom of the English tongue" (1770) was, at least, less offensive. Durell (Preface to Job), Lowth (Preface to Isaiah), Blayney (Preface to Jeremiah, 1784), were all strongly in favor of a new, or revised translation. Each contributed, in the best way, to the work by laboring steadily at a single book. Kennicott's labors in collecting MSS. of the O. T. issued in his State of the present Hebrew Text (1753, '59), and excited expectations that there might before long be something like a basis for a new version in a restored original. A more ambitious scheme was started by the Roman Catholic Dr. Geddes, in his Prospectus for a New Translation (1786). He, too, like Lowth, finds fault with the superstitious adherence to the Masoretic text, with the undue deference to lexicons, and disregard of versions shown by our translators. The work was issued in parts, according to the terms of the Prospectus, but did not get further than 2 Chr., in 1792, when the death of the translator put a stop to it. This translation fell rapidly into disfavor. 3. The revision of the A. V., like many other salutary reforms, was hindered by the French Revolution. In 1792, Archbishop Newcome had published an elaborate defence of such a scheme, taking the same line as Lowth. Revised translations of the N. T. were published by Wakefield in 1795, by Newcome himself in 1796, by Scarlett in 1798. Campbell's version of the Gospels appeared in 1788, Macknight's of the Epistles in 1795. But in 1796 the note of alarm was sounded. There is a long interval before the question again comes into any thing like prominence. Dr. John Bellamy published a new translation under the patronage of the Prince Regent (1818). The work was poor and unsatisfactory, and tremendous batteries were opened upon it in the Quarterly Review and elsewhere. The most masterly of the manifestoes against all change, was an anonymous pamphlet (Remarks on the Critical Principles, &c., Oxford, 1820), written by Archbishop Laurence. 4. A correspondence between Herbert Marsh, bishop of Peterborough, and the Rev. H. Walter, in 1828, is the next link in the chain. Marsh had spoken (Lectures on Biblical Criticism) with some contempt of the A. V. as based on Tyndal's, Tyndal's on Luther's, and Luther's on Munster's Lexicon, which was itself based on the Vulgate. Walter, in his answer, proves what is plain enough, that Tyndal knew some Hebrew, and that Luther, in some instances, followed Rabbinical authority and not the Vulgate; but the evidence hardly shows that Tyndal's version of the O. T. was entirely independent of Luther's, or Luther's of the Latin. 5. The last five-and-twenty years have seen the question of a revision from time to time gaining fresh prominence in Great Britain. Dr. Conquest's Bible, with "20,000 emendations," has not commanded the respect of critics. Dr. Beard's A Revised English Bible the Want of the Church (1857), though tending to overstate the defects of the A. V., is yet valuable as containing much information, and representing the opinions of the more learned Nonconformists. Far more important, every way, both as virtually an authority in favor of revision, and as contributing largely to it, are Professor Scholefield's Hints for an Improved Translation of the N. T. (1832). To Bishop Ellicott also belongs the credit of having spoken at once boldly and wisely on this matter (Preface to Pastoral Epistles). The translations appended by Ellicott to his editions of St. Paul's Epistles proceed on the true principle of altering the A. V. "only where it appears to be incorrect, inexact, insufficient, or obscure." Dr. Trench (On the A. V. of the N. T., 1858), in like manner, states his conviction that "a revision ought to come," though as yet, he thinks, "the Greek and the English necessary to bring it to a successful issue are alike wanting." The Revision of the A. V. by Five Clergymen (Dr. Barrow, Dr. Moberly, Dean Alford, Mr. Humphry, and Dr. Ellicott) represents the same school of conservative progress. As yet, this series includes only the Gospel of St. John, and the Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians. The publications of the American Bible Union are signs that the same want has been felt in America.* The translations given by Alford, Stanley, Jowett, and Conybeare & Howson, in their respective commentaries, are, in like manner, admissions of the necessity of the work and contributions toward it. Others, as Mr. Sharpe (1840), Mr. Highton (1862), Mr. Cookesley, &c., have undertaken to translate the entire N. T. Yet the opponents of a revision have probably the majority, and Mr. Scrivener, Dr. McCaul, Mr. C. S. Malone, and Dr. Cumming have given utterance to the feeling on this side.—XIII. Present State of the Question.—1. To take an accurate estimate of the extent to which the A. V. requires revision would require an examination of each single book, and involve an amount of detail beyond our limits. 2. The translation of the N. T. is from a Greek text (Beza's?) confessedly imperfect. No revision ought to ignore the results of the textual criticism of the last hundred years. (NEW TESTAMENT, II., III.) 3. Still less had been done at the commencement of the seventeenth century for the text of the O. T. The materials for a revised text are, of course, scantier than with the N. T. (OLD TESTAMENT, A.) 4. All scholars worthy of the name are now agreed that as little change as possible should be made in the language of the A. V. Some words, however, are altogether obsolete; others have been slowly passing into a different meaning. 5. The self-imposed law of fairness which led the A. V. translators to admit as many English words as possible to the honor of representing one in the Hebrew or Greek text has, as might be expected, marred the perfection of their work. Side by side with this fault, there is another just the opposite to it. One English word appears for several Greek or Hebrew words, and thus shades of meaning, often of importance to the right understanding of a passage, are lost sight of.† 6. Grammatical inaccuracy must be noted as a defect pervading, more or less, the present version. Both Greek and Hebrew were learned by the translators through the medium of Latin, which failed utterly to represent, e. g., the force of the Greek aorist and perfect tenses, &c. 7. The division into chapters and verses is a matter that ought not to be passed over in any future revision. (BIBL. IV.) 8. Other points of detail may be noticed: (a.) The chapter headings of the A. V. often go beyond their proper province. What should be a mere table of contents becomes a gloss upon the text. (b.) The use of italics in printing the A. V. is at least open to some risks. At first they seem an honest confession on the part of the translators of what is or is not in the original. On the other hand, they tempt to a loose translation. (c.) The marginal references, as now printed, are over-abundant, often only verbal, and need a careful sifting. (d.) Marginal readings, on the other hand, indicating variations in the text, or differences in the judgment of translators, might be profitably increased in number, and thus many difficulties and stumbling-blocks might be removed. 9. What has been said will serve to show at once to what extent a new revision is required, and what are the chief difficulties to be encountered.‡

* The commentaries of American Biblical students often contain or involve new translations of particular portions of Scripture, e. g. Prof. Stuart (on Romans, Hebrews, Apocalypse, Daniel, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes), Prof. J. A. Alexander (on Psalms, Isaiah, Mark), Prof. H. B. Hackett (on Acts, &c.), Rev. A. Barnes (on N. T., Isaiah, Job, Daniel), Prof. C. Hodge (on Romans, 1 Cor., Ephesians), Prof. G. Bush (on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Joshua, Judges), J. J. Owen (on Gospels), Jacobus, Conant, Ripley, Whedon, Nast, &c. The English translation of Lange's Commentary, edited by Dr. Schaff and other American scholars, contains numerous emendations of the A. V.

† The present work furnishes help for overcoming this difficulty, not only by systematically giving the Hebrew and Greek equivalents of important terms in the A. V., but also by illustrating the various English renderings of each of these original words in its turn. See ASSEMBLY; ATONEMENT; ETERNAL; GOD; LORD; ORDAIN; PREACH; SIN; SOUL; SPIRIT, &c., &c.

§ The views of Prof. Plumptre given in the text of this article agree with those of many eminent Biblical scholars, and contain much truth well presented. That the A. V. has many infelicitous, inexact, inconsistent, and even palpably erroneous renderings is freely admitted; these renderings are noticed and corrected in this Dictionary according to the best authorities, whenever it seemed requisite and practicable so to do; yet, as a whole, the A. V. in its general faithfulness to the original Scriptures, its pure and forcible English, its familiar yet, for the most part, dignified forms of expression, and its common acceptance by men of all denominations and of all shades of religious belief, presents a combination of advantages which no other English translation yet made can claim or counterbalance. Certainly no denominational versions, like those of the American Bible Union, and none made simply by and for scholars, like many of those mentioned under XII. and note 4 above, and indeed none made by Britons alone, or by Americans alone, can reasonably expect to take the place of the A. V., except to a limited extent and for particular purposes. It should be borne in mind that no translation made by men is itself inspired, and hence none either is or can be infallible or absolutely perfect; yet one that is confessedly imperfect or faulty in some respects may not only be far better than none, but, so long as it does not essentially mislead or prevent the use of other helps to ascertain the exact truth of God, it may be abundantly sufficient to fill the place which it is properly designed to occupy. "Our incomparable English Bible stands in no need of a radical revision; its idiom, beauty, and vigor are all that can be desired. But no good scholar will deny that it might be greatly improved as to clearness and accuracy; while many doubt whether it could be done without producing greater division and confusion, and thus doing more harm than good. A final revision for popular use should proceed from a body of scholars representing the British and American Bible Societies, and all the Protestant churches which worship God in the English language, and have an equal claim to this inestimable inheritance of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. In the mean time, no one can object to new translations and revisions for exegetical and critical use" (Rev. Philip Schaff, D. D., Preface to the American Edition of Lange's Commentary).

chdlaér, "a village," literally an enclosure (COURT; HAZER), a collection of huts, is often used, especially in the enumeration of towns in Josh. xiii., xv., xix., to imply unwall'd suburbs outside the walled towns (comp. Lev. xxv. 31 with 34; "SUBURBS"). Arab villages, as found in Arabia, are often mere collections of stone huts, "long, low, rude hovels, roofed only with the stalks of palm-leaves," or covered for a time with tent-cloths, which are removed when the tribe change their quarters. Others are more solidly built, as are most of the modern villages of Palestine, though in some the dwellings are mere mud-huts. There is little in the O. T. to enable us more precisely to define a village of Palestine, beyond the fact that it was destitute of walls or external defences. Persian villages are spoken of in similar terms (Ez. xxxviii. 11; Esth. ix. 19). By the Talmudists a village was defined as a place destitute of a synagogue. In the N. T. the term "village" (Gr. kómé; TOWN 7) is applied to BETHPHAGE (Mat. xxi. 2), BETHANY (Lk. x. 38), ENMAUS (xxiv. 18, 28), BETHLEHEM (Jn. vii. 42, A. V. "town"). Dependence on a chief town of a district appears to be denoted by the phrase "villages of Cesarea Philippi" (Mk. viii. 27). CAPERNAUM; CAPHAR; CITY; HAVOTH-JAIR; TOWN.

Vine (Heb. gephen; sórák = "the choicest vine" [Is. v. 2], "a noble vine" [Jer. ii. 21]; sórákáh = "choice vine" [Gen. xlix. 11]; názir = "vine undressed," i. e. not pruned [Lev. xxv. 5, 11; NAZARITE]; Gr. ampelos), the well-known valuable plant (Vitis vinifera), very frequently referred to in the Old and New Testaments, and cultivated from the earliest times. The first mention of this plant occurs in Gen. ix. 20, 21. (NOAH.) The Egyptians say that Osiris first taught men the use of the vine. That it was abundantly cultivated in Egypt is evident from the monuments, as well as from the Scriptural allusions (Gen. xl. 9-11; Num. xx. 5; Ps. lxxviii. 47). The vines of Palestine were celebrated both for luxuriant growth and for the immense clusters of grapes which they produced. The spies, on their arrival at the valley of Eshcol, cut down a branch with one cluster of grapes, and bore it between two on a staff (Num. xiii. 23). Travellers have frequently testified to the large size of the grape-clusters of Palestine. Schulz speaks of supping at Beitshin, a village near Ptolemais, under a vine about thirty feet high with a stem about a foot and a half in diameter, forming by its branches a hut upward of thirty feet broad and long. "The clusters of these extraordinary vines," he adds, "are so large that they weigh ten or twelve pounds, and the berries may be compared with our small plums." Especial mention is made in the Bible of the vines of Eshcol (Num. xiii. 24, xxxii. 9), of SHEMAH, Heshbon, and Elealeh (Is. xvi. 8-10; Jer. xlviii. 32), and Engedi (Cant. i. 14).—The vine is frequently the subject of metaphor in the Scriptures. To dwell under the vine and fig-tree is an emblem of domestic happiness and peace (1 K. iv. 25; Mic. iv. 4; Ps. cxxviii. 3); the rebellious people of Israel are compared to "wild grapes," "an empty vine," "the degenerate plant of a strange vine," &c. (Is. v. 2, 4; Hos. x. 1; Jer. ii. 21). It is a vine which our Lord selects to show the spiritual union between Himself and His members (Jn. xv. 1-6).—The ancient Hebrews probably allowed the vine to grow trailing on the ground, or upon supports. Dr. Robinson saw them at Hebron planted singly in rows eight or ten feet apart, the stock growing up large to the height of six or eight feet, then fastened in a sloping position to a strong stake, and the shoots extending in festoons from one plant to another, but pruned away in autumn. The vintage (Heb. bátsir), which formerly was a season of general festivity, commenced in September. The towns are deserted, and the people live among the vineyards in the lodges and tents (compare Judg. ix. 27; Jer. xxv. 30; Is. xvi. 10). The grapes were gathered with shouts of joy by the "grape-gatherers" (Jer. xxv. 30), and put into baskets (vi. 9). They were then carried on the head and shoulders, or slung upon a yoke, to the "WINE-PRESS." Those intended for eating were perhaps put into flat open baskets of wickerwork, as was the custom in Egypt. (BASKET.) In Palestine at present the finest grapes, says Dr. Robinson, are dried as "raisins" (Heb. tainimúk), and the juice of the remainder, after having been trodden and pressed, "is boiled down to a syrup which, under the name of dibs, is much used by all classes, wherever vineyards are found, as a condiment with their food." (DRINK, STRONG; FOOD; HONEY; WINE.) The vineyard, which was generally on a hill (Is. v. 1; Jer. xxxi. 6; Am. ix. 13), was surrounded by a WALL or HEDGE to keep out the wild boars (Ps. lxxx. 13), jackals, and foxes (Num. xxii. 24; Neh. iv. 8; Cant. ii. 15; Ez. xiii. 4, 6; Mat. xxi. 33). Within the vineyard was one or more towers (TOWER) of stone in which the vine-dressers lived (Is. i. 8, v. 2; Mat. xxi. 33). The WINE-PRESS and vat ("FAT"), which was dug (Mat. xxi. 33) or hewn out of the rocky soil, were part of the vineyard furniture (Is. v. 2). See the three following articles; also AGRICULTURE; FIRST-FRUITS; GLEANING, &c.

Vine (Heb. gephen) of Sodom occurs only in Deut. xxxii. 32. It is generally supposed that this passage alludes to the celebrated apples of Sodom, of which Josephus speaks, "which indeed resemble edible fruit in color, but, on being plucked by the hand, are dissolved into smoke and ashes." Some travellers, as Maundrell, regard the whole story as a fiction. Pococke supposed the apples of Sodom to be pomegranates. Hasselquist seeks to identify them with the egg-shaped fruit of the Solanum Melongena (egg-plant) when attacked by some insect (a species of Tenthredo) which converts the whole of the inside into dust, while the rind remains entire and keeps its color. Burckhardt, Irby and Mangles, Robinson, Tristram, Mr. Houghton, Dr. Hamilton (in Fbn.), &c., identify the apples of Sodom with the fruit of the ôâher of the Arabs, the Asclepias gigantea or Calotropis procera, which is a shrub or tree abundant in Upper Egypt, &c., but apparently confined in Palestine to the borders of the Dead Sea; growing at Ain Jidy to a height of ten to fifteen feet, and a diameter of six or eight inches; having a grayish cork-like bark, and long oval leaves; discharging copiously from its broken leaves and flowers a milky fluid; and in general appearing like a gigantic perennial species of the milkweed or silkweed (Asclepias cornuti) common in the Northern United States; bearing fruit in clusters of three or four, having a slender pod in the centre, containing a small quantity of fine silk with seeds, but filled mostly with air, and externally resembling a large, smooth apple or orange, yellow when ripe, and, on being pressed, exploding like a bladder or puff-ball. Mr. Walter Elliot endeavors to show that the apples of Sodom are oak-galls, which grow plentifully on dwarf oaks (Quercus infectoria) in the country beyond the Jordan. Dr. J. D. Hooker identifies the Dead Sea apple or upple of Sodom with the Solanum Sodomæum (PALESTINE, Botany).

Dr. Hooker and Mr. Houghton regard the "vine of Sodom" as the colocynth (Cucumis Colocynthis; Gourd 2), "which" says Dr. Hooker, "is bitter and powdery inside; the term vine would scarcely be given to any but a trailing or other plant of the habit of a vine."

Vin'e-gar. The Hebrew term hómets or chómets was applied to a beverage consisting generally of wine or strong drink turned sour, but sometimes artificially made by an admixture of barley and wine, and thus liable to fermentation. It was acid even to a proverb (Prov. x. 26), and by itself nauseous (Ps. lxxix. 21), but was used by laborers (Ru. ii. 14). Similar to this was the acetum of the Romans—a thin, sour wine consumed by soldiers, either pure, or more usually mixed with water, and then termed posca. Of this (Gr. oxos) the Saviour partook in His dying moments (Mat. xxvii. 48; Mk. xv. 36; Jn. xix. 29, 30). CRUCIFIXION; GALL; MYRRH.

* Vine'yard [vin-]. VINE; WINE.

Vine'yards, Plain of the (Heb. Abél Cérámin or Crámin), mentioned only in Judg. xi. 33; = ABEL 5; possibly (so Mr. Grove), at a ruin Beit el-Kerm (= house of the vine) encountered by De Sauley to the N. of Kerak.

* Vint'age. VINEX.

Viol. For an explanation of the Hebrew word translated "viol," see PSALTERY. The old English viol, like the Spanish vigueta, was a six-stringed guitar. Etymologically, viol is connected with the Dan. Fiol, and the A. S. fiole, through the Fr. viole, Old Fr. vielle, Med. Lat. vitella.

* Vio-let. COLORS, II. 2.

Viper, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. eph'ch, from a root signifying to hiss (Job xx. 16; Is. xxx. 6, lix. 5). Mr. Houghton thinks it impossible to determine the species of serpent indicated by this Hebrew term; Gesenius defines it "a viper, adder; any poisonous serpent."—2. Heb. ep'ha' (Is. xli. 24 margin), after some of the Rabbins, but wholly against the context (so Gesenius). The A. V. text and most expositors translate "nothing."—3. Gr. echidna (Mat. iii. 7, xii. 34, xxiii. 33; Lk. iii. 7; Acts xxviii. 3). The "viper" which fastened on Paul's hand in Melita was probably (so Mr. Houghton, &c.) the common viper of Europe (Pelias [or

Common Viper of Europe. Vipera [or Pelias] Berus.—(Fdn.)

Vipera [or Berus], or else the Vipera Aspis, which is not uncommon on the Mediterranean coasts. The poison of the former (so Mr. Gosse) is much more virulent in the S. of Europe than in England. "GENERATION of vipers" in Mat. and Lk. is spoken figuratively of wicked men. ADDER; ASP; GALL; POISON; SERPENT.

* Vir'gin [-jin] (Heb. béthuláh, 'almáh; Gr. parthe- nos) = a maiden chaste and pure (Gen. xxiv. 16, 48; Mat. i. 23, &c.). The Hebrews often personified the inhabitants of a city or country, taken collectively, as a "DAUGHTER" and "virgin" (2 K. xix. 21; Lam. i. 16, &c.). In Rev. iv. 14 "virgins" = the chaste or pure in a moral sense, and is applied to males. ADULTERY; CHILD; DAUGHTER; IDOLATRY; IMMANUEL; MARRIAGE; MARY THE VIRGIN.

Voph'el (Heb. my addition or appendage? Gen.). father of Nahbi, the Naphtalite spy (Num. xiii. 14).

Vow. The practice of making vows is extremely ancient, and common in all systems of religion. The earliest vow mentioned is Jacob's (Gen. xxviii. 18–22, xxxi. 13). Vows in general are also mentioned in Job xxii. 27, &c. The Law, therefore, did not introduce, but regulated the practice of vows. Three sorts are mentioned:—I. Vow of devotion (Heb. neder); II. Vow of abstinence (Heb. tsair or tsarar); III. Vow of destruction (Heb. hérem or chérem). I. As to vows of devotion, the following rules are laid down:—A man might devote to sacred uses possessions or persons, but not the first-born either of man or beast, which was devoted already (Lev. xxvii. 26). a. If he vowed land, he might either redeem it or not. If he intended to redeem, two points were to be considered: (1.) the rate of redemption (xxvii. 16 ff.); (2.) the distance, prospectively and retrospectively, from the year of JUBILEE. The purchaser of land, if he devoted and also wished to redeem it, was required to pay a redemption-price according to the priestly valuation, but without the additional fifth. The owner who wished to redeem would thus be required to pay either an annual rent or a redemption-price answering to the number of years short of the jubilee, but deducting Sabbatical years (xv. 2, 15, 16), and adding a fifth, or twenty per cent. in either case. If he refused or was unable to redeem, either the next of kin came forward, as he had liberty to do, or, if no redemption was effected, the land became the property of the priests (xv. 25, xxvii. 21; Ru. iii. 12, iv. 1, &c.). In the case of a house devoted, its value was to be assessed by the priest, and a fifth added to the redemption-price in case it was redeemed (Lev. xxvii. 15). b. Animals fit for sacrifice, if devoted, were not to be redeemed or changed; and if a man attempted to do so, he was required to bring both the devotee and the changeling (xxvii. 9, 10, 33; BLEMISH). An animal unfit for sacrifice might be redeemed by adding a fifth to the priest's valuation, or it became the property of the priests (ver. 12, 13). c. The case of persons devoted stood thus:—A man might devote either himself, his child (not the first-born), or his servant. If no redemption took place, the devoted person became a servant of the sanctuary: see the case of Abaelom (2 Sam. xv. 8). (NAZARITE.) Otherwise he might be redeemed at a valuation according to age and sex, on the scale given in Lev. xxvii. 1–8.—Among general regulations affecting vows may be mentioned:—1. Vows were entirely voluntary, but once made were regarded as compulsory (Num. xxx. 2; Deut. xxiii. 21; Eccl. v. 4). 2. If persons in a dependent condition made vows, as (a) an unmarried daughter living in her father's house, or (b) a wife, even if she afterward became a widow, the vow, if (a) in the first case her father, or (b) in the second, her husband heard and disallowed it, was void; but if they heard without disallowance, it was to remain good (Num. xxx. 3-16). 3. Votive offerings arising from the produce of any impure traffic were wholly forbidden (Deut. xxiii. 18; DOG; SODOMITE).—II, III. For vows of abstinence, see CORBAN; and for vows of extermination, ANATHEMA, also Ezr. x. 8 and Mic. iv. 13. For the vows of the Apostle PAUL (Acts xviii. 18, xxi. 24), see NAZARITE IV.

Vulgate, the. (Abridged from the original article of Mr. Westcott.) The influence of the Latin Versions of the Bible upon Western Christianity is scarcely less than that of the SEPTUAGINT upon the Greek Churches. For many centuries it was the only Bible generally used; and, directly or indirectly, it is the real parent of all the vernacular versions of Western Europe. The Gothic Version of Ulphilas alone is independent of it. (VERSIONS, ANCIENT.) The Anglo-Saxon and Wicliffe's versions were made from it. In the age of the Reformation the Vulgate was rather the guide than the source of the popular versions, though all the Roman Catholic versions were derived from it. That of Luther (N. T. in 1523) was the most important, and in this the Vulgate had great weight. From Luther the influence of the Latin passed to our own Authorized Version. (VERSION, AUTHORIZED.) The Vulgate is not only the source of our current theological terminology, but it is, in one shape or other, the most important early witness to the text and interpretation of the whole Bible.—I. Origin and History of the name Vulgate. The name Vulgate, = L. Vulgata editio (the current text of Holy Scripture), has necessarily been used differently in various ages of the Church. The phrase originally answered to the koinē ekdosis (Gr. = common edition or recension) of the Greek Scriptures (SEPTUAGINT, p. 995), and is thus used constantly by Jerome in his Commentaries. In some places Jerome distinctly quotes the Greek text; but generally he regards the Old Latin, which was rendered from the LXX., as substantially identical with it, and thus introduces Latin quotations under the name of the LXX., or Vulgata editio. In this way the transference of the name from the current Greek text to the current Latin text became easy and natural. Yet more: as the Gr. koinē ekdosis came to signify an uncorrected (and so corrupt) text, the same secondary meaning was attached to the L. vulgata editio. Thus, in some places the vulgata editio stands in contrast with the true Hexaplaric text of the LXX. This use of the phrase Vulgata editio to describe the LXX. (and the Latin Version of the LXX.) was continued to later times. As a general rule, the Latin Fathers speak of Jerome's Version as "our" Version; but it was not unnatural that the Council of Trent (as many later scholars) should be misled by the associations of their own time, and adapt to new circumstances terms which had grown obsolete in their original sense.—II. The Old Latin Versions. The history of the earliest Latin Version of the Bible is lost in obscurity. All that can be affirmed with certainty is that it was made in Africa. During the first two centuries the Church of Rome, and so that of Gaul, was essentially Greek; but the Church of Northern Africa seems to have been Latin-speaking from the first. At what date this Church was founded is uncertain. Tertullian (about A. D. 200) distinctly recognizes the general currency of a Latin Version of the N. T., characterized by a "rudeness" and "simplicity" which seem to point to the nature of its origin. The version of the N. T. appears to have arisen from individual and successive efforts; but it does not follow by any means that numerous versions were simultaneously circulated, or that the several parts of the version were made independently. Even if it had been so, the exigencies of the public service must soon have given definiteness and substantial unity to the fragmentary labors of individuals. The work of private hands would necessarily be subject to revision for ecclesiastical use. The separate books would be united in a volume; and thus a standard text of the whole collection would be established. With regard to the O. T. the case is less clear. Probably the Jews settled in Northern Africa were confined to the Greek towns; otherwise it might be supposed that the Latin Version of the O. T. is in part anterior to the Christian era, and that (as in the case of Greek) a preparation for a Christian Latin dialect was already made when the Gospel was introduced into Africa. However this may have been, the substantial similarity of the different parts of the O. T. and N. T. justifies the belief that there was one popular Latin Version of the Bible current in Africa in the last quarter of the second century. The exact literality of the Old Version was not confined to the most minute observance of order and the accurate reflection of the words of the original: in many cases the very forms of Greek construction were retained in violation of Latin usage.—From considerations of style and language it seems certain that Hebrews, James, and 2 Peter did not form part of the original African Version of the N. T. In the O. T., on the other hand, the Old Latin erred by excess, and not by defect, including the Apocryphal Books from the current copies of the LXX., to which 2 Esdras was early added. (CANON.) After the translation once received a definite shape in Africa, which could not have been long after the middle of the second century, it was not publicly revised. The old text was jealously guarded by ecclesiastical use, and was retained there when Jerome's version was elsewhere almost universally received. In the O. T. the version was made from the unrevised edition of the LXX.—But while the earliest Latin Version was preserved generally unchanged in Northern Africa, it fared differently in Italy. There the provincial rudeness of the version was more offensive, and a revision was more feasible. In the fourth century a definite ecclesiastical recension (of the Gospels at least) appears to have been made in Northern Italy by reference to the Greek, which was distinguished by the name of the Italian (L. Italia). This appears to have been made in some degree with authority: other revisions were made for private use, in which such changes were introduced as suited the taste of scribe or critic. The next stage in the deterioration of the text was the intermixture of these various revisions.—III. Labors of Jerome. At the close of the fourth century the Latin texts of the Bible current in the Western Church had fallen into the greatest corruption. The evil was yet greater in prospect than at the time; for the separation of the East and West was growing imminent. But in the crisis of danger the great scholar was raised up who probably alone for 1,500 years possessed the qualifications necessary for producing an original version of the Scriptures for the use of the Latin Churches. Jerome—in Latin Eusebius Hieronymus—was born A. D. 329 at Stridon in Dalmatia, and died at Bethlehem A. D. 420. After long and self-denying studies in the East and West, Jerome went to Rome A. D. 382, probably at the request of Damasus the Pope, to assist in an important synod. His active biblical labors date from this epoch, and in examining them it will be convenient to follow the order of time, noticing—(1.) Revision of the Old Latin Version of the N. T. Jerome had not been long at Rome (A. D. 383) when Damasus consulted him on points of Scriptural criticism. Apparently in the same year he applied to Jerome for a revision of the current Latin version of the N. T. by the help of the Greek original. The need of this was urgent. "There were," says Jerome, "almost as many forms of text as copies." The Gospels had naturally suffered most. Jerome therefore applied himself to these first. His aim was to revise the Old Latin, not to make a new version; yet the difference of the Old and Revised (Hieronymian) text is clear and striking. Some of the changes which Jerome introduced were made purely on linguistic grounds. Others involved questions of interpretation. But the greater number consisted in the removal of the interpolations by which the synoptic Gospels especially were disfigured.—The preface to Damasus speaks only of a revision of the Gospels, and a question has been raised whether Jerome really revised the remaining books of the N. T. But Damasus had requested a revision of the whole; Jerome (A. D. 398) enumerates among his works "the restoration of the (Latin version of the) N. T. to harmony with the original Greek;" and an examination of the Vulgate text, with the quotations of fathers before Jerome and the imperfect evidence of MSS., is itself sufficient to show that the revision of the later books was real, but hasty and imperfect. (2.) Revision of the O. T. from the LXX. About the same time (A. D. 383?), Jerome made a first revision of the Psalter by the help of the Greek, but the work was not very complete or careful. This revision obtained the name of the Roman Psalter, probably because it was made for the use of the Roman Church at the request of Damasus. In a short time, at the urgent request of Paula and Eustochium, Jerome commenced a new and more thorough revision (Gallican Psalter). This was probably soon after 387, when he retired to Bethlehem, and certainly before 391, when he had begun his new translations from the Hebrew. In the new revision Jerome adopted Origen's notation (ΣΕΠΤUAGINT), and attempted to represent as far as possible, by the help of the Greek versions, the real reading of the Hebrew. This new edition soon obtained a wide popularity. Gregory of Tours is said to have introduced it from Rome into the public services in France, and from this it obtained the name of the Gallican Psalter. Numerous MSS. remain which contain the Latin Psalter in two or more forms (Roman, Gallican, Hebrew, &c.). From the second (Gallican) revision of the Psalms Jerome appears to have proceeded to a revision of the other books of the O. T., restoring all, by the help of the Greek, to a general conformity with the Hebrew. The Prefaces to the Revisions of Job, Chronicles, and Solomon's three books, and the revised texts of the Psalter and Job have alone been preserved; but there is no reason to doubt that Jerome carried out his design of revising all the "Canonical Scriptures," though there is very great difficulty in tracing the history of the revision. (3.) Translation of the O. T. from the Hebrew. Jerome commenced the study of Hebrew when he was already advanced in middle life (about 374); but he availed himself of every help to perfect his knowledge of the language. His first teacher had been a Jewish convert; but afterward he did not scruple to seek the instruction of Jews, whose services he secured with great difficulty and expense. In some of his earliest critical letters (A. D. 381, 383) he examines the force of Hebrew words; and in 384, he had been engaged for some time in comparing the version of Aquila with Hebrew MSS., which a Jew had obtained for him from the synagogue. After retiring to Bethlehem, he appears to have devoted himself with renewed ardor to the study of Hebrew, and he published several works on the subject (about 389). These essays served as a prelude to his New Version, which he now commenced. This version was not undertaken with any ecclesiastical sanction, as the revision of the Gospels was, but at the urgent request of private friends, or from his own sense of the imperative necessity of the work. Its history is told in the main in the prefaces to the several instalments successively published. The Books of Samuel and Kings were issued first, and to these he prefixed the famous Prologus galatæus, addressed to Paula and Eustochium, in which he gives an account of the Hebrew Canon. At the time when this was published (about 391, 392) other books seem to have been already translated; and in 393 the sixteen prophets were in circulation, and Job had lately been put into the hands of his most intimate friends. Indeed, it would appear that in 392 he had in some sense completed a version of the O. T.; but many books were not completed and published till some years afterward. The next books which he put into circulation, yet with the provision that they should be confined to friends, were Ezra and Nehemiah, probably in 394. The Chronicles may be set down to 396. The three Books of Solomon followed in 398, "the work of three days" after a severe illness. The Octateuch now alone remained (i. e. Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges and Ruth, and Esther). Of this the Pentateuch was published first, probably after 400. The remaining books were completed shortly after 404. Thus the whole translation was spread over about fourteen years, from the sixtieth to the seventy-sixth year of Jerome's life; yet parts of it were finished in great haste (e. g. the Books of Solomon, Tobit, Judith). There are errors in the work which a more careful revision might have removed; but such defects are trifling compared with what he accomplished successfully. The work remained for eight centuries the bulwark of Western Christianity; and as a monument of ancient linguistic power the translation of the O. T. stands unrivalled and unique.—IV. History of Jerome's Translation to the Invention of Printing. The critical labors of Jerome were received with a loud outcry of reproach. He was accused of disturbing the repose of the Church, and shaking the foundations of faith. Acknowledged errors, as he complains, were looked upon as hallowed by ancient usage; and few had the wisdom or candor to acknowledge the importance of seeking for the purest possible text of Holy Scripture. Even Augustine was carried away by the popular prejudice, and endeavored to discourage Jerome from the task of a new translation, which seemed to him dangerous and almost profane. But the new translation gradually came into use equally with the old, and at length supplanted it. In the fifth century it was adopted in Gaul by Eucherius of Lyons, Vincent of Lerins, Sedulius and Claudianus Mamertus; but the Old Latin was still retained in Africa and Britain. In the sixth century the use of Jerome's Version was universal among scholars except in Africa, where the other still lingered; and at the close of it Gregory the Great, while commenting on Jerome's Version, acknowledged that it was admitted equally with the Old by the Apostolic See. But the Old Version was not authoritatively displaced, though the custom of the Roman Church prevailed also in the other Churches of the West. In the seventh century the traces of the Old Version grow rare. In the eighth century Bede speaks of Jerome's Version as "our edition;" and from this time it is needless to trace its history, though the Old Latin was not wholly forgotten. Yet throughout, the New Version made its way without any direct ecclesiastical authority. It was adopted in the different Churches gradually, or at least without any formal command.—But the Latin Bible which thus passed gradually into use under the name of Jerome was a strangely composite work. The books of the O. T., with one exception, were taken from his Version from the Hebrew, but variously corrupted, and in many particulars (especially in the Pentateuch) at variance with his later judgment. Long use, however, made it impossible to substitute his Psalter from the Hebrew for the Gallican Psalter; and thus this book was retained from the Old Version, as Jerome had corrected it from the LXX. Of the apocryphal books Jerome hastily revised or translated two only, Judith and Tobit. The remainder were retained from the Old Version against his judgment; and the apocryphal additions to Daniel and Esther, which he had carefully marked as apocryphal in his own version, were treated as integral parts of the books. In the N. T. the only important addition which was frequently interpolated was the apocryphal Epistle to the Laodiceans. The text of the Gospels was in the main Jerome's revised edition; that of the remaining books his very incomplete revision of the Old Latin. Thus the present Vulgate contains elements which belong to every period and form of the Latin Version—(1.) Unrevised Old Latin: Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, 1 and 2 Maccabees, Baruch. (2.) Old Latin revised from the LXX: Psalter. (3.) Jerome's free translation from the original text: Judith, Tobit. (4.) Jerome's translation from the Original: O. T. except Psalter. (5.) Old Latin revised from MSS.: Gospels. (6.) Old Latin cursorily revised: the remainder of the N. T.—The Revision of Alcuin. The simultaneous use of the Old and New Versions led to great corruptions of both texts. Mixed texts were formed according to the taste or judgment of scribes, and the confusion was further increased by the changes sometimes introduced by those who had some knowledge of Greek. Scarcely any Anglo-Saxon Vulgate MS. of the eighth or ninth centuries which Mr. Westcott has examined is wholly free from an admixture of old readings. As early as the sixth century, Cassiodorus attempted a partial revision of the text (Psalter, Prophets, Epistles) by a collation of old MSS. But private labor was unable to check the growing corruption; and Charlemagne intrusted to Alcuin (about 802) the task of revising the Latin text for public use. This Alcuin appears to have done simply by the use of MSS. of the Vulgate, and not by reference to the original texts. His revision, which had a wide currency, probably contributed much toward preserving a good Vulgate text. The best MSS. of his recension do not differ widely from the pure Hieronymian text. But the new revision was gradually deformed, though attempts at correction were made by Archbishop Lanfranc of Canterbury in 1089, Cardinal Nicolaus in 1180, and the Clistercian Abbot Stephanus about 1180. In the thirteenth century Correctoria (= notes of corrected readings) were drawn up, especially in France, in which varieties of reading were discussed. Little more was done for the text of the Vulgate till the invention of printing; and Laurentius Valla (about 1450) alone deserves mention, as one who devoted the highest powers to the criticism of Holy Scripture, at a time when such studies were little esteemed.—V. History of the Printed Text. It was a noble omen for the future progress of printing that the first book which issued from the press was the Bible; and the splendid pages of the Mazarin Vulgate (Mainz, Gutenberg, and Fust) stand yet unsurpassed by the latest efforts of typography. This work is referred to about 1455, and presents the common text of the fifteenth century. Other editions followed in rapid succession. The first collection of various readings appears in a Paris edition of 1504, and others followed at Venice and Lyons in 1511, 1513; but Cardinal Ximenes (1502–1517) first seriously revised the Latin text, to which he assigned the middle place of honor in his Polyglot, between the Hebrew and Greek texts. (NEW TESTAMENT, II. 2; OLD TESTAMENT, A, 3.) Robert Stephens used three MSS. of high character and the earlier editions in carefully preparing his edition of 1528 (second edition 1532). About the same time various attempts were made to correct the Latin from the original texts (Erasmus, 1516; Pagninus, 1518–28; Cardinal Cajetan; Steuchius, 1529; Clarius, 1542), or even to make a new Latin version (J. Campensis, 1538).<sup>1</sup> A more important edition of R. Stephens followed in 1540, in which he made use of twenty MSS. and introduced considerable alterations into his former text. In 1541 another edition was published by J. Benedictus at Paris, based on the collation of MSS. and editions, and often reprinted afterward. Vercellone speaks much more highly of the Biblia Ordinaria, with glosses, &c., published at Lyons, 1545, as giving readings in accordance with the oldest MSS. An authorized edition became a necessity for the Roman Catholic Church, and the Council of Trent decided in favor of the oldest Latin text.—The Sixtine and Clementine Vulgates. The first session of the Council of Trent was held December 13, 1545. After formally promulgating the Nicene Creed as the foundation of the Christian faith, February 4, 1546, the Council proceeded to the question of the authority, text, and interpretation of Holy Scripture. A committee, appointed to report upon the subject, held private meetings from February 20th to March 17th. Considerable varieties of opinion existed as to the relative value of the original and Latin texts, and the final decree (April 8th)—consisting of two parts, the first containing the list of the canonical books, with the usual anathema on those who refuse to receive it, and the second, "On the Edition and Use of the Sacred Books," without an anathema—was intended as a compromise. In affirming the authority of the "Old Vulgate" it contains no estimate of the value of the original texts. The question decided is simply the relative merits of the current Latin versions, and

this only in reference to public exercises. It was also enacted, that "Holy Scripture, but especially the old and common (Vulgate) edition should be printed as correctly as possible." The decree, however, was received with little favor, and the want of a standard text of the Vulgate practically left the question as unsettled as before. The theologians of Belgium did something to meet the want. In 1547 the first edition of Hentenius appeared at Louvain, which had very considerable influence upon later copies. It was based upon the collation of Latin MSS. and Stephens's edition of 1540. In the Antwerp Polyglot of 1568-72 the Vulgate was borrowed from the Complutensian; but in the Antwerp edition of the Vulgate of 1573-4 the text of Hentenius was adopted with copious additions of readings by Lucas Brugensis. This last was designed as the preparation and temporary substitute for the Papal edition: indeed it may be questioned whether it was not put forth as the correct edition required by the decree of the Council of Trent. But a Papal board was already engaged, however desultorily, upon the work of revision. In 1561 Paulus Manutius (son of Aldus Manutius) was invited to Rome to superintend the printing of Latin and Greek Bibles. During that year and the next several scholars (with Sirletus at their head) were engaged in the revision of the text. In the pontificate of Pius V. the work was continued, and Sirletus still took a chief part in it (1569, 1570), but it was currently reported that the difficulties of publishing an authoritative edition were insuperable. Nothing further was done toward the revision of the Vulgate under Gregory XIII., but preparations were made for an edition of the LXX. This appeared in 1587, in the second year of the pontificate of Sixtus V., who had been one of the chief promoters of the work. After the publication of the LXX, Sixtus immediately devoted himself to the production of an edition of the Vulgate. A board was appointed, under the presidency of Cardinal Carafa, to arrange the materials and offer suggestions for an edition. Sixtus himself revised the text, and when the work was printed he examined the sheets with the utmost care, and corrected the errors with his own hand. The edition appeared in 1590, with the famous constitution or ordinance (dated March 1, 1589) prefixed, in which Sixtus decreed that this edition was "to be received and held as true, lawful, authentic, and unquestioned in all public and private discussion, reading, preaching, and explanation." He forbade expressly the publication of various readings in copies of the Vulgate, and decreed that all readings which varied from his edition should "have no credit or authority for the future." It was also enacted that the new revision should be introduced into all missals and service-books; and the greater excommunication was threatened against all who in any way contravened the constitution. Sixtus, however, died in August, 1590; and, though during the brief pontificate of Urban VII. nothing could be done, the reaction was not long delayed. On the accession of Gregory XIV. some went so far as to propose that the edition of Sixtus should be absolutely prohibited; but Bellarmine's suggestion—that the erroneous alterations of the text "should be corrected with all possible speed and the Bible reprinted under the name of Sixtus, with a prefatory note to the effect that errors had crept into the former edition by the carelessness of the printers"—found favor with those in power. A commission was appointed to revise the Sixtine text, under the presidency of the Cardinal Colonna (Columna). At first the commissioners made but slow progress; but, after changes in the mode and place, the work, if we may believe the inscription which still commemorates the event, and the current report of the time, was completed in nineteen days. The task was hardly finished when Gregory died (October, 1591), and the publication of the revised text was again delayed. His successor, Innocent IX., died the same year, and at the beginning of 1592 Clement VIII. was raised to the papedom. Clement intrusted the final revision of the text to Toletus, and the whole was printed by Aldus Manutius (the grandson) before the end of 1592. The preface, written by Bellarmine, is favorably distinguished from that of Sixtus by its temperance and even modesty. Another edition followed in 1593, and a third in 1598, with a list of errata for each of the three editions. (Other editions were afterward published at Rome, but with these corrections the history of the authorized text properly terminates.—The respective merits of the Sixtine and Clementine editions have been often debated. In point of mechanical accuracy, the Sixtine seems to be clearly superior. The collections lately published by Vercellone place in the clearest light the strange and uncritical mode in which Sixtus dealt with the evidence and results submitted to him. The recommendations of the Sixtine correctors are marked by singular wisdom and critical tact, and in almost every case where Sixtus departs from them he is in error. The Gregorian correctors (whose results are given in the Clementine edition) in the main simply restored readings adopted by the Sixtine board and rejected by Sixtus. In point of fact the Clementine edition errs by excess of caution.—While the Clementine edition was still recent, some thoughts seem to have been entertained of revising it. Lucas Brugensis made important collections for this purpose, but the practical difficulties were found to be too great, and in the next generation use and controversy gave a sanctity to the authorized text. But in 1706 Martianay published a new, and in the main better text, chiefly from original MSS., in his edition of Jerome. Vallarsi added fresh collations in his revised issue of Martianay's work. Sabatier, though professing only to deal with the Old Latin, published important materials for the criticism of Jerome's Version, and gave at length the readings of Lucas Brugensis (1743). More than a century elapsed before anything more of importance was done for the text of the Latin version of the O. T. when at length the discovery of the original revision of the Sixtine correctors again directed the attention of Roman scholars to their authorized text. The first-fruits of their labors are given in the volumes of Vercellone (Rome, 1860-62), which have thrown more light upon the history and criticism of the Vulgate than any previous work.—VI. The Critical Value of the Latin Versions. Jerome's translation of the O. T. as a whole is a remarkable monument of the substantial identity of the Hebrew text of the fourth century with the present Masoretic text. In the N. T. the revision of Jerome, where it differs from the Old Latin, represents the received Greek Text of the fourth century, and so far claims a respect (speaking roughly) equal to that due to a first-class Greek MS. The substance of the Vulgate, and the copies of the Old Latin, bear witness to a text more ancient, and, therefore, other things being equal, more valuable, than is represented by any other authority (except perhaps the Peshito), yet not free from serious corruptions, though very different ones from those which affected Greek MSS. At the two authorities, therefore, mutually correcting one another.—In estimating the critical value of Jerome's labors, it is necessary to draw a distinction between his different works. The three versions of the Psalter represent the three different methods which he followed. At first he was contented with a popular revision of the current text (the Roman Psalter); then he instituted an accurate comparison between the current text and the original (the Gallican Psalter); and in the next place he translated independently, giving a direct version of the original (the Hebrew Psalter). These three methods follow one another in chronological order, and answer to the wider views which Jerome gradually gained of the functions of a biblical scholar. The revision of the N. T. belongs to the first period. When it was made, his aim was little more than to remove obvious interpolations and blunders; and in doing this he likewise introduced some changes of expression which softened the roughness of the old version, and some which seemed to be required for the true expression of the sense; yet he failed to carry out even this limited purpose with thorough completeness. Jerome's revision of the Gospels was far more complete than that of the remaining parts of the N. T. It is, indeed, impossible, except in the Gospels, to determine any substantial difference in the Greek texts represented by the Old and Hieronymian Versions. But his commentaries show that he used copies differing widely from the recension which passes under his name, and even expressly condemned as faulty many passages which are undoubtedly part of the Vulgate. The chief corruptions of the Old Latin consist in the introduction of glosses. The places where the Old Latin and the Vulgate have separately preserved the true reading are rare, when compared with those in which they combine with other ancient witnesses against the great mass of authorities. Of the interpretative value of the Vulgate little need be said. We have better means of elucidating the text, at least of the N. T., than the translators of the Latin Version enjoyed. Versions supply authority for the text, and opinion only for the rendering.—VII. The Language of the Latin Version. Generally it is necessary to distinguish two distinct elements both in the Latin Version and in subsequent patristic writings: (1.) Provincialisms. Early forms found in Plautus or noted as archaisms by grammarians reappear in the language of the Latin Version, and establish in a signal manner the vitality of the popular as distinguished from the literary idiom. There are also many other peculiarities which evidently belong to the African (or common) dialect, and not merely to the Christian form of it. Compounds, especially formed with the prepositions, are peculiarly abundant in the Latin Version. (2.) Grecisms. The "simplicity" of the Old Version necessarily led to the introduction of very numerous Septuagintal or N. T. forms, many of which have now passed into common use. The Vulgate Latin bears traces of a threefold influence derived from the original text (viz. [a.] an extension of the use of prepositions for simple cases; [b.] an assimilation of pronouns to the meaning of the Greek article; [c.] a constant employment of the definitive and epithetic genitive, when classical usage would have required an adjective); and the modifications of form traceable to this source occur yet more largely in modern languages, whether from the plastic power of the Vulgate on the popular dialect, or, more probably, from the powers widely working in the times of the empire on the common Latin and making their record in the Vulgate. These peculiarities, found in greater or less frequency throughout the Vulgate, are naturally most abundant and striking in the parts least changed from the Old Latin, the Apocrypha, the Acts, Epistles, and Apoc. ap. —Generally it may be said that the Scriptural idioms of our common language have come to us mainly through the Latin; and in a wider view the Vulgate is the connecting link between classical and modern languages. It contains elements which belong to the earliest stage of Latin, and exhibits (if often in a rude form) the flexibility of the popular dialect. On the other hand, it has furnished the source and the model for a large portion of current Latin derivatives. By far the greater part of the current doctrinal terminology is based on the Vulgate, and, as far as can be ascertained, was originated in the Latin Version. Predestination, justification, supererogation (Latin verb supererogare), sanc-tification, salvation, mediator, regeneration, revelation, visitation (metaphorically), propitiation, first appear in the Old Vulgate. Grace, redemption, election, reconciliation, satisfaction, inspiration, scripture, were devoted there to a new and holy use. Sacrament (= Gr. mysterion, mystery) and communion are from the same source; and though baptism is Greek, it comes to us from the Latin. To these add orders, penance, congregation, priest. The Latin Versions have left their mark upon our language and upon our thoughts; and if the right method of controversy is based upon a clear historical perception of the force of words, it is evident that the study of the Vulgate, however much neglected, can never be neglected with impunity. It was the Version which alone they knew who handed down to the Reformers the rich stores of mediæval wisdom; the Version with which the greatest of the Reformers were most familiar, and from which they had drawn their earliest knowledge of Divine truth.

Vulture, the A. V. translation of Heb. dûdh (Lev. xi. 14 only) and dayyâh (Deut. xiv. 13; Is. xxxiv. 15), also once of ayyâh (Job xxviii. 7). Mr. Tristram, original author of this article, regards these Hebrew words as referring to some of the smaller species of raptorial birds, as kites or buzzards. Dayyâh evidently = Ar. h'dayah, the vernacular for the "kite" in North Africa, and without the epithet "red" for the black kite especially. The Samaritan and all other Eastern Versions agree in rendering it "kite." Ayyâh yet more certainly = "kite" as in other passages. Two very different species of bird are comprised under the English term vulture: the griffon (Vultur fulvus, or Gyps fulvus, Savigny), Ar. nesser, Heb. nesher, invariably rendered "EAGLE" by the A. V.; and the percnopter, or Egyptian vulture (Neophron percnopterus, Savigny), Ar. rakhma, Heb. râhâm or râchâm, rendered "GIER-EAGLE" by the A. V. The identity of the Hebrew and Arabic terms in these cases can scarcely be questioned. The griffon is in all its movements and characteristics a majestic and royal bird, the largest and most powerful which is seen on the wing in Palestine, and far surpassing the eagle in size and power. Its only rival in these respects is the Bearded Vulture or Lammergeyer (see below).—If we make the Heb. ayyâh = the red kite (Milvus regalis, Temminck), and dayyâh = the black kite (Milvus ater, Temminck), we shall find the piercing sight of the former referred to in Job xxviii. 7, and the gregarious habits of the latter in Is. xxiv. 15. Both species are inhabitants of Palestine, the red kite being found all over the country, as formerly in England, but nowhere in great numbers, generally soaring at a great height over the plains, and apparently leaving the country in winter. The black kite, so numerous everywhere as to be gregarious, may be seen at all times of the year, hovering over the villages and the outskirts of towns, on the lookout for offal and garbage, its favorite food.—Three species of vulture are known to inhabit Palestine:—1. The Lammergeyer (Gypaëtos barbatus, Cuvier), which is rare everywhere, and only found in desolate mountain-regions. (OSSIFRAGE.) 2. The griffon (Gyps fulvus, Savigny), mentioned above, remarkable for its power of vision and the great height at which it soars. It scents its prey from afar, and congregates in the wake of an army (compare Mat. xxiv. 28; Job xxxix. 30; EAGLE). Mr. Tristram observed this bird universally distributed in all the mountainous and rocky districts of Palestine, and especially abundant in the S. E. Its favorite breeding-places are between Jerusalem and Jericho, and all round the Dead Sea. 3. The Egyptian vulture (Neophron percnopterus, Savigny), often called Pharaoh's hen, observed in Palestine by Hasselquist and all subsequent travellers, and very numerous everywhere. It is slovenly and cowardly, the familiar scavenger of all Oriental towns and villages, protected for its useful habits, but loathed and despised. GIER-EAGLE.

* Wa'fer (Heb. usually rakik) = a thin cake or leaf-like BREAD (Ex. xvi. 31, xxix. 2, 28, &c.).

Wages (Heb. mascōreth, sāchār, &c.; Gr. misthos, opsōnia). The earliest mention of wages is of a recompense not in money, but in kind, to Jacob from Laban (Gen. xxix. 15, 20, xxx. 28, xxxi. 7, 8, 41). In Egypt money payments by way of wages were in use, but the terms cannot now be ascertained (Ex. ii. 9). The only mention of the rate of wages in Scripture is found in the parable of the householder and the vineyard (Mat. xx. 2), where the laborer's wages are set at one "PENNY" (= DENARIUS, or 15 cents) for a day, a rate which agrees with Tob. v. 14, where a "DRACHM" is mentioned as the rate for a day, a sum which may be fairly taken as equivalent to the denarius, and to the usual pay of a soldier in the later days of the Roman republic (Tacitus, Annals, i. 17; Polybius, vi. 39). In earlier times the rate was probably lower. But it is likely that laborers, and also soldiers, were supplied with provisions. A drachma (= 17 cents) a day was also, according to Boeckh, the pay of a common laborer at Athens in the time of Pericles, B. C. 450; and the same was paid to the members of the Council of 500, at ATHENS (B. S. xv. 188, 193).—The Law was very strict in requiring daily payment of wages (Lev. xix. 13; Deut. xxiv. 14, 15). The employer who refused to give his laborers sufficient victuals is censured (Job xxiv. 11), and the iniquity of withholding wages is denounced (Jer. xxii. 13; Mal. iii. 5; Jas. v. 4). MONEY; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Wagon (Heb. agālāh, once recheb; CART; CHARIOT). The Oriental wagon is a vehicle composed of two or three planks fixed on two solid circular blocks of wood, from two to five feet in diameter, which serve as wheels. To the floor are sometimes attached wings, which slant outward like the sides of a wheelbarrow. For the conveyance of passengers, mattresses or clothes are laid in the bottom, and the vehicle is drawn by buffaloes or oxen. The covered wagons for conveying the materials of the Tabernacle were probably constructed on Egyptian models. CART; CHARIOT.

* Wall'ing. MOURNING.

Wall [wawl]. Only a few points need be noticed in addition to what has been said elsewhere on wall-construction, whether in brick, stone, or wood. (BRICK; FENCED CITY; HANDICRAFT; HEDGE; HOUSE; JERUSALEM; MORTAR 2; SHEEP-FOLD; SLIME.) 1. The practice common in Palestine of carrying foundations down to the solid rock (PALESTINE, II., § 25), as in the case of the TEMPLE, and in the present day with structures intended to be permanent (Lk. vi. 48). 2. A feature of some parts of Solomon's buildings, as described by Josephus (viii. 5, § 2), corresponds to the method adopted at Nineveh of encrusting or facing a wall of brick or stone with slabs of a more costly material, as MARBLE or ALABASTER. 3. Another use of walls in Palestine is to support mountain-roads or terraces formed on the sides of hills for purposes of cultivation. (AGRICULTURE; HIGHWAY.) 4. The "path of the vineyards" (Num. xxii. 24) is a pathway through vineyards, with walls on each side.

Wan'der-ing in the Wil'der-ness. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

War. The formation of the ARMY, their ARMY, and ENCAMPMENT, have been already described. Before entering on a war of aggression, the Hebrews sought for the Divine sanction by consulting the URIM AND THUMMIM (Judg. i. 1, xx. 2, 27, 28; 1 Sam. xiv. 37, xxiii. 2, xxviii. 6, xxx. 8), or some PROPHET (1 K. xxii. 6; 2 Chr. xviii. 5; DIVINATION). Divine aid was further sought in actual warfare by bringing into the field the ARK OF THE COVENANT, which was the symbol of JEHOVAH Himself (1 Sam. iv. 4–18, xiv. 18). Formal proclamations of war were not interchanged between the belligerents; but occasionally messages either deprecatory or defiant were sent (Judg. xi. 12–27; 1 K. xx. 2; 2 K. xiv.

8). Before entering the enemy's district, spies were sent to ascertain the character of the country, and the preparations of its inhabitants for resistance (Num. xiii. 17; Josh. ii. 1; Judg. vii. 10; 1 Sam.

xxvi. 4). When an engagement was imminent a sacrifice was offered (vii. 9, xiii. 9), and an inspiring address delivered either by the commander (2 Chr. xx. 20) or by a priest (Deut. xx. 2). Then followed the battle-signal (1 Sam. xvii. 52; Is. xlii. 13; Jer. l. 42; Ez. xxi. 22; Am. i. 14; CORNET). The combat assumed the form of a number of hand-to-hand contests. Hence the high value attached to fleetness of foot and strength of arm (2 Sam. i. 23, ii. 18; 1 Chr. xii. 8). Various strategic devices were practised, as the ambuscade (Josh. viii. 2, 12; Judg. xx. 36), surprise (Judg. vii. 16), or circumvention (2 Sam. v. 23). Another mode of settling the dispute was by the selection of champions (1 Sam. xvii.; 2 Sam. ii. 14), who were spurred on to exertion by the offer of high reward (1 Sam. xvii. 25, xviii. 25; 2 Sam. xviii. 11; 1 Chr. xi. 6). The contest having been decided, the conquerors were recalled from the pursuit by the sound of a trumpet (2 Sam. ii. 28, xviii. 16, xx. 22).

—The siege of a town or fortress was conducted thus:—A line of circumvallation was drawn round the place (Ez. iv. 2; Mic. v. 1), constructed out of the trees in the neighborhood (Deut. xx. 20), earth, &c. This line not only cut off the besieged from the surrounding country, but also served as a base of operations for the besiegers. The next step was to throw out from this line one or more "mounts" or "banks" in the direction of the city (2 Sam. xx. 15; 2 K. xix. 32; Is. xxxvii. 33), to be gradually increased in height until about half as high as the city wall. On this mound or bank towers were erected (2 K. xxv. 1; Jer. lii. 4; Ez. iv. 2, xvii. 17, xxi. 22, xxvi. 8), whence the slingers and archers might attack with effect. Battering-rams (Ez. iv. 2, xxi. 22) were brought up to the walls by means of the bank (ENGINE; RAM, BATTERING), and scaling-ladders might also be placed on it. Undermining the walls is not noticed in the Bible. (JERUSALEM.) Burning the gates was a mode of obtaining ingress (Judg. ix. 52). The water-supply would naturally be cut off, if possible (Jd. vii. 7). The besieged strengthened and repaired their fortifications (Is. xxii. 10); repelled the enemy from the wall by missiles (2 Sam. xi. 24), beams and heavy stones (Judg. ix. 53; 2 Sam. xi. 21), boiling oil, use of engines (2 Chr. xxvi. 15), &c.; made sallies to burn the besiegers' works (1 Mc. vi. 31) and drive them away.—The treatment of the conquered was extremely severe in ancient times. The bodies of the soldiers killed in action were plundered (1 Sam. xxxi. 8; 2 Mc. viii. 27); the survivors were killed in some savage manner (Judg. ix. 45; 2 Sam. xii. 31; 2 Chr. xxv. 12), or mutilated (Judg. i. 6; 1 Sam. xi. 2), or carried into captivity

(Num. xxxi. 26; Deut. xx. 14). Sometimes the bulk of the population of the conquered country was removed to a distant locality. (CAPTIVITY.) The Mosaic Law mitigated to a certain extent the severity of the ancient usages toward the conquered. With the exception of the Canaanites (CANAAN 1) who were under an ANATHEMA, the Israelites were to put to death only males bearing arms, to keep alive women and children (xx. 13, 14), to spare fruit-trees (ver. 19), to treat females humanely (xxi. 10-14). The majority of the savage acts recorded as practised by the Jews were either retaliatory for some gross provocation (Judg. i. 6, 7; 2 Sam. x. 2-4, xii. 31; 1 Chr. xx. 3), or done by lawless usurpers (2 K. xv. 16; compare 1 K. xx. 31). The conquerors celebrated their success by the erection of monumental stones (1 Sam. vii. 12; PILLAR), by hanging up trophies in their public buildings (xxi. 9, xxxi. 10; 2 K. xi. 10), and by triumphal songs and dances in which the whole population took part (Ex. xv. 1-21; Judg. v.; 1 Sam. xviii. 6-8; 2

* Ward = watch, guard, custody, &c. (Gen. xl. 3, 4, 7, &c.). PRISON.

* Wash'ing [wosh]. Washing the clothes is frequently spoken of in the Scriptures, mostly as connected with ritual purifications (Ex. xix. 10, 14; Lev. xi. 25, 40, &c.), sometimes simply for cleansing them from dirt (Neh. iv. 23). Moral and spiritual purification is denoted by washing the clothes or the person (Ps. lxxiii. 13; Is. i. 16; Heb. x. 22; Rev. vii. 14, &c.). Neglect of washing the clothes was significant of affliction and mourning (2 Sam. xix. 24). ANOINTING; BAPTISM; BATH; FULLER; NITRE; PURIFICATION; REGENERATION; SOAP; WASHING THE HANDS AND FEET; WATER.

Wash'ing the Hands and Feet. As knives and forks were dispensed with in eating, the hand, which was thrust into the common dish, needed to be scrupulously clean; and again, as sandals were ineffectual against the dust and heat of an Eastern climate, washing the feet on entering a house was an act both of respect to the company, and of refreshment to the traveller. The former of these usages was transformed by the PHARISEES of the N. T. age into a matter of ritual observance (Mk. vii. 3), and special rules were laid down as to the times and manner of its performance. The Gr. pygmí in Mk. i. c. is translated in A. V. “oft” (margin “or diligently; Gr. with the fist—up to the elbow, Theophylact”); by Alford, &c., after the Syriac, “diligently;” by the Vulgate, Gothic, &c., “frequently” or “oft;” Lange, taking the literal meaning “with the fist,” says, “probably it was part of the rite, that the washing hand was shut, because it might have been thought that the open hand engaged in washing might make the other unclean, or be made unclean by it, after having itself been washed,” and suggests that “the expression might mean a vigorous and thorough washing;” Rbn. N. T. Lex. explains, “literally, unless they wash their hands, rubbing them with the fist, i. e. not merely dipping the fingers or hand in water as a sign of ablution, but rubbing the hands together as a ball or fist, in the usual Oriental manner when water is poured over them; . . . hence (translated freely) sedulously, carefully, diligently.” Washing the feet did not rise to the dignity of a ritual observance, except in connection with the services of the sanctuary (Ex. xxx. 19, 21). It held a high place, however, among the rites of HOSPITALITY. When a guest presented himself at the tent-door, it was usual to offer the necessary materials for washing the feet (Gen. xviii. 4, xix. 2, xxiv. 32, xliii. 24; Judg. xix. 21). It was a yet more complimentary act, betokening equally humility and affection, if the host actually performed the office for his guest (1 Sam. xxv. 41; Lk. vii. 38, 44; Jn. xiii. 5-14; 1 Tim. v. 10; JESUS CHRIST). Such a token of hospitality is still occasionally exhibited in the East. MEALS; SANDAL; WASHING.

Watch'es of Night. The Jews, like the Greeks and Romans, divided the NIGHT into military watch'es instead of hours, each watch representing the period for which sentinels or pickets remained on duty. (ENCAMPMENT.) The proper Jewish reckoning recognized only three such watches, entitled the first or "beginning of the watches" (Lam. ii. 19), the middle watch (Judg. vii. 19), and the morning watch (Ex. xiv. 24; 1 Sam. xi. 11). These would last respectively from sunset to 10 P. M.; from 10 P. M. to 2 A. M.; and from 2 A. M. to sunrise. After the establishment of the Roman supremacy, the number of watches was increased to four, which were described either according to their numerical order, e. g. the "fourth watch" (Mat. xiv. 25), or by the terms "even, midnight, cock-crowing, and morning" (Mk. xiii. 35). These terminated respectively at 9 P. M., midnight, 3 A. M., and 6 A. M. The GUARD (QUATERNION) of soldiers was accordingly divided into four relays (Acts xii. 4). Watchmen appear to have patrolled the streets of the Jewish towns (Cant. iii. 3, v. 7; compare Ps. cxxvii. 1, cxxx. 6). CHRONOLOGY; DAY; HOUR; PETER, note.

* Water [waw-] (Heb. pl. mayim, construct mey or meymey; Gr. hudor). To the ancient Hebrews water appeared of inestimable value. FAMINE was a direct consequence of a deficiency of it; and in the wilderness the people often murmured from the want of it (Ex. xv. 22, xvii. 1 ff., xx. 2 ff., xxi. 5, &c.). An abundance of water was one of the choice blessings of the Promised Land (Deut. viii. 7, &c.). Water is an emblem of the spiritual nourishment or soul-satisfying blessings or SALVATION which God bestows upon His people (Is. lv. 1; Jn. iv. 14 thrice; Rev. xxi. 6, xxii. 1, 17, &c.). Water of Jealous-y (Num. v. 11-31). The ritual prescribed consisted in the husband's bringing the woman before the priest, and the essential part of it is unquestionably the oath to which the "water" was subsidiary, symbolical, and ministerial. With her he was to bring the tenth part of an ephah of barley-meal as an offering. Perhaps the whole is to be regarded from a judicial point of view, and this "offering" in the light of a court-fee. God Himself was solemnly invoked to judge, and His presence recognized by throwing a handful of the barley-meal on the blazing altar in the course of the rite. In the first instance, however, the priest "set her before the Lord" with the offering in her hand. As she stood holding the offering, so the priest stood holding an earthen vessel of holy water mixed with the dust from the floor of the sanctuary, and declaring her free from all evil consequences if innocent, solemnly devoted her in the name of Jehovah to be "a curse and an oath among her people," if guilty, further describing the exact consequences ascribed to the operation of the water in the "members" which she had "yielded as servants to uncleanness" (ver. 21, 22, 27; compare Rom. vi. 19). He then "wrote these curses in a book, and blotted them out with the bitter water," and having thrown, probably at this stage of the proceedings, the handful of meal on the altar, "caused the woman to drink" the potion thus drugged, she moreover answering to the words of his imprecation, "Amen, amen." Josephus adds, if the suspicion was unfounded, she obtained conception, if true, she died infamously. The custom of such an ordeal was probably traditional in Moses' time, and by fencing it round with the wholesome awe inspired by the solemnity of the prescribed ritual, the lawgiver would deprive it to a great extent of its barbarous tendency. Wave-of-fer-ing (Heb. tenúpháh). The breast of every PEACE-OFFERING, the Passover sheaf, loaves and lambs at Pentecost, &c., were to be "waved" before the Lord, and were hence called "wave-offerings." The Scriptural notices of these rites are to be found in Ex. xxix. 24-28; Lev. vii. 30, 34, viii. 27, 29, ix. 21, x. 14, 15, xxiii. 10, 15, 20; Num. vi. 20, xviii. 11, 18, &c. (FIRST-FRUIITS; PASSOVER, II. g, h, PENTECOST, &c.) It seems not quite certain from Ex. xxix. 26, 27, whether the waving was performed by the priest or by the worshipper with the former's assistance. The Rabbinical tradition represents it as done by the worshipper, the priest supporting his hands from below. This rite was the accompaniment of peace-offerings. These not only, like the other sacrifices, acknowledged God's greatness and His right over the creature, but they witnessed to a ratified covenant, an established communion between God and man. The Rabbis explain the heaving of the shoulder as an acknowledgment that God has His throne in the heaven, the waving of the breast that He is present in every quarter of the earth.

* Wax (Heb. dónag), a well-known substance produced by bees, and employed in the construction of their cells; mentioned in Scripture only as easily melted by heat (Ps. xxii. 14 [Heb. 15], lxxviii. 2 [Heb. 3], xcvi. 5; Mic. i. 4). BEE.

* Wax, to = to grow or become, as to wax great, to wax hot, to wax old, to wax faint, &c. (Gen. xxvi. 13, xli. 56; Ex. xvi. 21; Lev. xxv. 47 twice; 1 Sam. ii. 5, iii. 2; 2 Sam. xxi. 15; Ps. cii. 26; Mat. xxiv. 12, &c.).

* Wax'en (participle of the verb "to wax") = grown or become (Gen. xix. 13; Lev. xxv. 25, 35, 39, &c.).

Way (Heb. derech, &c.; Gr. hodos) = a road, track, path, or HIGHWAY (Gen. xvi. 7; Num. xiv. 25; 1 Sam. vi. 12; Mat. xx. 17; Mk. x. 32, &c.); figuratively a course or mode of life (Prov. i. 31, xii. 15, &c.); a religious course (Ps. cxxxix. 24; Am. viii. 14, &c.); particularly applied to the Christian religion (Acts ix. 2, xix. 9, 23, &c.).

* Wean-lug. ABRAHAM; BANQUETS; CHILD; ISHMAEL 1; SAMUEL.

Weapons. ARMS.

Weasel [wee'zl] (Heb. hóled or chóled) occurs only in Lev. xi. 29, in the list of unclean animals. According to the old versions, the Talmud, Gesenius, &c., the Hebrew denotes "a weasel;" but Bochart, &c., would make it = Ar. chuld and Syr. chuldo = a MOLE. The weasel family have long slender bodies and short legs, and are remarkably bloodthirsty quadrupeds. Col. C. H. Smith (in Kitto) says, the ferret or polecat (which he regards as the same species, Putorius vulgaris), the weasel (Mustela vulgaris Af*ricana*, larger and darker than the common European weasel), &c., inhabit Syria, &c. These animals are very destructive to other small animals.

* Weather. FROST; PALESTINE, Climate; RAIN; SNOW.

Weaving. The art of weaving appears to be coeval with the first dawning of civilization. In what country, or by whom it was invented, we know not; but it was very early practised with great skill by the Egyptians. The "vestures of fine LINEN," such as Joseph wore (Gen. xli. 42), were the product of Egyptian looms, and their quality, as attested by existing specimens, is pronounced not inferior to the finest cambric of modern times. The Israelites were probably acquainted with the process before their sojourn in Egypt; but undoubtedly there they attained the proficiency which enabled them to execute the hangings of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxxv. 35; 1 Chr. iv. 21), and other artistic textures. At a later period the Egyptians were still famed for their manufactures of "fine" (i. e. hackled) FLAX and of hórdy or chóráy, rendered in the A. V. "networks" (margin "white works"), probably (so Mr. Bevan, &c.) a white material either of linen or cotton (Is. xix. 9; Ez. xxvii. 7). The Egyptian loom (HANDICRAFT) was usually upright, and the weaver stood at his work. The cloth was fixed sometimes at the top, sometimes at the bottom. The modern Arabs use a procumbent loom, raised above the ground by short legs. The Bible notices, not the loom itself, but the beam to which the warp was attached (1 Sam. xvii. 7; 2 Sam. xxi. 19); the pin to which the cloth was fixed, and on which it was rolled (Judg. xvi. 14); the shuttle (Job vii. 6); the thrum or threads which attached the web to the beam (Is. xxxviii. 12 margin); and the web itself (Judg. xvi. 14, A. V. "beam"). Whether the two terms in Lev. xiii. 48, rendered "warp" and "woof," really mean these, admits of doubt. The textures produced by the Jewish weavers were very various. The coarser kinds, such as tent-cloth, sackcloth, and the "hairy garments" of the poor were made of goat's or camel's hair (Ex. xxvi. 7; Mat. iii. 4). Wool was extensively used for ordinary clothing (Lev. xiii. 47; Prov. xxvii. 26, xxxi. 13; Ez. xxvii. 18), while for finer work flax was used, varying in quality, and producing the different textures described in the Bible as "linen" and "fine linen." The mixture of wool and flax in cloth intended for a garment was interdicted (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11). BABYLONISH GARMENT; COTTON; DRESS; EMBROIDERER; SPINNING; TENT; WOOLEN.

Wedding. MARRIAGE.

Week (Heb. shabbá'; Gr. hebdomas in LXX, hebdomon [usually translated "Sabbath"] in N. T.). The origin of this division of time has given birth to much speculation. Its antiquity is so great (Gen. viii. 10, xxix. 27), its observance so wide-spread, and it occupies so important a place in sacred things, that it has been very generally thrown back as far as the CREATION of man. The week and the SABBATH are, if this be so, as old as man himself. A purely theological ground is thus established for the week and for the sacredness of the number seven. They who embrace this view support it by a reference to the six days' creation and the Divine rest on the seventh, and to the absence of any natural ground for it. To this view Mr. Garden, original author of this article, objects:—(a.) That the week rests on a theological ground may be cheerfully acknowledged by both sides; but nothing is determined by such acknowledgment as to the original cause of adopting this division of time. Whether the week gave its sacredness to the number SEVEN, or the ascendancy of that number helped to determine the dimensions of the week, it is impossible to say. (b.) The prevalence of the weekly division was indeed very great, but a nearer approach to universality is required to render it an argument for the view in aid of which it is appealed to. It was adopted by all the Shemitic races, and, in the later period of their history at least, by the Egyptians and Hindoos; it has been found in China, either universally or among the Buddhists; the Peruvians also had it or a division all but identical with it. On the other hand, there is no reason for thinking the week known till a late period either to Greeks or Romans. (c.) So far from the week being a division of time without ground in nature, there was much to recommend its adoption. Where the days were named from planetary deities, as among first the Assyrians and Chaldees, and then the Egyptians,<sup>1</sup> there of course each period of seven days would constitute a whole, and that whole might come to be recognized by nations that disregarded or rejected the practice which had shaped and determined it. But further, the week is a most natural and nearly an exact quadripartition of the MONTH, so that the quarters of the MOON may easily have suggested it.—Mr. Garden holds that the instances in Genesis (viii. 10, 12, xxix. 27 [compare Judg. xiv. 12], 1. 10) show only a custom of observing a term of seven days for any observance of importance, not a custom of dividing the whole YEAR, or the whole month, at all times and without regard to remarkable events. (SABBATH.) In Exodus the week comes into very distinct manifestation. Two of the great feasts (FESTIVALS)—the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles—are prolonged for seven days after that of their initiation (Ex. xii. 15–20, &c.). The division by seven was expanded so as to make the seventh month and the seventh year Sabbatical. (JUBILEE, YEAR OF; SABBATICAL YEAR.) Whether "days" were or were not intended in Daniel and the Apocalypse to be understood as meaning years, their being so would have been a congruous and even logical attendant on the scheme which counts weeks of years, and both would have been a natural computation to minds familiar and occupied with the law of the Sabbatical year. (DAY.)—The Christian Church, from the very first, was familiar with the week. St. Paul's language (1 Cor. xvi. 2) shows this. We cannot conclude from it that such a division of time was observed by the inhabitants of Corinth generally; for they to whom he was writing, though doubtless the majority of them were Gentiles, yet knew the LORD'S DAY, and most probably the Jewish SABBATH. But though we can infer no more than this from the place in question, it is clear that if not by this time, yet very soon after, the whole Roman world had adopted the hebdomadal division. Dion Cassius, who wrote in the second century, speaks of it as both universal and recent in his time, and represents it as coming from Egypt. CHRONOLOGY.

<sup>1</sup> The credit of introducing the planetary week has been claimed for the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the Hindoos. Prof. H. H. Wilson, Rev. R. Hunter (in Fairbairn), &c., have favored the claim for the Hindoos.—The English names of the days of the week are derived from the names of Saxon or rather Teutonic deities: viz. Sunday from the Sun, Monday from the Moon, Tuesday from Tiu (= Roman Mars), Wednesday from Woden (the highest god among the Germans and Scandinavians), Thursday from Thor (the god of thunder, = Roman Jupiter), Friday from Frig (wife of Woden and goddess of marriage, = Roman Juno, or [so some] Venus), Saturday from Sater or Saturn.

Weeks, Feast of. PENTECOST.

Weights and Measures.—A. Weights (originally by Mr. R. S. Poole).—Introduction. The general principle of the present article is to give the evidence of the monuments the preference on all doubtful points, and to compare it with that of literature, so as to ascertain the purport of statements which otherwise appeared explicable in two or three different ways. Besides this general principle, it will be necessary to bear in mind the following postulates:—a. All ancient Greek systems of weight were derived, either directly or indirectly, from an Eastern source. b. All the older systems of ancient Greece and Persia, the Æginetan, the Attic, the Babylonian, and the Euboic, are divisible either by 6,000 or by 3,600. c. The 6,000th or 3,600th part of the talent is a divisor of all higher weights and coins, and a multiple of all lower weights and coins, except its two-thirds. d. Coins are always somewhat below the standard weight. e. The statements of ancient writers as to the relation of different systems are to be taken either as indicating original or current relation. f. The statements of ancient writers are to be taken in their seemingly-obvious sense, or discarded altogether as incorrect or unintelligible. g. When a certain number of drachms or other denominations of one metal are said to correspond to a certain number of drachms or other denominations of another metal, it must not be assumed that the system is the same in both cases.—I. Early Greek talents. Three principal systems were used by the Greeks before the time of Alexander the Great, those of the Æginetan, the Attic, and the Euboic talents. 1. The Æginetan talent is stated to have contained 60 minæ, and 6,000 drachms. Its drachm was heavier than the Attic, by which, when unqualified, we mean the drachm of the full monetary standard, weighing about 67.5 grains Troy. Pollux states that it contained 10,000 Attic drachms and 100 Attic minæ. We find accordingly a monetary system in use in Macedonia and Thrace, of which the drachm weighs about 110 grains, in very nearly the proportion required to the Attic (6 : 10 :: 67.5 : 112.5). The silver coins of Ægina, however, and of many ancient Greek cities, follow a lower standard, of which the drachm has an average maximum weight of about 96 grains. The drachm obtained from the silver coins of Ægina has very nearly the weight, 92.3 grains, that Boeckh assigns to that of Athens before Solon's reduction, of which the system continued afterward in use as the commercial talent. The coins of Athens give a standard, 67.5 grains for the drachm of Solon. An examination of Mr. Burgon's weights from Athens, in the British Museum (one mina weighing 9,980 grains troy, another 7,171 grains troy), has, however, induced us to infer a higher standard in both cases, viz. about 99.8 grains troy for the drachm of the Commercial or Market system and about 71.7 grains for the drachm of the Popular or Solonian system. We thus obtain the following principal standards of the Æginetan weight: a. The Macedonian talent, or Æginetan of the writers, weighing about 660,000 grains, containing 60 minæ and 6,000 drachms. b. The Commercial talent of Athens, used for the coins of Ægina, weighing, as a monetary talent, never more than about 576,000 grains, reduced from a weight-talent of about 598,800, and divided into the same principal parts as the preceding. 2. The Attic talent, when simply thus designated, is the standard weight introduced by Solon, which stood to the older or Commercial talent in the relation of 100 to 138½. Its average maximum weight, as derived from the coins of Athens and the evidence of ancient writers, gives a drachm of about 67.5 grains; but Mr. Burgon's weights enable us to raise this sum to 71.7. It appears that the Attic talent weighed about 430,260 grains by the weights, and that the coins give a talent of about 405,000 grains, the latter being apparently the weight to which the talent was reduced after a time, and the maximum weight at which it is reckoned by ancient writers. It gradually lost weight in the coinage, until the drachm fell to about 57 grains or less, thus coming to be equivalent to, or a little lighter than, the denarius ("PENNY") of the early Cæsars. 3. The Euboic talent, though used in Greece, is of Eastern origin (see II. 2, below).—II. Foreign talents of the same period. Two foreign systems of the same period, besides the Hebrew, are mentioned by ancient writers, the Babylonian talent and the Euboic. 1. The Babylonian talent may be determined from existing weights (in the forms of lions and ducks) found by Mr. Layard at Nineveh. The weights represent a double system, of which the heavier talent contained two of the lighter talents, the talent in each system being divided into 60 manehs, and the maneh in each subdivided into sixtieths, &c. The following table exhibits our results.

Heavier Talent.

60ths of Maneh	30ths of Maneh	Maneh	Talent	Gra. troy.
1	= 1	= 1	= 1	= 266.4
2	= 2	= 2	= 2	= 532.8
60	= 30	= 1	= 1	= 15.934

Lighter Talent.

30ths of 60ths of Maneh	60ths of Maneh	Maneh	Talent	Gra. troy.
1	= 1	= 1	= 1	= 4.44
30	= 1	= 1	= 1	= 133.2
108000	= 3600	= 60	= 1	= 479.530

Herodotus speaks of the Babylonian talent as not greatly exceeding the Euboic, which has been computed to be = the Commercial Attic, but more reasonably as nearly = the ordinary Attic. Pollux makes the Babylonian talent = 7,000 Attic drachms. We may, therefore, suppose that the lighter talent was generally, if not universally, in use in the time of the Persian coins. Herodotus relates that the king of Persia received the silver tribute of the satrapies according to the Babylonian talent, but the gold tribute according to the Euboic. The larger silver coins of the Persian monarchy, and those of the satraps, are of the following denominations and weights:—

	Gra. troy.
Piece of three siglos .....	253.5
Piece of two siglos .....	169
Siglos .....	84.5

The only denomination of which we know the name is the siglos, which, as having the same type as the Daric, appears to be the oldest Persian silver coin. It is the ninetieth part of the maneh of the lighter talent, and the 5,400th of that talent. 2. The Euboic talent is rightly held to have been originally an Eastern system. As it was used to weigh the gold sent as tribute to the king of Persia, we may infer that it was the standard of the Persian gold money; and it is reasonable to suppose that the coinage of Eubœa was upon its standard. We suppose the Euboic talent was to the Babylonian as 60 to 72, or 5 to 6. Taking the Babylonian maneh at 7,992 grains troy, we obtain 399,600 grains for the Euboic talent. The principal, if not the only, Persian gold coin is the Daric ("DRAM"), weighing about 129 grains. This was the standard coin, according to which the silver money was adjusted. Its double in actual weight is found in the silver coinage, but its equivalent is wanting, as though for the sake of distinction. The Daric was the 3,600th part of the Babylonian talent. It is nowhere stated how the Euboic talent was divided, but if we suppose it to have contained 50 minæ, then the Daric would have been the sixtieth of the mina, but if 100 minæ, the thirtieth. In any case it would have been the 3,000th part of the talent. The coinage of Eubœa has hitherto been the great obstacle to the discovery of the Euboic talent. The silver coins (the only gold coin of Eubœa known to us weighs 49.4 grains) give the following denominations:

Coins of Eubœa.		Coins of Athens.
Highest weight. Gra. troy.	Assumed true weight. Gra. troy.		Assumed true weight. Gra. troy.
121	258	Tetradrachm	270
83	129	Didrachm	135
63	86
43	64.5	Drachm	67.5
	43	Tetrobolon	45

It will be perceived that though the weights of all denominations, except the third in the Euboic list, are very near the Attic, the system of division is evidently different. The third Euboic denomination is identical with the Persian siglos, and indicates the Persian origin of the system. The second piece is, however, identical with the Daric. The relation of the Persian and Greek systems may be thus stated:

Persian silver, Babylonian. Gra. troy.	Persian gold, Eubœa. Gra. troy.	Greek Euboic.
		Actual weight. Gra. troy.	Assumed. Gra. troy.
	129	121	129
84.5		86	86

3. The talents of Egypt have hitherto formed a most unsatisfactory subject. The gold and silver coins of the Ptolemies follow the same standard as the silver coins of the kings of Macedon to Philip II. inclusive, which are on the full Æginetan weight: but the copper coins of the Ptolemies follow the standard of the ancient Egyptians, the two talents, if calculated from the coins, being in the proportion of about 10 (gold and silver) to 13 (copper), or, if calculated from the higher correct standard of the gold and silver system, in the proportion of about 10 to 12.7. 4. The Carthaginian talent may not be as old as the period before Alexander, yet it reaches so nearly to that period that it cannot be here omitted. Those silver coins of the Carthaginians which do not follow the Attic standard seem to be struck upon the standard of the Persian coins, the Babylonian talent.—III. The Hebrew talent or talents and divisions. 1. A talent of silver is mentioned in Ex. xxxviii. 25–28 (comp. xxx. 13, 15), which contained 3,000 shekels, distinguished as "the holy shekel," or "shekel of the sanctuary." 2. A gold maneh is spoken of (A. V. "pound," 1 K. x. 17), and, in a parallel passage (2 Chr. ix. 16), shekels are mentioned, three manehs being represented by 300 shekels, a maneh therefore = 100 shekels of gold. 3. Josephus (iii. 6, § 7) states that the Hebrew talent of gold contained

100 minæ. 4. Josephus (xiv. 7, § 1) states that the Hebrew mina of gold = two libræ (= pounds) and a half. Taking the Roman pound at 5,050 grains, the maneh of gold = about 12,625 grains. 5. Epiphanius estimates the Hebrew talent at 125 Roman pounds, which, at the value given above, = about 631,250 grains. 6. A difficult passage in Ezekiel seems to speak of a maneh of 60 (possibly 50, LXX.) shekels (Ez. xlv. 12). 7. Josephus (iii. 8, § 10) makes the gold shekel a Daric. From these data it may be reasonably inferred, (1.) that the Hebrew gold talent contained 100 manehs, each of which again contained 100 shekels of gold, and, basing the calculation on the stated value of the maneh, weighed about 1,262,500 grains, or, basing the calculation on the correspondence of the gold shekel to the Daric, weighed about 1,290,000 grains ( $129 \times 100 \times 100$ ), the latter being probably nearer the true value, and (2.) that the silver talent contained 3,000 shekels, and is probably the talent spoken of by Epiphanius as equal to 125 Roman pounds, or 631,250 grains, which would give a shekel of 210.4 grains. It is reasonable to suppose that the gold talent was exactly double the silver talent.—Let us now examine the Jewish coins. 1. The shekels and half-shekels of silver, if we take an average of the heavier specimens of the Maccabean issue, give the weight of the former as about 220 grains. A talent of 3,000 such shekels would weigh about 660,000 grains. This result agrees very nearly with the weight of the talent given by Epiphanius. 2. The copper coins are generally without any indications of value. The two heaviest denominations of the Maccabean issue, however, bear the names "half" and "quarter." In the following scheme they are compared with the silver coins:

Copper Coins.		Silver Coins.
Half.....235.4	250	Shekel.....220	Same.
Quarter....122.0	125	Half shekel.110	Same.
(Sixth)....81.8	83.3	[Third]..... 73.3

Our theory of the Hebrew coinage would be as follows:—Gold . . . Shekel or Daric (foreign) 129 grains. Silver . . . Shekel 220, Half-shekel 110. Copper. . . Half (-shekel) 264, Quarter (-shekel) 132, (Sixth-shekel) 88.—We can now consider the weights. The gold talent contained 100 manehs, and 10,000 shekels. The silver talent contained 3,000 shekels, 6,000 bekas, and 60,000 gerahs. The copper talent probably contained 1,500 shekels. The "holy shekel," or "shekel of the sanctuary," is spoken of both of the gold (Ex. xxxviii. 24) and silver (25) talents of the time of the Exodus. We also read of the "king's weight" (2 Sam. xiv. 26). But there is no reason for supposing different systems to be meant. The significations of the names of the Hebrew weights must be here stated. The Heb. cicôr (A. V. "talent") = a circle or globe, probably an aggregate sum. The "shekel" simply = a weight. The "bekah" or "half-shekel" = a dirham, or half. The "quarter-shekel" is once mentioned (1 Sam. ix. 8). The "gerah" = a grain or bean.—IV. The history and relations of the principal ancient talents. The following is a list of the talents:—

A. Eastern Talents.
Hebrew gold.....1,290,000	Hebrew silver.....660,000
Babylonian (silver).....669,040	Babylonian lesser (silver).....473,320
Egyptian.....840,000	Persian gold.....800,000

B. Greek Talents.

Æginetan.....	660,000
Attic Commercial.....	598,800
Attic Commercial, lowered.....	558,900
Attic Solonian, double.....	860,520
Attic Solonian, ordinary.....	430,260
Attic Solonian, lowered.....	405,000
Euboic.....	387,000+

We take the Hebrew to be the oldest system of weight. Apart from the evidence from its relation to the other systems, this may be almost proved by our finding it to obtain in Greece, in Phœnicia, and in Judea, as the oldest Greek and Phœnician system, and as the Jewish system. The Hebrew system had two talents for the precious metals in the relation of 2 : 1. The gold talent, apparently not used elsewhere, contained 100 manehs, each of which contained again 100 shekels, there being thus 10,000 of these units, weighing about 132 grains each, in the talent. The silver talent, also known as the Æginetan, contained 3,000 shekels, weighing about 220 grains each. One gold talent appears to have been equal to 24 of these. The reason for making the talent of gold twice that of silver was probably merely for the sake of distinction.—The Babylonian talent, like the Hebrew, consisted of two systems, in the relation of 2 to 1, upon one standard. It appears to have been formed from the Hebrew by reducing the number of units from 10,000 to 7,200. The system was altered by the maneh being raised so as to contain 120 instead of 100 units, and the talent lowered so as to contain 60 instead of 100 manehs. It is possible that this talent was originally of silver.—The derivation, from the lighter Babylonian talent, of the Euboic talent, is easily ascertained. Their relation is that of 6 : 5.—The Egyptian talent cannot be traced to any other. The Hebrew copper talent is equally obscure. Perhaps it is the double of the Persian gold talent.—The Æginetan talent was the same as the lesser or silver Hebrew talent. Its introduction into Greece was doubtless due to the Phœnicians. The Attic Commercial was a degradation of this talent, and was itself further degraded to form the Attic Solonian. MONEY; SHEKEL; TALENT.

B. Measures (originally by Mr. Bevan). The most important topic to be discussed in connection with the subject of the Hebrew measures is their relative and absolute value. Another topic demands a few prefatory remarks, viz. the origin of these measures, and their relation to those of surrounding countries. We divide the Hebrew measures into two classes, according as they refer to length or capacity, and subdivide each of these classes into two, the former into measures of length and distance, the latter into liquid and dry measures. I. Measures of length and distance. 1. The denominations referring to length were derived for the most part from the arm and hand. We may notice the following four as derived from this source:—(a.) The finger's breadth (Heb. etaba, A. V. "FINGER"), in Jer. lli. 21 only. (b.) The "hand breadth" (Heb. tephah or ach and tôphah or ach; Ex. xxv. 25; 1 K. vii. 26; 2 Chr. iv. 5, &c.), applied metaphorically to a short period of time in Ps. xxxix. 5. (c.) The "span" (Heb. zereth), the distance between the extremities of the thumb and the little finger in the extended hand (Ex. xxviii. 16, xxxix. 9; 1 Sam. xvii. 4; Ez. xliii. 13), applied generally to describe any small measure in Is. xl. 12. (d.) The "cubit" (Heb. ammah; Gr. pēchus), the distance from the elbow to the extremity of the middle finger. This occurs very frequently in the Bible in relation to buildings, &c. (Gen. vi.

15; Ex. xxv.—xxvii.; Jm. xxi. 8; Rev. xxi. 17, &c.).

In addition to the above we may notice:—(e.) The Heb. gômēd (A. V. "cubit"), literally a rod, applied to Egion's dirk (Judg. iii. 16). Its length is uncertain, but it probably fell below the "cubit" (so Mr. Bevan; Ges. has cubit; Fū. span, fist; LXX. span; Vulg. palm, &c.). (f.) The "reed" (Heb. kāneh; Gr. kalamos; REED 4), for measuring buildings on a large scale (Ex. xl. 5–8, xli. 8, xlii. 16–19; Rev. xi. 1, xxi. 15, 16).—Little information is furnished by the Bible itself as to the relative or absolute lengths described under the above terms. With the exception of the notice that the "reed" = 6 cubits (Ez. xl. 5), we have no intimation that the measures were combined in any thing like a scale. The most important conclusion to be drawn from the Biblical notices is, that the cubit, which may be regarded as the standard measure, was of varying length, and that, to secure accuracy, it was necessary to define the kind of cubit intended, the result being that the other denominations, if combined in a scale, would vary in like ratio. Thus in Deut. iii. 11, the cubit is specified to be "after the cubit of a man;" in 2 Chr. iii. 3 "after the first," or rather "after the older measure;" and in Ez. xli. 8 "a great cubit," or literally "a cubit to the joint," further defined in xl. 5 "a cubit and an hand breadth." These expressions involve one of the most knotty points of Hebrew archæology, viz. the number and the respective lengths of the Scriptural cubits. That there was more than one cubit, is clear; but whether there were three, or only two, is not so clear. It is generally conceded that the "former" or "older" measure of 2 Chr. iii. 3 was the Mosaic or legal cubit, and that the modern measure, the existence of which is implied in that designation, was somewhat larger. Further, the cubit "after the cubit of a man" of Deut. iii. 11, is held to be a common measure in contradistinction to the Mosaic one, and to have fallen below this latter in point of length. In this case we should have three cubits—the common, the Mosaic or old measure, and the new measure. We turn to Ezekiel, and find a distinction of another character, viz. a long and a short cubit. Now, as it has been urged by many writers, Ezekiel would not be likely to adopt any other than the old Mosaic standard for the measurements of his ideal temple. If so, his long cubit would be identical with the old measure, and his short cubit with the one "after the cubit of a man," and the new measure of 2 Chr. iii. 3 would represent a still longer cubit than Ezekiel's long one. Other explanations of the prophet's language have, however, been offered; it has been sometimes assumed that, while living in Chaldea, he and his countrymen had adopted the long Babylonian cubit; but in this case his short cubit could not have belonged to the same country, inasmuch as the difference between these two amounted to only three fingers (Hdt. i. 178). Again, it has been explained that his short cubit was the ordinary Chaldean measure, and the long one the Mosaic measure; but this is unlikely on account of the respective lengths of the Babylonian and the Mosaic cubits (see below). Independently of these objections, we think that Deut. iii. 11 and 2 Chr. iii. 3 imply the existence of three cubits. An examination of Biblical notices (Ex. xxvii. 1, compare xx. 26; 1 K. vii. 27, &c.) tends to the conclusion that the cubit of early times, or Mosaic cubit, fell far below the length usually assigned to it; but these notices are so scanty and ambiguous that this conclusion is by no means decisive. The earliest and most reliable testimony as to the length of the cubit is supplied by the existing specimens of old Egyptian measures. Several of these have been discovered in tombs, carrying us back at all events to 1700 B. C., while the Nilometer at Elephantine exhibits the length of the cubit in the time of the Roman emperors. No great difference is exhibited in these measures, the longest being estimated at about 21 inches, and the shortest at about 20½, or exactly 20.4729 inches. They are divided into 28 digits, while the Mosaic cubit, according to Rabbinical authorities, was divided into 24 digits. There is some difficulty in reconciling this discrepancy with the almost certain fact of the derivation of the cubit from Egypt. It has been generally surmised that the Egyptian cubit was of more than one length, and that the sepulchral measures exhibit the shorter as well as the longer by special marks. Wilkinson denies the existence of more than one cubit; but most writers on the subject agree that the Egyptian cubit-measures in the Turin and Louvre Museums contain a combination of 2, if not 3 kinds of cubit. Thenius makes the old cubit = 26 digits or 19.066 inches, the royal cubit = 28 digits, = 20.611 or 20.591 inches (the length of the Turin and Louvre measures respectively), and a third or ordinary cubit = 23 digits, or about 16.9 inches. Another explanation makes the old cubit = 25 digits or 18.189 inches; another makes it = 24 digits. The use of more than one cubit appears to have also prevailed in Babylon, for Herodotus states that the "royal" exceeded the "moderate" cubit by three digits. Boeckh makes the Babylonian royal cubit = 20.806 inches; but Oppert's data would give 23.149 inches.—Mr. Bevan would identify the new Hebrew measure implied in 2 Chr. iii. 3 with the full Egyptian cubit; the "old" measure and Ezekiel's cubit with the lesser one, either of 26 or 24 digits; and the "cubit of a man" with the third one of 23 digits of which Thenius speaks. In the Mishna the Mosaic cubit is defined to be one of 6 palms. It is termed the moderate cubit, and is distinguished from a lesser cubit of 5 palms and from a larger one of 6 palms and a digit. The palm consisted, according to Maimonides, of 4 digits; and the digit, according to Arias Montanus, of 4 barley-corns. The length of the Mosaic cubit, as computed by Thenius (after several trials with the specified number of barley-corns of middling size), is 214.512 Paris lines, or 19.0515 inches. It seems hardly possible to arrive at any very exact conclusion by this mode of calculation. The Talmudists state that the Mosaic cubit was used for the edifice of the Tabernacle and Temple, and the lesser cubit for the vessels thereof. This was probably a fiction. Taking the estimate of Thenius, the length of the other denominations will be as follows:—

Digit.....					Inches.
4	Palm.....				.7938
12	3	Span.....			3.1752
24	6	2	Cubit.....		9.5257
144	36	12	6	Reed. .	19.0515
					114.3090

Land and area were measured either by the cubit (Num. xxxv. 4, 5; Ez. xl. 27) or by the reed (xlii. 20, xliii. 17, xlv. 2, xlviii. 20; Rev. xxi. 16). There is no indication in the Bible of the use of a square measure by the Jews. (ACRE.) Whenever they wished to define the size of a plot, they specified its length and breadth, even if it were a perfect square, as in Ez. xlviii. 16. The difficulty of defining an area by these means is experienced in the interpretation of Num. xxxv. 4, 5. (SABURA).—2. The measures of distance noticed in the O. T. are the three following:—(a.) The "pace" (Heb. tas'ad, 2 Sam. vi. 13), answering generally to our yard. (b.) The Heb. cibrath haddreta, rendered in the A. V. "a little way," margin "a little piece of ground" (Gen. xxxv. 16, xlviii. 7; 2 K. v. 19). The Hebrew expression appears to indicate some definite distance, but the only conclusion to be drawn from the Bible is, that it did not exceed and probably equalled the distance between Bethlehem and Rachel's burial-place (RACHEL), which is traditionally identified with a spot 1½ miles N. of the town. (c.) The "day's journey" (Heb. derech yom or mahalak yom; Gr. hémēras hodos), which was the most usual method of calculating distances in travelling (Gen. xxx. 34, xxxi. 23; Ex. iii. 18, v. 3, &c.), though but one instance of it occurs in the N. T. (Lk. ii. 44). The ordinary day's journey among the Jews was 30 miles; but when they travelled in companies only 10 miles: Neapolis (SHECHEM) formed the first stage out of Jerusalem, according to the former, and BETHROTH, according to the latter computation. It is impossible to assign any distinct length to the day's journey. In the Apocrypha and N. T. we meet with the following additional measures:—(d.) The "SABBATH-DAY'S JOURNEY." (e.) The "furlong" (Gr. stadion, L. form stadium, Eng. stade), a Greek measure introduced into Asia after Alexander's conquest, and hence first mentioned in the Apocrypha (2 Mc. xi. 5, xii. 9, 17, 29), subsequently in the N. T. (Lk. xxiv. 13; Jn. vi. 19, xi. 18; Rev. xiv. 20, xxi. 16). Both the name and the length of the stade were borrowed from the footrace-course at Olympia. It = 600 Greek feet (Hdt. ii. 149), or 125 Roman paces (Pliny, ii. 23), or 606½ feet of our measure. It thus falls below the furlong by 53½ feet. (f.) The MILK, a Roman measure, = 1,000 Roman paces, 8 stades, or 1,618 English yards. (g.) The "fathom" (Gr. orguia, Acts xxvii. 28 twice), strictly = the length of the outstretched arms; as a measure of length, according to Herodotus, = 1½ stadium = 6 feet 1 inch (L. & S.).—II. Measures of capacity. The Hebrew measures of capacity for liquids were:—(a.) The log (Lev. xiv. 10 ff.), the name originally signifying a basin. (b.) The hin, a name of Egyptian origin (properly = ruad, Ges.), frequently noticed in the Bible (Ex. xxix. 40, xxx. 24; Num. xv. 4 ff.; Ez. iv. 11, &c.). (c.) The bath (= measured), the largest of the liquid measures (1 K. vii. 26, 38; 2 Chr. ii. 10, iv. 5; Ezr. vii. 22; Ia. v. 10, &c.). We gather from Josephus (iii. 8, § 3) that the bath contained 6 hins, and from the Rabbins that the hin contained 12 logs. The relative values, therefore, stand thus:—

Log
72	6 Bath

The Hebrew dry measure contained the following denominations: (a.) The cab (literally = hollow or concave), mentioned only in 2 K. vi. 25. (b.) The omer (= a heap, and secondarily a sheaf), mentioned only in Ex. xvi. 16–36. The same measure is elsewhere termed isadrón (= a lentil), as being the tenth part of an ephah (compare Ex. xvi. 36), whence in the A. V. "tenth deal" (Lev. xiv. 10, xxiii. 13; Num. xv. 4, &c.). (c.) The Heb. eká, etymologically and appropriately translated "measure," the ordinary measure for household purposes (Gen. xviii. 6; 1 Sam. xiv. 18; 1 K. xviii. 32; 2 K.

vii. 1, 16, 18). The Greek equivalent (saton, A. V. "measure") occurs in Mat. xiii. 33 and Lk. xiii. 21. The seah was also termed shâlîsh (Heb. = a thira), as being the third part of an ephah (Is. xl. 12; Ps. lxxx. 5 [A. V. "great measure"]). (d.) The ephah (Heb. form êphâh, rarely êphâh), a word of Egyptian origin, = measure, specially of corn, Ges. (Ex. xvi. 36; Lev. v. 11, vi. 20; Ru. ii. 17; 1 Sam. i. 24, xvii. 17; Ez. xlv. 10, 11, 13, 24, xlv. 5, 7, 11, 14, &c.). (e.) The Heb. lethech, A. V. "half-homer" (Hos. iii. 12 only), literally = what is poured out. (f.) The homer, meaning heap (Lev. xxvii. 16; Num. xi. 32; Is. v. 10; Ez. xlv. 11-14; Hos. iii. 2). It is elsewhere termed cor (properly a round vessel, Ges.), from the circular vessel in which it was measured (1 K. iv. 22, v. 11; 2 Chr. ii. 10, xxvii. 5; Ezr. vii. 22; Ez. xlv. 14 [A. V. "cor" here and in 1 K. iv. 22 margin; elsewhere translated "measure"]). The Greek equivalent (koros, A. V. "measure") occurs in Lk. xvi. 7. The following is the scale of relative values (partly from Ex. xvi. 36 and Ez. xlv. 11, and partly from the Rabbinites):—

6	10	3	10

The absolute values of the liquid and dry measures form the subject of a single inquiry, inasmuch as the two scales have a measure of equal value, viz. the bath and the ephah (Ez. xlv. 11). Attempts have been made to deduce the value of the bath from a comparison of the dimensions and contents of the molten sea (SEA, MOLTEN) as given in 1 K. vii. 23-26; but uncertainty attends every statement. Josephus (viii. 2, § 9) states that the bath = 72 zetæ (see below), that the bin = 2 Attic choes (iii. 8, § 3, 9, § 4), and that the seah = 1½ Italian modii (ix. 4, § 5), that the cor = 10 Attic medimni (xv. 9, § 2), and that the issaron or omer = 7 Attic cotylæ (iii. 6, § 6). It may further be implied from Jos. ix. 4, § 5, as compared with 2 K. vi. 25, that he regarded the cab = 4 zetæ. Now, to reduce these statements to consistency, it must be assumed that in Jos. xv. 9, § 2, he has confused the medimnus with the metrêlên, and in Jos. iii. 8, § 6, the cotylê with the zetêlên. Such errors throw doubt on his other statements, and tend to the conclusion that Josephus was not really familiar with the Greek measures. Nevertheless his testimony must be taken as decisively favoring the identity of the Hebrew bath with the Attic metrêlên. The statements of Jerome and of Epiphanius in respect to Hebrew measures are equally remarkable for inconsistency. Assuming that Josephus was right in identifying the bath with the metrêlên, its value would be, according to Boeckh's estimate of the latter, 1993.95 Paris cubic inches, or 8.7053 English gallons, but, according to the estimate of Bertheau, 1885.77 Paris cubic inches, or 8.6696 English gallons. The Rabbinites furnish data of a different kind on the basis of which Thenius has estimated the bath at 1014.39 Paris cubic inches or 4.4286 gallons. As we are unable to decide between Josephus and the Rabbinites, we give a double estimate of the various denominations, adopting Bertheau's estimate of the metrêlên:—

In the N. T. we have notices of the following foreign measures:—(a.) The Gr. metrêlên (Jn. ii. 6; A. V. "firkin"), for liquids. (b.) The chaniz (Gr. choinix, Rev. vi. 6; A. V. "measure"), for dry goods. (c.) The zetêlên, applied, however, not to the particular measure so named by the Greeks, but to any small vessel, such as a cup (Mk. vii. 4, 8; A. V. "pot"). (d.) The modius (Gr. modios), similarly applied to describe any vessel of moderate dimensions (Mat. v. 15; Mk. iv. 21; Lk. xi. 33; A. V. "bushel"); though properly meaning a Roman measure (= ½ Attic medimnus, or ¾ Attic metrêlên, Rbn. N. T. Lex.), amounting to about a peck. Taking the Attic metrêlên = 8.6696 gallons, the amount of liquid in six stone jars, containing on the average 2½ metrêlên each, would exceed 110 gallons (Jn. ii. 6). Very possibly, however, the metrêlên represents the Hebrew bath, and if the bath be taken at the estimate of the Rabbinites (see above), the amount would be reduced to about 60 gallons. The chaniz was ¼ of an Attic medimnus, and contained nearly a quart. It represented the usual amount of corn for a day's food; hence a chaniz for a "PENNY" (denarius), which usually purchased a bushel (Cic. Verr. iii. 81), indicated a great scarcity. (WAGS.)—As to the use of fair measures, various precepts are expressed in the Mosaic Law, &c. (Lev. xix. 35, 36; Deut. xxv. 14, 15; Prov. xx. 10; Ez. xlv. 10), and probably standard measures were kept in the Temple, as was usual in other ancient countries.

Well (Heb. usually bêr, sometimes bôr, ma'yân, mâkôr, or 'ayin; Gr. phrear and pégê, both used in N. T. only of Jacob's "well" in Jn. iv.; see AIN, CISTERN, FOUNTAIN, PIT). The special necessity of a supply of water (Judg. i. 15) in a hot climate has always involved among Eastern nations questions of property of the highest importance, and sometimes given rise to serious contention. Thus the well BEER-SHEBA was opened, and its possession attested with special formality by Abraham (Gen. xxi. 30, 31). The Philistines stopped up the wells dug and named by Abraham, an encroachment stoutly resisted by Isaac's followers (xxvi. 15-33; see 2 K. iii. 19; 2 Chr. xxvi. 10). The Koran notices abandoned wells as signs of desertion. To acquire wells which they had not themselves dug, was one of the marks of favor foretold to the Hebrews on their entrance into Canaan (Deut. vi. 11). To possess one is noticed as a mark of independence (Prov. v. 15), and to abstain from the use of wells belonging to others, a disclaimer of interference with their property (Num. xx. 17, 19, xxi. 22). Similar rights of possession, actual and hereditary, exist among the Arabs of the present day. Wells, Burckhardt says, in the interior of the desert are exclusive property, either of a whole tribe, or of individuals whose ancestors dug the wells. Wells have become in many cases links in the history and landmarks in the topography both of Palestine and of the Arabian Peninsula. Wells in Palestine are usually excavated from the solid limestone rock, sometimes with steps to descend into them (Gen. xxiv. 16). The brims are furnished with a curb or low wall of stone, in which furrows are worn by the ropes used in drawing water. This curb, as well as the stone cover, also very usual, agrees with the directions of the Law, as a protection against accidents (Ex. xxi. 33). On a curb of this sort our Lord sat when He conversed with the woman of Samaria (Jn. iv. 6), and it was this, the usual stone cover, which the woman placed on the mouth of the well at Bahurim (2 Sam. xvii. 19, A. V. "a covering"). The usual methods for raising water are—1. The rope and bucket, or water-skin (Gen. xxiv. 14–20; Jn. iv. 11). 2. The sakiyah, or Persian wheel. This consists of a vertical wheel with buckets or earthen jars attached to a cord passing over the wheel, which descend empty and return full as the wheel revolves. 3. A modification of the last method, by which a man, sitting opposite to a wheel furnished with buckets, turns it by drawing with his hands one set of spokes prolonged beyond its circumference, and pushing another set from him with his feet. 4. A method very common, in ancient and modern Egypt, &c., is the shadoof, consisting of a lever moving on a pivot, which is loaded at one end with some weight, and has at the other a bowl or bucket. Wells are usually furnished with troughs of wood or stone, into which the water is emptied for the use of persons or animals coming to the wells. Unless machinery is used, which is commonly worked by men, women are usually the water-carriers. * Wen. The Heb. yabbd, A. V. "having a wen," applied to animals from the flock or herd (Lev. xxii. 22 only), is translated by Gesenius "flowing, running, sc. with matter as a sore, i. e. having running sores, ulcers." MEDICINE.

* West (Heb. yām [= SEA], ma'arab, once [Is. xlv. 6] ma'arabāh [both literally = the occident or place where the sun sets, Ges.]; Gr. dusnē [= the setting of the sun]), the quarter of the heavens or earth which lies toward the setting sun, or opposite to the EAST (Gen. xii. 8, xxviii. 14 [Heb. yām in both]; Ps. ciii. 12, cvii. 8 [Heb. ma'arab in both]; Mat. viii. 11, xxiv. 27, &c.). The Mediterranean Sea ("the hinder sea;" see EAST) formed the western border of Palestine, and hence the Hebrews would naturally use "seaward" or "toward the sea" to denote a western direction. SEA, THE GREAT; WIND.

Whale. For the Heb. tan and tannin, rendered in the A. V. "dragon," "whale," "serpent," "sea-monster," see DRAGON, 1, 2. The Book of JONAH records the swallowing of that prophet by some "great fish" which in Mat. xii. 40 is called in Greek kétos, in A. V. "whale." But the Gr. kétos is not restricted in its meaning to "a whale," or any Cetacean; like the L. ete or cetus, it may denote any sea-monster, "a whale," "a shark," "a seal," "a tunny of enormous size," &c. (so Mr. Houghton, and scholars universally). Although two or three species of whale are found in the Mediterranean Sea, yet the "great fish" that swallowed the prophet cannot properly be identified with any Cetacean, for, although the Sperm whale (Calodon macrocephalus) has a gullet sufficiently large to admit the body of a man, yet it can hardly be the fish intended; as the natural food of Cetaceans consists of small animals, such as medusæ and crustacea. The only fish, then, capable of swallowing a man would be a large specimen of the white shark (Carcharias vulgaris), that dreaded enemy of sailors, and the most voracious of the shark family, which sometimes attains the length of thirty feet. Ruysch says that the whole body of a man in armor has been found in the stomach of a white shark; and Captain King, in his Survey of Australia, says he caught one which could have swallowed a man with the greatest ease. Blumenbach mentions that a whole horse has been found in a shark, and Captain Basil Hall reports the taking of one in which, besides other things, he found the whole skin of a buffalo which a short time before had been thrown overboard from his ship. The white shark is not uncommon in the Mediterranean; it occurs, as Forskål assures us, in the Arabian Gulf, and is common also in the Indian Ocean. It might therefore have been seen on the voyage to TARSHISH. So far for the natural portion of the subject. But how Jonah could have been swallowed whole unhurt, or how he could have existed for any time in the shark's belly, cannot be explained by simply natural causes, though certainly no more remarkable than the preservation of SHADRACH, &c., in the "burning fiery furnace." Wheat, the well-known valuable cereal, cultivated from the earliest times, and frequently mentioned in the Bible. In the A. V. the Heb. bar, dāgān, and riphōth, are occasionally translated "wheat;" but the proper Hebrew name of this cereal, as distinguished from "BARLEY," "RYE," &c., is hitāk or chittāh (Chal. hintin or chintin). As to the former Hebrew terms and the Gr. silos, see under CORN. The first mention of wheat ("wheat-harvest") occurs in Gen. xxx. 14, in the account of Jacob's sojourn with Laban in Mesopotamia. Egypt in ancient times was celebrated for its wheat; the best quality, according to Pliny, was grown in the Thebaid; it was all bearded, and the same varieties, Sir G. Wilkinson writes, "existed in ancient as in modern times, among which may be mentioned the seven-eared quality described in Pharaoh's dream" (Gen. xli. 22). Babylonia was also noted for the excellence of its wheat and other cereals. Modern writers, as Chesney and Rich, bear testimony to the great fertility of Mesopotamia. Syria and Palestine produced wheat of fine quality and in large quantities (Ps. lxxxi. 16, cxlvii. 14, &c.). There appear to be two or three sorts of wheat at present grown in Palestine, the Triticum vulgare (var. hybernum, the common "winter wheat"), Triticum Spelta (i. e. spelt; "RYE"), and another variety of bearded wheat which appears to be the same as the "Egyptian wheat," the Triticum compositum. In the parable of the sower our Lord alludes to grains of wheat which in good ground produce a hundred-fold (Mat. xiii. 8). The common wheat will sometimes produce one hundred grains in the ear. Wheat is reaped toward the end of April, in May, and in June, according to the differences of soil and position; it was sown either broadcast, and then ploughed in or trampled in by cattle (Is. xxxii. 20), or in rows, if we rightly understand Is. xxviii. 25, which seems to imply that the seeds were planted apart in order to insure larger and fuller ears. The wheat was put into the ground in the winter, and some time after the BARLEY; in the Egyptian plague of hail, consequently, the barley suffered, but the wheat had not appeared, and so escaped injury (Ex. ix. 32). AGRICULTURE; BARN; BREAD; FIRST-FRUIT; FOOD; MILL; MORTAR 1, &c.

* Wheel (Heb. ôphan, galgal, &c.). For the common uses of the wheel, see CART; CHARIOT; HAMATH; LAYER; WELL, &c. In Ps. lxxxiii. 13 (Heb. 14), the A. V. has "wheel" for Heb. galgal, which Gesenius (and so Fürst in substance) here makes = "chaff, stubble, any thing driven round before a WHIRLWIND." Thomson (ii. 357-8) suggests that it denotes in Ps. l. c. and Is. xvii. 13 (A. V. "a rolling thing," margin "thistledown") the globe or sphere—a foot or more in diameter—formed by the branches of the wild artichoke, which, becoming light and dry in autumn, is broken off from the main stem and carried by the wind over the plain, rolling and leaping hither and thither to the great annoyance of the traveller and his horse. In some parts, as on the plain N. of Hamath and in the desert E. of Haurân, hundreds and even thousands of these artichoke globes may be seen in full motion before the wind. For "wheel" in Eccl. xii. 6, see MEDICINE, p. 628. WHIRLWIND.

* Whip. GOAD; PUNISHMENTS; ROD; SCOURGING.

Whirlwind. The Hebrew terms thus translated in the A. V., viz. sûphâh (Job xxxvii. 9; Prov. i. 27, x. 25; Is. v. 28, xvii. 13, xxi. 1, lxvi. 15; Jer. iv. 13; Hos. viii. 7; Am. i. 14; Nah. i. 3; translated "storm" in Job xxi. 18, also in Ps. lxxxiii. 15 [Heb. 16], and Is. xxix. 6), sa'ar (Jer. xxiii. 19 h, xxv. 32, xxx. 23 b: translated "tempest" in Ps. lv. 8 [Heb. 9], lxxxiii. 15 [Heb. 16], also in Am. i. 14 and Jon. i. 4, 12), and sê'arâh (2 K. i. 1, 11; Job xxxviii. 1, xl. 6; Is. xl. 24, xli. 16; Jer. xxiii. 19 a, xxx. 23 a; Ez. i. 4; Zech. ix. 14: translated "storm" in Ps. cvii. 29; "stormy" [literally of storm or of storms] in ver. 25, cxlviii. 8, and Ez. xiii. 11, 13; "tempest" in Is. xxix. 6), convey the notion of a violent wind or hurricane, the first because such a wind sweeps away every object it encounters, the other two because the objects so swept away are tossed and agitated. Gesenius, Fürst, &c., translate by "whirlwind" the Heb. galgal, in Ps. lxxvii. 18 (A. V. "heaven"), and Ez. x. 13 (A. V. "WHEEL"). It does not appear (so Mr. Bevan) that any of the above terms express the specific notion of a whirlwind. The most violent winds in Palestine come from the east. The "whirlwind" is frequently used as a metaphor of violent and sweeping destruction. RAIN; WIND.

* White is often used as symbolical of cleanness, purity, brightness, &c. (Is. i. 18; Dan. xii. 10; Rev. iii. 4, 5, &c.). ASS; COLORS; DRESS; LEPROSY; LINEN; SNOW; STONES 8.

* Whore. HARLOT; IDOLATRY; SODOMITE.

Widow (Heb. almânâh; Gr. chêra). Under the Mosaic dispensation no legal provision was made for the maintenance of widows. They were left dependent partly on the affection of relations, especially of the eldest son, whose birthright, or extra share of the property, imposed such a duty upon him (FIRST-BORN; HEIR), and partly on the privileges accorded to other distressed classes (ALMS; POOR; STRANGER), such as a participation in the triennial third TITHE (Deut. xiv. 29, xxvi. 12), in GLEANING (xxiv. 19-21; CORNER), and in religious feasts (xvi. 11, 14; FESTIVALS). Taking a widow's garments in pledge was specially prohibited (xxiv. 17; compare Job xxiv. 3). The widow was commended to the care of the community (Ex. xxii. 22; Deut. xxvii. 19; Is. i. 17; Jer. vii. 6, xxii. 3; Zech. vii. 10), and any neglect or oppression was strongly reprobated (Job xxii. 9, xxiv. 21; Ps. xciv. 6; Is. x. 2; Ez. xxii. 7; Mal. iii. 5; Mat. xxiii. 14, &c.).—With regard to the remarriage of widows, the only restriction imposed by the Mosaic law had reference to one left childless, whom the brother of the deceased husband was to marry (Deut. xxv. 5, 6; Mat. xxii. 23-30; MARRIAGE, p. 605). In the Apostolic Church the widows were sustained at the public expense, the relief being daily administered in kind, under the superintendence of officers appointed for this special purpose (Acts vi. 1-6). Particular directions are given by St. Paul as to the class of persons entitled to such public maintenance (1 Tim. v. 3-16). These were the poor and friendless (ver. 3-5, 16). Out of the body of such widows a certain number were to be enrolled (A. V. "taken into the number"), each (1.) not under sixty years of age; (2.) having been "the wife of one man," probably meaning but once married; and (3.) having led a useful and charitable life (ver. 9, 10). Alford, De Wette, Lange, &c., favor the view that the enrolled widows formed an ecclesiastical order, having duties identical with or analogous to those of the deaconesses of the early Church. (DEACONESS.) But Mr. Bevan, original author of this article, taking the passage as a whole, concludes that the main condition of enrolment was poverty, and its primary object eleemosynary, simply to enforce a more methodical administration of the Church funds, though the order of widows might easily obtain a quasi-official position in the Church, as they would naturally be looked up to as models of piety to their sex, and would belong to the class whence deaconesses would be chiefly drawn.<sup>1</sup> WOMEN.

Wife. MARRIAGE; WIDOW; WOMEN.

Wild Beast. BEAST.

* Wilder-ness. ARABIA; DESERT; WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING; ZIN, &c.

Wilder-ness of the Wan-der-ing. The evidence in respect to many of the localities of that wilderness in which the Israelites wandered for forty years, is so scanty that the whole subject of their route is involved in much obscurity. The fact that from "ETHAM in the edge of the wilderness," their path struck across the RED SEA (Ex. xiii. 20), and from the sea into the same wilderness of Etham, seems to indicate the upper end of the furthest tongue of the Gulf of Suez as the point of crossing. There seems reason also to think that this gulf had then, as also at EZION-GEBER, a further extension northward than at present. (BAAL-ZEPHON; EXODUS, THE; GOSHEN; MIGDOL 1; PI-HAHIROTH; RED SEA, PASSAGE OF.)—The twin gulfs of Suez and 'Akabah, into which the RED SEA separates, embrace the Peninsula on its east and west sides respectively. The northern portion of the whole Peninsula is a plateau called et-Tih (Ar. = the wandering, sc. of the Israelites), bounded S. by the range of et-Tih, which extends somewhat like a slack chain from Suez on the W. to some sandstone cliffs on the E., which shut off this region from the Gulf of 'Akabah. The northwestern member of this chain converges with the shore of the Gulf of Suez, till the two run nearly parallel. Its eastern member throws off several fragments of long and short ridges toward the Gulf of 'Akabah and the northern plateau et-Tih. The greatest elevation of the et-Tih range is a little W. of long. 34°, viz. 4,654 feet above the Mediterranean. From this point the watershed of the plateau runs obliquely between N. and E. toward Hebron, the part of the plateau W. of this line being drained by the great

Wady el-'Ariah along a gradual slope to the Mediterranean, and consisting of limestone covered with coarse gravel interspersed with black flints and drift, while the shorter and much steeper slope eastward is drained by the Wady Fikreh and et-Jeib and et-Jeráfah into the Dead Sea, and consists of a flat rising here and there in heights steep on one side, composed of white chalk with frequent lumps of flint embedded. Sand is rare in the Peninsula, except in the plain or broad band known as the Deb-bet er-Ramleh, on the south side of the et-Tih range. Of sandstone on the edges of the granitic central mass there is no lack. It is chiefly found between the chalk and limestone of et-Tih and the southern rocky triangle of SINAI. The hardness of the granite in the Jebel et-Túr has been emphatically noticed by travellers.—As to the sustenance in this wilderness of the 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 Israelites with their flocks and herds, we know not to what extent the last were fed with the MANNA which supported the human life, and there is no doubt that the vegetation of the wadys has considerably decreased from the violence of the winter torrents, the reckless waste of the Bedouin tribes (who have of late years ruthlessly destroyed the acacia-trees for charcoal), &c. The Wady er-Ráhah (at Sinai), which was "a vast green plain" in the sixteenth century, is now entirely bare. Seetzen gives a list of sixty-three places as a proof that the region from the Hijaz to the neighborhood of Damascus, now arid and desolate, was once extremely populous. The gardens at the wells of Moses ('Ayin Músa) and at Mount Sinai are conspicuous examples of successful attempts to produce vegetation in this desert. There seems to be no deficiency of RAIN. Human fostering hands might extend the prospect of possible resources from the present "transparent coating of vegetation" in the wilderness of Sinai to a point as far in excess of present facts as were the numbers of the Israelitish host above the 6,000 Bedouins computed now to form the population of the desert. (AGRICULTURE.)—Assuming the passage of the Red Sea to have been effected at some spot N. of the now extreme end of the Gulf of Suez, the Israelites would march from their point of landing a little to the E. of S. Here they were in the wilderness of SHUR, and in it "went three days and found no water." The next point mentioned is MARAH, thought by most travellers since Burckhardt's time to be 'Ain el-Havárah. On this first section of their desert-march, Stanley (Syria and Palestine, 37) remarks, "There can be no dispute as to the general track of the Israelites after the passage [of the Red Sea]. If they were to enter the mountains at all, they must continue in the route of all travellers, between the sea and the table-land of the Tih, till they entered the low hills of Ghurundel. Marah must either be Havárah or Ghurundel." He adds in a note, "Dr. Graul, however, was told . . . of a spring near Tih el-Amra, right (i. e. south) of Havárah, so bitter that neither men nor camels could drink of it. From hence the road goes straight to Wady Ghurundel." Seetzen inclines to favor the identification of el-Amra with Marah. It seems almost certain, however, that Wady Ghurundel—whether it be Marah, as Lepsius and (although doubtfully) Seetzen thought, or ELIM as Niebuhr, Robinson, and Kruse—must have lain on the line of march, and furnished a camping station (so Mr. Hayman, original author of this article). In this wady Seetzen found more trees, shrubs, and bushes than anywhere else from Sinai to Suez. The scenery in this region becomes a succession of watercourses; and the Wady el-Taiyibeh (= the good), connected with Ghurundel by Usel, is so named from the goodly water and vegetation which it contains. These three wadys encompass on three sides the Jebel Humdm; the sea, which it precipitously overhangs, being on the fourth. There seems no reason why all three should not have combined to form Elim, or at any rate, as Stanley suggests, two of them. From Elim, the next stage brought the people again to the sea. This fact, and the water supply, and consequent great fertility, enjoyed by Tûr on the coast (lat.  $28^{\circ}13'$ ), would make it seem probable that Tûr was the locality intended; but as it lies more than seventy miles, in a straight line, from the nearest probable assignable spot for Elim, such a distance makes it a highly improbable site for the next encampment. The account in Ex. xvi. omits this encampment by the sea, and brings the host at once into "the wilderness of Sin." This is probably the alluvial plain, called by Stanley the plain of Murkhah, which lower down the coast expands into the broadest in the peninsula, and is there called el-Kā'a, somewhere in the still northern portion of which we must doubtless place the next stations, DOPHKAI and ALUSH (Num. xxxiii. 12-14). In the wilderness of Sin occurred the first murmuring for food, and the first fall of MANNA. If, now, REPHIDIM be found at Feirān, it becomes almost certain that the track of the host lay to the N. of Serbāl, a magnificent five-peaked mountain, which becomes first visible at the plain of Murkhah. (SINAI.) Feirān must have been gained by some road striking off from the sea-coast, like the Wady Mokatteb, which is now the usual route from Cairo thither, perhaps by several parallel or converging lines. Stanley suggests the road by the S. of Serbāl, through Wady Hibrān, as also a possible route to Sinai, and designates it "the southern" one. The identification of SINAI itself will probably never be free from obscurity, though Mr. Hayman thinks that a slight preponderance of probability rests in favor of the Jebel Mūsa.<sup>1</sup>—The sojourn of the Israelites for a year in the neighborhood of Mount Sinai embraced the memorable events connected with the receiving of the two Tables (TEN COMMANDMENTS) and the institution of the LAW OF MOSES, the Golden CALF, Moses' vision of God (JEHOVAH), the visit of JETHRO, the death of NADAB and ABIHU, &c. The last incident mentioned before the wilderness of Sinai was quitted for that of PARAN is the intended departure of HOBAB the Kenite, which it seems he abandoned at Moses' urgency. They now quitted the Sinaitic region for that of PARAN, in which they went three days without finding a permanent encampment (Num. i., ix. 15-23, x. 13, 33, xi. 35, xii. 16). Here a choice of two main routes begins, in order to cross the intervening space between Sinai and Canaan, which they certainly approached in the first instance on the southern, and not on the eastern side.<sup>2</sup> TABERAH and KIBROTH-HATTA'AVAH seem to belong to the same encampment where Israel abode for at least a month (xi. 20), being names given to it from the two events which happened there. These stations seem from Num. x. 11-13, 33-36, to have lain in the wilderness of Paran; but possibly x. 11-13 should come after 33-36, and the "three days' journey" of verse 33 lie still in the wilderness of Sinai; and even Taberah and HAZEROTH, reached in xi., xii., also there. HazerOTH is coupled with DIZABAH = the Dahab on the shore of the gulf of 'Akabah' (Deut. i.). This makes a seaward position likely for HazerOTH, which is probably 'Ain el-Huṭhera'. In HazerOTH the people tarried seven days, if not more (Num. xi. 35, xii.), during the exclusion of MIRIAM from the camp while leprous. The next permanent encampment brought them into the wilderness of PARAN, and here the greatest difficulties begin. These difficulties resolve themselves into two main questions. Did Israel visit KADESH once, or twice? And where is it now to be looked for? We read in Num. x. 11, 12, that "on the twentieth day of the second month of the second year . . . the children of Israel took their journeys out of the wilderness of Sinai, and the cloud rested in the wilderness of Paran." The latter statement is probably to be viewed as made by anticipation; as we find that, after quitting Kibroth-hatta'avah and HazerOTH, "the people pitched in the wilderness of Paran" (Num. xii. 16). Here the grand pause was made while the spies, "sent," it is again impressed upon us (xiii. 3), "from the wilderness of Paran," searched the land for "forty days," and returned "to Moses and to Aaron, and to all the congregation . . . unto the wilderness of Paran to Kadesh." This is the first mention of Kadesh in the narrative of the Wanderings (verses 25, 26). "KADESH" probably = (1.) a region of the desert spoken of as having a relation, sometimes with the wilderness of Paran, and sometimes with that of Zin (comp. verses 21, 26); and (2.) a distinct city within that desert limit. Now, all the conditions of the narrative of the departure and return of the spies, and of the consequent despondency, murmuring, and penal sentence of wandering, will be satisfied by supposing that "Kadesh" here means the region merely. It has been proposed under KADESH to regard part of the 'Arabah,' including all the low ground at the southern and southwestern extremity of the Dead Sea, as the wilderness of Zin. Then the broad lower plateau N. of the el-Tih range, including both its slopes (viz. the more gradual one whose waters are drained by the Wady el-'Arish toward the Mediterranean on the N. W., and the much steeper one whose waters pass through the Wady el-Fikreh, el-Jeb, and el-Jerāfeh, into the Dead Sea), will be defined as the Paran wilderness proper. If we assume the higher superimposed plateau to bear the name of "Kadesh" as a desert district, and its southwestern mountain-wall to be "the MOUNTAIN OF THE AMORITES," then the Paran wilderness, so far as synonymous with Kadesh, will mean most naturally the region where that mountain-wall from Jebel 'Arduf en-Nakah to Jebel Mukhrith, and perhaps thence northward along the other side of the angle of the highest plateau, overhangs the lower terrace of the Tih. The spies' return to "the wilderness of Paran to Kadesh" means to that part of the lower plateau where it is adjacent to the higher, and probably the eastern side of it. The expression "from Kadesh-barnea even unto Gaza," is decisive of an eastern site for the former (Josh. x. 41). Here, as is plain both from Num. xiv. 40-45 and from Deut. i. 41-44, followed the wayward attempt of the host to win their way, in spite of the sentence of prohibition, to the "hill" or "mountain" of the Amalekites, and Canaanites, or Amorites, and their humiliating defeat. They were repelled in trying to force the pass at HORMAH (or ZEPHATH, Judg. i. 14), and the region of this defeat is called SRIR.—Here, then, the penal portion of the wanderings commences, and the great bulk of it, comprising nearly thirty-eight years, passes over between this defeat in Num. xiv., and the resumption of local notices in Num. xx., where again the names of "Zin" and "Kadesh" are the first that meet us. We gather from Deut. i. 46, that the greater part, perhaps the whole, of this period of nearly thirty-eight years, if so we may interpret the "many days" there spoken of, was passed <sup>2</sup> Robinson (l. 151, &c.), Porter (In Kitto), &c., maintain that the route of the Israelites was from Wady er-Rihah at the foot of Sinai nearly N. E. to the coast of the Gulf of 'Akabah,' and so along the coast to 'Akabah,' thence through the Wady el-'Arabah to his KADESH ('Ain el-Wad-beh'). Rev. J. Rowlands (in Fairbairn), and so Stanley, in part) advocates a route passing nearly N. from el-Ain (about twenty miles W. from the Gulf in latitude 29°) over the desert el-Tih to his KADESH ('Ain Kadeis'), in Kadesh, i. e. the region, not the city. But Num. xx. 1 brings us to a new point of departure. The people have grown old, or rather again young, in their wanderings. Here, then, we are at "the desert of Zin, in the first month," with the "people abiding in Kadesh." By the sequel, "Miriam died there, and was buried there," a more precise definition of locality now seems intended; which is further confirmed by the subsequent message from the same place to the king of Edom, "Behold, we are in Kadesh, a city in the uttermost of thy border" (Num. xx. 16). This, then, must be supposed to coincide with the encampment, recorded as taking place "in the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh," registered in the itinerary (xxxiii. 38). We see then why, in that register of specific camping-spots, there was no necessity for any previous mention of "Kadesh;" because the earlier notice in the narrative, where that name occurs, introduces it not as an individual encampment, but only as a region, within which perpetual changes of encampment went on for the greater part of thirty-eight years. We also see that they came twice to Kadesh the region, if the city Kadesh lay in it, and once to Kadesh the city; but once only to Kadesh the region, if the city lay without it. We are not told how the Israelites came into possession of the city Kadesh, nor who were its previous occupants. The itinerary takes here another stride from Kadesh to Mount Hor, where AARON was buried. In Deut. x. 6, 7, is a short list of names of localities, on comparing which with the portion of the itinerary in which corresponding names occur, we get some clew to the line of march from the region Kadesh to Ezion-geber southward. Their order is, however, slightly changed, standing in the two passages as follows:—

CONJECTURAL SITE.

- (a.) 'Ain Hasb, N. W. in the 'Arabah.
- (1.) Kusehbeh, mouth of the Wady Abu, near the foot of Mount Hor.
- (2.) 'Ain Ghurundel.
- (3.) Wady el-Ghudhaghidh.
- (4.) Confluence of Wady el-'Ahrbeh with el-Jeráfah.

NUM. xxxiii. 30-35.

- (a.) (HASHMONAH).
- (1.) MOSEROTH.
- (2.) BENE-JAAKAN.
- (3.) HOR-HAGIDGAD.
- (4.) JOTBATHAH. (EBRONAH). (EZION-GEBER).

DEUT. x. 6, 7.

- (1.) BEEROTH OF THE CHILDREN OF JAAKAN.
- (2.) MOSERA.
- (3.) GUDGODAH.
- (4.) JOTBATH.

Now, in Num. xx. 14, 16, 22-29, the narrative conducts us from Kadesh the city, reached in or shortly before "the fortieth year," to Mount Hor, where Aaron died, a portion of which route is accordingly that given in Deut. x. 6, 7; whereas the parallel column from Num. xxxiii. gives substantially the same route as pursued in the early part of the penal wandering, when fulfilling the command given in the region Kadesh, "turn you, get you into the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea" (Num. xiv. 25; Deut. i. 40), which command we further learn from Deut. ii. 1 was strictly acted on, and which a march toward Ezion-geber would exactly fulfil. (DEUTERONOMY, B, I. 5).—The mountains on the W. of the 'Arabah must have been always poor in water, and form a dreary contrast to the rich springs of the eastern side in Mount Seir. From the cliff front of this last, Mount Hor stands out prominently. HOR-HAGIDGAD, or Gudgodah, possibly = Wady el-Ghudhaghidh, which has a confluence with the Wady el-Jeráfah, the latter running into the 'Arabah on the W. side. JOTBATH, or Jotbatha, described as "a land of rivers of waters" (Deut. x. 7), may stand for any confluence of wadys in sufficient force to justify that character, but should certainly be in the southern portion of the 'Arabah, or a little to the W. of the same.—The probabilities of the whole march from Sinai, then, seem to stand as follows: they proceeded toward the N. E. to the 'Ain el-Hudhera (HAZEROTH), and thence quitted the maritime region, striking directly northward to el-'Ain, and thence by a route wholly unknown, perhaps a little to the E. of N. across the lower eastern spurs of the el-Tih range, descending the upper course of the Wady el-Jeráfah, until the southeastern angle of the higher plateau confronted them at the Jebel el-Mukhráh. Hence, after dispatching the spies, they moved perhaps into the 'Arabah, or along its western overhanging hills, to meet their return. Then followed the disastrous attempt at or near es-Sufáh (ZEPHATH), and the penal wandering in the wilderness of Kadesh, with a track wholly undetermined, save in the last half-dozen stations to Ezion-geber inclusively, as shown above. They then marched on Kadesh, the city, probably up the 'Arabah by these same stations, took it, and sent from there the message to Edom. The refusal with which it was met forced them to retrace the 'Arabah once more, and meanwhile Aaron died. Thus the same stations (Deut. x. 6, 7) were passed again, with the slight variation just noticed, probably caused by the command to resort to Mount Hor which that death occasioned. Thence, after reaching 'Akabah, and turning northeastward, they passed by a nearly straight line toward the eastern border of MOAB.—Of the stations in the list of Num. xxxiii. 19-28 (RITHMAH; RIMMON-PAREZ; LIBNAH 2; RISSAH; KEHELATHAH; SHAPHER, MOUNT; HARADAH; MAKHELOTH; TAHATH; TARAH; MITHCAH) nothing is known, though Mithcah and the few preceding it probably belong to the wilderness of Kadesh. After the burial of Aaron, the refusal of Edom to permit Israel to "pass through his border" made it necessary for the people to "compass the land of Edom" (xxi. 4), when they were much "discouraged on account of the way," and the consequent murmuring was rebuked by the visitation of the "fiery serpents" (ver. 5, 6). There is near ELATH a promontory known as the Rás Um Haye, "the mother of serpents," which seem to abound in the region adjacent; and, if we may suppose this the scene of that judgment, the event would be thus connected with the line of march, rounding the southern border of Mount Seir, whence "turning northward," having "compassed that mountain (Mount Seir) long enough," they "passed by the way of the wilderness of Moab" (Deut. ii. 3, 8). Some permanent encampment, perhaps at ZALMONAH (Num. xxxiii. 41, 42), seems here to have taken place, to judge from the urgent expression of Moses to the people in Deut. ii. 18: "Now rise up, said I, and get you over the brook ZERED," which lay further N. a little E., probably the Wady el-Ahaz. The delay caused by the plague of serpents may account for this apparent urgency, which would on this view have taken place at Zalmonah; and as we have connected the scene of that plague with the neighborhood of Elath, so, if we suppose Zalmonah to have lain in the Wady el-Nun, which has its junction with the 'Arabah close to 'Akabah, the modern site of Elath, this will harmonize the various indications, and form a suitable point of departure for the last stage of the wandering, which ends at the brook Zered (Deut. ii. 14). Three stations, PUNON, ONOTH, and IJE-ABARIM, were passed between this locality and the brook or valley of Zered (Num. xxi. 10-12, compare xxxiii. 43, 44), this last name, with "the brooks of ARNON," BEER, MATTANAH, NAHALIEL, and BAMOTH, being in Num. xxi. 14-20, but not in xxxiii.; but the interval between Ije-abarim and NEBO, which last corresponds probably (Deut. xxxiv. 1) with the PISGAH of Num. xxi. 20, is filled by two stations merely, DIBON-GAD and ALMON-DIBLATHAIM, whence we may infer that in these two only were permanent halts made. In this stage of their progress occurred the "digging" of the "well" by "the princes," the victories over SIHON and OG, the episodes of BALAAM and PHINEHAS, and the final numbering of the people, followed by the chastisement of the MIDIANITES (Num. xxi. 17, xxii.-xxvi., xxxi. 1-12; compare Deut. ii. 24-37, iii. 1-17). Several names of places, which are identical with some herein considered, occur in Deut. i. 1, where Moses is said to have spoken "on this (i. e. E.) side Jordan in the wilderness, in the plain over against the Red Sea, between PARAN and TOPHEL, and LABAN and HAZEROTH and DIZAHAB." PARAN here is perhaps the El-paran to which Chedorlaomer came in Gen. xiv. 6, and probably Tophel is the well-known Tufleh to the N. N. E. of Petra; and similarly the Red Sea, "over against" which it is spoken of as lying, is defined by Dizahab on its coast, and Hazeroth near the same. The introduction of "Laban" is less clear. Willows (Heb. 'arābīm) are mentioned in Lev. xxiii. 40, as used for making booths at the Feast of Tabernacles; in Job xl. 22 as giving shade to BEHEMOTH; in Is. xlv. 4 in illustration of the springing up of Israel's offspring. The tree upon which the captive Israelites hung their harps (Ps. cxxxvii. 2) was undoubtedly (so Mr. Houghton, &c.) the weeping willow (Salix Babylonica), which grows abundantly on the banks of the Euphrates, in other parts of Asia as in Palestine, and in Northern Africa. Sprengel seems to restrict the Hebrew word to the weeping willow; but there can scarcely be a doubt that the term is generic, and includes other species of the large family of willows, which is probably well represented in Palestine and the Bible lands, as the white willow (Salix alba), osier (Salix viminalis), Egyptian willow (Salix Aegyptiaca), which latter plant Sprengel identifies with the Ar. safās, probably = the Heb. tsaph-tsaphāh (A. V. "willow") of Ez. xvii. 5.

Willows, the Brook of the (Heb. nahal [or nahal] hd'arābīm), a wady mentioned (Is. xv. 7) as one of the boundaries of Moab—probably, as Gesenius observes, the southern one; possibly = a wady mentioned in Am. vi. 14 (A. V. "the river of the wilderness") as the then recognized southern limit of the northern kingdom, the Hebrew word being the same here for "brook" in Isaiah, and "river" in Amos, while that translated "wilderness" in Amos is hd'Arābāh (ARABAH), elsewhere almost exclusively = the Valley of the Jordan, the Ghór of modern Arabs. Mr. Grove, with Ewald, Hitzig, &c., regards the Heb. 'arābīm in Isaiah as = deserts (pl. of ARABAH); the A. V. margin, with the LXX., Syr., and Ar., translates it "Arabians;" while the Vulgate, Luther, Gesenius, Pusey, J. A. Alexander, A. V., &c., render it "willows." Most consider the Wady el-Ahry (ZERED?) as intended in one, if not in both, of the above passages, though Mr. Grove remarks that the name Wady Safās, "Willow Wady," is still attached to a part of the main branch of the ravine which descends from Kerak to the northern end of the peninsula of the Dead Sea, and that either of these positions would agree with the requirements of either passage.

Wills. Under a system of close inheritance (HEIR), like that of the Jews, the scope for bequest in respect of land was limited by the right of redemption and general reentry in the JUBILEE year. But the Law does not forbid bequests by will of such limited interest in land as was consistent with those rights. (Vows.) The case of houses in walled towns was different, and they must have frequently been bequeathed by will (Lev. xxv. 30). Two instances are recorded in the O. T., under the Law, of testamentary disposition, (1.) effected in the case of Athithophel (2 Sam. xvii. 23), (2.) recommended in the case of Hezekiah (2 K. xx. 1; Is. xxxviii. 1).

Wimple, an old English word for hood or veil, representing the Heb. mīpachath or mitpachath in Is. iii. 22. The Hebrew word signifies rather a kind of shawl or mantle. DRESS, p. 235.

Wind (Heb. rūah or rūach; Gr. anemos, πνεῦμα, pnōē). That the Hebrews recognized four prevailing winds as issuing, broadly speaking, from the four cardinal points, NORTH, SOUTH, EAST, and WEST, may be inferred from their using the "four winds" as = the "four quarters" of the hemisphere (Ez. xxxvii. 9; Dan. viii. 8; Zech. ii. 6; Mat. xxiv. 31; compare Jer. xlix. 36). The N. wind, or, as it was usually called, "the North," was naturally the coldest of the four (Ecclus. xliii. 20), and its presence is hence invoked as favorable to vegetation in Cant. iv. 16. It is described in Prov. xxv. 23 (margin) as bringing rain; in this case we must understand the N. W. wind. The N. W. wind prevails from the

autumnal equinox to the beginning of November, and the N. wind from June to the equinox. The E. wind crosses the sandy wastes of the Arabian Desert before reaching Palestine, and was hence termed "the wind of the wilderness" (Job i. 19; Jer. xiii. 24). It blows with violence, and is hence supposed to be = any violent wind (Job xxvii. 21, xxxviii. 24; Ps. xlviii. 7; Is. xxvii. 8; Ez. xxvii. 26). Probably in this sense it is used in Ex. xiv. 21. The Greek translators appear to have felt the difficulty of rendering the Heb. kādīm ("EAST wind") in Gen. xli. 6, 23, 27, because the parching effects of the E. wind, with which the inhabitants of Palestine are familiar, are not attributable to that wind in Egypt, but either to the S. wind, called in that country the khamāseen, or to that known as the samoom, which comes from the S. E. or S. S. E. (BLASTING; PLAGUES, THE TEN.) In Palestine the E. wind prevails from February to June. The S. wind, which traverses the Arabian peninsula before reaching Palestine, must necessarily be extremely hot (Job xxxvii. 17; Lk. xii. 55). In Egypt the S. wind (khamāseen) prevails in the spring, a portion of which in April and May is hence termed el-khamāseen. The W. and S. W. winds reach Palestine loaded with moisture gathered from the Mediterranean, and are termed by the Arabs "the fathers of the RAIN." Westerly winds prevail in Palestine from November to February. The Sea of Genesaret was liable to local squalls (Mk. iv. 37; Lk. viii. 23). Thomson (i. 337) mentions a fierce wind which in the plain of Ijon, December 28, chilled ten men and eighty-five cattle to death in a few minutes. (AIR; EUROCLYDON; WHIRLWIND.) The winds are often spoken of metaphorically; the E. wind was the symbol of nothingness (Job xv. 2; Hos. xii. 1), of the wasting by war (Jer. xlviii. 17), and of the effects of Divine vengeance (Is. xxvii. 8), in which sense, however, general references to violent wind are also employed (Ps. ciii. 16; Is. lxiv. 6; Jer. iv. 11). The wind is an image of transitoriness (Job vii. 7; Ps. lxxviii. 39), a witness of the Creator's power (Job xxviii. 25; Ps. cxxxv. 7; Prov. xxx. 4; Eccl. xi. 5; Jer. x. 13; Am. iv. 13), and a representative of the operations of the Holy Spirit (Jn. iii. 8; Acts ii. 2; SPIRIT).

Window (Heb. hallōn or challōn; Chal. cav; Gr. thuris). The window of an Oriental house consists generally of an aperture closed in with lattice-work, named in Heb. arubbāh (Eccl. xii. 3, A. V. "window"; Hos. xiii. 3, A. V. "chimney"), hāraccim or chāraccim (Cant. ii. 9), and eshnāb (Judg. v. 28; Prov. vii. 6, A. V. "casement"). (LATTICE.) GLASS has been introduced into Egypt in modern times as a protection against the cold of winter, but lattice-work is still the usual, and with the poor the only, contrivance for closing the window. The windows generally look into the inner court of the house, but in every house one or more look into the street. For the "window" in the Ark, see NOAH, p. 738.

Wine. The manufacture of wine is carried back in the Bible to the age of NOAH (Gen. ix. 20, 21), to whom the discovery of the process is apparently, though not explicitly, attributed. For the natural history and culture of the vine, see VINE. The only other plant whose fruit is noticed as converted into wine was the POMEGRANATE (Cant. viii. 2). In Palestine the vintage takes place in September, and is celebrated with great rejoicings. The ripe fruit was gathered in baskets (Jer. vi. 9), and carried to the WINE-PRESS. It was then placed in the upper one of the two vats of the WINE-PRESS, and was subjected to the process of "treading," which has prevailed in all ages in Oriental and South-European countries (Neh. xiii. 15; Job xxiv. 11; Is. xvi. 10; Jer. xxv. 30, xlviii. 33; Am. ix. 13; Rev. xix. 15). A certain amount of juice exuded from the ripe fruit from its own pressure before the treading commenced. This appears to have been kept separate from the rest of the juice, and to have formed the sweet wine (Gr. gleukos, A. V. "new wine") noticed in Acts ii. 13. The "treading" was by one or more men, according to the size of the vat. They encouraged one another by shouts and cries (Is. xvi. 9, 10; Jer. xxv. 30, xlviii. 33). Their legs and garments were dyed red with the juice (Gen. xlix. 11; Is. lxiii. 2, 3). The expressed juice escaped by an aperture into the lower vat, or was at once collected in vessels. A hand-press was occasionally used in Egypt, but we have no notice of such an instrument in the Bible. The wine was sometimes preserved in its unfermented state, and drunk as must, but more generally it was bottled off after fermentation, and, if it were designed to be kept for some time, a certain amount of lees was added to give it body (Is. xxv. 6). The wine consequently required to be "refined" or strained previously to being brought to table (xxv. 6).—The produce of the wine-press was described in Hebrew by a variety of terms, indicative either of the quality or of the use of the liquid. The most general Heb. term for "wine" is yayin (probably from a root signifying to boil up, to ferment, Ges.), which is undoubtedly connected with the Gr. oinos, the L. vinum, and our "wine." The Heb. tīrōsh (A. V. "wine," "new wine," once "sweet wine") is referred to the root yārash = to get possession of, and is applied, according to Gesenius, to wine from its inebriating qualities, whereby it gets possession of the brain; but, according to Bythner, to the vine as a possession in the eyes of the Hebrews. Both yayin and tīrōsh are occasionally connected with expressions that would apply properly to a fruit; e. g. the former (A. V. "wine") with verbs of gathering (Jer. xl. 10, 12) and growing (Ps. civ. 14, 15); the latter with gathering (Is. lxii. 9, A. V. "brought it together," viz. "thy wine," comp. ver. 8), treading (Mic. vi. 15, A. V. "sweet wine"), withering (Is. xxiv. 7, A. V. "the new wine mourneth"; Joel i. 10, A. V. "the new wine is dried up"), finding "in the cluster" of the grapes (Is. lxxv. 8, A. V. "new wine"). There is, however, in most, if not all, the passages where these and similar expressions occur, something to denote that the fruit is regarded not simply as fruit, but as the raw material out of which

wine is manufactured. The question whether either of the above terms ordinarily signified a solid substance, would be settled by the manner in which they were consumed. We are not aware of a single passage which couples yayin with the act of eating<sup>1</sup> (so Mr. Bevan, original author of this article). In the only passage where the act of consuming tirōsh alone is noticed (Is. lxii. 8 [A. V. "shall not drink thy wine"], 9 ["shall drink it"]), the Hebrew verb is shukhah, which constantly indicates the act of drinking (e. g. Gen. ix. 21, xxiv. 14, 18, 19, 22; Ex. vii. 18, 21, 24; Ru. ii. 9; 1 Sam. xxx. 12, 16; Job i. 4, &c.). To the argument that tirōsh is generally connected with "corn" (Gen. xxvii. 28, 37; Deut. vii. 13, xi. 14, &c.; A. V. "wine" usually in this connection, but "new wine" in Neh. x. 39 [Heb. 40], xiii. 5, 12), and therefore implies an edible rather than drinkable substance, it may reasonably be urged that in any enumeration of the materials for man's support, "meat and drink" would be specified, rather than several kinds of the former and none of the latter. There are, moreover, passages which seem to imply the actual manufacture of tirōsh by the same process by which wine was ordinarily made (Mic. vi. 15, "sweet wine;" Prov. iii. 10, "new wine;" Joel ii. 24, "wine"). Lastly, we have intimations of the effect produced by an excessive use of yayin and tirōsh. To the former are attributed the "darkly flashing eye" (Gen. xlix. 12, A. V. "red with wine"), the unbridled tongue (Prov. xx. 1; Is. xxviii. 7), the excitement of the spirit (Prov. xxxi. 6; Is. v. 11; Zech. ix. 15, x. 7), the enchained affections of its votaries (Hos. iv. 11), the perverted judgment (Prov. xxxi. 5; Is. xxviii. 7), the indecent exposure (Hab. ii. 15, 16), and the sickness resulting from the heat (Heb. hēmāh or chēmāh, A. V. "bottles" marg. "heat") of wine (Hos. vii. 5). In Hos. iv. 11—"Whoredom and wine (yayin), and new wine (tirōsh) take away the heart"—tirōsh appears as the climax of engrossing influences, in immediate connection with yayin. The impression produced by a general review of the above notices is, that both yayin and tirōsh in their ordinary and popular acceptance referred to fermented, intoxicating wine.<sup>2</sup> A certain amount of fermentation is implied in the distension of the leather bottles when new wine was placed in them, which was liable to burst old bottles (Job xxxii. 19; Mat. ix. 17). Very likely new wine was preserved in the state of must by placing it in jars or bottles, and then burying it in the earth. But we should be inclined to understand the passages above quoted as referring to wine drawn off before the fermentation was complete, either for immediate use, or for forming it into sweet wine.<sup>3</sup>—The Heb. daīs (Cant. viii. 2 [A. V.

"juice"]; Is. xlix. 26 and Am. ix. 13 [in both "sweet wine," marg. "new wine"]; Joel i. 5, iii. 18 [iv. 18, Heb.; "new wine" in both]) is derived from a word signifying to tread, and would very properly refer to new wine as being recently trodden out, but not necessarily to unfermented wine. It forms part of a Divine promise (Joel iii. 18; Am. ix. 13) very much as tirōsh occurs elsewhere, though other notices imply that it was the occasion of excess (Is. xlix. 26; Joel i. 5). The Heb. abbe is derived from a root signifying to soak or drink to excess (Is. i. 22, A. V. "wine;" Hos. iv. 18, "drink;" Nah. i. 10, "drunken"), and seems to be characterized by strength rather than sweetness. The term occurs in Hos. iv. 18, in the sense of a debauch.—The Heb. hemer or chemer (Deut. xxii. 14, A. V. "pure;" Is. xxvii. 2, "red wine"), Chal. hāmar or chāmar (A. V. "wine" in Ezr. vi. 9, vii. 22), and hamrd or chanrd (A. V. "wine," Dan. v. 1 ff.), convey the notion of foaming or ebullition, and may equally well apply to the process of fermentation or to the frothing of liquid freshly poured out, in which latter case they might be used of an unfermented liquid.—The Heb. mesach (A. V. "mixture," Ps. lxxv. 8, Heb. 9), meary ("liquor," marg. "mixture," Cant. vii. 2, Heb. 3), and minsach (Prov. xxiii. 30, "mixed wine;" Is. lxxv. 11, "drink-offering"), imply a mixture of wine with some other substance, and this mingling may have increased or diminished the strength of the wine according as the substance added was spices or water. The notices chiefly favor the former view; for mingled liquor was prepared for high festivals (Prov. ix. 2, 5), and occasions of excess (xxiii. 30; Is. v. 22). A cup "full-mixed" was emblematic of severe punishment (Ps. lxxv. 8). The wine "mingled with MYRRH" (GALL) given to Jesus may have been a bitter draught or one designed to deaden pain (Mk. xv. 23), and the spiced pomegranate wine prepared by the bride (Cant. viii. 2) may well have been of a mild character.—The Heb. shēchār (A. V. "strong drink") is a generic term applied to all fermented liquors except wine (DRINK, STRONG); hēmets or chōnēts is a weak sour wine (VINEGAR); dashūdh (A. V. "FLAGON of wine," 2 Sam. xvi. 1, &c.) = a cake of pressed raisins; and shēmdrīm, properly the "LEES" or "dregs" of wine, in Is. xxv. 6 = wine that had been kept on the lees to increase its body.—In the N. T. the Gr. oinos answers to the Heb. yayin as the general designation of "wine" (Mat. ix. 17 thrice; Mk. iv. 22 four times, xv. 23; Lk. i. 15, &c.); sikera is a Grecized form of the Heb. shēchār = "strong drink" (Lk. i. 15 only); ozos = "VINEGAR." The Gr. gleukos, properly sweet wine, A. V. "new wine" (Acts ii. 13 only), could not be new wine in the proper sense, as about eight

<sup>3</sup> Rev. Eli Smith, D. D., the well-known American missionary in Syria (1836-'57), describes the methods of making wine in Mount Lebanon as numerous, but reducible to three classes, viz. (1.) The simple juice of the grape is fermented, without desiccation or boiling; (2.) The juice of the grape is hotted down before fermentation; (3.) The grapes are partially dried in the sun before being pressed. Branded wines, drugged wines, and unfermented wines, all appear to be unknown in Syria and Palestine. "The only form in which the unfermented juice of the grape is preserved is that of dibb, which may be called grape molasses. . . . Wine in Syria is not an article of exportation. Wine-making "is not the most important, but rather the least so, of all the objects for which the vine is cultivated" (Eli Smith, D. D., in B. S. lit. 385 ff.). Rev. Henry A. Homes, formerly (1835-'51) American missionary in Constantinople, describes (in B. S. v. 288 f.) grape syrup or molasses (Ar. dibb; Turkish pekmez) as made by boiling fresh grape-juice or must (purified by calcareous earth, &c.) from five to seven hours in Turkey, and still longer in Syria, the Syrian article becoming so hard that it does not easily run. This dibb, which is sometimes converted into brandy, is never regarded as a boiled wine, but as a sweetening syrup. (HOMES.) Mr. Homes also describes wardak, which is simple boiled must (not purified by any earth, but boiled down to one-fourth), as unfermenting and cooling, and used as a syrup for a beverage, one part of the syrup to from six to fifteen parts of water, and regards this wardak as corresponding with the accounts of certain drinks included by some of the ancients under the appellation "wine."

months must have elapsed between the vintage and the feast of Pentecost, and the context implies that it was a fermented liquor (comp. note <sup>4</sup>). The explanations of the ancient lexicographers lead us to infer that its luscious qualities were due, not to its being recently made, but to its being produced from the very purest juice of the grape.—There can be little doubt that the wines of Palestine varied in quality, and were named after the localities in which they were made. The only wines of which we have special notice, belonged to Syria: these were the wine of HELBOX (Ez. xxvii. 18), and the wine of Lebanon (note <sup>3</sup>), famed for its aroma (Hos. xiv. 7).—Wine was produced on occasions of ordinary hospitality (Gen. xiv. 18), and at festivals, such as marriages (Jn. ii. 3). (BANQUETS; MARRIAGE.) The monuments of ancient Egypt furnish abundant evidence that the people of that country, both male and female, indulged liberally in the use of wine.—Under the Mosaic law wine formed the usual drink-offering that accompanied the daily SACRIFICE (Ex. xxix. 40), the presentation of the FIRST-FRUITS (Lev. xliii. 13), and other offerings (Num. xv. 5). TITHE was to be paid of wine as of other products. The priest was also to receive first-fruits of wine, as of other articles (Deut. xviii. 4; compare Ex. xxii. 29). The priests were prohibited from the use of wine and strong drink before performing the services of the Temple (Lev. x. 9; ABIHU). The NAZARITE was prohibited from the use of wine or strong drink, or even the juice of grapes, during his vow (Num. vi. 3). (RECHABITES.) The use of wine at the PASSOVER was not enjoined by the Law, but had become an established custom, at all events in the post-Babylonian period. The wine was mixed with warm water on these occasions, as implied in the notice of the warming-kettle. Hence in the early Christian Church it was usual to mix the sacramental wine with water. The Pastoral Epistles direct that bishops and deacons shall not be "given to wine" (1 Tim. iii. 3, 8; Tit. ii. 3). St. Paul advises TIMOTHY himself to be no longer an habitual water-drinker, but to take a little wine for his health's sake (1 Tim. v. 23).<sup>4</sup> DRUNK-ARD.

* Wine-fat = wine-vat or wine-press. FAT.

Wine-press. The wine-presses of the Jews consisted of two receptacles or vats placed at different elevations, in the upper one of which the grapes were trodden, while the lower one received the expressed juice. The two vats are mentioned together only in Joel iii. 13 (iv. 13, Heb.):—"The press (Heb. gath) is full: the vats (Heb. pl. yekdhhim) overflow"—the upper vat being full of fruit, the lower one overflowing with the must. The Heb. yekab is similarly applied to the lower vat in Joel ii. 24 (A. V. "fat") and probably in Prov. iii. 10 ("press"), &c. The Heb. gath is also strictly applied to the upper vat in Neh. xiii. 15, and in Lam. i. 15 (A. V. "wine-press" in both), and Is. lxiii. 2 (A. V. "wine-fat"), with Heb. pûrdh (A. V. "wine-press") in a parallel sense in ver. 3. Gesenius regards the Heb. yekab in 2 K. vi. 27 and Job xxiv. 11 ("wine-press" in both) as = the upper vat. The Heb. pûrdh, as used in Hag. ii. 16 (A. V. "press"), probably refers to the contents of a wine-vat, rather than to the press or vat itself.

<sup>4</sup> The great Christian principle of abstaining from that which occasions injury or becomes a stumbling-block to another is thus laid down by the apostle: "It is good neither to eat flesh (SHAMBLE), nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended (OFFEND, TO. 9), or is made weak" (Rom. xiv. 21; comp. 1 Cor. viii. 18).

The two vats were usually dug or hewn out of the solid rock (Is. v. 2, margin; Mat. xxi. 38). Dr. Robinson describes one of these ancient wine-presses in the rock as having the upper vat eight feet square and fifteen inches deep, the other vat two feet lower down and four feet square by three feet deep.

Wis'dom of Sol'o-mon, the (Gr. Sophia Salômôn; Sophia Solomônitos; later, hê Sophia). (This article is abridged from the original of Mr. Westcott.) A. Text. The Book of Wisdom is preserved in Greek (SEPTUAGINT) and Latin (VULGATE) texts, and in subsidiary translations into Syriac, Arabic, and Armenian. (VERSIONS, ANCIENT.) The Greek text is undoubtedly the original. The chief Greek MSS. in which the book is contained are the Sinaitic (S), Alexandrine (A), the Vatican (B), and Ephrem (C). The entire text is preserved in the three former; in the latter, only considerable fragments: viii. 5-xi. 10; xiv. 19-xvii. 18; xviii. 24-xix. 22.—B. Contents. The book has been variously divided, but it seems to fall most naturally into two great divisions: (I.) i.-ix.; (II.) x.-xix.—I. Chapters i.-ix. The doctrine of Wisdom in its spiritual, intellectual, and moral aspects. (1.) i.-v. Wisdom the giver of happiness and immortality. (a.) The conditions of wisdom (i. 1-11); Uprightness of thought (1-5)—Uprightness of word (6-11). (b.) The origin of death (i. 12-ii. 24): Sin (in fact) by man's free will (i. 12-16)—The reasoning of the sensualist (ii. 1-20)—Sin (in source) by the envy of the devil (21-24). (c.) The godly and wicked in life (as mortal) (iii. 1-iv.). In chastisements (iii. 1-10)—In the results of life (iii. 11-iv. 6)—In length of life (7-20). (d.) The godly and wicked after death (v.). The judgment of conscience (1-14);—The judgment of God—On the godly (15, 16)—On the wicked (17-23). (2.) vi.-ix. Wisdom the guide of life. (a.) Wisdom the guide of princes (vi. 1-21): The responsibility of power (1-11)—Wisdom soon found (12-16)—Wisdom the source of true sovereignty (17-21). (b.) The character and realm of wisdom: Open to all (vi. 22-vii. 7)—Pervading all creation (vii. 8-viii. 1)—Swaying all life (viii. 2-17). (c.) Wisdom the gift of God (viii. 17-ix.). Prayer for wisdom (ix.). II. Chapters x.-xix. The doctrine of Wisdom in its historical aspects. (1.) Wisdom a power to save and chastise. (a.) Wisdom seen in the guidance of God's people from Adam to Moses (x.-xi. 4). (b.) Wisdom seen in the punishment of God's enemies (xi. 5-xii.). The Egyptians (xi. 5-xii. 1)—The Canaanites (xii. 5-28)—The lesson of mercy and judgment (19-27). (2.) The growth of idolatry the opposite to wisdom. (a.) The worship of nature (xiii. 1-9). (b.) The worship of images (xiii. 10-xiv. 18). (c.) The worship of defiled men (xiv. 14-21). (d.) The moral effects of idolatry (xiv. 22-31)—(3.) The contrast between true worshippers and idolaters (xv.-xix.). (a.) The general contrast (xv. 1-17). (b.) The special contrast at the Exodus: The action of beasts (xv. 18-xvi. 13)—The action of the forces of nature—water, fire (xvi. 14-29)—The symbolic darkness (xvii.-xviii. 4)—The action of death (xviii. 5-25)—The powers of nature changed in their working to save and destroy (xix. 1-21)—Conclusion (xix. 21).—C. Unity and Integrity. The book forms a complete and harmonious whole. But the distinct treatment of the subject, theoretically and historically, in two parts, has given occasion for the maintenance by Houbigant, Eichhorn, Bretschneider, Bertholdt, &c., that it is the work of two or more authors. The idea (Grotius, Grätz) that the book has been interpolated by a Christian hand is as little worthy of consideration as the idea (Eichhorn, Grotius, &c.) that it is incomplete.—D. Style and Language. In the richness and freedom of its vocabulary it most closely resembles the fourth Book of Maccabees, but it is superior to that in power and variety of diction. No existing work represents perhaps more completely the style of composition produced by the sophistic schools of rhetoric, and hence the effect of different parts of the book is very unequal. The florid redundancy and restless straining after effect, which may be not unsuited to vivid intellectual pictures, is wholly alien from the philosophic contemplation of history. The magnificent description of Wisdom (vii. 22–viii. 1) must rank among the noblest passages of human eloquence. Examples of strange or new words may be found on almost every page.—E. Original Language. The book was once supposed to be the work of Solomon, yet its style and language show conclusively that it was written in Greek, not translated from any Hebrew or Aramaic text (see H, below).—F. Doctrinal character. The theological teaching of the book offers, in many respects, the nearest approach to the language and doctrines of Greek philosophy which is found in any Jewish writing up to the time of Philo. Thus, in speaking of the almighty power of God, the writer describes Him as “having created the universe out of matter without form” (Wis. xi. 17), adopting the very phrase of the Platonists, found also in Philo. Scarcely less distinctly heathen is the conception of the body as a mere weight and clog to the soul (ix. 15; contrast 2 Cor. v. 1–4). The preexistence of souls finds expression in Wis. viii. 20. The writer represents the Spirit of God as filling (i. 7) and inspiring all things (xii. 1), but even here the idea of “a soul of the world” seems to influence his thoughts. There is no trace of the Christian doctrine of a resurrection of the body; and the future triumph of the good is entirely unconnected with any revelation of a personal Messiah (iii. 7, 8, v. 16). The identification of the tempter (Gen. iii.), directly or indirectly, with the devil, as the bringer “of death into the world” (Wis. ii. 23, 24), is the most remarkable development of Biblical doctrine which the book contains. It is in this point that the Pseudo-Solomon differs most widely from Philo, who recognizes no such evil power in the world. The subsequent deliverance of Adam from his transgression is attributed to wisdom—not the scheme of Divine Providence, but that wisdom given by God to man, which is immortality (viii. 17). There are few traces of the recognition of the sinfulness even of the wise man in his wisdom, which forms, in the Psalms and the Prophets, the basis of the Christian doctrine of the atonement (yet compare xv. 2). A typical significance is assumed to underlie the historic details of the O. T. (xvi. 1, xviii. 4, 5, &c.). In connection with the O. T. Scriptures, the book, as a whole, may be regarded as carrying on one step further the great problem of life contained in ECCLESIASTES and JOB.—G. The doctrine of Wisdom. It would be impossible to trace here in detail the progressive development of the doctrine of Wisdom, as a Divine Power standing in some sense between the Creator and creation, yet without some idea of this history no correct opinion can be formed on the position of this book in Jewish literature. The foundation of the doctrine is to be found in Prov. viii., where Wisdom is represented as present with God before (22) and during the creation of the world. By the personification of Wisdom, and the relation of Wisdom to men (31), a preparation is made for the extension of the doctrine. In Ecclus. xxiv. Wisdom is represented as a creation of God (9), penetrating the whole universe (4–6), and taking up her special abode with the chosen people (8–12). Her personal existence and providential function are thus distinctly brought out. In the Book of Wisdom the conception gains yet further completeness. In this, Wisdom is identified with the Spirit of God (Wis. ix. 17). She is the power which unites (i. 7) and directs all things (viii. 1). By her, in especial, men have fellowship with God (xii. 1). Her working, in the providential history of God's people, is traced at length (x.); and her power is declared to reach beyond the world of man into that of spirits (vi. 23). The conception of Wisdom, however boldly personified, yet leaves a wide chasm between the world and the Creator. Wisdom answers to the idea of a spirit vivifying and uniting all things in all time, as distinguished from any special outward revelation of the Divine Person. Thus at the same time that the doctrine of Wisdom was gradually constructed, the correlative doctrine of the Divine Word was also reduced to a definite shape. The Word (Logos), the Divine expression, as it was understood in Palestine, furnished the exact complement to Wisdom, the Divine thought. Broadly, the Word properly represented the mediative element in the action of God, Wisdom the mediative element of His omnipresence. The Book of the Pseudo-Solomon, which gives the most complete view of Divine wisdom, contains only two passages in which the Word is invested with the attributes of personal action (xvi. 12, xviii. 15; ix. 1 is of different character). These, however, are sufficient to indicate that the two powers were distinguished by the writer; and it has been commonly argued that the superior prominence given in the book to the conception of Wisdom is an indication of a date anterior to Philo. The doctrine of the Divine wisdom passes by a transition, often imperceptible, to that of human wisdom, which is derived from it. This embraces not only the whole range of moral and spiritual virtues, but also the various branches of physical knowledge. (PHILOSOPHY.) In this aspect, the enumeration of the great forms of natural science in vii. 17–20 (viii. 8) offers a most instructive subject of comparison with the corresponding passages in 1 K. iv. 32–34.—H. Place and date of writing. It seems most reasonable to believe that the book was composed at ALEXANDRIA some time before the time of Philo (about 120–80 B. C.). Alexandria was the only place where Judaism and philosophy, both of the East and West, came into natural and close connection. The mode in which Egyptian idolatry is spoken of indicates present and living antagonism. It may, indeed, be said justly, that the local coloring of the latter part of the book is conclusive as to the place of its composition. But all the guesses as to its authorship are absolutely valueless. The earliest, mentioned by Jerome, assigned it to Philo. Lutterbeck suggested ARISTOBULES. Eichhorn, Zeller, Jost, &c., supposed the author one of the Therapeutæ. Some later critics have held that the book is of Christian origin, or even definitely the work of Apollon.—I. History. The history of the book is extremely obscure. There is no trace of the use of it before the Christian era.

On the other hand, it can scarcely be doubted that St. Paul, if not other apostolic writers, was familiar with its language, though he makes no definite quotation from it (the supposed reference in Lk. xi. 49 to Wis. ii. 12-14 is wholly unfounded). Thus we have striking parallels in Rom. ix. 21 to Wis. xv. 7; in Rom. ix. 22 to Wis. xii. 20; in Eph. vi. 13-17 to Wis. v. 17-19 (the heavenly armor), &c. It may be questioned whether his acquaintance with the book may not have been gained rather orally than by direct study. The first clear references to the book occur not earlier than the close of the second century. According to Eusebius, Irenæus made use of it in a lost work, and in a passage of his great work (against Heresies) Irenæus silently adopts a characteristic clause from it (Wis. vi. 19). From the time of Clement of Alexandria the book is constantly quoted as an inspired work of Solomon, or as "Scripture," even by those Fathers who denied its assumed authorship, and it gained a place in the CANON (with the other apocryphal books; APOCRYPHA) at the Council of Carthage, about A. D. 397. From this time its history is the same as that of the other apocryphal books up to the period of the Reformation. (VULGATE.) It furnishes for the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church of America several lessons for church-festivals.

* Witness. Among people with whom writing is not common (EDUCATION), or who for any reason do not have permanent offices or courts of record, the evidence of a transaction is often given by some tangible memorial or significant ceremony. Abraham gave seven ewe-lambs to Abimelech as an evidence of his property in the well of Beer-sheba. Jacob raised a heap of stones as a boundary-mark between himself and Laban (Gen. xxi. 30, xxxi. 47, 52). The tribes of Reuben and Gad raised an "altar" as a witness to the covenant between themselves and the rest of the nation; Joshua set up a stone as an evidence of the allegiance promised by Israel to God (Josh. xxii. 10, 26, 34, xxiv. 26, 27). Thus also symbolical usages, in ratification of contracts, or completed arrangements, &c., as the ceremony of shoe-loosing (Deut. xxv. 9, 10; Ru. iv. 7, 8; MARRIAGE), the ordeal prescribed in the case of a suspected wife (Num. v. 17-31; ADULTERY), the ceremony at offering FIRST-FRUIITS, &c.—But written evidence was by no means unknown to the Jews. Divorce was to be proved by a written document (Deut. xxiv. 1, 3). In civil contracts, at least in later times, documentary evidence was required and carefully preserved (Is. viii. 16; Jer. xxxii. 10-16).—The Law was very careful to provide and enforce evidence for all its infractions and all transactions bearing on them (Num. xv. 32, 40, xvi. 38; Deut. xix. 14, xxvii. 2-4, 17; Josh. iv. 9, viii. 30; Prov. xxii. 28; ARK OF THE COVENANT; TESTIMONY). Special provisions with respect to evidence are—1. Two witnesses at least are required to establish any charge (Num. xxxv. 30; Deut. xvii. 6; Jn. viii. 17; 2 Cor. xiii. 1; Heb. x. 28; compare 1 Tim. v. 19). 2. In the case of the suspected wife, evidence besides the husband's was desired (Num. v. 13). 3. The witness who withheld the truth was censured (Lev. v. 1). 4. False witness was punished as the offence which it sought to establish. (OATH; PUNISHMENTS.) 5. Slandorous reports and officious witness are discouraged (Ex. xx. 16, xxiii. 1; Lev. xix. 16, 18, &c.). 6. The witnesses were the first executioners (Deut. xiii. 9, xvi. 7; Acts vii. 58). 7. In case of an animal left in charge and torn by wild beasts, the keeper was to bring the carcass in proof of the fact and disproof of his own criminality (Ex. xxii. 13). 8. According to Josephus, women and slaves were not admitted to bear testimony (Jos. iv. 8, § 15).—In the N. T. the original notion of a witness is exhibited in the special form of one who attests his belief in the Gospel by personal suffering (Acts xxii. 20; Rev. ii. 13, &c.; MARTYR). JUDGE; TRIAL.

* Wolf (Heb. zēb; Gr. lukos), a fierce and rapacious animal (Gen. xlix. 27; Ez. xxii. 27; Hab. i. 8; Mat. vii. 15), which prowls at night (Jer. v. 6; Zeph. iii. 3, &c.), and is especially destructive to sheep and lambs (Mat. x. 16; Lk. x. 3; Jn. x. 12). Isaiah (xi. 6, lxxv. 25) foretells the peaceful reign of the MESSIAH under the metaphor of a wolf dwelling with a lamb; cruel persecutors are compared with wolves (Mat. x. 16; Acts xx. 29). There can be little doubt (so Mr. Houghton) that the wolf of Palestine is the common wolf (Canis Lupus), and that this is the animal so frequently mentioned in the Bible, though we lack precise information with regard to the canine animals of Palestine. (Dog; Fox.) Col. Hamilton Smith mentions, under the name of derboun, a species of black wolf, as occurring in Arabia and Southern Syria. Wolves were doubtless far more common in Biblical times than they are now, though they are occasionally seen by modern travellers.

* Wom'an [o as in wolf], pl. Wom'en [wim'en] (Heb. usually ishshāh, sometimes nekebāh [commonly translated "female"]; Gr. usually gunē, thēleia [= female] only in Rom. i. 26, 27). The position of women in the Hebrew commonwealth contrasts favorably with that now generally assigned to them in Eastern countries.<sup>1</sup> The most salient point of contrast in the usages of ancient as compared with modern Oriental society was the large amount of liberty enjoyed by women. Instead of being immured in a barem, or appearing in public with the face covered, the wives and maidens of ancient times mingled freely and openly with the other sex in the duties and amenities of ordinary life. Rebekah travelled on a camel with her face unveiled, until she came into the presence of her affianced (Gen. xxiv. 64, 65). Jacob saluted Rachel with a kiss in the presence of the shepherds (xxix. 11). Women played no inconsiderable part in public celebrations (Ex. xv. 20, 21; Judg. xi. 34, &c.; DANCE). The odes of DEBORAH (Judg. v.) and of HANNAH (1 Sam. ii. 1, &c.) exhibit a degree of intellectual cultivation which is in itself a proof of the position of the sex in that period. Women also occasionally held public offices, particularly that of PROPHETESS or inspired teacher (Ex. xv. 20; Judg. iv. 4; 2 K. xxii. 14; Neh. vi. 14; Lk. ii. 36; ATHALIAH; JEZEDEL).—The management of household affairs devolved mainly on the women. The value of a virtuous and active housewife forms a frequent topic in the Book of Proverbs (xi. 16, xii. 4, xiv. 1, xxxi. 10 ff.). Her influence was of course proportionably great. The effect of polygamy was to transfer female influence from the wives to the MOTHER. (QUEEN.) Polygamy also necessitated a separate establishment for the wives collectively, or for each individually. ADAM; ADULTERY; BANQUETS; CHILD; CONCUBINE; CREATION; DAUGHTER; DEACONESS; DIVORCE; DRESS; EDUCATION; EYE; FOREHEAD; FOUNTAIN; HAIR; HEAD-DRESS; MAN; MARRIAGE; MEALS; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL; PATRIARCH; PURIFICATION; SLAVE; VEIL; WIDOW.

Wood. AGRICULTURE; ARCHITECTURE; COAL; FESTIVALS II.; FIRE; FOREST; OAK; PALESTINE, &c.

Wool (Heb. tsemer; Chal. 'amar; Gr. erion). Wool was an article of the highest value among the Jews, as the staple material for the manufacture of clothing (Lev. xiii. 47; Deut. xxii. 11; Job xxxi. 20; Prov. xxxi. 13; Ez. xxxiv. 3; Hos. ii. 5). The "fleece" (Heb. géz, gizdák) is mentioned in Deut. xviii. 4, and in Judg. vi. 37 ff. and Job xxxi. 20. The importance of wool is shown by Mesha's tribute of rams "with the wool" (2 K. iii. 4), and by its being specified with the first-fruits to be offered to the priests (Deut. xviii. 4). The wool of Damascus was highly prized in the mart of Tyre (Ez. xxvii. 18). Wool is an image of purity and brilliancy (Is. i. 18; Dan. vii. 9; Rev. i. 14). DRESS; HANDICRAFT; SHEEP; SPINNING; WEAVING; WOOLLEN.

Wool'en, or Wool'en (Lin'en, and). Among the laws against unnatural mixtures is found one to this effect: "Neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woollen come upon thee" (Lev. xix. 19); or, as in Deut. xxii. 11, "thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts, as of woollen and linen together." The same Heb. word (sha'atnéz) is translated in Leviticus "of linen and woollen," and in Deuteronomy "a garment of divers sorts." The word sha'atnéz is foreign, but its origin is uncertain. Its signification is sufficiently defined in Deut. xxii. 11. Jablonski

East the case was and is different, for she retains her name and property (both real and personal), she can carry on business and obtain legal redress for wrongs done her by her husband or by others. In Mohammedan countries the Koran is the basis of civil law as the Pentateuch (Law or Moses) was in the Hebrew commonwealth; but the common law of England and the United States is derived from the Roman law, and to a great extent ignores the claims of morality and religion. MARRIAGE IV.

favors Forster's suggestion that a garment of linen and woollen was called by the Egyptians sa'outnez, and that this word was borrowed by the Hebrews, and written sha'atnéz. The reason given by Josephus (iv. 8, § 11) for the law against wearing a garment woven of linen and woollen is, that such were worn by the priests alone. Maimonides found in the books of the ancient Zabii that the priests of the idolaters clothed themselves with robes of linen and woollen mixed together. Probably the law was based on some relation of the prohibited mixtures to impurity or idolatry.

* Word in the general sense (= something spoken, a saying, the expression or sign of an idea) often occurs in the A. V. as the translation of the Heb. émer, ómer, inráh, dabar, milláh, &c., and of the Gr. logos and réma. But in Jn. i. 1, 14 is a special application of the Gr. logos, A. V. "Word," to the Lord JESUS CHRIST, or rather to His preëxistent Divine nature. In Jn. i. 1-14 He is declared to be closely united with God, and Himself Divine, the Creator of all things, the Author and Source of all life, spiritual as well as physical, the Incarnate God. The same term is also applied to Jesus Christ in 1 Jn. i. 1, v. 7 (according to the A. V., and the Received Greek text), and Rev. xix. 13. The precise meaning of the Gr. logos in this application is a matter of dispute. Some make it = the promised one; others, the teacher; others, the author of the word, &c. Perhaps the revealer is sufficiently exact. The origin of this application of the term has also been much discussed. It is well known that in the O. T. "the word of the LORD" is sometimes personified or = Jehovah Himself (Gen. xv. 1 ff.; 1 K. xiii. 9, 17, &c.)—that the Targums (VERSIONS, ANCIENT [TARGUM]) often used the Chal. méymará dí Yehováh (= the word of Jehovah), &c., instead of the simple Divine title JEHOVAH ("LORD," A. V.), &c.—that the "wisdom" of God is personified (Prov. viii.; Wis. vii. 21 ff.; Eccles. xxiv.)—that Philo represents in a peculiar way the distinction between God revealed and God concealed, connecting, if not identifying, the "wisdom" with the "word" (logos) of God. See ALEXANDRIA; PHILOSOPHY; WISDOM OF SOLOMON; Prof. Stuart in B. S. vii. 13 ff., 281 ff., 696 ff.; Rbn. N. T. Lex., &c.

* World, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. erets (Ps. xxii. 27 [Heb. 28]; Is. xxiii. 17), usually and properly translated "earth" or "land." (EARTH 1)—2. Heb. hedel or chedel = place of rest, region of the dead, hades, Ges., Fu. (Is. xxxviii. 11 only).—3. Heb. heled or cheled = this world as fleeting, transient, vain, Ges. (Ps. xvii. 14, xlix. 1 [Heb. 2]); elsewhere translated "age" (Job xi. 17; Ps. xxxix. 5 [Heb. 6]), or "time" (Lxxix. 47 [Heb. 48]).—4. Heb. 'ólám (Ps. lxxiii. 12; Eccl. iii. 11; [in phrases] Is. xlv. 17 [A. V. "world without end"] and lxiv. 4 [Heb. 3, A. V. "the beginning of the world"]), usually translated "for ever" or "everlasting." (ETERNAL 1; ETERNITY).—5. Heb. tsébel = the earth, as fertile and inhabited, the habitable globe, world; also often the whole earth, the world in general, Ges. (1 Sam. ii. 8; 2 Sam. xxii. 16, and 33 other passages; compare No. 10 below), once (followed by No. 1) "the habitable part" of his earth (Prov. viii. 31).—6. Gr. aion (Mat. xii. 32, xiii. 22, 39, 40, 49, &c.; ETERNAL 4).—7. Gr. adj. aiónios in the phrases "before (or 'since' the world began" (Rom. xvi. 25; 2 Tim. i. 9; Tit. i. 2; ETERNAL 5).—8. Gr. gē (Rev. xiii. 3 only, put for the inhabitants of the earth), usually and correctly translated "EARTH" or "land."—9. Gr. kosmos, primarily (so Rbn. N. T.

Lex.) = order, i. e. regular disposition and arrangement; hence in N. T. (1.) decoration, ornament (1 Pet. iii. 3 only in this sense, A. V. "adorning"); (2.) order of the universe, the world, so used by Pythagoras and subsequent philosophers; hence (a.) Generally, the world, the universe, the heavens and earth (Mat. xiii. 35, xxiv. 21, &c.), by metonymy the inhabitants of the universe (1 Cor. iv. 9), and tropically an aggregate or congeries of any thing, as "a world of iniquity" (Jas. iii. 6); (b.) By synecdoche, the earth, this lower world, as the abode of man (Mat. iv. 8; Mk. xvi. 15; Jn. i. 9, iii. 17, 19, &c.), and by metonymy the inhabitants of the earth or mankind (Mat. v. 14, xiii. 38, &c.); (c.) In the Jewish mode of speaking, the present world, the present order of things, as opposed to the kingdom of Christ, and hence as transient, worthless, evil, troubled, though having its pleasures and good things (Mat. xvi. 26; Jn. xii. 25, &c.), and by metonymy the men of this world, worldlings (vii. 7, xii. 31 twice, &c.). This word occurs in N. T. nearly 200 times, and is uniformly translated "world," except in 1 Pet. iii. 3 (see above).—10. Gr. oikoumenē = (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) the inhabited earth, the world, i. e. (1.) In Greek usage, as inhabited by Greeks, opposed to barbarian lands, and hence in N. T. the Roman world, the Roman empire (Lk. ii. 1; Acts xi. 28 [these two passages probably refer chiefly to the regions in and around Palestine, Rbn.], xvii. 6, xxiv. 5); (2.) Generally, in later usage, the habitable globe, the earth, the world, as known to the ancients (Mat. xxiv. 14; Lk. iv. 5 [hyperbolically], xxi. 26; Rom. x. 18; Heb. i. 6; Rev. xvi. 14), and by metonymy the inhabitants of the earth, mankind (Acts xvii. 31, xix. 27; Rev. iii. 10, xii. 9), also once tropically in the phrase "the world to come" (Heb. ii. 5), i. e. the kingdom of Christ in its full development after the day of judgment (compare ETERNAL, 4 c). This word in LXX. is used for No. 1, and especially for No. 5.

Worm, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. sās (Is. li. 8 only), probably = some particular species of moth, whose larva is injurious to wool.—2. Heb. rimmāh (Ex. xvi. 24; Job vii. 5, xvii. 14, xxi. 26, xxiv. 20, xxv. 6 a; Is. xiv. 11 a). The Hebrew word points evidently to various sorts of maggots, and the larvæ of insects which feed on putrefying animal matter, rather than to earthworms.—3. Heb. tōl'd (Ex. xvi. 20), tōl'āh and tōl'a'āh (Deut. xxviii. 39; Job xxv. 6 b; Ps. xxii. 6 [Heb. 7]); Is. xiv. 11 b, xli. 14, lxvi. 24; Jon. iv. 7). The Heb. rimmāh and tōl'āh are clearly used indiscriminately to denote either true worms (Annelidæ), or the larval condition of various insects. (Colors, II. 3.) Job xxv. 6 compares the estate of man to a rimmāh, and the son of man to a tōl'āh. This latter is applied in Deut. xxviii. 39 to some sorts of larvæ destructive to the vines. Of the various insects which attack the vine, one of the most destructive is a species of moth (Tortrix vitinana), the little caterpillar of which eats off the inner parts of the blossoms, the clusters of which it binds together by spinning a web around them.—4. Gr. skólēx = (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) a worm, feeding on dead bodies (Mk. ix. 44, 46, 48); in LXX. = No. 3. The death of Herod Agrippa I. was caused by worms (Acts xii. 23, Gr. skōlēkobrōlos, A. V. literally "eaten of worms"); according to Josephus (xix. 8), his death took place five days after his departure from the theatre. Whether the worms were the cause or the result of the disease is an immaterial question. MEDICINE.

Worm'wood (Heb. la'āndh; Gr. apsinthos), a bitter plant, or rather the name common to several species of aromatic and bitter plants of the genus Artemisia. The word occurs frequently in the Bible, and generally in a metaphorical sense (Deut. xxix. 18 [Heb. 17]; Prov. v. 4; Jer. ix. 15 [Heb. 14], xxiii. 15; Lam. iii. 15, 19; Am. v. 7 [in vi. 12 the A. V. has "hemlock" for la'āndh]; Rev. viii. 11 twice). The Orientals typified sorrows, cruelties, and calamities of any kind by plants of a poisonous or bitter nature. (GALL.) Kitto (Physical History of Palestine, p. 215) enumerates four kinds of wormwood as found in Palestine—Artemisia Nilotica, Artemisia Judaica, Artemisia fruticosa, and Artemisia cinerea.

* Worship. ADORATION; ALTAR; GOD; IDOL; IDOLATRY; MINISTER; PRAYER; PRIEST; SACRIFICE, &c.

Worship-er or Worship-per = one who renders worship or adoration, as to BAAL (2 K. x. 19 ff.) or to GOD (Jn. iv. 23, ix. 31; Heb. x. 2). In Acts xix. 35 only is it the A. V. translation of the Gr. neōkoros (margin "temple-keeper"; literally temple-sweeper), originally an attendant in a temple, probably intrusted with its charge, but afterward applied to cities or communities which undertook the worship of particular gods, and even of emperors during their lives. The first occurrence of the term in connection with EPHESUS is on coins of the age of Nero (A. D. 54–68).

* Worth is used in the A. V., as now, to indicate value or equality in value (Gen. xxiii. 9, 15; 1 K. xxi. 2, &c.); once as a verb in the phrase "Woe worth the day!" (Ez. xxx. 2), i. e. woe be to the day! Let woe befall the day!

* Wot, to = to know, to have knowledge (Gen. xxi. 26, xxxix. 8, xlv. 15, &c.). WIT, to.

Writing. It is remarkable that although the Hebrews have assigned the discovery of other arts, e. g. of music and metal working, to the heroes of a remote antiquity, there is no trace or tradition whatever of the origin of letters. The Book of Genesis has not a single allusion, direct or indirect, either to the practice or to the existence of writing. (SEAL.) That the Egyptians, in the time of Joseph, were acquainted with writing of a certain kind there is other evidence to prove, but there is nothing to show that up to this period the knowledge extended to the Hebrew family (so Mr. Wright). At the same time there is no evidence against it. Writing is first distinctly mentioned in Ex. xvii. 14, and the connection clearly implies that it was then so familiar as to be used for historic records, Moses being commanded to preserve the memory of Amalek's onslaught in the desert by committing it to writing. The tables of the testimony are said to be "written by the finger of God" (Ex. xxxi. 18) on both sides, and "the writing was the writing of God, graven upon the tables" (xxxii. 15). The engraving of the gems of the high-priest's breast-plate with the names of the children of Israel (xxviii. 11) and the inscription upon the mitre (xxxix. 30) have to do more with the art of the ENGRAVER than of the writer, but both imply the existence of alphabetic characters. The curses against the adulteress were written by the priest "in the book;" and blotted out with water (Num. v. 23). This proceeding, though principally distinguished by its symbolical character, involves the use of some kind of ink, and of a material on which the curses were written, which would not be destroyed by water. Hitherto, however, nothing has been said of the application of writing to the purposes of ordinary life, or of the knowledge of the art among the common people. Up to this point such knowledge is only attributed to Moses and the priests. From Deut. xxiv. 1, 3, however—"let him (the husband) write her a bill of divorcement" (DIVORCE)—it would appear that it was extended to others. It is not absolutely necessary to infer from this that the art of writing was an accomplishment possessed by every Hebrew citizen, though there is no mention of a third party; and it is more than probable (so Mr. Wright) that these "bills of divorcement," though apparently so informal, were the work of professional SCRIBES. It was one of the king's duties (Deut. xvii. 18) to transcribe the book of the Law for his own private study. If we examine the instances in which writing is mentioned in connection with individuals (Deut. xxvii. 3, 8, xxxi. 22, 24; Josh. viii. 32, xviii. 8; Judg. v. 14; 1 Sam. x. 25; 2 Sam. xi. 14, 15; 1 Chr. xxix. 29; 2 Chr. ix. 29, xii. 15, xiii. 22, xx. 34; EPISTLE), we shall find that in all cases the writers were men of superior position (so Mr. Wright). In Is. xxix. 11, 12, a distinction is drawn between the man who was able to read, and the man who was not, and Mr. Wright regards it as a natural inference that the accomplishments of reading and writing, though possessed by the Hebrews at a very early period, were not widely spread among the people, especially when we find that they are universally attributed to those of high rank or education, kings, priests, prophets, and professional scribes. (EDUCATION; KIRJATH-SEPPER; WITNESS.)—Recent investigations have shown that the square character of the Hebrews is of comparatively modern date, and has been formed from a more ancient type by a gradual process of development. (OLD TESTAMENT, A, I.; SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH; SEMITIC LANGUAGES.) What, then, was this ancient type? Most probably the Phœnician. To the PHœNICIANS tradition assigned the honor of the invention of letters.

Pliny was of opinion that letters were of Assyrian origin, but he mentions as a belief held by others that they were discovered among the Egyptians by Mercury, or that the Syrians had the honor of the invention. Diodorus Siculus says that the Syrians invented letters, and from them the Phœnicians having learned them, transferred them to the Greeks. On the other hand, according to Tacitus (Annals, xi. 14), Egypt was believed to be the source whence the Phœnicians got their knowledge. It may be reasonably inferred that the ancient Hebrews derived from, or shared with, the Phœnicians the knowledge of writing and the use of letters. The names of the Hebrew letters indicate (so Mr. Wright, &c.) that they must have been the invention of a Semitic people. They contain no trace whatever of ships or seafaring matters; on the contrary, they point distinctly to an inland and pastoral people. Perhaps all that can be inferred from the tradition that letters came to the Greeks from the Phœnicians, but that they were the invention of the Egyptians, is that the Egyptians possessed an alphabet before the Phœnicians. Gesenius argues for a Phœnician origin of the alphabet, in opposition to a Babylonian or Aramean, because—1. The names of the letters are Phœnician, and not Syrian. 2. It is not probable that the Aramaic dialect was the language of the inventors; for the letters א (aleph), ב (bet), ג (gimel), ד (daleth), which to them were certainly consonants, had become so weak in the Aramaic that they could scarcely any longer appear as such, and could not have been expressed by signs by an inventor who spoke a dialect of this kind. 3. If the Phœnician letters are pictorial, as there seems reason to believe, there is no model, among the old Babylonian discoverers of writing, after which they could have been formed. But whether or not the Phœnicians were the inventors of the Semitic alphabet, there can be no doubt of their just claim to being its chief disseminators; and with this understanding we may accept the genealogy of alphabets as given by Gesenius, and exhibited in the accompanying table.

Whatever minor differences may exist between the ancient and more modern Semitic alphabets, they have two chief characteristics in common:—1. That they contain only consonants and the three principal long vowels, א (aleph, a), ב (bet, b), ג (gimel, g), the other vowels being represented by signs above, below, or in the middle of letters, or being omitted altogether. 2. That they are written from right to left. The Ethiopic, being perhaps a non-Semitic alphabet, is an exception to this rule, as is the cuneiform character in which some Semitic inscriptions are found.—The old Semitic alphabets may be divided into two principal classes: 1. The Phœnician, as it exists (a) in the inscriptions in Cyprus, Malta, Carpentras, and the coins of Phœnicia and her colonies; distinguished by an absence of vowels, and by having the words sometimes divided and sometimes not. (b) In the inscriptions on Jewish coins. (MONEY.) (c) In the Phœnicio-Egyptian writing, with three vowel signs, deciphered by Caylus on the mummy bandages. From (a) are derived (d), the Samaritan character, and (e), the Greek. 2. The Hebrew-Chaldee character; to which belong (a), the Hebrew square character; (b), the

Palmyrene, which has some traces of a cursive hand; (e), the Estrangelo, or ancient Syriac; and (d), the ancient Arabic or Cufic. The oldest Arabic writing (the Himyaritic) was perhaps the same as the ancient Hebrew or Phœnician.—Arguments that the Samaritan character is older than the square Hebrew are derived from the existence of the SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, from the names of the letters and the correspondence of their forms to their names in the Phœnician and Phœnicio-Samaritan alphabets, and from the fact that the Phœnician alphabet can be traced much further back than the square character, the latter not being found on historic monuments before the birth of Christ. Gesenius (in article Paläographie, in Ersch & Gruber's Encyclopædie) concludes as most probable that the ancient Hebrew was first changed for the square character about the birth of Christ. Hupfeld maintains that the original alphabet was invented by the Babylonians and extended by the Phœnicians, and that from this the square character was developed by three stages: (1.) In its oldest form it appears on Phœnician monuments, stones, and coins. Closely allied with it are the characters on the Maccabean coins (MONEY) and the Samaritan alphabet. (2.) The old writing underwent a gradual transformation among its original inventors, the Arameans, especially those of the West (Palmyrenes, &c.; see SEMITIC LANGUAGES). (3.) A similar and simultaneous process of change went on in the old character among the Jews, and thus it became an angular, uniform, broken, "square" character. Hupfeld rejects altogether the theory of an abrupt change of character.—It is evident that in the fourth century A. C. the square character was substantially the same as now, that the Hebrew letters were then called by their present names, and that the change of character, even in Origen's time (A. D. 185–254) was an event already long past, and was attributed in the common legend to Ezra, or by most of the Talmudists to God Himself. Mat. v. 18, generally brought forward as a proof that the square character must have been in existence in the time of Christ, who mentions iota, or yod ("Jor"), as the smallest letter of the alphabet, proves at least that the old Hebrew or Phœnician character was no longer in use, but that the Palmyrene character, or one very much like it, had been introduced. Mr. Wright supposes it was probably about the first or second century after Christ that the square character assumed its present form.—The Alphabet. The oldest evidence on the subject of the Hebrew alphabet is derived from the alphabetical Psalms and poems (Ps. xxv., xxxiv., xxxvii., cxi., cxli., cxlv.; Prov. xxxi. 10–31; Lam. i.–iv.). From these we ascertain that the number of the letters was twenty-two, as at present. The Arabic alphabet originally consisted of the same number. It has been argued by many that the alphabet of the Phœnicians at first consisted of sixteen letters, or according to Hug of fifteen, י, כ, ג, ד, ה, ז, being omitted. The legend, as told by Pliny, is that Cadmus brought with him into Greece sixteen letters; at the time of the Trojan war Palamedes added four others, Θ, Ξ, Φ, Χ, and Simonides of Melos four more, Ζ, Η, Ψ, Ω. Aristotle recognized eighteen letters of the original alphabet, Α Β Γ Δ Ε Ζ Ι Κ Λ Μ Ν Ο Π Ρ Σ Τ Φ, to which Θ and Χ were added by Epicharmus. But in the oldest story of Cadmus, as told by Herodotus and Diodorus, nothing is said of the number of the letters. Recent investigations, however, have rendered it probable that at first the Shemitic alphabet consisted of but sixteen letters. It is true that no extant monuments illustrate the period when the alphabet was thus curtailed, but the theory is based upon an organic arrangement first proposed by Lepsius, and, according to Dr. Donaldson, makes "four classes, each consisting of four letters: the first and second classes consist each of three mutes preceded by a breathing, the third of the three liquids and the sibilant, which perhaps closed the oldest alphabet of all, and the fourth contains the three supernumerary mutes preceded by a breathing." The original sixteen letters of the Greek alphabet, corresponding to those of the Shemitic, are thus given by Dr. Donaldson:

Α	Β	Γ	Δ	Ε	Ζ	Η	Θ	Λ	Μ	Ν	Ξ	Ο	Π	Ρ	Τ

"In the Greek alphabet, as it is now given in the grammars, F and Q are omitted, and ten other characters added to these."—The following are the letters of the Hebrew alphabet in their present shape, with their names, probable meanings, and English representatives, as employed in the A. V., and in this Dictionary:—

א, ALEPH (= an ox). The old Phœnician forms have some resemblance to an ox-head, .

This Heb. letter being a light breathing, is not represented by any corresponding English letter. Gr. ALPHA (Α) = α.

ב, BETH (= a house) = Eng. b. The figure in the square character corresponds more to its name, while the Ethiopic  has greater resemblance to a tent. Gr. Beta (Β) = β.

ג, GIMEL (= a camel) = Eng. g. The ancient form is supposed to represent the head and neck of this animal. In Phœnician it is ; in Ethiopic ; in Gr. Gamma (Γ) = γ.

ו, VAU (= a hook or tent-peg) = v. The old Greek equivalent, Bau (Ϝ), or Digamma, resembles the Phœnician .

ז, ZAIN (= a weapon) = z. It appears to be the same as the ancient Gr. San (afterward disused).

ח, CHETH (= a fence, enclosure), rarely represented in the A. V. by ch (as in Achmetha, Cheth, Rachel), but usually by h (as in Habakkuk, Hadad, Haggai, Ham, Hamath, Hananiah, &c., &c.); commonly written ch by Germans, and uniformly written h or ch in this Dictionary. Comp. the Phœnician . Cheth is the Gr. Eta (Η) = e long.

ט, TETH (= a snake, Ges.; or a basket, Fū.) = Gr. Theta (Θ) = th.

י, JOD (= a hand), properly = y or i (as in Abiel,

- Ariel, Sinai, &c.), but often written j (as in Hallelujah, Jebus, Jehovah, Jod, and most proper names beginning with J), or with both i and j in the same word (as in Abijah, Ahijah, &c.). The form of the letter was perhaps originally longer, as in the Greek Iota (I) = i. Phenician  $\text{𐤇}$ ; Samaritan  $\text{𐤇}$ .
- 𐤇, or (when final)  $\text{𐤇}$ , CAPH (= the hollow of the hand) = c (as in Caleb, Carmel, Cush, &c.) or ch (as in Achan, Achbor, Achish, &c.); often in A. V. written ch in the beginning of a word, when c hard or k might represent it (as in Chalcol, Cherub, Chittim, Chozeba, &c.); represented in this Dictionary by c, or (if aspirated) by ch. The Gr. Kappa (K = Eng. k) is the old Phenician form ( $\text{𐤇}$ ) reversed.
- 𐤈, LAMED (= ox-goad) = l. Gr. Lambda (Λ) = l.
- 𐤉, or (when final)  $\text{𐤉}$ , MEM (= water) = m. In the old alphabets it is  $\text{𐤉}$ , in which Gesenius sees the figure of a trident, and so possibly the symbol of the sea. Gr. Mu (Μ) = m.
- 𐤊, or (when final)  $\text{𐤊}$ , NUN (= a fish, Chal., Ar., and Syr.) = n. In almost all Phenician alphabets the figure is  $\text{𐤊}$ . Gr. Nu (Ν) = n.
- 𐤋, SAMECH (= a prop) = s. Gr. Sigma (Σ) = s.
- 𐤌, AIN (= an eye). A guttural sound, usually not represented in the A. V., but sometimes expressed by g, as in Gaza (also written Azzah), Gomorrah, &c.; represented in this Dictionary by an apostrophe ('). In the Phenician and Greek alphabets O.
- 𐤍, or (when final)  $\text{𐤍}$ , PE (= a mouth) = p. Gr. Pi (Π) = p.
- 𐤎, or (when final)  $\text{𐤎}$ , TZADDI (= a reaping-hook or fish-hook, Fii.), properly = ts (as in Hatsiham-menuchoth), but usually represented in A. V. by z (as in Azel, Ezbon, Mizraim, Zadok, Zedekiah, etc.), rarely by tz (as in Tzaddi). From this name is derived the Gr. Zeta (Ζ) = z.
- 𐤏, KOPH (= the back of the head) = k. The old Hebrew form (P), inverted Q, became the old Greek Koppa (Ϟ); and the form (Q), which occurs on the ancient Syracusan coins, suggests the origin of the Roman Q.
- 𐤐, RESH (= a head) = r. The Phenician Q when turned round became the Gr. Rho (Ρ) = r or rh.
- 𐤑, Shin, and 𐤒, Sin (= a tooth) = sh or s. (SCHIN.) The letters 𐤑 and 𐤒 were probably at first one letter, and afterward became distinguished by the diacritic point. The Gr. Xi (Ξ = Eng. x) is derived from Shin.
- 𐤓, TAU (= a mark or sign; probably a sign in the shape of a cross, such as cattle were marked with). The signification corresponds to the shapes of the old Hebrew letter on coins +, x, from the former of which comes the Gr. Tau (Τ) = t.

= d; Epsilon (Ε, ε) = e short; Zeta (Ζ, ζ) = z; Eta (Η, η) = e long (ε); Theta (Θ, θ, θ) = th; Iota (Ι, ι) = i; Kappa (Κ, κ) = k; Lambda (Λ, λ) = l; Mu (Μ, μ) = m; Nu (Ν, ν) = n; Xi (Ξ, ξ) = x; Omicron (Ο, ο) = o short; Pi (Π, π) = p; Rho (Ρ, ρ, ρ) = r or rh; Sigma (Σ, σ, σ) = s; Tau (Τ, τ) = t; Upsilon (Υ, υ) = u (usually written y in Latin); Phi (Φ, φ) = ph (= f); Chi (Χ, χ) = ch hard (as in Christ); Psi (Ψ, ψ) = ps; Omega (Ω, ω) = o long (ό).

Divisions of words. Hebrew was originally written, like most ancient languages, without any divisions between the words (so Mr. Wright). The same is the case with most Greek and Phenician inscriptions. (NEW TESTAMENT; OLD TESTAMENT.)—Final letters, &c. We find in all Hebrew MSS. and printed books particular forms assumed by five of the Hebrew letters, when they occur at the end of words. Their invention was clearly due to an endeavor to render reading more easy by distinguishing one word from another, but they are of comparatively modern date. The final nun is found on the Palmyrene inscriptions. The five final letters are mentioned in Bereshith Rabba and in both Talmuds. On the ancient Phenician inscriptions, as in the Greek uncial MSS., the letters of a word were divided at the end of a line without any indication being given of such division, but in Hebrew MSS. a twofold course has been adopted in this case. If at the end of a line the scribe found that he had not space for the complete word, he either wrote as many letters as he could of this word, but left them unpointed and put the complete word in the next line, or he made use of what are called extended letters, in order to fill up the superabundant space. That abbreviations were employed in the ancient Hebrew writing is shown by the inscriptions on the Maccabean coins. The greater and smaller letters which occur in the middle of words (compare Pa. lxxx. 16; Gen. ii. 4), the suspended letters (Judg. xviii. 30; Pa. lxxx. 14), and the inverted letters (Num. x. 36), are transferred from the MSS. of the Masoretes, and have all received at the hands of the Jews an allegorical explanation. (OLD TESTAMENT, A. 1.) Numbers were indicated either by figures, as on Phenician coins, on the sarcophagus of Ashmunazar (king of Sidon), on the Palmyrene inscriptions, and probably also in the Arameo-Egyptian writing; or by letters, as on the Maccabean coins, and among the Arabs, and the early Greeks. It is also conjectured that figures and letters were likewise used as numerals by the ancient Hebrews. (NUMBER.—Vowel-points and diacritical marks. Almost all the learned Jews of the middle ages maintained the equal antiquity of the vowels and consonants, or at least the introduction of the former by Ezra and the men of the Great Synagogue; but the preponderance of evidence goes to show that Hebrew was written without vowels or diacritical marks all the time that it was a living language (so Mr. Wright). No vowel-points are found on any of the Jewish coins, or in the Palmyrene inscriptions, or in the relics of Phenician writing. A single example of a diacritical mark occurs for the first time on one of the Carthaginian inscriptions. The first certain indication of vowel-points in a Semitic language is in the Arabic. (SEMITIC LANGUAGES.) Kalisch, one of the first Hebrew scholars of Europe, states his conclusions thus: "According to a statement on a scroll of the Law, which may have been in Susa from the eighth century, Moses the Punctator was the first who, in order to facilitate the reading of the Scriptures for his pupils, added vowels to the consonants, a practice in which he was followed by his son Judah, the Corrector or Reviser. These were the beginnings of a full system of Hebrew points, the completion of which has, by tradition, been associated with the name of the Karaite Acha of Irak, living in the first half of the sixth century, and which comprised the vowels and accents, dagesh and rapheh, keri and cethib. It was, from its local origin, called the Babylonian or Assyrian system. Almost simultaneously with these endeavors, the scholars of Palestine, especially of Tiberias, worked in the same direction, and here Rabbi Mocha, a disciple of Anan the Karaite, and his son Moses, fixed another system of vocalization (about 570), distinguished as that of Tiberias, which marks still more minutely and accurately the various shades and niceties of tone and pronunciation, and which was ultimately adopted by all the Jews. For though the Karaites, with their characteristic tenacity, and their antagonism to the Rabbanites, clung for some time to the older signs, because they had used them before their secession from the Talmudical sects, they were at last, in 937, induced to abandon them in favor of those adopted in Palestine. Now, the Babylonian signs, besides differing from those of Tiberias in shape, are chiefly remarkable by being almost uniformly placed above the letters. There still exist some MSS. which exhibit them, and many more would probably have been preserved had not, in later times, the habit prevailed of substituting in old codices the signs of Tiberias for those of Babylonia." From the sixth century downward the traces of punctuation become more and more distinct. The object of the accents is twofold: (1.) To mark the tone-syllable, and at the same time to show the relation of each word to the sentence; (2.) To indicate the modulation of the tone according to which the O. T. was recited in the synagogues. "The manner of recitation was different for the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the metrical books (Job, the Proverbs, and the Psalms): old modes of cantillation of the Pentateuch and the Prophets have been preserved in the German and Portuguese synagogues; both differ, indeed, considerably, yet manifestly show a common character, and are almost like the same composition sung in two different keys; while the chanting of the metrical books, not being employed in the public worship, has long been lost" (Kalisch).—Writing materials, &c. The oldest documents which contain the writing of a Semitic race are probably the bricks of NINEVEH and Babylon (BABEL) on which are impressed the cuneiform Assyrian inscriptions. There is, however, no evidence that they were ever employed by the Hebrews, Ez. iv. 1 being manifestly an exception. (ENGRAVER; PRINT; TO; STONES; TABLE; TABLETS; TEN COMMANDMENTS.) Wood was used upon some occasions (Num. xvii. 3), and writing-tablets of box-wood are mentioned in 2 Esd. xiv. 24. The "lead," to which allusion is made in Job xix. 24, is supposed to have been poured when melted into the cavities of the stone made by the letters of an inscription, in order to render it durable. Probably the most ancient as well as the most common material which the Hebrews used for writing was dressed skin in some form or other. We know that the dressing of skins was practised by the Hebrews (Ex. xxv. 5; Lev. xiii. 48), and they may have acquired the knowledge of the art from the Egyptians, among whom it had attained great perfection, the leather-cutters constituting one of the principal subdivisions of the third caste. (LEATHER.) Perhaps the Hebrews may have borrowed, among their other acquisitions, the use of papyrus from the Egyptians, but of this we have no positive evidence. (EGYPT; PAPER-REEDS; REED 2.) In 2 Jn. 12 the Gr. chartés (A. V. "paper") occurs, which refers especially to papyrus paper, and in 3 Mc. iv. 20 the Gr. chartéria is found in the same sense. In Josephus the trial of adultery is made by writing the name of God on a skin, and the seventy men sent to Ptolemy from Jerusalem by the high-priest Eleazar, to translate the Law into Greek (SEPTUAGINT), took with them the skins on which the Law was written in golden characters (Jos. xii. 2, § 10). Herodotus, after telling us that the Ionians learned the art of writing from the Phœnicians, adds that they called their books skins, because they made use of sheep-skins and goat-skins when short of paper.<sup>1</sup> Parchment was used for the MSS. of the Pentateuch in the time of Josephus, and the "parchments" (Gr. pl. membranai) of 2 Tim. iv. 13 were skins of parchment. It was one of the provisions in the Talmud that the Law should be written on the skins of clean animals, tame or wild, or even of clean birds. The skins when written upon were formed into rolls (Heb. pl. mégillóth; Ps. xl. 8; compare Is. xxxiv. 4; Jer. xxxvi. 14; Ez. ii. 9; Zech. v. 1). They were rolled upon one or two sticks and fastened with a thread, the ends of which were sealed (Is. xxxiv. 11; Dan. xii. 4; Rev. v. 1, &c.).<sup>2</sup> The rolls were generally written on one side only, except in Ez. ii. 9 and Rev. v. 1. They were divided into columns (Heb. pl. délahóth, literally doors, A. V. "leaves," Jer. xxxvi. 23); the upper margin was to be not less than three fingers broad, the lower not less than four; and a space of two fingers' breadth was to be left between every two columns. (NEW TESTAMENT, I. §§ 2, 3, 17; OLD TESTAMENT, A. 2; ROLL.) The rolls were kept in a case (Gr. teuchos or théké). But besides skins, which were used for the more permanent kinds of writing, tablets of wood covered with wax (Lk. i. 63, Gr. pinakidion, A. V. "writing-table") served for the ordinary purposes of life. Several of these were fastened together and formed volumes. They were written upon with a pointed style (Heb. é, A. V. "pen"), sometimes of iron (Job xix. 24; Ps. xlv. 1 [Heb. 2]; Jer. viii. 8, xvii. 1). For harder materials a graver (Heb. heret or cheret; Ex. xxxii. 4, A. V. "graving tool"; Is. viii. 1, A. V. "pen") was employed: the hard point might be "the point of a DIAMOND," i. e. tipped with emery or corundum (Jer. xvii. 1; ENGRAVER). For parchment or skins a reed was used (3 Jn. 13, A. V. "pen," Gr. kalamos; REED 4; 3 Mc. iv. 20). The ink (Heb. déy, literally black, Jer. xxxvi. 18; Gr. melas, literally black; 2 Cor. iii. 3; 2 Jn. 12; 3 Jn. 13) was to be of lamp-black dissolved in gall-juice, though sometimes a mixture of gall-juice and vitriol was allowable. It was carried in an inkstand (Heb. keseth hassóphér, A. V. "a wri-

<sup>1</sup> "Paper." In our use of the word to denote the material for writing made of cotton or linen pulp, was not known in Europe until long after the Christian era. The art of manufacturing paper of this kind, is said by Gibbon to have been derived from the manufacturers of Samarcand, where it was introduced from China A. D. 651, and thence spread over Europe.

<sup>2</sup> Hence a "book" (Heb. sepher; Gr. biblion, biblōn) in the Scriptures is ordinarily a roll or scroll of parchment, &c. (Jer. xxxvi. 2; Ez. ii. 9; Lk. iv. 17; Rev. v. 1 ff., &c.). "The book of life" (Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5, x. 12, 15, &c.; compare "the book of the living," Ps. lxxix. 28) is the roll or MS. in which God is figuratively represented as having recorded the names of those destined to eternal LIFE.

the East. Modern SCRIBES "have an apparatus consisting of a metal or ebony tube for their reed pens, with a cup or bulb of the same material, attached to the upper end, for the ink. This they thrust through the girdle, and carry with them at all times" (Thn. i. 188). BIBLE; DIVINATION; EPISTLE; PROPHET; REVELATION, &c.

Xan'thi-cus [zan'the-kus] (L. fr. Gr.), one of the Macedonian months; = (so Josephus) Heb. Nisan. MONTH.

Yarn (Heb. mikveh, mikvê). The notice of yarn is contained in 1 K. x. 28 and 2 Chr. i. 16: "Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn: the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price." The probability is (so Mr. Bevan) that the term refers to some entrepôt of Egyptian commerce, but whether Tekoah, as in the LXX., or Coa, as in the Vulgate (with which agree the Chaldee, Maurer, Fürst, Bertheau, W. L. Alexander [in Kitto], &c.), is doubtful. The Douay Bible (after the Vulgate) translates the verse thus: "And horses were brought for Solomon out of Egypt and Coa: for the king's merchants brought them out of Coa, and bought them at a set price." Gesenius (followed by Keil, &c.) gives the sense of company (Pool. 4) as applying equally to the merchants and the horses:—"A company of the king's merchants brought a company (of horses) at a price;" but the verbal arrangement in 2 Chronicles is opposed to this rendering. The sense adopted in the A. V. is derived from Jewish interpreters. HORSE; LINEN.

Year (Heb. shānāh; Gr. etoe), the highest ordinary division of time. The Hebrew name (root shānāh = to repeat, to do the second time) is thought by Gesenius, Fürst, &c., to mean properly a repetition, sc. of the course of the sun, or of the seasons.—I. Years, properly so called. Two years were known to, and apparently used by, the Hebrews. 1. A year of 360 days, containing twelve months of thirty days each, is indicated by certain passages in the prophetic Scriptures. The time, times, and a half, of Dan. vii. 25, xii. 7, where "time" means "year," evidently = the 42 months of Rev. xi. 2 and 1,260 days of Rev. xi. 8, xii. 6, for  $360 \times 3.5 = 1,260$ , and  $30 \times 42 = 1,260$ . This year perfectly corresponds to the Egyptian Vague year, without the five intercalary days. It appears to have been in use in Noah's time, for in the narrative of the Flood the interval from the 17th day of the 2d month to the 17th day of the 7th of the same year appears to be stated to be a period of 150 days (Gen. vii. 11, 24, viii. 8, 4, compare 13), and, as the 1st, 2d, 7th, and 10th months of one year are mentioned (viii. 13, 14, vii. 11, viii. 4, 5), the 1st day of the 10th month of this year being separated from the 1st day of the 1st month of the next year by an interval of at least 54 days (viii. 5, 6, 10, 12, 13), we can only infer a year of 12 months. (CHRONOLOGY I.; SABBATH; WEEK.) A year of 360 days is the rudest known. It is formed of 12 spurious lunar months, and was probably the parent of the lunar year of 354 days, and the Vague year of 365. The Hebrew year, from the time of the Exodus, was evidently lunar, though in some manner rendered virtually solar, and we may therefore infer that the lunar year is as old as the Exodus. As the Hebrew year was not an Egyptian year, and as nothing is said of its being new, save in its time of commencement, it was perhaps earlier in use among the Israelites, and either brought into Egypt by them or borrowed from Semitic settlers. (EGYPT, Chronology and History.) 2. The year used by the Hebrews from the time of the Exodus may be said to have been then instituted, since a current month, Abib, on the 14th day of which the first Passover was kept, was then made the first month of the year. This Hebrew year was essentially solar, for the offerings of productions of the earth, FIRST-FRUIT, harvest-produce, and ingathered fruits, were fixed to certain days of the year, two of which were in the periods of great feasts, the third itself a feast reckoned from one of the former days. (FESTIVALS; PASSOVER; PENTECOST; TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.) But the months were lunar, each commencing with a new moon. There must therefore have been some method of adjustment. Probably the Hebrews determined their new year's day by the observation of heliacal or other star-risings or settings known to mark the right time of the solar year (so Mr. R. S. Poole, original author of this article). (ASTRONOMY.) It follows, from the determination of the proper new moon of the first month, whether by observation of a stellar phenomenon, or of the forwardness of the crops, that the method of intercalation can only have been that in use after the Captivity, the addition of a thirteenth MONTH whenever the twelfth ended too long before the equinox for the offering of the first-fruits to be made at the time fixed. The later Jews had two commencements of the year, whence it is commonly but inaccurately said that they had two years, the sacred year and the civil. We prefer to speak of the sacred and civil reckonings. The sacred reckoning was that instituted at the Exodus, according to which the first month was Abib: by the civil reckoning the first month was the seventh (= Tisri). The interval between the two commencements was thus exactly half a year. It has been supposed that the institution at the time of the Exodus was a change of commencement, not the introduction of a new year, and that thenceforward the year had two beginnings, respectively at about the vernal and the autumnal equinoxes. (AGRICULTURE.)—II. Divisions of the Year. The Bible makes mention of two seasons ("summer" and "winter") of months, weeks, days, &c. (AGRICULTURE; CHRONOLOGY I.; DAY; FASTS; FESTIVALS; HOUR; MONTH; PALESTINE, Climate; SABBATH; WEEK, &c.)—III. Sacred Years. SABBATICAL YEAR; JUBILEE, YEAR OF

Yoke. 1. A well-known implement of husbandry (AGRICULTURE), described by the Hebrew terms mōt (Nah. i. 13; elsewhere "bar," &c.), mōtāh (Is. lviii. 6, 9; Jer. xxvii. 2, xxviii. 10, 12, 13 twice; Ez. xxx. 18; elsewhere "bands," &c.), and ōl (Gen. xxvii. 40; Lev. xxvi. 13; Num. xix. 3; Deut. xxi. 3, xxviii. 48; 1 Sam. vi. 7; 1 K. xii. 4 ff.; 2 Chr. x. 4 ff., &c.), the two former specifically applying to the bows of wood out of which it was constructed, and the last to the application (binding) of the article to the neck of the ox. In the N. T. the Gr. zeugos is usually translated "yoke" (Mat. xi. 29, 30; Acts xv. 10, &c.). "Yoke" often figuratively denotes a burden, bondage, &c. (1 K. xii. 4 ff.; Jer. xxviii. 2 ff.; Mat. xi. 28, 30, &c.).—2. (Heb. tsemed.) A pair of oxen, so termed as being yoked together (1 Sam. xi. 7, xiv. 14; 1 K. xix. 19, 21; Job i. 3, xlii. 12; Jer. li. 28; elsewhere translated "a couple," "two," &c.; ACRES). The Gr. zeugos is applied to "a pair" of turtle-doves (Lk. ii. 24) and five "yoke" of oxen (xiv. 19).

* Yoke-fel'low (Gr. enzugos) = a fellow-laborer, colleague (Phil. iv. 3). It is not known whom the apostle here addresses by this title, probably (so Conybeare & Howson) some eminent Christian at Philippi. Some (improbably) have supposed the word a proper name = "Syzygus."

Za-a-na'im (fr. Heb. = removals, Ges.), the Plain of (Heb. dlon, see PLAIN 7), more accurately "the oak by Zaana'im;" a tree near which Heber the Kenite was encamped when Sisera took refuge in his tent (Judg. iv. 11). It was "near KEDESH," i. e. Kedesh-naphthali, on the high ground W. of the Lake of el-Huleh. The Targum gives as the equivalent of the name, mishôr aganiyâ = the plain of the swamp, which can hardly refer to any thing but the marsh bordering the lake of Huleh on the N., and probably more extensive in the time of Deborah than now. On the other hand, Dr. Stanley has pointed out an appropriate situation for this tree in "a green plain . . . studded with massive terebinths," which adjoins on the S. the plain containing the remains of Kedesh. The Keri, or Hebrew correction, of Judg. iv. 11 substitutes ZAAANANIM for Zaana'im.

Za-a-nan (fr. Heb. = place of flocks, Ges.), a place named by Micah (i. 11); doubtless = ZENAN.

* Zi-a-nan'nim (fr. Heb. = removals, Ges.), a place on the border of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). ALLON 1; ZAAANAIM.

Za'a-van (Heb. unquiet, Ges.), a Horite chief, son of Ezer the son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 27); = ZAVAN.

Za'bad (Heb. whom God gave, Ges.). 1. Son of Nathan, son of Attai, son of AHLAI, Sheshan's daughter (1 Chr. ii. 31-37), and hence called son of Ahlai (xi. 41). He was one of David's "valiant men."—2. An Ephraimite (1 Chr. vii. 21). (SMUTHCLAH.)

—3. Son of the Ammonitess Shimeath, and an assassin, with Jehozabad, of King Joash (2 Chr. xxiv. 26); = JOZACHAR.—4. The name of three Israelites in Ezra's time who had married foreign wives; viz. the first, one of the sons of Zattu (Ezr. x. 27);—5. The second, one of the sons of Hashum (x. 33);—6. The third, one of the sons of Nebo (x. 43).

Zab-a-dai-as [-da'yas] (Gr.) = ZABAD 6 (1 Esd. ix. 35).

Zab-a-de'aus (fr. Gr.), an Arab tribe attacked and spoiled by Jonathan, on his way back to Damascus from his fruitless pursuit of the army of Demetrius (1 Mc. xii. 31). Josephus (xiii. 5, § 10) calls them Nabateans, but he is evidently in error (so Mr. Wright). Nothing certain is known of them. Jonathan had pursued the enemy's army as far as the river Eleutherus (Nahr el-Kebir), and was on his march back to Damascus when he attacked and plundered the Zabadeans. Mr. Wright thinks that the modern village of Zebedany, on the road from Damascus to Ba'albek, about 8½ hours (26 miles) N. W. from Damascus, at the upper end of a plain of the same name, which is the very centre of Antilibanus, is possibly a relic of the ancient tribe of the Zabadeans.

Zab'bai (Heb., probably a corruption of ZACCAI, Ges.). 1. One of the sons of Bebai, and husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 28).—2. Father of the BARUCH who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the city wall (Neh. iii. 20).

Zab'bud (Heb. = ZABUD, Ges.), one of the sons of Bigvai, and companion of Ezra in returning from Babylon (Ezr. viii. 14; margin "Zaccur, as some read").

Zab-de'us (fr. Gr. form) = ZEBADIAH 6 (1 Esd. ix. 21).

Zab'di (Heb. gift of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. Son of Zerah, the son of Judah, and ancestor of Achan (Josh. vii. 1, 17, 18); ZIMRI 3?—2. A Benjamite chief, son of Shimhi (1 Chr. viii. 19).—3. David's officer over the produce of the vineyards for the wine-cellars (xxvii. 27); called "the SHIPHMITES."—4. A Levite, son of Asaph (Neh. xi. 17); probably = ZACCUR 3 and ZICHI 5.

Zab'di-el (Heb. gift of God, Ges.). 1. Father of JASHOBEAM (1 Chr. xxvii. 2).—2. An overseer of the priests in Nehemiah's time; son of one of the great men, or, as the margin gives it, "Haggadolim" (Neh. xi. 14).—3. An Arabian chieftain, who put ALEXANDER BALAS to death (1 Mc. xi. 17).

Za'bud (Heb. given, Ges.), son of NATHAN 1 (1 K. iv. 5); described as a PRIEST (A. V. "principal officer"), and as holding at the court of Solomon the confidential post of "king's friend," which had been occupied by Hushai the Archite during the reign of David (2 Sam. xv. 37, xvi. 16; 1 Chr. xxvii. 33). Some suppose Zabud = ZABAD 1. KING.

Zab'u-lon, the Latinized Greek form of ZEBULON (Mat. iv. 13, 15; Rev. vii. 8).

Zac'cal, or Zac'ca-i (Heb. pure, innocent, Ges.), ancestor of 760 who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 9; Neh. vii. 14).

Zac-che'us (L. Zacchaeus, fr. Heb. = ZACCAI). 1. An officer of Judas Maccabeus (2 Mc. x. 19).—2. A tax-collector near Jericho, who being short in stature climbed up into a sycamore-tree, to obtain a sight of JESUS CHRIST as He passed through that place (Lk. xix. 1-10). He was "a son of Abraham, i. e. a Jew. The term "chief among the publicans" (Gr. architelônês), which designates his office, describes him no doubt as the superintendent of customs or tribute in the district of Jericho, where he lived, as one having a commission from his Roman principal to collect the imposts levied on the Jews by the Romans, and who in the execution of that trust employed subalterns, who were accountable to him, as he in turn was accountable to his superior (so Prof. Hackett). The office must have been lucrative in such a region, and Zaccheus was "rich." (PUBLICAN.) The eagerness of Zaccheus to see Jesus indicates a deeper interest than that of mere curiosity. There was evidently a religious susceptibility and a preparation for the reception of spiritual blessings.

Though regarded as "a man that was a sinner," he was ready to engage to restore "fourfold" for the illegal exactions of which he would not venture to deny that he might have been guilty. That day salvation came to his house. The Saviour spent the night probably in his house, and the next day pursued his journey to Jerusalem. We read in the Rabbinic writings also of a Zaccheus who lived at Jericho at this same period, well known on his own account, and especially as the father of the celebrated Rabbi Jochanan ben Zachai.

Zac'char (fr. Heb. = ZACCUR), a Simeonite, of the family of Mishma (1 Chr. iv. 26).

Zac'car (Heb. mindful, Ges.). 1. A Reubenite, father of Shammua the spy (Num. xiii. 4).—2. A Merarite Levite, son of Jaaziah (1 Chr. xxiv. 27).—3. A Levite, son of Asaph, and chief of the third division of the Temple choir (xxv. 2, 10; Neh. xii. 35); probably = ZABDI 4 and ZICHRI 5.—4. Son of Imri, assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the city wall (iii. 2).—5. A Levite, or family of Levites, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 12).—6. A Levite, whose son or descendant Hanan was one of the treasurers appointed by Nehemiah (xiii. 13).

Zach-a-ri'ah [zak-], properly ZECHARIAH. 1. Son of Jeroboam II.; fourteenth king of Israel, and the last of the house of Jehu. Most chronologers assume an interregnum of eleven years between Jeroboam's death and Zachariah's accession, during which the kingdom was suffering from the anarchy of a disputed succession. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) Zachariah's reign lasted only six months. He was killed in a conspiracy, of which SHALLUM was the head, and by which the prophecy in 2 K. x. 30 was accomplished.—2. Father of Abi, or Abijah, Hezekiah's mother (2 K. xviii. 2); = ZECHARIAH 25.

Zach-a-ri'as (Gr. and L. = ZECHARIAH). 1. ZECHARIAH 27 (1 Esd. i. 8).—2. HEMAN 2 (i. 15).—3. SERATAH 6 = AZARIAH 20 (v. 8).—4. The prophet ZECHARIAH 1 (vi. 1, vii. 3).—5. ZECHARIAH 8 (viii. 30).—6. ZECHARIAH 9 (viii. 37).—7. ZECHARIAH 10 (viii. 44).—8. ZECHARIAH 11 (ix. 27).—9. Father of JOSEPH 6, a leader in the first campaign of the Maccabean war (1 Mc. v. 18, 56-62).—10. Father of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Lk. i. 6, &c.).—11. Son of Barachias, slain, our Lord says, by the Jews between the altar and the temple (Mat. xxiii. 35; Lk. xi. 51). There has been much dispute who this Zacharias was. Many of the Greek Fathers maintained that the father of John the Baptist (No. 10 above) is the person to whom our Lord alludes; but there can be little or no doubt that the allusion is to ZECHARIAH 6, the son of Jehoiada. The name of the father of Zacharias is not mentioned by St. Luke, and we may suppose that the name of Barachias crept into the text of St. Matthew from a marginal gloss, a confusion having been made between Zachariah, the son of Jehoiada, and Zacharias, the son of Barachias (Berechiah) the prophet.

Zach-a-ry (fr. Gr.) = the prophet ZECHARIAH 1 (2 Esd. i. 40).

Za'cher (Heb. remembrance, memorial, Ges.), a son of Jehiel, the father or founder of Gibeon, by his wife Maachah (1 Chr. viii. 31); = ZECHARIAH 3.

Zad'ok (fr. Heb. = righteous). 1. Son of AHITUB 2, and one of the two chief priests (HIGH-PRIEST) in the time of David, ABIATHAR being the other. Zadok was of the house of ELEAZAR, the son of AARON (1 Chr. xxiv. 3), and eleventh in descent from Aaron. The first mention of him is in 1 Chr. xii. 28, as joining DAVID at Hebron after Saul's death with twenty-two captains of his father's house, and, apparently, with 900 men (4,600—3,700, ver. 26, 27). Up to this time, it may be concluded, he had adhered to the house of Saul. But henceforth his fidelity to David was inviolable. When Absalom revolted, and David fled from Jerusalem, Zadok and all the Levites, bearing the Ark, accompanied him, and it was only at the king's express command that they returned to Jerusalem, and became the medium of communication between the king and Hushai the Archite (2 Sam. xv., xvii.). When Absalom was dead, Zadok and Abiathar persuaded the elders of Judah to invite David to return (xix. 11). When Adonijah, in David's old age, set up for king, and had persuaded Joab, and Abiathar the priest, to join his party, Zadok was unmoved, and was employed by David to anoint Solomon to be king in his room (1 K. i.). Solomon "thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the Lord," and "put in Zadok the priest" in his room (ii. 27, 35). From this time, however, we hear little of him. In the enumeration of Solomon's officers of state Zadok is named as the priest (iv. 4; 1 Chr. xxix. 22), but no single act of his is mentioned. Zadok and ABIATHAR were of nearly equal dignity (2 Sam. xv. 35, 36, xix. 11). The duties of the office were divided. Zadok ministered before the Tabernacle at Gibeon (1 Chr. xvi. 39), Abiathar had the care of the Ark at Jerusalem. Not, however, exclusively, as appears from 1 Chr. xv. 11 and 2 Sam. xv. 24, 25, 29).—2. According to the genealogy of the high-priests in 1 Chr. vi. 12, there was, about the time of King Ahaziah, a second Zadok, son of a second Ahitub, son of Arnariah. Lord A. C. Hervey supposes it probable that this second Zadok (and so AHITUB 3) never existed, and that the insertion of the two names is a copyist's error; but we have no authority for excluding these names. (GENEALOGY; HIGH-PRIEST).—3. Father of Jerushah, the wife of King Uzziah, and mother of King Jotham (2 K. xv. 33; 2 Chr. xxvii. 1).—4. Son of Baana, repaired a portion of the wall in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 4); probably the Zadok in the list of those that sealed the covenant in Neh. x. 21.—5. Son of Immer; a priest who repaired a portion of the wall over against his own house (iii. 29).—6. In Neh. xi. 11, and 1 Chr. ix. 11, mention is made of Zadok, the son of Meraioth, the son of Ahitub. But Lord A. C. Hervey considers Meraioth as inserted by the error of a copyist, and Zadok the son of Ahitub as meant. (AHITUB 2; MERAIOTH 1).—7. "Zadok the scribe" was one of the treasurers appointed by Nehemiah (Neh. xiii. 13).

Za'h'am (Heb. loathing, Ges.), son of Rehoboam by Abihail, the daughter of Eliab (2 Chr. xi. 19).

* Za'in (Heb. zayin = a weapon, Ges.), the seventh letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.). WRITING.

Za'ir (fr. Heb. = small, Ges.), a place (probably in or near Edom), where Joram, in his expedition against the Edomites, having been surrounded by the latter, cut his way through them by night and escaped (2 K. viii. 21 only). In 2 Chr. xxi. 9 the words "to Zair" are omitted, and the words "with his princes" inserted, perhaps by the error of a copyist (Dahler), or intentionally, because the name Zair was not elsewhere known (Keil). Others (Movers, Ewald) suggest that Zair = ZOAR. A third conjecture (Thenius) is, that Zair is an alteration for SAIR.

Za'taph (fr. Heb. = fracture, wound, Ges.), father of Hanun, who assisted in rebuilding the city wall (Neh. iii. 30).

Zai'mon (fr. Heb. = shady, Ges.), an Abohite, one of David's thirty warriors (2 Sam. xxi. 8); = ILAI.

Zal'mon (see above), Mount, a wooded eminence near SHECHEM, from which Abimelech and his people cut down the boughs for setting fire to the citadel (Judg. ix. 48). Mount EBAL is now called Jebel Sultanyeh; but it is uncertain whether there is any connection between this name and Zalmon. The name DALMANUTHA has been supposed a corruption of Zalmon. SALMON.

Zal-mo'nah (fr. Heb. = shady, Ges.), a desert-station of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 41). It lies on the E. side of Edom; but whether or not = Ma'an, a few miles E. of Petra, as Raumer thinks, is doubtful. More probably Zalmonah may be in the Wady el-Ihm (so Mr. Hayman). WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Zal-mu'na (fr. Heb. = shelter is denied him, Ges., Fñ.), one of the two "kings" of MIDIAN taken and slain by GIDEON (Judg. viii. 5-21; Ps. lxxxiii. 11). ZEBAH.

Zam'bis (fr. Gr.) = AMARIAH 5 (1 Esd. ix. 34).

Zam'bi (Gr.) = ZIMRI 1 (1 Mc. ii. 26).

Za'moth (Gr.) = ZATTU (1 Esd. ix. 28).

Zam-zum'mim (Heb. pl. = noisy people, Ges.), Zam-zum'mim (fr. Heb.), the Ammonite name for the people, who by others were called "Rephaim" (Deut. ii. 20 only); described as originally a powerful and numerous nation of giants. From a slight similarity between the two names, and from the mention of the EMIM in connection with each, it is usually assumed that the Zamzumim = the ZUZIM (GIANTS 3.). But the identification is conjectural (so Mr. Grove).

Za-no'ah (Heb. marsh, bog? Ges.). In the genealogies of Judah, JERUTHIEL is called "the father of Zanoah" (1 Chr. iv. 18). Mr. Grove supposes this passage indicates that ZANOAH 2, a town of Judah (see below), was colonized by Egyptians or by Israelites directly from Egypt.

Za-no'ah (see above), the name of two towns of Judah. 1. In the low country, named in the same group with Zoreah and Jarmuth (Josh. xv. 34); re-inhabited by Jews after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 30), the inhabitants assisting in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (iii. 13); identified by Dr. Robinson, &c., with Zanú'a, a site on the low slope of a hill not far E. of 'Ain Shenah (Beth-shemesh), and about ten miles W. S. W. from Jerusalem.—2. In the mountains, named with Maon, Carmel, Ziph, &c. (Josh. xv. 56); perhaps at Za'núth (Rbn. ii. 204), which appears to be about ten miles S. S. W. of Hebron.

(Heb. tsáphēnath pa'anēah or -ach; written in the LXX. psouthomphanēch; see below), a name given by Pharaoh to JOSEPH 1 (Gen. xli. 45). This name has been explained as Hebrew or Egyptian, and always as a proper name. 1. The Rabbins, Josephus, &c., interpreted Zaphnath-paaneah as Hebrew = revealer of a secret. 2. Isidore, Jerome, Fürst, &c., interpret it as of Egyptian origin = saviour (or preserver) of the world. 3. Modern scholars have looked to Coptic for an explanation of this name, Jablonski and others proposing as the Coptic of the Egyptian original psút en phenech = the preservation (or preserver) of the age. Gesenius prefers the form p-sóni-m-ph-enech = sustainer (or defender) of the age; Brugsch gives p-so-nto-p-enech = prince of the life of the world. Mr. R. S. Poole identifies the LXX. form with p-sent-n p-anh-ee = the defender (or preserver) of the living; but he gives no satisfactory explanation of the name as it appears in the Hebrew and A. V. Mr. Poole says that the name, at first sight, seems to be a proper name, but, as occurring after the account of Joseph's appointment and honors, may be a title.

Za'phon (fr. Heb. = the north, Ges.) a place "in the valley" (VALLEY 1), allotted to the tribe of Gad (Josh. xiii. 27). Mr. Grove supposes it was near the Sea of Chinneroth; but its site is unknown. In Judg. xii. 1 the Heb. tsáphōnāh (A. V. "northward") may be rendered to Zaphon, as in the Alexandrine LXX., &c.

Za'ra (Gr.) = ZARAH or ZERAH 1 (Mat. i. 3).

Zar'a-tes [-sees] (fr. Gr., apparently a corruption of ZEDEKIAH), brother of Jehoikim king of Judah (1 Esd. i. 38).

Za'rah (Heb.) = ZERAH 1 (Gen. xxxviii. 30, xli. 12).

Za-ra'as [-ra'yas], or Zar-a'-as (Gr. = ZERAHIAH). 1. ZERAHIAH 1 (1 Esd. viii. 2).—2. ZERAHIAH 2 (viii. 31).—3. ZEBADIAH 5 (viii. 34).

Za're-ah (fr. Heb.) = ZORAH and ZOREAH (Neh. xi. 29).

Za're-ath-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the inhabitants of ZAREAH or ZORAH (1 Chr. ii. 53); = ZORATHITES.

Za'red (Heb. = ZERED), the Valley of; accurately ZERED (Num. xxi. 12).

Zar'e-phath (fr. Heb. = smelting-house? Ges.), a town near to, or dependent on, Zidon; the residence of the prophet ELIJAH during the latter part of the drought (1 K. xvii. 9, 10). It is also mentioned in Ob. 20. It was on the coast road between Tyre and Zidon (Josephus, Jerome), near the modern village of Surafend, which is more than a mile from the coast, high up on the slope of a hill. Of the old town on the shore considerable indications remain. One group of foundations is on a headland called 'Ain el-Kanterah; but the chief remains are S. of this, and extend for a mile or more, with many fragments of columns, slabs, and other architectural features. The site of the chapel erected by the crusaders on the spot then reputed to be the site of the widow's house where Elijah dwelt, is probably now marked by a tomb and small khan dedicated to el-

Zarephath (ruins near Surafend). From D'Estournel, Voyage en Orient.—(Fbn.)

Zar'e-tan (fr. Heb.) = ZARTHAN (Josh. iii. 16).

Zar'eth-sha'har (fr. Heb. = splendor of the dawn, Ges.), a town of Reuben, named between SIBMAH and BETH-PEOR, and specified as "in the Mount of the Valley" (Josh. xiii. 19 only); site unknown.

Zar'hites (fr. Heb. = descendants of Zerah), the.

1. A branch of the tribe of Judah, descended from ZERAH 2 (Num. xxvi. 20; Josh. vii. 17; 1 Chr. xxvii. 11, 13).—2. A family of Simeonites, descended from ZERAH 3 (Num. xxvi. 13).

Zar'ta-nah (fr. Heb., probably = ZEREDA, Ges.), a place named in 1 K. iv. 12, to define the position of BETH-SHEAN; possibly = ZARTHAN.

Zar'than (fr. Heb., probably = ZEREDA, Ges.), a place in the plain or circle of Jordan, mentioned in connection with Succoth (1 K. vii. 46); also named, in the account of the passage of the Jordan by the Israelites (Josh. iii. 16, A. V. "ZARETAN"), as defining the position of the city Adam; = ZEREDATHAN; perhaps = ZARTANAH and ZERERATH. All these spots agree in proximity to the Jordan, but beyond this we are absolutely at fault as to their position. Van de Velde would identify the name with Kurn Suriabeh, a lofty hill on the W. side of the Jordan valley, about seventeen miles N. of Jericho.

Zath'o-e (Gr., see below). This name occurs in 1 Esd. viii. 32, for ZATTU, supposed by some to have been omitted in Ezr. viii. 5, which would then read, "Of the sons of Zattu, Shechaniah the son of Jahaziel."

Za-thu'l (fr. Gr.) = ZATTU (1 Esd. v. 12).

Zat'hu (fr. Heb.) = ZATTU (Neh. x. 14).

Zat'tu (Heb. a sprout, Ges.), ancestor of a family of laymen of Israel who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 8; Neh. vii. 13). Several of this family married foreign wives (Ezr. x. 27). One of the chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah was "Zatthu" = Zattu (Neh. x. 14). SHECHANIAH 3; ZATHOE.

Za'van (fr. Heb.) = ZAAVAN (1 Chr. i. 42).

Za'za (Heb. projection, Fii.; comp. ZIZA), son of Jonathan, a descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 33).

"Zeal (Heb. kindh; Gr. zēlos) may include both warmth and excitement of feeling and impetuosity or vehemence of action, and may be commendable or censurable according to the goodness or badness of its motives and aims and the wisdom or folly of its modes of procedure. Thus the "zeal" of Jehu (2 K. x. 16), of Saul of Tarsus (Phil. iii. 6), and of the Israelites who opposed Christ (Rom. x. 2), was unworthy of the praise bestowed on the "zeal" of the Corinthian Christians (2 Cor. vii. 11, ix. 2) and of Epaphras (Col. iv. 13). The "zeal" of the Lord of hosts (2 K. xix. 31; Is. lx. 7 [Heb. 6], xxxvii. 32, &c.) signifies "not only God's intense love for His people but His jealousy in their behalf, i. e. His disposition to protect and favor them at the expense of others" (J. A. Alexander on Is. ix. 6). "The zeal of Thine house" (Ps. lxi. 9 [Heb. 10]; Jn. ii. 17) was "a jealous regard for the honor of the Sanctuary, as the visible centre of true religion . . . implying an extreme intensity of feeling" (Alexander on Ps. i. c.). "A zeal of God, but not according to knowledge" (Rom. x. 2), is zeal or ardor for God, which is not intelligent, discerning, enlightened (Stuart on Rom. i. c.).

* Zeal'ot [zel-]. JUDAS OF GALILEE; ZELOTES.

Zeb-a-d'iah (fr. Heb. = Jehovah gave, Ges.). 1. A Benjamite chief, son of Beriah (1 Chr. viii. 15).—2. A Benjamite chief, son of Elpaal (viii. 17).—3. One of the sons of Jeroham of Gedor, joined David at Zikhag (xii. 7).—4. Son of Joab's brother Asahel, and Asahel's successor as David's captain for the fourth month (xxvii. 7).—5. Son of Michael, returned in Ezra's caravan with eighty sons of Shephatiah (Ezr. viii. 8).—6. A priest of the sons of Immer; husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (x. 20).—7. A Levite porter, third son of Meshelemiah the Korhite (1 Chr. xvi. 2).—8. A Levite in Jehoshaphat's reign, one of those sent to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (2 Chr. xvii. 8).—9. Son of Ishmael and prince of Judah in Jehoshaphat's reign, superintendent or judge "for all the king's matters" (xix. 11).

Ze'bah (Heb. slaughter, sacrifice, Ges.), one of the two "kings" of MIDIAN who appear to have commanded the great invasion of Palestine, and fell by the hand of GIDEON himself. He is always coupled with ZALMUNNA (Judg. viii. 5-21; Ps. lxxxiii. 11). While OREB and Zeeb, two of the inferior leaders of the incursion, had been slain, with a vast number of their people, by the Ephraimites, at the central fords of the Jordan, the two kings had succeeded in making their escape by a passage further to the N. (probably the ford near Beth-shean), and thence to KARKOR. Here they were reposing with 15,000 men, a mere remnant of their huge horde, when Gideon overtook them. The name of Gideon was still full of terror, and the Midianites were entirely unprepared for his attack—they fled in dismay, and the two kings were taken. Gideon, on his return after this victory, probably strode on foot by the side of his captives. They passed PEKEK and SECOTH; they crossed the rapid stream of the Jordan; they ascended the highlands W. of the river, and at length reached OPHELAH, the native village of their captor. Then, at last, the question which must have been on Gideon's tongue during the whole of the return found a vent. "What manner of men were they which ye slew at Tabor?" Up to this time the sheikhs may have believed that they were reserved for ransom; but these words once spoken, there can have been no doubt what their fate was to be. They met it without fear or weakness. One request alone they make—that they may die by the sure blow of the hero himself—"and Gideon arose and slew them."

Ze-ba'im (fr. Heb. = roes, antelope, Ges.). "The children of Pochereth of Zebaim" are mentioned among the children of Solomon's servants, who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59). Mr. Grove, &c., suppose Zebaim the name of a place (ZEBAIM 1?); Gesenius, W. L. Alexander, Ayre, &c., make Pochereth-Zebaim (= slaying the antelope) the proper name of a man who was probably a mighty hunter of antelope.

Zeb'e-dee (fr. Gr. Zebdaios = ZEBEDIAH, Ges.), a fisherman of Galilee, the father of the apostles James the Great and John (Mat. iv. 21; JAMES 1; JOHN THE APOSTLE), and the husband of SALOME (xxvii. 56; Mk. xv. 40). He probably lived either at Bethsaida or in its immediate neighborhood. It has been inferred from the mention of his "hired servants" (i. 20), and from the acquaintance between the apostle John and Annas the high-priest (Jn. xviii. 15), that the family of Zebedee were in easy circumstances (compare xix. 27), although not above manual labor (Mat. iv. 21). He appears only once in the Gospel narrative (iv. 21, 22; Mk. i. 19, 20), where he is seen in his boat with his two sons mending their nets.

Ze-hol'im (fr. Heb.) = Zebolim 1 (Gen. xiv. 2, 8).
Ze-ho'im (fr. Heb. = roca or hyenas, Ges.). This word represents in the A. V. two names which in the original are quite distinct. 1. One of the five cities of the "plain" or circle of Jordan; also written "Zebolim," (SEA, THE SALT; SODOM; ZOAR.) It is mentioned in Gen. x. 19, xiv. 2, 8, in Deut. xix. 23, and in Hos. xi. 8, in each either coupled with ADMAH, or placed next it in the lists. No attempt appears to have been made to discover the site of Zebolim, till M. de Saulcy suggested the Talia Sebda, a name which he, and he alone, reports as attached to extensive ruins on the high ground between the Dead Sea and Kerak.—2. A place, named with Hadid, Neballat, Lodi, Ono, &c., as reinhabited by Benjamites after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 34 only); site unknown (compare No. 3).—3. "The Valley" (Heb. gáy; VALLEY 2) of Ze-ho'im" (fr. Heb. = hyenas or ravenous beasts, Ges.), a ravine or gorge, apparently E. of Michmash, mentioned only in 1 Sam. xiii. 18. The road running from Michmash to the E. is specified as "the road of the border that looketh to the ravine of Zeboim toward the wilderness." The "wilderness" (Heb. midbár; DESERT 2) is no doubt the district of uncultivated mountain tops and sides which lies between the central district of Benjamin and the Jordan Valley; and here, apparently, the ravine of Zeboim should be sought. In that very district there is a wild gorge, bearing the name of Shuk ed-Dubba' (= ravine of the hyena), the exact equivalent of the Hebrew (so Mr. Grove).

Ze-bu'dah (Heb. fem. of ZABUD), daughter of Pedaiiah of Rumah; wife of Josiah, and mother of King Jehoiakim (2 K. xxiii. 36).

Ze'bul (Heb. habitation, Ges.), chief man (A. V. "ruler") of SHECHEM at the contest between ABIMELECH and the men of Shechem. He accomplished the ejection of GAAL from the city (Judg. ix. 28 ff.).

Zeb'u-lon-ite (fr. Heb.) = a member of the tribe of ZEBULUN; applied only to ELON, the one judge produced by the tribe (Judg. xii. 11, 12).

Zeb'u-lun (Heb. habitation, dwelling, Ges.), in N. T. ZABULON, tenth son of JACOB; sixth and last son of LEAH (Gen. xxx. 20, xxxv. 23, xvi. 14; 1 Chr. ii. 1). His birth is recorded in Gen. xxx. 19, 20. His three sons, Sered, Elon, Jahleel (Gen. xli. 14), were the founders of the chief families of the tribe (compare Num. xxvi. 26) at the time of the migration to Egypt. During the journey from Egypt to Palestine the tribe of Zebulun formed one of the first camp, with Judah and Issachar (also sons of Leah), marching under the standard of Judah. Its numbers, at the census of Sinai, were 57,000, surpassed only by Simeon, Dan, and Judah. At that of Shittim they were 60,500. The head of the tribe at Sinai was Eliab, son of Helon (Num. vii. 24); its prince, appointed to assist in dividing the land of Canaan, was Elizaphan, son of Parnach (xxxiv. 25). Its representative among the spies was Gaddiel, son of Sodi (xiii. 10). Besides what may be implied in its appearances in these lists, the tribe is not recorded to have taken part, for evil or good, in any of the events of the wandering or the conquest. In the division of Canaan, Judah, Joseph, Benjamin, had acquired the south and the centre of the country. To Zebulun fell one of the fairest of the remaining portions. Its limits (Jos. v. 1, § 22) reached on the one side to the Lake of Gennesaret, and on the other to Carmel and the Mediterranean. On the S. it was bounded by Issachar, who lay in the great plain or valley of the Kishon; on the N. it had Naphtali and Asher. (PALESTINE, map.) It was afterward included in GALILEE. The fact recognized by Josephus, that Zebulun extended to the Mediterranean, though not appearing in the lists of Joshua and Judges, is alluded to in the Blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 13). Situated so far from the centre of government, Zebulun remains throughout the history mostly in the obscurity which envelops the whole of the northern tribes. But the conduct of the tribe during the struggle with SISERA, when they fought with desperate valor side by side with their brethren of Naphtali, was such as to draw down the especial praise of Deborah, who singles them out from all the other tribes (Judg. v. 18). ELON, the single judge produced by the tribe (Judg. xii. 11, 12), may have been one of the "SCRIBES" referred to in Josh. i. 10, i. e. probably officers who registered and marshalled the host. A similar warlike reputation is implied in the mention of the tribe among those who attended the inauguration of David's reign at Hebron (1 Chr. xii. 33). The same passage, however, shows that they did not neglect the arts of peace (ver. 40). The head of the tribe under David was Ishmaiah, the son of Obadiah (xxvii. 19). We are nowhere directly told that the people of Zebulun were carried off to Assyria, though it is implied in Is. ix. 1. Many of the tribe came to Jerusalem to attend Hezekiah's passover (2 Chr. xxx. 18). In Ez. xlviii. 26-33 and Rev. vii. 8 this tribe finds its due mention.

Zech-a-ri'ah [zek-] (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah remembers, Ges.). 1. The eleventh in order of the twelve minor prophets. (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT; PROPHET.) Of his personal history we know but little. He is called in Zech. i. 1 the son of Berechiah, and the grandson of Iddo; in Ezr. v. 1, vi. 14, the son of Iddo. Cyril of Alexandria supposes Berechiah the father of Zechariah according to the flesh, and Iddo his instructor and spiritual father. Gesenius and Rosenmüller take "son" in Ezra to mean "grandson." Knobel thinks that "Berechiah" has crept into the present text of Zechariah from Is. viii. 2. Mr. J. J. S. Perowue, original author of this article, considers it more natural to suppose, as the prophet himself mentions his father's name, whereas the historical Books of Ezra and Nehemiah mention only Iddo, that Berechiah had died early, and that there was now no intervening link between the grandfather (who may have been the priest mentioned in Neh. xii. 4) and the grandson (compare No. 15, below). Zechariah, according to this view, like Jeremiah and Ezekiel before him, was priest as well as prophet. He seems to have entered upon his office while yet young (Zech. ii. 4), and must have been born in Babylon, whence he returned with the first caravan of exiles under Zerubbabel and Joshua. It was in the eighth month, in the second year of Darius, that he first publicly discharged his office. In this he acted in concert with HAGGAR. Both prophets had the same great object before them: both directed all their energies to the building of the Second Temple. The foundations of the Temple had indeed been laid (Ezr. v. 16), but, discouraged by the opposition encountered at first, the Jewish colony were not able to finish; and even when the letter came from Darius sanctioning the work, and promising his protection, they showed no hearty disposition to engage in it. At such a time no more fitting instrument could be found to rouse the people, whose heart had grown cold, than one who united to the authority of the prophet the zeal and the traditions of a sacerdotal family. (PRIEST.) Accordingly, to Zechariah's influence we find the rebuilding of the Temple in a great measure ascribed. "And the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo" (vi. 14). Later traditions assume, what is indeed very probable, that Zechariah took personally an active part in providing for the liturgical service of the Temple. He and Haggai are both said to have composed psalms with this view. If the later Jewish accounts may be trusted, Zechariah, as well as Haggai, was a member of the Great Synagogue. (SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT.) The patriotic notices of the prophet are worth nothing. According to these, he exercised his prophetic office in Chaldea, and wrought many miracles there; returned to Jerusalem at an advanced age, where he discharged the duties of the priesthood, and where he died and was buried by the side of Haggai. Zechariah leans avowedly on the authority of the older prophets, and copies their expressions. Jeremiah especially seems to have been his favorite; and hence the Jewish saying, "the spirit of Jeremiah dwelt in Zechariah." But in what may be called the peculiarities of his prophecy, he approaches more nearly to Ezekiel and Daniel. Like them he delights in visions, uses symbols and allegories, beholds angels ministering before Jehovah, and fulfilling His behests on the earth. He is the only one of the prophets who speaks of Satan. That some of these peculiarities are owing to his Chaldean education can hardly be doubted. Even in the form of the visions a careful criticism might perhaps discover some traces of the prophet's early training. Generally speaking, Zechariah's style is pure, and remarkably free from Chaldaisms; but in orthography, and in the use of some words and phrases, he betrays the influence of a later age. — Content's of the Prophecy. The Book of Zechariah, in its existing form, consists of three principal parts, chs. i.-viii., chs. ix.-xi., chs. xii.-xiv. 1. The first of these divisions is allowed by all critics to be the genuine work of Zechariah the son of Iddo. It consists, first, of a short introduction or preface, in which the prophet announces his commission; then of a series of visions, descriptive of all those hopes and anticipations of which the building of the Temple was the pledge and sure foundation; and finally of a discourse, delivered two years later, in reply to questions respecting the observance of certain established fasts. 1. The short introductory oracle (ch. i. 1-6) is a warning voice from the past, and manifestly rests upon the former warnings of Haggai. 2. In a dream of the night there passed before the eyes of the prophet a series of visions (i. 7-vi. 15). These visions are obscure, and, accordingly, the prophet asks their meaning. The interpretation is given by an angel who knows the mind and will of Jehovah. (1.) In the first vision (i. 7-15) the prophet sees, in a valley of myrtles, a rider upon a roan horse, accompanied by others who, having been sent forth to the four quarters of the earth, had returned with the tidings that the whole earth was at rest (with reference to Hag. ii. 20). Hereupon the angel asks how long this state of things shall last, and is assured that the indifference of the heathen shall cease, and that the Temple shall be built in Jerusalem. (2.) The second vision (ii. 1-17, A. V. i. 18-ii. 13) explains how the promise of the first is to be fulfilled. It symbolizes the destruction of the heathen kingdoms hitherto combined against Jerusalem, and the rapid increase of its population. The old prophets, in foretelling the happiness and glory of the times which should succeed the Captivity in Babylon, had made a great part of that happiness and glory to consist in the gathering together again of the whole dispersed nation in the land given to their fathers. This vision was designed to teach that the expectation thus raised—the return of the dispersed of Israel—should be fulfilled. (8.) The next two visions (iii., iv.) are occupied with the Temple, and with the two principal persons on whom the hopes of the returned exiles rested. The permission granted for the rebuilding of the Temple had no doubt stirred afresh the malice and the animosity of the enemies of the Jews. Joshua the high-priest had been singled out, it would seem, as the especial object of attack, and perhaps formal accusations had already been laid against him before the Persian court. The prophet, in vision, sees him summoned before a higher tribunal, and solemnly acquitted, despite the charges of the Satan or Adversary. This is done with the forms still usual in an Eastern court, the filthy garments of the accused being exchanged for the robe of honor put on the innocent. (4.) The last vision (iv.) supposes that all opposition to the building of the Temple shall be removed. This sees the completion of the work. — The two next visions (v. 1-11) signify that the land, in which the sanctuary has just been erected, shall be purged of all its pollutions. (5.) First, the curse is recorded against wickedness in the whole land (not as A. V. "earth;" v. 3). (6.) Next, the unclean thing, whether in the form of idolatry or any other abomination, shall be utterly removed. (7.) And now the night is waning fast, and the morning is about to dawn. Chariots and horses appear, issuing from between two brazen mountains, the horses like those in the first vision; and these receive their several commands and are sent forth to execute the will of Jehovah in the four quarters of the earth. Thus, then, the cycle of visions is completed. Scene after scene is unrolled till the whole glowing picture is presented to the eye. All enemies crushed; the land re-peopled and Jerusalem girt as with a wall of fire; the Temple rebuilt, more truly splendid than of old, because more abundantly filled with a Divine Presence; the leaders of the people assured in the most signal manner of the Divine protection; all wickedness solemnly sentenced, and the land forever purged of it;—such is the magnificent panorama of hope which the prophet displays to his countrymen. A symbolical act immediately follows. Three Israelites had just returned from Babylon, bringing with them rich gifts to Jerusalem, apparently as contributions to the Temple, and had been received in the house of Josiah the son of Zephaniah. Thither the prophet is commanded to go—whether still in a dream or not, is not very clear—and to employ the silver and gold of their offerings for the service of Jehovah. He is to make of them two crowns, and to place these on the head of Joshua the high-priest—a sign that, in the Messiah who should build the Temple, the kingly and priestly offices should be united. 3. From this time, for nearly two years, the prophet's voice was silent, or his words have not been recorded. But in the fourth year of King Darius, in the fourth day of the ninth month, there came a deputation of Jews to the Temple, anxious to know whether the fast-days instituted during the seventy years' captivity were still to be observed. It is remarkable that this question should have been addressed to priests and prophets conjointly in the Temple. Still Zechariah, as chief of the prophets, has the decision of this question. In language worthy of his position and his office, language which reminds us of one of the most striking passages of his great predecessor (Is. lviii. 5-7), he lays down the same principle that God loves mercy rather than fasting, and truth and righteousness rather than sackcloth and a sad countenance (Zech. vii. 4-14). Again he foretells, but not now in vision, the glorious times near at hand when Jehovah shall dwell in the midst of them, and Jerusalem be called a city of truth (viii. 1-15). Again, he declares that "truth and peace" (ver. 16, 19) are the bulwarks of national prosperity. And he announces, in obedience to the command of Jehovah, not only that the fasts are abolished, but that the days of mourning shall henceforth be days of joy, the fasts be counted for festivals. His prophecy concludes with a prediction that Jerusalem shall be the centre of religious worship to all nations of the earth (viii. 16-23).—II. The remainder of the book consists of two sections, ix.-xi. and xii.-xiv., each of which has an inscription. 1. In the first section he threatens Damascus and the seacoast of Palestine with misfortune; but declares that Jerusalem shall be protected. The Jews who are still in captivity shall return to their land. The land too shall be fruitful as of old (compare viii. 12). The Teraphim and the false prophets may indeed have spoken lies, but upon these will the Lord execute judgment, and then He will look with favor upon His people and bring back both Judah and Ephraim from their captivity. The possession of Gilead and Lebanon is again promised, as the special portion of Ephraim; and both Egypt and Assyria shall be broken and humbled. The prophecy now takes a sudden turn. An enemy is seen approaching from the N., who, having forced the narrow passes of Lebanon, the great bulwark of the northern frontier, carries desolation into the country beyond. Hereupon the prophet receives a commission from God to feed His flock, which God Himself will no more feed because of their divisions. The prophet undertakes the office, makes to himself two staves in order to tend the flock, and cuts off several evil shepherds whom his soul abhors; but observes at the same time that the flock will not be obedient. Hence he throws up his office; he breaks asunder one crook in token that God's covenant with Israel is dissolved; he demands and receives the wages of his service, thirty pieces of silver, which he casts into the house of Jehovah; he cuts in pieces the other crook, in token that the brotherhood between Judah and Israel is dissolved. 2. The second section, xii.-xiv., is entitled "The burden of the word of Jehovah for Israel." Israel here = the nation at large, not Israel as distinct from Judah. The prophet beholds the near approach of troublous times, when Jerusalem should be hard pressed by enemies. But in that day Jehovah shall come to save them, and all the nations which gather themselves against Jerusalem shall be destroyed. At the same time the deliverance shall not be from outward enemies alone. God will pour out upon them a spirit of grace and supplications. There shall be a deep and true repentance (xii. 1-xiii. 6). Then follows a short apostrophe to the sword of the enemy to turn against the shepherds of the people; and a further announcement of searching and purifying judgments. The prophecy closes with a grand and stirring picture. All nations are gathered together against Jerusalem; and seem already sure of their prey. Half of their cruel work has been accomplished, when Jehovah Himself appears on behalf of His people. He goes forth to war against the adversaries of His people. He establishes his kingdom over all the earth. All nations that are still left shall come up to Jerusalem, as the great centre of religious worship, and the city from that day forward shall be a holy city. Such is, briefly, an outline of the second portion of that book which is commonly known as the Prophecy of Zechariah.—Integrity. Is the book in its present form the work of one and the same prophet, Zechariah the son of Iddo, who lived after the Babylonish exile? Joseph Mede († 1638) was the first to call this in question. The probability that the later chapters (ix.-xiv.) were by some other prophet seems first to have been suggested to him by the citation in Mat. xxvii. 9, 10—"Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet," &c. Mede ascribed Zech. ix.-xiv. to Jeremiah, partly on the authority of St. Matthew, and partly on the ground that the contents of the later chapters require a date earlier than the exile. Archbishop Newcome was the first who advocated the theory, that the last six chapters of Zechariah are the work of two distinct prophets. His words are: "The eight first chapters appear by the introductory parts to be the prophecies of Zechariah, stand in connection with each other, are pertinent to the time when they were delivered, are uniform in style and manner, and constitute a regular whole. But the six last chapters are not expressly assigned to Zechariah; are unconnected with those which precede; the three first of them are unsuitable in many parts to the time when Zechariah lived; all of them have a more adorned and poetical turn of composition than the eight first chapters; and they manifestly break the unity of the prophetic book." "I conclude," he continues, "from internal marks in chs. ix., x., xi., that these three chapters were written much earlier than the time of Jeremiah and before the captivity of the tribes. . . . The twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth chapters form a distinct prophecy, and were written after the death of Josiah; but whether before or after the Captivity, and by what prophets, is uncertain." A large number of critics (Bishop Kidder, Whiston, Hammond, J. P. Smith, S. Davidson, &c., in England; Flügel, Eichhorn, Bauer, Bertholdt, Augusti, Forberg, Rosenmüller, Credner, Ewald, Maurer, Knobel, Hitzig, Bleek, &c., in Germany) have followed Mede and Newcome in denying the later date of Zech. ix.-xiv., and maintaining that these chapters are not the work of Zechariah the son of Iddo. The later date of these chapters and their being the work of Zechariah the son of Iddo have been maintained in England by Blayney, Henry, Scott, Henderson, Ayre, &c.; in Germany by Carpzov, Beckhaus, Jahn, Köster, Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Keil, De Wette (in the later editions of his Introduction), Stähelin, &c.; in the United States by Moore, &c. Those who impugn the later date of Zech. ix.-xiv. rest their arguments on the change in style and subject after ch. viii., but differ much in the application of their criticism. Thus, of those who argue that chs. ix.-xiv. must have been written by one author, Rosenmüller (from Zech. xiv. 5; compare Am. i. 1) assigns him to the reign of Uzziah, Davidson (from Is. viii. 2) to the reign of Ahaz, Eichhorn to the time of Alexander the Great. Others, as Bertholdt, Ges-nus, Knobel, Maurer, Bunsen, and Ewald, think that chs. ix.-xi. (to which Ewald adds xiii. 7-9) are a distinct prophecy from chs. xii.-xiv., most of them regarding the author of the former portion as the Zechariah mentioned Ia. viii. 2, while they all assign the section xii.-xiv. to a period immediately previous to the Babylonish Captivity. According to this hypothesis (of Bertholdt, &c.), we have the works of three different prophets collected into one book, and passing under one name:—1. Chs. ix.-xi., the book of Zechariah, a contemporary of Isaiah, under Ahaz, about B. C. 738. 2. Chs. xii.-xiv., author unknown (Bunsen makes him Urijah, a contemporary of Jeremiah), about B. C. 607 or 606. 3. Chs. i.-viii., the work of Zechariah the son (or grandson) of Iddo, Haggai's contemporary, about B. C. 520-518. In reply to the arguments alleged by the advocates of the theories that chs. ix.-xiv. are by one or two prophets different from Zechariah the son of Iddo, Keil, Stähelin, &c., urge that the difference of style is not greater than may reasonably be accounted for by the change of subject—that the predictions which do occur in the first section have a general similarity to those of the second—that the same peculiar forms of expression occur in the two sections—and that the historical references in the later chapters are perfectly consistent with a post-exile date.—With regard to the quotation in Mat. xxvii. 9, 10, there seems no good reason for setting aside the received reading. Jerome said that he found the passage word for word in an apocryphal book of Jeremiah, but was still inclined to think the quotation made from Zechariah. Eusebius thought the passage thus quoted stood originally in the prophecy of Jeremiah, but was erased subsequently by the malice of the Jews, or else the name of Zechariah was substituted for that of Jeremiah through the carelessness of copyists. Augustine testifies that the most ancient Greek copies had Jeremiah, and thinks that the mistake was originally St. Matthew's.<sup>1</sup> Some have suggested that in the Greek autograph of Matthew, ΖΠΙΟΥ (= Zriou, an abbreviation for Zachariou, a Greek genitive denoting Zechariah) may have been written, and that copyists may have taken this for ΙΠΙΟΥ (= Iriou, an abbreviation for Jeremiu or Jeremiou, a Greek genitive denoting Jeremiah or "Jeremy"). But there is no evidence that abbreviations of this kind were in use so early. The most ancient copy of the Latin Version of the Gospels omits the name of Jeremiah, and has merely "it was said by the prophet;" it has been conjectured that this represents the original Greek reading, and that some early annotator wrote Jeremiah on the margin, whence it crept into the text.<sup>2</sup>—2. Son of Meshelemiah, or Shelemiah; a Korhite porter (1 Chr. ix. 21, xxvi. 2, 14); = No. 4?—3. A Benjamite, son of Jehiel (ix. 37); = ZACHER.—4. A Levite, one of those appointed to play "with psalteries on Alamoth" (xv. 18, 20); =

<sup>2</sup> Lange (Comm. on Mat. i. c., translated by Schaaf) regards the passage as combining four different quotations: (a.) "And they took the thirty pieces of silver," derived from the narrative in Matthew, with special reference to Zech. xi. 12; (b.) "the price of Him that was valued," also after Zechariah; (c.) "whom they bought of the children of Israel" (as in A. V. margin), after Gen. xxxvii. 28; (d.) "and gave them for the potter's field," from the narrative, with special reference to Zechariah; (e.) "as the Lord appointed to me"—the key of the whole passage, quoted from Jer. xxxii. 6, 8.—Lightfoot and Scrivener suppose that the Book of Jeremiah, arranged by the Jews as the first of all the prophets, gave its name to the whole body of their writings (Schaaf, in Lange). OLD TESTAMENT, C.

No. 2?—5. One of the princes of Judah sent to teach the people the Law in Jehoshaphat's reign (2 Chr. xvii. 7).—6. Son of the high-priest Jehoiada, and therefore cousin of Josiah, king of Judah (2 Chr. xxiv. 20). After Jehoiada's death Zechariah probably succeeded to his office, and in attempting to check the reaction in favor of idolatry which immediately followed, he fell a victim to a conspiracy formed against him by the king, and was stoned in the court of the Temple. Probably "Zacharias son of Barachias," who was slain between the Temple and the altar (Mat. xxiii. 35), is the same with Zechariah the son of Jehoiada. (ZACHARIAS 11.)—7. A Kohathite Levite, an overseer of the workmen at the Temple in Josiah's reign (2 Chr. xxxiv. 12).—8. Leader of the sons of Pharosh who returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 8).—9. Leader of the sons of Bebai under Ezra (viii. 11).—10. One of the "chief men" whom Ezra summoned in council at the river Abana (viii. 16). Some suppose him = No. 9 or 10; others suppose him = the Zechariah of Neh. viii. 4, who was probably a priest or Levite, and perhaps = No. 16.—11. One of the family of Elam, husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 26).—12. A descendant of Perez and ancestor of Athaiah, or Uthai (Neh. xi. 4).—13. A son of SHILOMI and ancestor of MAASERIAN 9 (xi. 5).—14. A priest, son of Parhur (xi. 12).—15. Chief of the priestly family of Iddo in the days of High-priest Joiakim (xii. 16); probably = Zechariah the prophet (No. 1, above).—16. A descendant of Asaph, and participant in musical services at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (xii. 35); perhaps different from the Zechariah of ver. 41, who then had one of the trumpets, and was apparently a priest.—17. A Reubenite chief at the captivity by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chr. v. 7).—18. One of the priests with trumpets who accompanied the ark from the house of Obed-edom (xv. 24).—19. A Kohathite Levite descended from Uzziel; son of Ishiah or Jesiah (xxiv. 25).—20. A Merarite Levite, fourth son of Hosah (xxvi. 11).—21. A Manassite, father of IDDO 3 (xxvii. 21).—22. A Levite, father of JAHAZIEL 4 (2 Chr. xx. 14).—23. One of the sons of Jehoshaphat, slain by Jehoram (xxi. 2).—24. A man in Uzziah's reign "who had understanding in the visions (margin 'seeing') of God," i. e. a prophet, or (as some suppose) one eminent for piety, or for discernment in things pertaining to God or His service (xxvi. 5).—25. Father of Hezekiah's mother (xxix. 1); = ZACHARIAH 2.—26. A descendant of Asaph, aided in purifying the Temple in Hezekiah's reign (xxix. 18).—27. One of the rulers of the Temple in Josiah's reign (xxxv. 8); probably (so Bertheau) "the second priest" (compare 2 K. xxv. 18; HIGH-PRIEST).—28. Son of Jeberemiah; taken by the prophet Isaiah as one of the "faithful witnesses to record," when he wrote concerning Maher-shalhash-baz (Is. viii. 2); supposed by some = No. 26, and by others = No. 25. Bertholdt, &c., have ascribed to him the writing of Zech. ix.-xi. (see No. 1, above).

Ze'ad (fr. Heb. = a mountain-side, Gen.; steep place, Fül.), a place on the N. border of the land of Israel, as promised by Moses (Num. xxxiv. 8) and as restored by Ezekiel (xlvi. 15); identified by Robinson (ii. 507), Porter (in Kitto), Wilson (ii. 358), &c., with the large modern village of Sadad, E. of the northern extremity of the chain of Anti-libanus, about fifty miles E. N. E. of Be'atbek, and thirty-five S. E. of Hama.

1. The last king of Judah and Jerusalem. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) He was the son of JOSIAH by his wife Hamutal, and, therefore, own brother to JEHOIAHAZ (2 K. xxiv. 18, compare xxiii. 31). His original name, MATTANIAH, was changed to Zedekiah by NEBUCHADNEZZAR, when he carried off his nephew JEHOIAKIM to Babylon, and left him on the throne of Jerusalem. Zedekiah was but twenty-one years old when he was thus placed in charge of an impoverished kingdom, and of a city which, though still strong, both naturally and artificially, was bereft of well-nigh all its defenders. His history is given in 2 K. xxiv. 17-xxv. 7, and in Jer. xxxix. 1-7, lii. 1-11, and 2 Chr. xxxvi. 10, &c.; and also in Jer. xxi., xxiv., xxvii.-xxix., xxxii.-xxxiv., xxxvii., xxxviii. (containing Jeremiah's prophecies, &c., of this reign), and Ez. xvi. 11-21. To these add Jos. x. 7, 8. From these it is evident that Zedekiah was a man not so much bad at heart as weak in will. It is evident from Jer. xxvii. and xxviii. that the earlier portion of Zedekiah's reign was marked by an agitation throughout Syria against the Babylonian yoke. In the fourth year of Zedekiah's reign we find ambassadors from all the neighboring kingdoms—Tyre, Sidon, Edom, and Moab—at his court, to consult as to the steps to be taken. This happened either during the king's absence or immediately after his return from Babylon, whither he went, perhaps, to blind the eyes of Nebuchadnezzar to his contemplated revolt (Jer. li. 59). The first act of overt rebellion of which any record survives was the formation of an alliance with Egypt (2 Chr. xxxvi. 13; Ez. xvii. 13). As a natural consequence it brought on Jerusalem an immediate invasion of the Chaldeans. The mention of this event in the Bible occurs only in Jer. xxxvii. 5-11, xxxiv. 21, and Ez. xvii. 15-20; but Josephus (x. 7, § 3) relates it more fully, and gives its date, viz. the eighth year of Zedekiah. It appears that Nebuchadnezzar, made aware of Zedekiah's defection, either by the non-payment of the tribute or by other means, at once sent an army to ravage Judea. This was done, and the whole country reduced, except JERUSALEM, LACHISH, and AZEKAH (Jer. xxxiv. 7). In the panic which followed the appearance of the Chaldeans the princes and people at Jerusalem solemnly covenanted with Zedekiah to release all the Hebrews held in bondage, and many were thus freed (8 ff.). —In the mean time Pharaoh had moved to the assistance of his ally. On hearing of his approach the Chaldeans at once raised the siege and advanced to meet him. The nobles seized the moment of respite to reassert their power, and reduce to bondage again those recently freed (11 ff.). How long the Babylonians were absent from Jerusalem we are not told; but on the tenth day of the tenth month of Zedekiah's ninth year the Chaldeans were again before the walls (li. 4). From this time forward the siege progressed slowly but surely to its consummation, with the accompaniment of both famine and pestilence (Jos.). Zedekiah interfered to preserve the life of Jeremiah from the vengeance of the princes (Jer. xxxvii. 7-13), and then occurred the interview between the king and the prophet, which affords so good a clew to the condition of abject dependence into which a long course of opposition had brought the weak-minded monarch (14 ff.). While the king was hesitating, the end was rapidly coming nearer. The city was indeed reduced to the last extremity. The fire of the besiegers had throughout been very destructive (Jos.), but it was now aided by a severe famine. The bread had for long been consumed

(Jer. xxxviii. 9), and all the terrible expedients had been tried to which the wretched inhabitants of a besieged town are forced to resort in such cases (Lam. iv. 5-10). At last, after sixteen dreadful months, the catastrophe arrived. It was on the ninth day of the fourth month, about the middle of July, at midnight, as Josephus with careful minuteness informs us, that the breach in those stout and venerable walls was effected. The moon, nine days old, had gone down below the hills which form the western edge of the basin of Jerusalem, or was at any rate too low to illuminate the utter darkness which reigns in the narrow lanes of an Eastern town, where the inhabitants retire early to rest, and few windows emit light from the interior of the houses. The wretched remnants of the army, starved and exhausted, had left the walls, and there was nothing to oppose the entrance of the Chaldeans. Passing in through the breach, they made their way, as their custom was, to the centre of the city, and for the first time the Temple was entered by a hostile force. The alarm quickly spread through the sleeping city, and Zedekiah, collecting his wives and children (Jos.), and surrounding himself with the few soldiers who survived, made his way out of the city at the opposite end to that at which the Assyrians had entered, by a street which ran between two walls, and issued at a gate above the royal gardens and the Fountain of Siloam. Thence he took the road toward the Jordan. On the way they were met and recognized by some of the Jews who had formerly deserted to the Chaldeans. By them the intelligence was communicated to the generals in the city (Jos.), and, as soon as the dawn of day permitted it, swift pursuit was made. The king's party were overtaken near Jericho, when just within sight of the river. A few of the people only remained round the person of the king. The rest fled in all directions, so that he was easily taken. Nebuchadnezzar was then at RIBLAH, about ten days' journey from Jerusalem. Thither Zedekiah and his sons were dispatched: his daughters left behind were taken to Mizpah and afterward into Egypt (Jer. xl. 7, xli. 16, xliii. 6, 7, lii.). Nebuchadnezzar, with a refinement of cruelty characteristic of those cruel times, ordered his sons to be killed before him, and lastly his own eyes to be thrust out. (PUNISHMENTS; WAR.) He was then loaded with brazen fetters, and at a later period taken to Babylon, where he died.

—2. Son of Chenaanah; a false prophet at the court of AHAB. He appears but once, viz. as spokesman when the prophets are consulted by Ahab on the result of his proposed expedition to Ramoth-gilead (1 K. xxii.; 2 Chr. xviii.). Zedekiah had prepared himself for the interview with a pair of iron horns after the symbolic custom of the prophets (compare Jer. xlii., xli., and Deut. xxxiii. 17). With these, in the interval before Micaiah's arrival, he illustrated the manner in which Ahab should drive the Syrians before him. When Micaiah appeared and had delivered his prophecy, Zedekiah sprang forward and struck him a blow on the face, accompanying it by a taunting sneer. For this he is threatened by Micaiah in terms which evidently allude to some personal danger to Zedekiah. Josephus relates that after Micaiah had spoken, Zedekiah again came forward, and denounced him as false on the ground that his prophecy contradicted the prediction of Elijah, that Ahab's blood should be licked up by dogs in the field of Naboth of Jezreel; and as a further proof that he was an impostor, he struck him, daring him to do what Iddo, in somewhat similar circumstances, had done to Jeroboam—viz. wither his hand.—3. Son of Maaseiah; a false prophet in Babylon (Jer. xxix. 21, 22). He was denounced in the letter of Jeremiah for having, with Ahab the son of Kolaiah, buoyed up the people with false hopes, and for profane and flagitious conduct. Their names were to become a byword, and their terrible fate of being burnt to death a warning.—4. Son of Hananiah, one of the princes of Judah in Jeremiah's time (Jer. xxxvi. 12).

Zeeb (Heb. zof), one of the two "princes" of MIDIAN in the great invasion of Israel; always named with OREB (Judg. vii. 25, viii. 3; Ps. lxxxiii. 11). Zeeb was slain by the Ephraimites in a winepress which in later times bore his name—the "winepress of Zeeb." ZEBBAH.

Ze'lah (fr. Heb. = a rib, the side, Ges.), a city of Benjamin, named between Taralah and Eleph (Josh. xviii. 28). It contained the family tomb of Kish the father of Saul (2 Sam. xxi. 14). ZELAH.

Ze'lek (fr. Heb. = figure, Ges.), an Ammonite, one of David's thirty "valiant men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 37; 1 Chr. xi. 39).

Ze-lo-ph-ez-had (fr. Heb. = first fracture, perhaps first-born, Ges.), son of Hephher, son of Gilead, son of Machir, son of Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 3); apparently the second son of Hephher (1 Chr. vii. 15). Zelophehad came out of Egypt with Moses, but died in the wilderness, as did the whole of that generation (Num. xiv. 35, xvii. 3). On his death without male heirs, his five daughters (Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, Tirzah), just after the second numbering in the wilderness, came before Moses and Eleazar to claim the inheritance of their father in the tribe of Manasseh. The claim was admitted by Divine direction (xxvi. 23, xxvii. 1-11). HEIR.

Ze-lo'tes (Gr. the Zealot = THE CANAANITE, Rbn. N. T. Joz.), an epithet given to the Apostle Simon 5 to distinguish him from Simon Peter (Lk. vi. 15).

Zel'zah (fr. Heb. = shade from the sun, Ges.), a place named once only (1 Sam. x. 2), as on the boundary of Benjamin, close to Rachel's sepulchre. It is usually considered = ZELAH, and that again with Beit Jala, about a mile W. S. W. from Rachel's tomb (so Wilson, i. 401; Porter [in Kitto], &c.). "But," says Mr. Grove, "this is not tenable; at any rate there is nothing to support it."

Zem-a-ra'im (fr. Heb. = double mountain-forest, Fii.; see below), a city of Benjamin, named between BETH-ARABAH and BETHEL (Josh. xviii. 22). If it lay in the Jordan valley, a trace of the name may remain in Khurbet es-Sunrah, about four miles N. of Jericho. If between the valley and Bethel, it may be connected, or identical, with Mount Zemaraim (see below), which must have been in the highland district. In either event Zemaraim may have derived its name from the ancient tribe of the Zemarim or Zemarites (so Mr. Grove). ZEMARITE.

Zem-a-ra'im (see above), Mount, an eminence mentioned in 2 Chr. xiii. 4 only). It was "in Mount Ephraim," i. e. within the general district of the highlands of that great tribe. It appears to have been close to the scene of the engagement mentioned in the narrative, which again may be inferred to have been S. of Bethel and Ephraim (ver. 19). Whether Mount Zemaraim is identical with, or related to, the ZEMARAIM of the preceding article, cannot be ascertained.

Zem'a-rite (fr. Heb. sing. collective temart = people of Temar [i. e. mountain-region], the ancient Simyra, Fii.; see below), the; a son of CANAAN, or a collective name of one of the Hamite tribes descended from Canaan (Gen. x. 18; 1 Chr. i. 15). Nothing is certainly known of this ancient tribe. The old interpreters (Jerusalem Targum, Arabic Version, &c.) place them at Emesa, the modern Hums. (SYRIA.) Michaelis, Gesenius, Fürst, Dr. P. Holmes (in Kitto), &c., locate them at Simyra (the Simyra of the classical geographers), a site of ruins near Arka. ARKITE; ZEMARAIM.

Ze-mi'ra (fr. Heb. = song, Ges.), son of Becker the son of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 8).

Ze'man (fr. Heb. = Zaanan? Ges.), a city of Judah in the lowland district (Josh. xv. 37; probably = ZAAANAN. Schwarz proposes to identify it with "the village Zan-obra (= es-Senahirah of Robinson?), situated two and a half English miles S. E. of Marashah." But this identification is more than doubtful (so Mr. Grove).

Ze'nas (Gr. given by Zeus, the Rom. Jupiter, Pott, Pape), a believer, and, as may be inferred from the context, a preacher of the Gospel, mentioned in Tit. iii. 13, and described as "the LAWYER" (Gr. nomikos). It is impossible to determine whether Ze'nas was a Roman juriconsult or a Jewish doctor. Grotius thinks that he was a Greek who had studied Roman law. The N. T. usage of "lawyer" leads rather to the other inference (so Mr. Jones). An untrustworthy tradition makes him one of the "seventy-two" disciples, and subsequently bishop of Diospolis (Lydda) in Palestine.

Zeph-a-ni'ah (fr. Heb. = Jehorah hides, protects, Ges.). 1. The pedigree of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. i. 1) is traced to his fourth ancestor, HEZEKIAH: supposed by Aben Ezra, Eichhorn, Hitzig, Hävernick, Keil, Bleek, &c., to be the celebrated king of that name.—Analysis of the prophecy of Zephaniah. Ch. i. The utter desolation of Judea is predicted as a judgment for idolatry, and neglect of the Lord, the luxury of the princes, and the violence and deceit of their dependents (ver. 3-9). The prosperity, security, and insolence of the people is contrasted with the horrors of the day of wrath (ver. 10-18). Ch. ii., a call to repentance (ver. 1-3), with prediction of the ruin of the cities of the Philistines, and the restoration of the house of Judah after the visitation (ver. 4-7). Other enemies of Judah, Moab, Ammon, are threatened with perpetual destruction. Ethiopia with a great slaughter, Nineveh with desolation (ver. 8-15). Ch. iii. The prophet addresses Jerusalem, which he reproves sharply for vice, disobedience, &c. (ver. 1-7). He then concludes with a series of promises (ver. 8-20).—The chief characteristics of this book are the unity and harmony of the composition, the grace, energy, and dignity of its style, and the rapid and effective alternations of threats and promises. The general tone of the last portion is Messianic, but without any specific reference to the Person of our Lord. The date of the book is given in the inscription; viz. the reign of JOSIAH, from 642 to 611 B. C. It is most probable, moreover, that the prophecy was delivered before the reformation in the eighteenth year of Josiah (so Mr. Cook, with Hitzig, Jahn, Keil, Ewald, De Wette, Meyers, Anderson, &c.). (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT.)—2. A Kohathite Levite, ancestor of Samuel and Heman (1 Chr. vi. 36 [Heb. 21]).—3. The son of Maaseiah (Jer. xxi. 1), and agan or second priest in the reign of Zedekiah. (HIGH-PRIEST.) He succeeded Jehoiada (xxix. 25, 26), and was probably a ruler of the Temple, whose office it was to punish pretenders to the gift of prophecy, &c. In this capaucity he was appealed to by Shemlah the Nehelemite to punish Jeremiah (xxix. 29). Twice was he sent from Zedekiah to inquire of Jeremiah the issue of the siege of the city by the Chaldeans (xxi. 1), and to implore him to intercede for the people (xxxvii. 3). On the capture of Jerusalem he was taken and slain at Riblah (lii. 24, 27; 2 K. xxv. 18, 21).—1. Father of JOSIAH 2 and of HEN (Zech. vi. 10, 14).

Ze phath (fr. Heb. = watch-tower, Ges.), a Canaanite town (Judg. i. 17), which after its capture and destruction was called by the Israelites HORMAH. Two identifications have been proposed for Zephath: that of Robinson with the well-known Pass es-Sufâ, by which the ascent is made from the borders of the Arabah to the higher level of the "South country," and that of Rowlands and Wilton with Sebda or Sebâ, about five miles S. W. of Khulanah (CHESIL ?) on the road to Suez, and about a mile N. of Ruheibeh or Ruheibeh (REHOBOTH ?). WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Zeph'a-thah (fr. Heb. = ZEPHATH, Ges.), the Valley of (Heb. gêy; see VALLEY 2), the spot in which Asa joined battle with ZERAH 5 the Ethiopian (2 Chr. xiv. 10 only). It was "at" or rather "belonging to" MARESHAH. This would seem (so Mr. Grove) to exclude the possibility of its being, as suggested by Dr. Robinson, at Tell es-Sâfêh (GATH ?), which is not less than eight miles from Marash (= Mareslah). Porter (in Kitto) would identify it with a deep valley which runs past Marash down to Beit Jibrin, and thence down to the plain of Philistia.

Ze'phi (fr. Heb.) = ZEPHO (1 Chr. i. 36).

Ze'pho (fr. Heb. = watch-tower, Ges.), a son of Eliphaz, son of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11); a "DUKE" of the Edomites (ver. 15); = ZEPHI.

Ze'phon (fr. Heb.) = ZIPHON the son of Gad (Num. xxvi. 15), and ancestor of the ZEPHONITES.

Ze'phon-ites (fr. Heb.), the = a family or branch of the tribe of Gad, descended from ZEPHON or ZIPHON (Num. xxvi. 15).

Zer (fr. Heb. = fort, Ges.), a fortified town of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35 only), probably (so Mr. Grove) in the neighborhood of the S. W. side of the Lake of Gennesaret; site unknown.

Zer'ah (Heb. a rising, of light, Ges.). 1. A son of Reuel, son of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 13; 1 Chr. i. 37); a "DUKE" of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi. 17).—2. (Less properly ZARAH). Twin son, with his elder brother PHAREZ, of Judah and Tamar (xxxviii. 30; 1 Chr. ii. 6; Mat. i. 3). His descendants were ZARAHITES 1; EZRAHITES, or IZRAHITES (Num. xxvi. 20; 1 K. iv. 31; 1 Chr. xxvii. 8, 11).—3. Son of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 24); ancestor of the ZARAHITES 2; = ZOHAR 2.—4. A Gershonite Levite, son of Iddo or Adaiah (1 Chr. vi. 21, 41, [6, 26, Heb.]).—5. "The ETHIOPIAN" or Cushite, an invader of Judah, defeated by ASA (2 Chr. xiv. 9 ff.). (1.) The name, identical with the Hebrew proper name above, has been supposed to represent the Egyptian Usarken, a name almost certainly of Shemitic origin (so Mr. R. S. Poole, original author of this article). (2.) The war between Asa and Zerah appears to have taken place soon after the tenth, and shortly before the fifteenth year of Asa, probably late in the fourteenth. It therefore occurred in about the same year of Usarken II., fourth king of the twenty-second dynasty of Egypt, who began to reign about the same time as the king of Judah. Asa's reign, as far as the fourteenth year inclusive, was B. C. about 958-940, or, if Manasseh's reign be reckoned of thirty-five years, 938-920. (SHISHAK.) (3.) The first ten years of Asa's reign were undisturbed by war. Then Asa took counsel with his subjects, and walled and fortified the cities of Judah. He also maintained an army of 580,000 men, 300,000 spearmen of Judah, and 280,000 archers of Benjamin (2 Chr. xiv. 1-8). At length, probably in the fourteenth year of Asa, the anticipated danger came. Zerah, with an army of a million, invaded the kingdom, and advanced unopposed in the field as far as MARESHAH. The invading army had swarmed across the border and devoured the Philistine fields before Asa could march to meet it. "In the Valley of ZEPHATHAH at Mareslah," the two armies met. From the prayer of Asa we may judge that, when he came upon the invading army, he saw its hugeness, and so that, as he descended through a valley, it lay spread out beneath him. The Egyptian monuments enable us to picture the general disposition of Zerah's army. The chariots formed the first corps in a single or double line; behind them, massed in phalanxes, were heavy-armed troops; probably on the flanks stood archers and horsemen in lighter formations. The hills and mountains were the favorite camping-places of the Hebrews, who usually rushed down upon their more numerous or better-disciplined enemies in the plains and valleys. The chariots, broken by the charge, and with horses made unmanageable by flights of arrows, must have been forced back upon the cumbrous host behind. "So the LORD smote the Ethiopians before Asa, and before Judah; and the Ethiopians fled. And Asa and the people that [were] with him pursued them unto Gerar: and [or 'for'] the Ethiopians were overthrown, that they could not recover themselves." So complete was the overthrow, that the Hebrews could capture and spoil the cities around Gerar, which must have been in alliance with Zerah. Zerah and his people were too signally crushed to attack Asa again. (4.) Zerah has been thought to be a Cushite of Arabia, or a Cushite of Ethiopia above Egypt. But lately it has been supposed that Zerah is the Hebrew name of Usarken I., second king of the Egyptian twenty-second dynasty; or perhaps more probably Usarken II., his second successor. The composition of the army of Zerah, of Cushim (A. V. "Ethiopians") and Lubim (2 Chr. xvi. 8), closely resembles that of SHISHAK (xii. 8): both armies also had chariots and horsemen (xvi. 8, xii. 3). The Cushim might have been of an Asiatic Cush, but the LUBIM can only have been Africans. The kings of the twenty-second dynasty employed mercenaries of the Mashuwasha, a Libyan tribe, which apparently supplied the most important part of their hired force. That the army was of an Egyptian king, therefore, cannot be doubted. The name Usarken has been thought to be Sargon. It is less remote from Zerah than seems at first sight. According to Mr. Poole's computation, Zerah might have been Usarken II., but according to Dr. Hincks's, Usarken I. (5.) The defeat of Zerah's army is without parallel in the history of the Jews. We have, indeed, no distinct statement that this defeat was a miracle, yet God providentially enabled the Hebrews to vanquish a force greater in number, stronger in the appliances of war, with horsemen and chariots, more accurate in discipline, no raw levies hastily equipped from the king's armory, but a seasoned standing army, strengthened and more terrible by the addition of swarms of hungry Arabs, bred to war, and whose whole life was a time of pillage. This great deliverance is one of

Zer-a-hi'ah (fr. Heb. = Jehovah caused to be born, Ges.) 1. A priest, son of Uzzi, and ancestor of Ezra the Scribe (1 Chr. vi. 6, 51; Ezr. vii. 4); = ZARAIAS 1.—2. Father of Elihoenai of the sons of Pahath-moab (Ezr. viii. 4); = ZARAIAS 2.

Ze're'd (Heb. exuberant growth of trees, Ges.), a brook or valley (BROOK 4) running into the Dead Sea near its S. E. corner, regarded by Robinson, Gesenius, Porter (in Kitto), Fairbairn, &c., as probably the Wady el-Ahay. It lay between Moab and Edom, and is the limit of the proper term of the Israelites' wandering (Deut. ii. 14); = ZARED. Laborde, arguing from the distance, thinks that the source of the Wady Ghurundel in the Arabah is the site. The Wady el-Ahay, also known, after it issues from the mountains, as Wady el-Kurdhy and Wady (or Nahr) es-Sâfieh, is a plentiful stream, and the source of all the fertility of the Ghôr es-Sâfieh. It forms the boundary between the districts of Jebel and Kerek. SEA, THE SALT; WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING; WILLOWS, BROOK OF THE.

Zer'e-da (fr. Heb. = cooling, Ges.), the native place, according to the present Hebrew text, of JEROBOAM 1 (1 K. xi. 26 only). The Vatican MS. of the LXX. for "Zereda" substitutes Sareira, while the Alexandrine LXX. has Sarida. In the long addition to the history of Jeroboam which the LXX. inserts between 1 K. xii. 24 and 25 of the Hebrew text, Sareira appears as the town which Jeroboam fortified for Solomon in Mount Ephraim, to which he went on his return from Egypt, and where he assembled the tribe of Ephraim, and built a fortress. The LXX. further make it the residence of Jeroboam at the time of the death of his child, and substitute it for TIRZAH three times. Gesenius, Fiirst, Winer, &c., suppose Zereda = ZERADATHAH, ZERERATH, and perhaps ZARTHAN or ZARTANAH.

Ze-red'a-thah (fr. Heb. = ZEREDA, Ges.), a place between which and Succoth were the foundries for the brass-work of Solomon's Temple (2 Chr. iv. 17 only). In 1 K. vii. 46 ZARTHAN occupies the place of Zeradathah.

Zer'e-rath (fr. Heb. = ZEREDA, Ges.), a place named only in Judg. vii. 22, in describing the flight of the Midianite host before Gideon; apparently in the Jordan valley, and probably = ZERKATHAH. ZEREDA.

Ze'resh (Heb. fr. Pers. = gold, Ges.), wife of HAMAN the Agagite (Esth. v. 10, 14, vi. 13).

Ze'reth (fr. Heb. = splendor, Ges.), son of Ashur the founder of Tekoa, by his wife Heiah (1 Chr. iv. 7).

Ze'ri (fr. Heb. = IZRI, son of Jeduthun in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxv. 3).

Ze'ror (fr. Heb. = a bundle, pebble, grain, Ges.), a Benjamite, ancestor of Kish the father of Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1).

Ze-rub'ah (fr. Heb. = leprous, Ges.), mother of JEROBOAM 1 (1 K. xi. 26).

Zerub'ba-bel (Heb. son [i. e. begotten] in Babylon, Ges.), in N. T. and Apocrypha ZOROBABEL, the head of the tribe of Judah at the return from the Babylonish Captivity in the first year of Cyrus. His exact parentage is a little obscure, from his being called the son of SHEALTIEL or SALATHIEL (Ezr. iii. 2, 8, v. 2, &c.; Hag. i. 1, 12, 14, &c.), and appearing as such in the genealogies (Mat. i. 12; Lk. iii. 27), whereas in 1 Chr. iii. 19 he is represented as the son of PEDATHAH 2, and consequently as Salathiel's nephew. Probably the genealogy in

1 Chr. exhibits his true parentage (so Lord A. C. Hervey, original author of this article), and he succeeded his uncle as head of the house of Judah. (GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.) According to the Scriptures (Ezr. i. ff., &c.), he was living at Babylon in the first year of Cyrus, and was the recognized prince of Judah in the Captivity, what in later times was called "the Prince of the Captivity," or "the Prince." (RHESA.) On the issuing of Cyrus's decree he placed himself at the head of those of his countrymen "whose spirit God had raised to go up to build the House of the Lord which is in Jerusalem." It is probable, both from his having a Chaldean name (SHESHBAZZAR), and from his receiving from Cyrus the office of governor of Judea, that he was in the service of the king of Babylon. On arriving at Jerusalem, Zerubbabel's first care was to build the altar on its old site, and to restore the daily sacrifice. (JESHA 4.) But his great work, which he set about immediately, was the rebuilding of the TEMPLE. In the second month of the second year of their return, the foundation was laid with all the pomp which they could command. But there were many hindrances and delays to be encountered before the work was finished. (EZRA, BOOK OF; NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF.) The Samaritans or Cutheans (SAMARIA 3) put in a claim to join with the Jews in rebuilding the Temple; and when Zerubbabel and his companions refused to admit them into partnership, they tried to hinder them from building, and hired counsellors to frustrate their purpose. They were successful in putting a stop to the work during the seven remaining years of the reign of Cyrus, and through the eight years of Cambyses and Smerdis. (AHASUERUS 2; ARTAXERXES 1.) Nor does Zerubbabel appear quite blameless for this long delay. The difficulties in the way of building the Temple need not have stopped the work; and during this long suspension of sixteen years Zerubbabel and the rest of the people had been building costly houses for themselves. But in the second year of Darius the spirit of prophecy (HAGGAI; ZECHARIAH 1) suddenly blazed up with a most brilliant light amongst the returned captives. Their words fell like sparks upon tinder. In a moment Zerubbabel, roused from his apathy, threw his whole strength into the work, zealously seconded by Jeshua and all the people. Undeterred by a fresh attempt of their enemies to hinder the building, they went on with the work even while a reference was being made to Darius; and when, after the original decree of Cyrus had been found at Ec-batana, a favorable decree was issued by DARIUS 2, ordaining TATHAI and SETHAR-BOSZAI to assist the Jews with whatsoever they had need of at the king's expense, the work advanced so rapidly that on the third day of the month Adar, in the sixth year of Darius, the Temple was finished, and was forthwith dedicated with much pomp and rejoicing. The only other works of Zerubbabel which we learn from the Scripture history are the restoration of the courses of priests and Levites, and of the provision for their maintenance, according to the institution of David (Ezr. vi. 18; Neh. xii. 47); the registering the returned captives according to their genealogies (vii. 5); and the keeping of a Passover in the seventh year of Darius, with which last event ends all that we know of Zerubbabel's life. Zerubbabel was inferior to few of the great characters of Scripture, whether we consider the perilous undertaking to which he devoted himself, the importance, in the Divine economy, of his work, his courageous faith, or the singular distinction of being the object of so many and remarkable prophetic utterances.—The apocryphal history of Zerubbabel, which, as usual, Josephus follows, may be summed up in a few words. The story told in 1 Esd. iii.-vii. is, that on the occasion of a great feast made by Darius on his accession, three young men of his body-guard had a contest who should write the wisest sentence. That one of the three (Zerubbabel) writing "Women are strongest, but above all things Truth beareth away the victory;" and afterward defending his sentence with much eloquence, was declared by acclamation to be the wisest, and claimed for his reward, at the king's hand, that the king should perform his vow which he had vowed to rebuild Jerusalem and the Temple. Upon which the king gave him letters to all his treasurers and governors on the other side of the river, with grants of money and exemption from taxes, and sent him to rebuild Jerusalem and the Temple, accompanied by the families of which the list is given in Ezr. ii. and Neh. vii.; and then follows, in utter confusion, the history of Zerubbabel as given in Scripture. Josephus (xi. 4, § 9) has also another story, not in 1 Esdras, of Zerubbabel going to Darius and obtaining from him a decree commanding his officers in Samaria to supply the high-priest with all that he required for sacrifices, &c.—It has already been observed that in Mat. i. 12, and Lk. iii. 27, Zerubbabel is represented as son of Salathiel, though the Book of Chronicles tells us he was the son of Pedaiiah, and nephew of Salathiel. It is of more moment to remark that, while St. Matthew deduces his line from Jeconias (= Jehoiachin) and Solomon, St. Luke deduces it through Neri and Nathan. Zerubbabel (so Lord A. C. Hervey) was the legal successor and heir of Jehoiachin's royal estate, the grandson of Neri, and the lineal descendant of Nathan the son of David. GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST; HANANIAH 8.

Zer-u-lah, or Ze-ru-lah (fr. Heb. = cleft, wounded, Ges.), the mother of the three leading heroes of David's army—ABISHAI, JOAB, and ASAHAI 1—the "sons of Zeruiah." She and ABIGAIL 2 are specified in 1 Chr. ii. 16 as sisters of the sons of Jesse, and in 2 Sam. xvii. 25 Abigail is called "the daughter of Nabal, sister to Zeruiah, Joab's mother." (JESSE; NABASH 2.) Zeruiah's husband, not mentioned in the Bible, is called by Josephus (vii. 1, § 3) Suri.

Ze'tham (Heb. = ZETHAN? Ges.), a Gershonite Levite, son or grandson of Laadan (1 Chr. xxiii. 8, xxvi. 22).

Ze'than (fr. Heb. = olive-tree, Ges.), a Benjamite, son of Bilhan (1 Chr. vii. 10).

Zi'a (Heb. motion, Ges.), one of the Gadites who dwelt in Bashan (1 Chr. v. 13).

Zi'ba (fr. Heb. = statue, Ges.), "a servant of the house of Saul," one of Saul's freedmen (so Jos. vii. 5, § 5), who had fifteen sons and twenty servants, and was prominent in the transactions between DAVID and MEPHIBOSHETH (2 Sam. ix. 2-12, xvi. 1-4, xix. 17, 29).

Zib'e-on (fr. Heb. = dye, Ges.), father of ANAH, whose daughter Aholibamah was Esau's wife (Gen. xxxvi. 2). Although called a Hivite, he probably = Zibben the son of Seir the Horite (ver. 20, 24, 29; 1 Chr. i. 38, 40).

Zib'i-a, or Zib'i-a (fr. Heb. = roc, Ges.), a Benjamite, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chr. viii. 9).

Zib'i-ah, or Zib'i-ah (fr. Heb. = roc, Ges.), a native of Beer-sheba, and mother of King JOASH 1 (2 K. xii. 1; 2 Chr. xxiv. 1).

Zich'ri [zik-] (Heb. remembered, renowned, Ges.). 1. Son of Ishar the son of Kohath (Ex. vi. 21, incorrectly "Zithri" in some editions).—2. A Benjamite chief, son of Shimhi (1 Chr. viii. 19).—3. A Benjamite chief, son of Shashak (viii. 23).—4. A Benjamite chief, son of Jeroham (viii. 27).—5. A Levite, son of Asaph (ix. 15); probably = ZABDI 4 and ZACCUR 3.—6. A Levite, descended from Eli-ezer the son of Moses (xxvi. 25).—7. Father of the Reubenite chief Eliezer (xxvii. 16).—8. Father of Jehoshaphat's captain Amasiah (2 Chr. xvii. 16).—9. Father of Elishaphat, a captain associated with Jehoiada (xxiii. 1).—10. An Ephraimite hero in Pekah's army, who slew MAASIAH 17, &c. (xxviii. 7).—11. Father or ancestor of JOEL 14 (Neh. xi. 9).—12. A priest, chief of the family of Abijah, in the days of High-priest Joiakim (xii. 17).

Zid'dim (fr. Heb. = the sides, Ges.), a fortified town of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35); probably (so Mr. Grove, &c., after Schwarz) at the modern village of Hattin, about five miles nearly W. of Tiberias.

Zid-ki-jah (fr. Heb. = ZEDEKIAH), a priest, or family of priests, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 1).

Zi'don (fr. Heb. Tsidôn = fishing or fishery, Ges.), or Sid'on (Gr. and L. fr. Heb.) (Gen. x. 19, 15; Josh. xi. 8, xix. 28; Judg. i. 31, xviii. 28; 1 Chr. i. 13; Is. xxiii. 2, 4, 12; Jer. xxv. 22, xxvii. 3; Ez. xxviii. 21, 22; Joel iii. 4 [iv. 4]; Zech. ix. 2; 2 Esd. i. 11; Jd. ii. 28; 1 Mc. v. 15; Mat. xi. 21, 22, xv. 21; Mk. iii. 8, vii. 24, 31; Lk. iv. 26, vi. 17, x. 13, 14; Acts xii. 20, xxvii. 3), an ancient and wealthy city of PHENICIA, on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, in latitude 30° 34' 05" N., less than twenty English miles N. of TYRE. Its modern name is Saida. It is situate in the narrow plain between Lebanon and the sea. From a Biblical point of view, this city is inferior in interest to its neighbor Tyre, with which its name is so often associated. Justin says that the inhabitants of Sidon, when their city had been reduced by the king of Ascalon, founded Tyre the year before the capture of Troy. But Justin is a weak authority for any disputed historical fact (so Mr. Twissleton, original author of this article), and in contradiction of his statement, it has been insisted on, that the relation between a colony and the mother-city among the Phenicians was sacred, and that as the Tyrians never acknowledged this relation toward Zidon, the supposed connection between Tyre and Zidon is morally impossible. There is otherwise nothing improbable in Zidonians having founded Tyre, as the Tyrians are called Zidonians, but the Zidonians are never called Tyrians. And this circumstance tends to show that in early times Zidon was the more influential of the two cities. This is shadowed forth by the statement that Zidon was the first-born of Canaan (Gen. x. 15; 1 Chr. i. 13), and is implied in the name of "Great Zidon," or "the Metropolis Zidon" (Josh. xi. 8 [margin "Zidon-rabbah"], xix. 28). It is confirmed, likewise, by the use of "Sidonians" as = Phenicians, or Canaanites (xiii. 6; Judg. xviii. 7); and by the reason assigned for there being none to deliver the people of LAISH from massacre, that "they were far from the Zidonians," though the Tyrians were much nearer and of substantially the same religion (xviii. 28). From the time of Solomon to the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar Zidon is not often directly mentioned in the Bible, and it appears to have been subordinate to Tyre. When the people called "Zidonians" is mentioned, it sometimes seems that the PHENICIANS of the plain of Zidon are meant (1 K. v. 6, xi. 1, 5, 33, xvi. 31; 2 K. xxiii. 13). And this seems to be equally true of "merchants of Zidon," "Zidon," and "daughter of Zidon," in Is.

xxiii. There is no doubt, however, that Zidon itself, the city properly so called, was threatened by Joel (iii. 4) and Jeroniah (xxvii. 3). Still, all that is known respecting it during the epoch is very scanty, amounting to scarcely more than that one of its

sources of gain was trade in slaves (SLAVE), the Zidonians selling inhabitants of Palestine; that the city was governed by kings (Jer. xxvii. 3, xxv. 22); that, previous to Nebuchadnezzar's invasion, it had furnished mariners to Tyre (Ez. xxvii. 8); that, at one period it was subject, in some sense, to Tyre; and that, when Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, invaded Phenicia, Zidon seized the opportunity to revolt. During the Persian domination, Zidon seems to have attained its highest prosperity; and it is recorded that, toward the close of that period, it far excelled all other Phenician cities in wealth and importance. Very probably the long siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar had tended to enrich Zidon at the expense of Tyre. In the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, the Sidonians were a preëminently important element of his naval power. But while the PERSIANS in the time of Artaxerxes Ochus were making preparations in Phenicia to put down the revolt in Egypt, some Persian satraps and generals behaved oppressively and insolently to Sidonians in the Sidonian division of TRIPOLIS. On this the Sidonian people projected a revolt; and having first concerted arrangements with other Phenician cities, and made a treaty with the Egyptian king, they seized and put to death the insolent Persians, expelled the satraps from Phenicia, strengthened their defences, equipped a fleet of 100 triremes, and prepared for a desperate resistance. But their King Tennes betrayed into the power of the Persian king 100 of the most distinguished citizens of Sidon, who were all shot to death with javelins. Five hundred other citizens, who went out to the king with ensigns of supplication, shared the same fate; the Persian troops were treacherously admitted within the gates, and occupied the city walls. The Sidonians, before the arrival of Ochus, had burnt their vessels to prevent any one's leaving the town; and when they saw themselves surrounded by the Persian troops, they shut themselves up with their families, and set fire each man to his own house (B. C. 351). Forty thousand persons are said to have perished in the flames; Tennes was put to death by Ochus; and the privilege of searching the ruins was sold for money. After this dismal tragedy, Sidon gradually recovered from the blow. The battle of Issus was fought B. C. 333, and then the inhabitants of the restored city, from hatred of Darius and the Persians, opened their gates to ALEXANDER THE GREAT of their own accord. The Sidonian fleet in joining Alexander was an essential element of his success against Tyre. From this time Sidon, dependent on the fortunes of war in the contests between the successors of Alexander, ceases to play any important political part in history. It became, however, again a flourishing town. Strabo, in his account of Phenicia, says of Tyre and Sidon, "Both were illustrious and splendid formerly, and now; but which should be called the capital of Phenicia, is a matter of dispute between the inhabitants." According to Strabo, it was on the mainland, on a fine naturally-formed harbor; its inhabitants cultivated arithmetic and astronomy, and had the best opportunities for acquiring a knowledge of these and of all other branches of philosophy. Strabo mentions distinguished philosophers, natives of Sidon, as Boëthus, with whom he studied the PHILOSOPHY of Aristotle, and his brother Diodotus. The names of both these are Greek, and probably, in Strabo's time, GREEK was the language of the educated classes at least, both in Tyre and Sidon. A few years after Strabo wrote, Sidon was visited by Christ. It is about fifty miles from Nazareth, and is the most northern city mentioned in connection with His journeys.<sup>1</sup> Pliny notes the manufacture of GLASS here. In later ages Sidon has shared generally the fortunes of TYRE, except that it was several times taken and retaken during the Crusades, and suffered accordingly more than Tyre previous to its being abandoned to the Mohammedans in 1291. Since that time it never seems to have fallen quite so low as Tyre. Through Fakhr ed-Din, emir of the Druzes 1594-1634, and the establishment at Sidon of French commercial houses, it had a revival of trade in the seventeenth and part of the eighteenth century, and became the principal city on the Syrian coast for commerce between the East and the West. This was terminated in 1791 by oppression and violence. The town still shows signs of former wealth.<sup>2</sup> Its ancient harbor was filled up with stones and earth by Fakhr ed-Din, so that only small boats can now enter it. The trade between Syria and Europe now mainly passes through Beirut.—At the base of the mountains E. of Sidon are numerous sepulchres in the rock, and there are likewise sepulchral caves in the adjoining plain. In January, 1855, a sarcophagus of black syenite was discovered in one of these caves, its lid hewn in the form of a mummy with the face bare, upon the lid a perfect Phœnician inscription in twenty-two lines,<sup>3</sup> and on the head of the sarcophagus another almost as long. This sarcophagus is now in the Louvre in Paris. ZIDONIANS.

Zi-de-ni-ans, or Si-de-ni-ans = the inhabitants of ZIDON. They were among the nations of Canaan left to practise the Israelites in the art of war (Judg. iii. 3), and colonies of them appear to have spread up into the hill country from Lebanon to Misrephoth-maim (Josh. xiii. 4, 6), whence in later times they hewed cedar-trees for David and Solomon (1 Chr. xxii. 4). They oppressed the Israelites on their first entrance into the country (Judg. x. 12), and appear to have lived a luxurious, reckless life (xviii. 7); they were skilful in hewing timber (1 K. v. 6), and were employed for this purpose by Solomon. They were idolaters, and worshipped ASHTORETH as their tutelary goddess (xi. 5, 33; 2 K. xxiii. 13), as well as the sun-god BAAL, from whom their king was named (1 K. xvi. 31). "Zidonians" among the Hebrews appears = PHENICIANS among the Greeks. GLASS; HANDICRAFT.

Zif. MONTH.

Zi'ha (fr. Heb. = dry, thirsty, Ges.). 1. Ancestor of a family of Ne'hinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 43; Neh. vii. 46).—2. Chief of the Nethinim in Ophel (xi. 21); probably representative or descendant of No. 1.

Zik'lag (fr. Heb. = outpouring of a fountain [so Sim.]? Ges.), a place first mentioned in the catalogue of the towns of Judah (Josh. xv. 31); next among the places allotted out of the territory of Judah to Simeon (xix. 5); next as in the possession of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxvii. 6), when it was, at David's request, bestowed upon him by Achish, king of Gath. DAVID resided there for a year and four months (7; xxxi. 14, 23; 1 Chr. xii. 1, 20). There he received the news of Saul's death (2 Sam. i. 1, iv. 10). He then relinquished it for Hebron (ii. 1). Ziklag is finally mentioned as reinhabited by the people of Judah after their return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 28). The town was certainly in "the south" (JUDAH 1 [I.]); yet this is difficult to reconcile with its connection with the Philistines, and with the fact—which follows from 1 Sam. xxx. 9, 10, 21—that it was N. of the Brook BESOR. But with a portion of the south country the Philistines had a connection which may have lasted from the time of their residence there in the days of Abraham and Isaac. Mr. Rowlands (in Fairbairn) identifies Ziklag with 'Aslûj, or Kaslûj, an ancient site with ancient wells, about four hours S. S. E. of Khulanah (Chesil?), and about three hours S. E. or E. S. E. of Zebûta (Zephath?). The identification is supported by Mr. Wilton (Negéb, 209); but it is impossible at present to do more than name it (so Mr. Grove).

Zil'lah (fr. Heb. = shade, Ges.), one of the two wives of LAMECH 1, to whom he addressed his song (Gen. iv. 19, 22, 23). She was the mother of TUBALCAIN and NAAMAH 1.

Zil'pah (Heb. a dropping, Ges.), a Syrian given by LABAN to his daughter LEAH as an attendant, and by Leah to JACOB as a CONCUBINE; mother of GAD and ASHER (Gen. xxix. 24, xxx. 9-13, xxxv. 26, xxxvii. 2, xlv. 18).

Zil'thal (fr. Heb. = shadow [i. e. protection] of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. A Benjaminite chief, son of Shimhi (1 sepulchre or disturbing his remains. It mentions his mother as priestess of Ashtoreth (Ashtoreth), and records his conquest of "Dor and Joppa, and ample corn-lands which are at the root of Dan" (Thn. i. 200-1).

<sup>2</sup> The population, according to ecclesiastical returns (allways understated), is said to be 6,800 Moslems and Melchizedek, 850 Greek Catholics, 750 Maronites, 150 Greeks, and 300 Jews. The entire population is therefore not far from 10,000 (Thn. i. 154).

Chr. viii. 20).—2. A Manassite captain who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 20).

Zim'mah (Heb. plau, mischief, Ges.). 1. A Gershonite Levite, "son" of Jahath (1 Chr. vi. 20).—2. A Gershonite, son of Shimai, and grandson of Jahath (vi. 42); probably = No. 1.—3. Father or ancestor of Joah, a Gershonite in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 12); perhaps = No. 1.

Zim'ran (Heb. = ZIMRI, Ges.), son of ABRAHAM, eldest by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chr. i. 32). His descendants are not mentioned. Some would identify Zimran with ZIMRI 5; others suggest a comparison with Zambran, the chief city of the Cinædopolitæ, who dwelt on the Red Sea, W. of Mecca; Hitzig and Lengerke connect Zimran with Zimiris, a district of Ethiopia, mentioned by Pliny; but Grotius, with more plausibility, finds a trace of it in the Zamerani, a tribe of the interior of Arabia (so Mr. Wright).

Zim'ri (Heb. sung, celebrated in song, Ges.). 1. Son of Salu; a Simeonite chieftain, slain by PHINEHAS with the Midianitish princess COZBI (Num. xxv. 14, comp. 6 ff.). (BAAL-PEOR; MIDIAN).—2. Fifth sovereign of the separate kingdom of Israel, of which he occupied the throne for seven days. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) Originally in command of half the chariots in the royal army, he gained the crown by the murder of ELAH 3. But the army then besieging Gibbethon, when they heard of Elah's murder, proclaimed their general OMRI king. He immediately marched against Tirzah, and took the city. Zimri retreated into the innermost part of the late king's palace, set it on fire, and perished in the ruins (1 K. xvi. 9-20).—3. One of the five sons of Zerah the son of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 6); = ZABDI 1.—4. Son of Jehoadah and descendant of Saul (viii. 36, ix. 42).—5. An obscure name, mentioned (Jer. xxv. 25) in probable connection with DEDAN, TEMA, BUZ, ARABIA, the "MINGLED PEOPLE." Nothing further is known respecting Zimri, but it may possibly be the same as, or derived from, ZIMRAN.

Zim (fr. Heb. = a low palm-tree, Ges.), the name given to a portion of the desert tract between the Dead Sea, Ghôr, and Arabah on the E., and the general plateau of the Tih which stretches westward. (WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.) The country in question consists of two or three successive terraces of mountain converging to an acute angle at the Dead Sea's southern verge, toward which also they slope. Here the drainage finds its chief vent by the Wady el-Fikrah into the Ghôr, the remaining waters running by smaller channels into the Arabah, and ultimately by the Wady el-Jeib also to the Ghôr. Judging from natural features, it is likely that the portion between, and drained by these wadys, is the region in question; but where it ended westward is quite uncertain. KADESH lay in it, or on this unknown boundary, and here also Idumea was contiguous with Judah; since Kadesh was a city in the border of Edom (Num. xiii. 21, xx. 1, xxvii. 14, xxxiii. 36, xxxiv. 3; Josh. xv. 1).

Zi'na (Heb.) = ZIZAN (1 Chr. xxiii. 10, comp. 11).

Zi'on (fr. Heb. Tsiyôn = sunny place, sunny mount, Ges.), in N. T. SION. JERUSALEM, pp. 458, 461-2, &c.

Zi'or (fr. Heb. = smallness, Ges.), a town in the mountains of Judah, named next after HEBRON (Josh. xv. 54 only); perhaps, as suggested by Mr. Grove, at the modern Sa'ir, a small village about six miles N. N. E. of Hebron.

Ziph (Heb. a flowing, Ges.), the name borne by two towns of Judah. 1. In the S.; named between ITHNAN and TELEM (Josh. xv. 24 only). Mr. Rowlands (in Fairbairn) supposes the name may be found in the pass es-Sufîh, and the site of the town may be near the top of the pass. (AKRABBIM).—2. In the highland district; named between CARMEL and JUTTAH (xv. 55). Near it some of the greatest perils and happiest escapes of DAVID took place (1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 15, 24, xxvi. 2). The "wood" near it in David's time has disappeared; but the "wilderness" (i. e. waste pasture-ground; DESERT 2) remains. The name of Zif is found about three miles S. of Hebron, attached to a rounded hill of 100 feet or more in height, called Tell Zif. About half a mile E. of this tell on a low hill or ridge are ruins regarded by Robinson (i. 492) as the proper ruins of Ziph. Mr. Grove supposes the ruins on the top of the tell itself to be those of the ancient place fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 8). In 1 Chr. ii. 42 MESSA 3 is called "the father (i. e. founder) of Ziph" (see ZIPH, below).

Ziphah (Heb. = ZIPH), son of Jehaleleel (1 Chr. iv. 16; comp. ZIPH).

Ziph'im (Heb. pl.), Ziph'im [-imz] (fr. Heb.), the = the inhabitants of ZIPH 2 (title of Ps. lrv.); = ZIPHITES.

Ziph'ites (fr. Heb. Ziphi, singular of Ziphim, used collectively), the = ZIPHIM (1 Sam. xxiii. 19; xxi. 1).

Ziph'on (fr. Heb. = a looking out, Ges.), son of Gad (Gen. xli. 16); = ZEPHON.

Ziph'ron (Heb. sweet odor, Ges.), a place between ZEPAD and HAZAR-KNAN, on the N. boundary of the Promised Land as specified by Moses (Num. xxxiv. 9). Dr. W. M. Thomson (in B. S. v. 685) suggests an identification with a ruin called Zephron or Zaphron, about twelve miles S. S. E. of Hamath (Hamath).

Zip'por (fr. Heb. = a little bird, sparrow, Ges.), father of BALAK, king of Moab (Num. xxii. 2, 4, 10, 16, xxiii. 18; Josh. xxiv. 9; Judg. xi. 25).

Zip'po'rah, or Zip'po-rah (fr. Heb., fem. of ZIPPOR, Ges.), daughter of Reuel or JETHRO, the priest of Midian; wife of MOSES, and mother of his two sons GERSHOM 1 and ELIEZER 2 (Ex. ii. 21, iv. 25, xviii. 2, comp. 6). Many consider Zipporah the Cushite (A. V. "Ethiopian") wife who furnished MIRIAM and AARON with the pretext for their attack on MOSES (Num. xii. 1, &c.; comp. Hab. iii. 7; ETHIOPIAN WOMAN). Mr. Grove supposes, with Ewald, that the Cushite was a second wife, or a concubine, taken by Moses during the march through the wilderness.

Zith'ri (fr. Heb. Sithri = protection of Jehovah, Ges.), a Kohathite Levite, son of Uzziel (Ex. vi. 22). In verse 21, "Zithri" (in some copies) should be "Zichri," as in A. V. of 1611.

Ziz (fr. Heb. = brightness, flower, wing, Ges.), the CLIFF; the pass (CLIFF) by which the horde of Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunim, made their way up from the shores of the Dead Sea to the wilderness of Judah near Tekoa (2 Chr. xx. 16 only, comp. 20); probably the pass of 'Ain Jidy (Engedi)—"the very same route," as Dr. Robinson remarks, "which is taken by the Arabs in their marauding expeditions at the present day." The name may perhaps be traceable in el-Husishah, a tract of tableland above the pass, bounded on the N. by Wady Husishah (so Mr. Grove).

Chr. iv. 37).—2. Son of Rehoboam by Maachah (2 Chr. xi. 20).

Zizah (Heb. = ZIZA, Ges.), a Gershonite Levite, second son of Shimei (1 Chr. xxiii. 11) = ZANA.

Zoan (Heb. Tō'an; Gr. and L. Tanis; both from Egyptian = low region, Ges., Fū.; but see below), an ancient city of lower Egypt, near the eastern border. Its Shemitic name (so Mr. R. S. Poole, original author of this article) indicates a place of departure from a country. The Egyptian name Ha-awar, or

Pn-awar (= Avaris), means the abode (or house) of going out (or departure). Zoan, or Tanis, is situated in N. latitude 31°, E. longitude 31° 55', on the E. bank of the canal which was formerly the Tanitic branch of the Nile. Anciently a rich plain—then known as the "Fields," or "Plains," or "Marshes," or "Pasture-lands," and watered by four of the seven branches of the Nile, but now almost covered by the great lake Menzalah—extended due E. as far as Pelusium (SIN), about thirty miles distant, gradually narrowing toward the east. Tanis, while Egypt was ruled by native kings, was the chief town of this territory, and an important post toward the eastern frontier. It is said to have been rebuilt, strongly walled, and garrisoned with 240,000 men, by Salatis the first of the Shepherd kings.

Manetho explicitly states Avaris to have been older than the time of the Shepherds; but there are reasons for questioning his accuracy in this matter. The name is more likely to be of foreign than of

Avaris has the simple signification abode of departure. A remarkable passage in Num. xiii. 22—

"Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt"—seems to determine the question. Hebron was already built in Abraham's time, and the Shepherd-invasion may be dated about the same period. Whether some older village or city were succeeded by Avaris matters little: its history begins in the reign of Salatis. What the Egyptian records tell us of this city may be briefly stated.

Apepee, probably Apophis of the fifteenth dynasty, a Shepherd king who reigned shortly before the eighteenth dynasty, built a temple here to Set, the Egyptian Baal, and worshipped no other god. According to Manetho, the Shepherds, after 511 years of rule, were expelled from all Egypt and shut up in Avaris, whence they were allowed to depart by capitulation about B. C. 1500. Rameses II. embellished the great temple of Tanis, and was followed by his son Menptah. Mr. Poole believes that the Pharaoh of Joseph as well as the oppressors were Shepherds, the former ruling at Memphis and Zoan, the latter probably at Zoan only. Zoan is mentioned in connection with the Plagues in such a manner as to leave no doubt that it is the city spoken of in the narrative in Exodus as that where Pharaoh dwelt (Ps lxxviii. 42, 43). After the fall of the empire, the first dynasty is the twenty-first, called by Manetho that of Tanites. Its history is obscure. The twenty-third dynasty is called Tanite, and its last king is probably Sethos, the contemporary of Tirhakah, mentioned by Herodotus. At this time Tanis once more appears in sacred history as a place to which came ambassadors of Hoshea, or Ahaz, or possibly of Hezekiah (Is. xxx. 4). As mentioned with the frontier-town Tahpanhes, Tanis is not necessarily the capital. But the same prophet perhaps more distinctly points to a Tanite line—

"the princes of Zoan" (xix. 18). The doom of Zoan is foretold by Ezekiel, "I will set fire in Zoan"

(xxx. 14), where it occurs among the cities to be taken by Nebuchadnezzar.—The "field of Zoan," now the plain of Sân, has become a barren waste; and one of the principal abodes of the Pharaohs is now the habitation of fishermen, the resort of wild beasts, and infested with reptiles and malignant fevers. It is remarkable for the height and extent of its mounds, which are upward of a mile from N. to S., and nearly three-quarters of a mile from E. to W.

The area in which the sacred enclosure of the temple stood is about 1,500 feet by 1,250, surrounded by mounds of fallen houses. The temple was adorned by Rameses II. with numerous obelisks and most of its sculptures. It is very ruinous, but its remains prove its former grandeur.

Zoar (fr. Heb. = smallness, Ges.), an ancient city, originally named BELA (Gen. xiv. 2, 8). It was in intimate connection with the cities of the "plain of JORDAN"—SODOM, GOMORRAH, ADMAH, and ZEBORIM (see also xiii. 10; but not x. 19); and its king took part with the kings of those towns in the battle with CHEDORLAOMER, &c., which ended in their defeat and the capture of LOT. In the general destruction of the cities of the plain, Zoar was spared to afford shelter to Lot (xix. 22, 23, 30). It is mentioned in the account of the death of Moses as one of the landmarks which bounded his view from Pisgah (Deut. xxxiv. 3), and is connected with Moab in Is. xv. 5 and Jer. xlviii. 34. I. Zoar was situated in the same district with the four cities already mentioned, viz. in the "plain" or "circle" (PLAIN 3) "of the Jordan," and the narrative of Gen. xix. evidently implies that it was very near to Sodom (ver. 15, 23, 27). The common opinion among Biblical scholars has been, and is, that the "plain of the Jordan" in Gen. xiii. &c., extends to the southern end of the Dead Sea. Mr. Grove, Mr. Tristram, &c., argue that the plain of the Jordan was at the N. of the Dead Sea, and that the cities of the plain must therefore have been situated there, because—(a.) The Jordan must have discharged itself into the lake in Abraham's time pretty nearly where it does now. (SEA, THE SALT, II., § 47). (b.) The plain was within view of the spot from which Abraham and Lot took their survey of the country (Gen. xiii. 1–13). Now the lower part of the course of the Jordan is plainly visible from the hills E. of Beitin. On the other hand, the southern half of the Dead Sea is not only too far off to be discerned, but is actually shut out from view by intervening heights. To this argument it is replied that the narrative does not necessarily imply either that the cities were near, or that every part of the plain in which they were contained was either situated E. of the spot where Abram and Lot stood, or distinctly visible from that spot. Lot's view embraced so much of the valley as to give a correct idea of the fruitfulness, &c., of the whole; and "Lot journeyed east" from Bethel on his way thither. "The argument assumes that there has been no essential change in the plain and the sea since that day, except what would result in the former from disuse of the artificial irrigation which then made it so fruitful. But the phrase 'before the Lord destroyed,' &c. (ver. 10), plainly indicates a marked change in consequence of that event; and there is certainly nothing in the Scripture narrative inconsistent with the general belief that the catastrophe of the cities, which destroyed also 'the country,' wrought a great and general change in 'the land of Sodom and Gomorrah,' thus turned 'into ashes.' If the cultivated plain or valley, with or without a lake of fresh water, in a part of the present bed of the sea, then extended as far as the present southern limit of the sea and adjacent plain, and the cities were in that section of it, the fact would not conflict with the sacred record" (Dr. S. Wolcott, in B. S. xxv. 129). (c.) In the account of the view of Moses from Pisgah the "plain" or "circle" is more strictly defined as "the plain (or 'circle') of the plain of Jericho" (A. V. "plain of the valley of Jericho"), and Zoar is mentioned in immediate connection with it ("unto Zoar"). Mr. Grove considers it impossible to believe that the "plain of Jericho" can have been extended to the southern end of the Dead Sea, and therefore regards it as highly probable that the Zoar of the Pentateuch was to the N. of the Dead Sea, not far from its northern end, in the general parallel of Jericho, and on the eastern side of the valley, because the descendants of Lot, the Moabites and Ammonites, are in possession of that country as their original seat when they first appear in the sacred history. Mr. Tristram, on the other hand, would place Zoar on the N. W. side of the Dead Sea, between Wady Dabûr and Râs Feshkhah, because this was the limit of Moses' view from NEBO. Porter (in Kitto, art. "Sodom") sustains the common view by remarking that "names derived from rivers and towns often extend to a wide region; and the very word circuit ('PLAIN' 3) would seem to denote a district defined by some great natural boundaries, such as the mountains which shut in the Jordan valley," and that "it is not uncommon at the present day for geographers to give the name 'Jordan valley' to the whole valley reaching from Hermon to Jebel Usdum." II. The passages in Isaiah and Jeremiah in which Zoar is mentioned imply that it was a city of MOAB, and therefore E. of the Dead Sea. III. Among later writers, including Ptolemy and Josephus, Eusebius and Jerome, the crusaders and later historians, travellers, geographers, &c., the representation is almost unanimous that the Zoar of the Bible was at the southeastern end of the Dead Sea. Thus Josephus (i. 11, § 4) says that it retained its name to his day, that it was at the further end of the Asphaltic Lake, in Arabia—by which he means the country lying S. E. of the lake, whose capital was Petra. Fulcher (a monk or priest, who accompanied Robert of Normandy in the first Crusade, A. D. 1096, &c.) states that "having encircled the southern part of the lake on the road from Hebron to Petra, we found there a large village which was said to be Segor, in a charming situation, and abounding with dates. Here we began to enter the mountains of Arabia." The natural inference from the description of Fulcher is that Segor lay in the Wady Kerak, the ordinary road, then and now, from the S. of the Dead Sea to the eastern highlands. The conjecture of Irby and Mangles, that the extensive ruins which they found in the lower part of this Wady were those of Zoar, is therefore probably accurate. The name Dra'a or Dera'ah, which they, Poole and Burekhardt, give to the valley, may be a corruption of Zoar. Zoar was an episcopal see, represented by its bishops at the Council of Chalcedon (A. D. 451), and of Constantinople (A. D. 536). M. de Sauley places Zoar in the Wady Zuweirah, the pass leading from Hebron to the Dead Sea. But the names Zuweirah and Zoar are not nearly so similar in the originals as they are in their Western forms. Zôghal (in Um Zôghal) is much nearer the Hebrew of Zoar.

Zô'bi, or Zô'bah (both fr. Heb. = station, Ges.), a portion of SYRIA, which formed a separate kingdom in the time of Saul, David, and Solomon. Prof. Rawlinson, original author of this article, regards it as lying chiefly eastward of Coelestria, and extending thence N. E. and E. toward, if not even to, the Euphrates. Zobah appears first in Saul's time among his enemies, a separate country, governed, apparently, by a number of kings who owned no common head or chief (1 Sam. xiv. 47). Some forty years later, HADADDEZER, son of Rehob, ruler of Zobah, had wars with Toi, king of Hamath (2 Sam. viii. 10), and held various petty Syrian princes as vassals under his yoke (x. 19). DAVID (viii. 3) attacked Hadadezer in the early part of his reign, defeated his army, and took from him a thousand chariots, seven hundred (seven thousand, 1 Chr. xviii. 4) horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen. Hadadezer's allies, the Syrians of Damascus, were defeated in a great battle. The wealth of Zobah is very apparent in the narrative of this campaign. (ARMS, II. 6.) It is not clear whether the Syrians of Zobah submitted and became tributary on this occasion, or whether, although defeated, they were able to maintain their independence. At any rate, a few years later, the Syrians of Zobah, hired by the Ammonites, were again in arms against David. The allies were defeated in a great battle by Joab, who engaged the Syrians in person (2 Sam. x. 9). Hadadezer, upon this, drew to his aid the Syrians beyond the Euphrates (1 Chr. xix. 16). A battle was fought near HELAM, where the Syrians of Zobah and their new allies were defeated with great slaughter. Zobah, however, though subdued, continued to cause trouble to the Jewish kings. A man of Zobah, Rezon, son of Eliadah, made himself master of Damascus, where he proved a fierce adversary to Israel all through Solomon's reign (1 K. xi. 23-25). Solomon also was, it would seem, engaged in a war with Zobah itself (2 Chr. viii. 3). This is the last that we hear of Zobah in Scripture. The name, however, is found at a later date in the inscriptions of Assyria, where the kingdom of Zobah seems to intervene between Hamath and Damascus. ARAM; HAMATH-ZOBAB.

Zo-be-bah (fr. Heb. = the slow-moving, Ges.), son of Coz, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 8).

Zo'har (fr. Heb. = whiteness, Ges.). 1. Father of Ephron the Hittite (Gen. xxiii. 8, xiv. 9).—2. Son of Simeon (Gen. xlii. 10; Ex. vi. 15); = ZERAH 2.

Zo'he-leth (Heb. serpent, Ges.), the Stone. This was "by EN-ROGEL" (1 K. i. 9); and, therefore, if En-rogel be the modern Um ed-Deraj, this stone, "where Adonijah slew sheep and oxen," was in all likelihood not far from the well of the Virgin. (JERUSALEM; SILOAM.) The Targumists translate it the rolling stone; and Rashi affirms that it was a large stone on which the young men tried their strength in attempting to roll it. Others make it the serpent-stone. Others connect it with running water; but there is nothing strained in making it the stone of the conduit, from its proximity to the great rock-conduit or conduits that poured into Siloam. STONES.

Zo'heth (Heb. corpulent, strong, Fu.), son of Ishi of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 20).

Zo'phah (fr. Heb. = a cruse, Ges.), son of Helem, or Hotham, the son of Heber, an Asherite (1 Chr. vii. 35, 36).

Zo'phal (fr. Heb. = ZUPH), a Kohathite Levite, son of Elkanah and ancestor of Samuel (1 Chr. vi. 26 [Heb. 11]); = ZUPH.

Zophim (Heb. watchers, lookers-out, Targum of Onkelos, Syr.), the field of; a spot on or near the top of PISGAH, from which Balaam had his second view of the encampment of Israel (Num. xxiii. 14). If the Heb. sadeh (A. V. "field") may be taken in its usual sense, then "the field of Zophim" was a cultivated spot high up on the top of the range of Pisgah. But that word is the almost invariable term for a portion of the upper district of Moab; and Mr. Grove asks, May not the field of Zophim be the same place as "Mizpeh of Moab?" (MIZPAH 2.) Porter (in Kitto) would identify the field of Zophim with a plateau of arable land reaching from Heshbon to the ruins of Mā'in (Raal-meon).

Zo'rah (fr. Heb. = hornet's town, Ges.), a city of Dan (Josh. xix. 41), previously mentioned (xv. 33), in the catalogue of Judah, among the places in the lowland district (A. V. "ZOREAH"). In both lists it is in immediate proximity to ESHTAOL. Zorah was the residence of MANOAH and the native place of SAMSON. It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 10), and reinhabited after the Captivity (A. V. "ZAREAH," Neh. xi. 29). In the Onomasticon it is mentioned as lying some ten miles N. of ELEUTHEROPOLIS, on the road to Nicopolis (= EMMAUS 2). By the Jewish traveller hap-Parchi, it is specified as three hours S. E. of Lydd. These notices agree in direction—though in neither is the distance nearly sufficient—with the modern village of Sur'ah, which lies just below the brow of a sharp-pointed conical hill, at the shoulder of the ranges which there meet and form the northern side of the Wady Ghurāb, the northernmost of the two branches which unite just below Sur'ah, and form the great Wady Surār. ZAREATHITES; ZORATHITES; ZORITES.

Zorath-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the people of ZORAH, mentioned in 1 Chr. iv. 2 as descended from SHOBAI 3.

Zo're-ah (fr. Heb.) = ZORAH (Josh. xv. 33).

Zor'ites (fr. Heb. = ZORATHITES, Ges.), the, are named in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 54) apparently amongst the descendants of Salma and near connections of Joab (so Mr. Grove); the Targum, Gesenius, Fürst, make Zorites = ZORATHITES.

iv. 13, v. 5-70, vi. 2-29; Eccclus. xlix. 11; Mat. i. 12, 13; Lk. iii. 27).

Zu'ar (fr. Heb. = smallness, Ges.), father of Nethaneel the chief of Issachar at the Exodus (Num. i. 8, ii. 5, vii. 18, 23, x. 15).

Zuph (fr. Heb. = honey-comb, Ges.), the Land of; a district at which Saul and his servant arrived after passing through those of SHALISHA, of SHALIM, and of the Benjamites (1 Sam. iv. 5 only). It evidently contained the city in which they encountered Samuel (ver. 6), and that was not far from the "tomb of RACHEL." The only trace of the name of Zuph in modern Palestine, in any suitable locality, is to be found in Sōba, a well-known place about seven miles due W. of Jerusalem, and five miles S. W. of Neby Samwil. But this is conjecture, and unless the land of Zuph extended a good distance E. of Sōba, the city in which the meeting with Samuel took place could hardly be sufficiently near to Rachel's sepulchre.

Zur (fr. Heb. = a rock, edge, cut, Ges.). 1. Father of Cozbi (Num. xxv. 15), and one of the five princes of Midian slain by the Israelites when Balaam fell (xxx. 8).—2. A Benjamite, son of Jehiel the founder of Gibeon (1 Chr. viii. 30, ix. 36).

Zu'ri-el (fr. Heb. = my rock is God, Ges.), son of Abihail, and chief of the Merarite Levites at the Exodus (Num. iii. 36).

Zu-ri-shad'da-l, or Zu-ri-shad'dal (fr. Heb. = my rock is the Almighty, Ges.), father of Shelumiel, the chief of Simeon at the Exodus (Num. i. 6, ii. 12, vii. 36, 41, x. 19).

Zu'zim (Heb. pl. = strong people, LXX., Targum of Onkelos, Samaritan Version; the wanderers, Lo Clerc; dwarfs, Michaelis; flowing out, abounding, from the fertility of the soil? Ges.; the prominent ones, giants, Fü.), Zu'zims [-zimz] (fr. Heb.), the; an ancient people attacked and overthrown by Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gen. xiv. 5 only). There is some plausibility in the suggestion of Ewald, that the Zuzim inhabited the country of the Ammonites, and were = the ZAMZUMMIM, who were exterminated and succeeded in their land by the Ammonites (so Mr. Grove). GIANTS; HAIR; HAM 2.
